START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

APRIL 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-027

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholar-ship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 27

Volume 51

BSO

Pops

1928-1929

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 51

BSO
Pops

1928 - 1929

Modern Music to Get Hearing at Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, snapped today while seated at the piano in his home in Jamaica Plain.

TRAV SEPT 28

Koussevitzky, Just Home from Europe, Enthusiastic Over His Plans for Season's Concerts; Has No Use for Routine

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who scoffs at traditions, is going to scoff some more during the current musical season which opens next month.

MORE MODERN MUSIC

He is going to introduce more modern music in this season's program. He said so today at his home on Lockstead avenue, Jamaica Plain, to which he has just returned, following his summer's trip abroad with Mme. Koussevitzky.

Alert and soldierly, the conductor strode into the room, his blue eyes agleam, fingered the keys of his favorite piano, and playing a soft melody, said as though in an aside: "Well?"

And immediately he let his interviewer understand that he anticipates a notable season with the Symphony. Always noted for his disdain of plain routine, his program this year is to be more unorthodox than ever; there will be more modern compositions on the list. Of that he is very enthusiastic.

NEW COMPOSERS ON LIST

He has brought many interesting works here for the season. He is introducing five new composers. Here they are: Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Hindemith, Toch, and—hold your breath! Frederick the Great! But more about him later.

Some of Stravinsky's compositions have been heard here, but not enough so that they have been an accepted feature, and so Koussevitzky really calls him new on the list. The first four of this list are sufficiently modern and different to excite the interest of every music lover.

About Frederick the Great. He was much interested in the arts and sciences and music. He composed a symphony. It is that symphony, in three parts, that Koussevitzky is to introduce to America for the first time.

Selection of this symphony is in itself a notable departure. And there will probably be more discussion about than any one single feature of the entire season.

Meanwhile, Koussevitzky's face lights up when he mentions it. Suffice for him to say of it: "Very, very interesting, this symphony." Which is a tip-off that something of the unusual is to happen.

Of the coming season, he said: "It seems very, very good to be back here. Boston is the greatest musical centre. I will give to Boston's public all that I can, and I leave it to the listeners to judge."

Koussevitzky is preparing for the opening orchestra rehearsal next Monday.

IN THE CONCERT HALLS

Boston Symphony Orchestra for Oct. 5 —Thereafter, Familiar Voices, Noted Players

The first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season will be on Friday afternoon, Oct. 5. This season will be the 48th, and the fifth under direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, who sails from France on Wednesday. The Friday and Saturday series are solidly subscribed, those on the waiting lists having engaged such seats as were released last spring. There will also be the usual series of five Monday evening concerts, beginning on Nov. 12th, and the series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts; nine concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and Pension Fund concerts in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoons.

An imposing list of great singers and virtuosos is scheduled to appear in Symphony hall during the new musical season. Mr. Kreisler will open the regular series of Sunday afternoon concerts on Oct. 14. Mme. Farrar will sing on Sunday, Oct. 21, and the English Singers will appear on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 28. Mr. Koussevitzky will give a recital as a virtuoso of the double bass in Symphony hall on Monday evening, Oct. 15. He will be assisted by Henri Casadesus, virtuoso of the viola d'amore and founder of the Society of Ancient Instruments. This will be Mr. Koussevitzky's second double-bass recital in America. The first was given as a charity concert last autumn. Mr. Horowitz will give a recital on Sunday evening, Oct. 21. Theremin will bring to Boston on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 7, his new invention whereby he makes music by movements of his fingers in the air. On Sunday evening, Oct. 28, Pompeo's Band will give a concert with Maria Mantovani, soprano, as soloist.

Other artists to appear on Sunday afternoons in the course of the season will include Galli-Curci, Hayes, Schipa, Werrenrath, Heifetz, Gieseking, Casals, Rachmaninoff, Menuhin, Spalding, Louise Homer and daughter, Hofmann, and McCormack.

[illegible] Leginska, with her Boston Womens' Symphony orchestra, opens a seven-weeks' tour, under direction of A. H. Handley, at Bloomsburg, Pa., on Friday, Oct. 26. Concerts also will be given at Washington, Pennsylvania State College, Akron and Cleveland, O.; Buffalo, and in middle western cities. The usual Boston concerts will be resumed in December. The orchestra during the past summer provided a concert cycle of orchestral programs at Conneaut Lake, playing 13 performances in a period of seven days, including concert performances of the opera "Faust," Handel's "Messiah" and formal symphony programs.

Edith Mason, long identified with the Chicago Civic opera company, will appear, early in October, as the first of a group of internationally known artists to be heard in Sunday evening concerts in the Copley-Plaza ballroom. Others announced are Mary Garden, Rosa Raisa, Tito Schipa, George Baklanoff, Cyrena Van Gordon, Ethel Leginska, Horace Britt, Richard Bonelli, Marguerite D'Alvarez, Mary Roselli, Carmela Ippoliti and the Gordon string quartet. Mme. Amelia Conti, concert manager of the Chicago Civic opera company, and Arthur L. Race, managing director of the Copley-Plaza, will be sponsors.

Aaron Richmond announces that the opening Jordan hall recital of the season on Oct. 18, will be given by Luther Emerson, baritone. Jean Duncan, soprano, will make her Boston debut on the 19th. Rita Neve, an English pianist, to be heard here for the first time on the 24th; Jean Bedetti, the popular solo 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with the assistance of Felix Fox, pianist, on the 25th; Guy Maier in one of his young people's concerts on the morning of the 27th, and the Brahms quartette, in a program of "vocal chamber music," on the afternoon of that date, also are announced.

Under Mr. Richmond's direction the New England tour of the New York Theatre Guild Repertory company will include appearances in Andover, Worcester, Hartford and at Wellesley College.

MINNEAPOLIS ORCHESTRA

The soloists for the concerts of the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra will be: Singers, Mmes. Meisle, Melius, Austral and Messrs. Crooks and Tibbett; violinists, Mme. Chenot, and Messrs. Heifetz and Spalding; pianists, Messrs. Hutcheson, Reuter, Rosenthal, and Shattuck. The first concert will be on Oct. 19. Henri Verbrugghan will conduct (his sixth year); Harold Ayres is the concert master. During the orchestra's mid-winter tour, which opens at Chicago on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 13, the orchestra will make its first visit to southern Florida and Havana, Cuba. Among the re-engagements to be filled during this tour are New Orleans, La., Atlanta, Ga., Nashville, Tenn., Louisville, Ky., Indianapolis, Ind., and Pittsburgh, Pa. At the close of the home season the orchestra will make its usual spring festival tour, covering the states of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma and Texas.

CONCERTS AND OPERAS

SEPT 23 1929 SUN. HER.

Javanese Music Impresses Stokowski— "The Beggar's Opera" in German

The People's [illegible]hony orchestra will give a series of 20 Sunday afternoon concerts in the Hotel Statler ballroom, starting Oct. 21, at 3 P. M.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who should arrive in New York some day this coming week, is bringing from Europe scores of considerable interest and importance which will figure on the coming season's programs by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The centennial of Franz Schubert, who died Nov. 19, 1828, will be duly observed in the season's concerts. Rehearsals will start immediately on Mr. Koussevitsky's arrival here, and the first concerts will be given in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 5, and Saturday evening, Oct. 6.

GLOBE—

SEPTEMBER 23, 1928

The Boston Symphony is announced this season as containing 112 musicians. If the annual increase by twos and threes continues the orchestra will some day crowd the audience out of Symphony Hall. Not so many years since an orchestra of 90 was a record breaker and 60 players were deemed adequate by Theodore Thomas for the tours of his famous orchestra. But there are many works which demand 100 or more performers if the composer's desires are to be carried out. Whether any of these works are as great as Mozart's G minor Symphony, which can be properly played by an orchestra of between 30 and 40, is a question perhaps irrelevant.

Koussevitzky Letter by Air from Ile de France

Among Boston-directed letters brought here by the catapulted seaplane from the liner Ile de France last night was one from Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who landed at New York from the steamer today. It was post-marked on the liner Sunday afternoon and gave instructions to W. H. Brennan, orchestra manager here, for the rehearsals which begin next week and the opening of the concert season, slated for Oct. 11. Koussevitzky will remain in New York a day or two before returning to Boston.

HILL, SMITH & CO. (INC.)
STATIONERS AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET, BOSTON.
Job No. 1916
Duplicate this book by sending the above number.

[i] chaff. H. T. P.

Concert-Calendar

First Symphonies

THE forty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the fifth with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor will begin with the pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. The program will include: Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Hindemith's Concerto for Orchestra, Op. 38; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

Recitals, Variously

Kajaloff, Russian 'cellist, will play at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening at 8.30 P. M. The selections included on the program are: Beethoven's Sonata in A Major, Haydn's Concerto in D, adagio by Bach, minuet by Debussy, and sonata by Henry Eccles, arranged by Salmon.

Leon Theremin, young Russian inventor, with his new and strange device by which he produces "ether music," will be at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 7. Not content with his past accomplishments, he contemplates eventually a forty-piece electrical orchestra, but for the present and at his coming appearance he will confine himself to demonstration of the one "Theremin Vox." The program is yet to be announced.

Latest information forthcoming on Mr. Koussevitzky's recital on the double-bass, which is planned for Oct. 15, lets it be known that he will play for the first time in this country his Valse Miniature, together with his own double-bass Concerto. The rest of the program will be made up of short solo numbers with concerted music of the Eighteenth Century written for the double-bass and the viola d'amore. The latter instrument will be played by M. Henri Casadesus.

CONCERTS IN PROSPECT

Jean Kayaloff, Russian 'cellist, will present this program at a concert in Jordan hall, Thursday evening, Oct. 4, at 8:30: Beethoven, sonata, A major; Haydn, concerto in D; Bach, adagio; Debussy, menuet; Eocles, sonata, arranged by Salmon.

The Roth quartet of Budapest through the courtesy and generosity of Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, will give a concert in John Knowles Paine hall of the Music building, Harvard University, Thursday evening, Oct. 4, at 8:15. The program, open to the public, admission free, will include quartets by Mozart and Bartok, and a quintet for strings by [illegible].

The Boston Symphony orchestra opens its 48th season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The program: Beethoven Overture to Leonore, No. 3; Debussy two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, Op. 38, and Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

[illegible] soprano, and Claudius J. Broadfield, tenor, will give a joint recital in Jordan hall Sunday afternoon, Oct. 7, at 3:30.

Concerted music of the 18th century, written for the double-bass and viola d'amore, will be played by Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus, foremost masters of these old instruments, at their recital to be given in Symphony hall on Monday eve., Oct.

SUN. HER. SEPT 30 '28

Bos. Eve. American.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1928

Koussevitzky Will Play Bass in Joint Recital

Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus, foremost living masters of the double-bass and viola d'amore, will play concerted music for these old instruments of the 18th century at their recital in Symphony Hall, on Monday evening, October 15. Koussevitzky will then play his own "Double-bass Concerto" and his own "Valse Miniature," together with other short solo numbers.

Boston Sunday Advertiser

SEPTEMBER 30, 1928

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT ON FRIDAY

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 48th season.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct in the following program: Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

KOUSSEVITZKY IN UNUSUAL RECITAL

Concerted music of the 18th century, written for the double-bass and viola d'amore, will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus at their recital in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, October 15.

Koussevitzky will then also play his own double-bass concerto, "Valse Miniature," together with other [illegible] numbers.

SEPT 29 - TRAVELER

CONCERT - CALENDAR

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 48th season. Serge Koussevitzky will then be heard in the following program: Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 3; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals;" Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, Op. 38, and Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

KOUSSEVITZKY'S PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus, foremost living masters of the double-bass and viola d'amore, will play together concerted music for these old instruments of the 18th century at their recital to be given in Symphony Hall, on Monday evening, Oct. 15.

Koussevitzky will then play his own double-bass concerto and his own valse miniature, together with other short solo numbers. Casadesus is journeying from Paris especially to assist Koussevitzky in this program.

NEW WORKS ON LIST FOR SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky to Give Several for First Time

SEPT 29 - 1928

Serge Koussevitzky is back in town, ready and eager for the opening of the Symphony season next Friday afternoon, and as usual full of enthusiasm for the new works which he has in store for Boston.

DOUBLE BASS RECORDS

Four days ago Mr. Koussevitzky with Mme. Koussevitzky landed in New York after their customary summer in Europe, and while Mme. Koussevitzky proceeded immediately to Boston the conductor stayed behind to make phonograph recordings of his performance upon the double-bass, arriving here early yesterday morning.

At his Jamaica Plain home yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky was altogether willing to divulge his conductorial plans, touching first upon the two Pension Fund Concerts that will mark Boston's observance of the centenary of Schubert's death that now engrosses the entire musical world.

Three New Symphonies

But it was of his new pieces that the conductor was most eager to speak, and his recital was repeatedly punctuated with the comment that the forthcoming season would be "very, very interesting."

Again European as well as American composers have entrusted Mr. Koussevitzky and our orchestra with the first performances of their newest works. Among these world premiers will be those of new symphonies by Prokofieff, Martinu and the little-known younger Frenchman, Janin, and of new pieces, otherwise unspecified, by Aaron Copland and Roger Sessions, as well as of the orchestral fragments from a new ballet by Stravinsky, the music for whose "Apollo Musagetes" will also be made known to us. On the latter ballet, first performed in Washington last spring, Mr. Koussevitzky lavished praise, taking issue with a musician concerned in that performance who had dismissed the work as negligible. "You may like Stravinsky or you may dislike him," said Mr. Koussevitzky, "but he is never 'nothing.'"

By Frederick the Great

Among the pieces new to Boston will be compositions by the Germans, Hindemith, Toch and Hauer, the Hungarian Kodaly and the Swiss-American Bloch (the new prize symphony "America"), not to mention Gustav Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," which of itself fills an evening. For revivals will come Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "Don Quixote" and the Eighth Symphony of Bruckner, like Mahler, a composer long neglected in Symphony Hall. All four of the symphonies of Schumann will be performed this year, and Boston will hear for the first time a symphony by Frederick the Great, who was composer as well as skillful performer on the flute.

During the summer Mr. Koussevitzky was occupied with the hearing and the conducting of music in Paris and with mountaineering, in company with his friend Prokofieff, in the French Alps. It may be added that in the course of the four concerts which he conducted in Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky introduced no less than 13 works to the Parisian public.

Bos. Sunday Globe Sep. 30 '29

PICTURES AND MUSICIANS

Music Notes and Comment

The Boston Symphony season which begins this week gives promise of being one of the most successful the orchestra has ever had. All subscription tickets for both Friday and Saturday were sold last Spring to people on the waiting list. Very few places for the five Monday and five Tuesday concerts now remain unsubscribed.

Mr Koussevitzky's first program is as usual composed chiefly of familiar repertory pieces, since rehearsal time has been limited. Hindemith's concerto for orchestra is the only unfamiliar number. It has been played here but once before. The composer is a German modernist much discussed of late years.

The People's Choral Union will open [illegible] season Oct 7 with a rehearsal at Recital Hall, New England Conservatory of Music. James R. Houghton has been retained as conductor, and all of last year's chorus have signified their intention of continuing to be members. Mr Houghton will accept new singers, as he wishes to enlarge the chorus. Three concerts at Jordan Hall are planned for this year. The works to be sung will include Schubert's "Miriam's Song of Triumph," Franck's Mass in A, and Handel's "Samson." Rehearsals will be held Sundays from 4 to 5:30 p m. Classes in voice building and tone placement will be held Sundays at 3. This chorus offers an admirable and worth-while opportunity for everyone who likes to sing. Under Mr Houghton's conductorship it was last season notably successful in all it undertook.

Jean Kayaloff, a Russian cellist will make his Boston debut Thursday evening at Jordan Hall, in a program of unusually high musical quality, including Beethoven's great sonata in A. This is the first recital of [illegible] promises to be a very crowded musical season.

Ruth Redefer, who will give her first Boston recital at Jordan Hall Oct 17, is a young pianist from Nashville, Tenn, where her father was professor of Greek in Vanderbilt University. She is herself a college graduate and a member of Phi Beta Kappa, and holds the degree of master of arts from Northwestern University in economics and political science. She has been a pianist from childhood and has given successful recitals in Chicago and many Western and Southern cities.

Prof Theremin's demonstration next Sunday at Symphony Hall of his new instrument, described at length in this section of last Sunday's Globe, is rousing much interest not only among [illegible]s but among students of applied science and people interested in the technical side of radio.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to mark the centenary of Schubert's death next November by playing a program of his music.

Mrs W. O. Taylor, soprano, and [illegible]us J. Broadfield, tenor, will give next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 in Jordan Hall a joint recital, featuring [illegible] ensemble.

Hope Hampton, who started her career by winning a beauty contest at Houston, Tex, and then became a movie star, has at last attained the grand opera stage She will make her debute Nov 29 as Mimi in "Boheme" with the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company and later is scheduled to sing "Manon."

Miss Hampton first sang in Philadelphia in "Madame Pompadour" some seasons back, but was dropped from the cast when the company came to New York. She appeared here last year in "My Princess." Miss Hampton's teacher is Estelle Liebling.

George Gershwin has been invited to compose an original symphony to be played by the 110-piece orchestra of the Roxy Theatre in New York.

Fritz Kreisler will open a crowded and important month of recitals in Symphony Hall when he gives the first Sunday afternoon concert there Oct 14.

Geraldine Farrar will sing on the following Sunday afternoon, Oct 21, and the English Singers will return Sunday afternoon, Oct 28.

Vladimir Horowitz, the phenomenal young Russian pianist, will give his second Boston recital Sunday evening, Oct 21. Pompeo's Band, with Maria [illegible], soprano, as soloist, will [illegible] Sunday.

Concerted music of the 18th century, written for the double-bass and viola d'amore, will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus, foremost masters of these old instruments, at their recital to be given in Symphony Hall Monday evening, Oct 15.

Koussevitzky will then also play his own double-bass Concerto, and for the first time in this country, his own Valse Miniature—together with other short solo numbers. This will be Koussevitzky's second double-bass recital in America.

Henri Casadesus, founder of the French "Society of Ancient Instruments," is coming from Europe for the purpose of assisting in this program.

The [illegible] Music Association of Chicago and the Orchestral Association announce that the Civic Orchestra will resume its work for the season early in October. Examinations for membership in the orchestra will be held Oct 9th. As in the past the destinies of the organization will be guided by Frederick Stock assisted by Eric DeLamarter and there will be free classes in Orchestra Repertory, Chamber Music, Sight Reading, etc, as well as full rehearsals under the direction of Mr Stock and Mr DeLamarter. That the work of the Civic Orchestra in training young musicians for the career of symphony playing has borne good fruit may be realized from the fact that its members are found in such famous organizations as the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, the Minneapolis Orchestra.

Rome." These works have caused Alfredo Casella to nickname him "the Baedecker of Italian Music." Signor Respighi will attend the Metropolitan's first performance of his opera, "The Sunken Bell," and play the piano part of his new Toccata with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in New York on Nov 29 and 30. The composer will be accompanied to this country by his wife, Elsa Olivieri Sanglacomo, a soprano.

Globe

MUSI

SEPT 9 1928

OCTOBER CONCERTS ANNOUNCED

Advance announcements indicate that October, the first month of the new musical season, will be a busy one for musical reviewers. The season opens with the first pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Oct 5 and 6. All season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons and 24 Saturday evening concerts of the 48th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been sold. Those on the waiting list last Spring engaged every seat released.

The only places to be had for the regular series in this, the fifth year of Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship here, are the rush seats, unreserved, on Fridays, and such single tickets as may be turned in by subscribers to be sold at the box office for the benefit of the orchestra's endowment fund.

The Boston Symphony will offer the usual extra series of five Monday evening and five Tuesday afternoon concerts, nine concerts at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and several pension fund concerts at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoons.

Mr Koussevitzky's double bass recital, the second he has given here, will be at Symphony Hall Monday evening, Oct 15. He is also to make his New York debut as a double bass player at Carnegie Hall Tuesday evening, Oct 23. Henri Casadesus, the distinguished French player on the viola d'amore, will assist Mr Koussevitzky. Leon Theremin, the young Rus[illegible]

Mike. SUN. GLOBE SEP. 30

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERTS

With Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3 Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the 48th season of that organization and Mr. Koussevitzky's fifth as its conductor. Beethoven, too, will close the programme of this season's first pair of concerts, with the "Eroica" Symphony. Between will come Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the Concerto for Orchestra by Paul Hindemith first made known to Boston three seasons ago by Mr. Koussevitzky.

TRAVELER SEP. 28 1928

CONCERT - CALENDAR

Serge Koussevitzky is now on his way from Europe on the Ile de France, which will dock in New York in the middle of next week. The famous conductor will immediately assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal, in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 5, and Saturday evening, Oct. 6. This will be the 48th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the fifth season under Koussevitzky's leadership.

Koussevitzky is bringing with him from Europe scores of considerable interest and importance which will figure on the coming season's programs.

In addition to the Friday and Saturday series of 48 concerts in Symphony hall, there will be the usual series of five Monday evening and five Tuesday afternoon concerts.

OCTOBER CONCERTS

The regular Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony hall will open on Oct. 14 with the appearance of Fritz Kreisler. Geraldine Farrar will sing on the following Sunday afternoon, Oct. 21, and the English Singers will appear on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 28.

Serge Koussevitzky, besides opening the Boston Symphony season on Oct. 5, will give a recital on his double-bass on Monday evening, Oct. 15. This will be his second recital in America as double-bass virtuoso. He will then be assisted by Henri Casadesus, the famous French specialist in old instruments.

Vladimir Horowitz, the young pianist who carried America by storm when he first came here last season, will give his second Boston recital when he appears in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, Oct. 21.

Pompeo's band will appear on Sunday evening, Oct. 28, with Maria Mantovani, as soloist.

chaff. H. T. P.

Concert-Calendar

Sept 29 Trans.

First Symphonies

THE forty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the fifth with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor will begin with the pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. The program will include: Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Hindemith's Concerto for Orchestra, Op. 38; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

Recitals, Variously

Kalaloff, Russian 'cellist, will play at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening at 8.30 P. M. The selections included on the program are: Beethoven's Sonata in A Major, Haydn's Concerto in D, adagio by Bach, minuet by Debussy, and sonata by Henry Eccles, arranged by Salmon.

Leon Theremin, young Russian inventor, with his new and strange device by which he produces "ether music," will be at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 7. Not content with his past accomplishments, he contemplates eventually a forty-piece electrical orchestra, but for the present and at his coming appearance he will confine himself to demonstration of the one "Theremin Vox." The program is yet to be announced.

Latest information forthcoming on Mr. Koussevitzky's recital on the double-bass, which is planned for Oct. 15, lets it be known that he will play for the first time in this country his Valse Miniature, together with his own double-bass Concerto. The rest of the program will be made up of short solo numbers with concerted music of the Eighteenth Century written for the double-bass and the viola d'amore. The latter instrument will be played by M. Henri Casadesus.

Bos. Eve. American.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1928

Koussevitzky Will Play Bass in Joint Recital

Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus, foremost living masters of the double-bass and viola d'amore, will play concerted music for these old instruments of the 18th century at their recital in Symphony Hall, on Monday evening, October 15. Koussevitzky will then play his own "Double-bass Concerto" and his own "Valse Miniature," together with other short solo numbers.

Boston Sunday Advertiser

SEPTEMBER 30, 1928

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT ON FRIDAY

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 48th season.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct in the following program: Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals;" Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

KOUSSEVITZKY IN UNUSUAL RECITAL

Concerted music of the 18th century, written for the double-bass and viola d'amore, will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus at their recital in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, October 15.

Koussevitzky will then also play his own double-bass concerto, "Valse Miniature," together with other short numbers.

Sept 29-Traveler

Concert-Calendar

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 48th season. Serge Koussevitzky will then be heard in the following program: Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 3; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals;" Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, Op. 38, and Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

KOUSSEVITZKY'S PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus, foremost living masters of the double-bass and viola d'amore, will play together concerted music for these old instruments of the 18th century at their recital to be given in Symphony Hall, on Monday evening, Oct. 15.

Koussevitzky will then play his own double-bass concerto and his own valse miniature, together with other short solo numbers. Casadesus is journeying from Paris especially to assist Koussevitzky in this program.

CONCERTS IN PROSPECT

Jean Kayaloff, Russian 'cellist, will present this program at a concert in Jordan hall, Thursday evening, Oct. 4, at 8:30: Beethoven, sonata, A major; Haydn, concerto in D; Bach, adagio; Debussy, menuet; Eccles, sonata, arranged by Salmon.

The Roth quartet of Budapest, through the courtesy and generosity of Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, will give a concert in John Knowles Paine hall of the Music building, Harvard University, Thursday evening, Oct. 4, at 8:15. The program, open to the public, admission free, will include quartets by Mozart and Bartok, and a quintet for strings by M...

The Boston Symphony orchestra opens its 48th season next Friday a... noon and Saturday evening in ... phony hall, Serge Koussevitzky ... ducting. The program: Beetho... Overture to Leonore, No. 3; Debu... two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "... vals"; Hindemith's concerto for ... tra, Op. 38, and Beethoven's sy... No. 3, "Eroica."

... W. O. Taylor, soprano, and Claudius J. Broadfield, tenor, will ... a joint recital in Jordan hall Su... afternoon, Oct. 7, at 3:30.

Concerted music of the 18th ... written for the double-bass ... la d'amore, will be played by ... Koussevitzky and Henri Casade... foremost masters of these old ins... ments, at their recital to be given ... Symphony hall on Monday eve., Oct. ...

NEW WORKS ON LIST FOR SYMPHONY

Mr. Koussevitzky to Give Several for First Time

SEPT 29-1928

Serge Koussevitzky is back in town, ready and eager for the opening of the Symphony season next Friday afternoon, and as usual full of enthusiasm for the new works which he has in store for Boston.

DOUBLE BASS RECORDS

Four days ago Mr. Koussevitzky with Mme. Koussevitzky landed in New York after their customary summer in Europe, and while Mme. Koussevitzky proceeded immediately to Boston the conductor stayed behind to make phonograph recordings of his performance upon the double-bass, arriving here early yesterday morning.

At his Jamaica Plain home yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky was altogether willing to divulge his conductorial plans, touching first upon the two Pension Fund Concerts that will mark Boston's observance of the centenary of Schubert's death that now engrosses the entire musical world.

Three New Symphonies

But it was of his new pieces that the conductor was most eager to speak, and his recital was repeatedly punctuated with the comment that the forthcoming season would be "very, very interesting."

Again European as well as American composers have entrusted Mr. Koussevitzky and our orchestra with the first performances of their newest works. Among these world premiers will be those of new symphonies by Prokofieff, Martinu and the little-known younger Frenchman, Janin, and of new pieces, otherwise unspecified, by Aaron Copland and Roger Sessions, as well as of the orchestral fragments from a new ballet by Stravinsky, the music for whose "Apollo Musagetes" will also be made known to us. On the latter ballet, first performed in Washington last spring, Mr. Koussevitzky lavished praise, taking issue with a musician concerned in that performance who had dismissed the work as negligible. "You may like Stravinsky or you may dislike him," said Mr. Koussevitzky, "but he is never 'nothing.'"

By Frederick the Great

Among the pieces new to Boston will be compositions by the Germans, Hindemith, Toch and Hauer, the Hungarian Kodaly and the Swiss-American Bloch (the new prize symphony "America"), not to mention Gustav Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," which of itself fills an evening. For revivals will come Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "Don Quixote" and the Eighth Symphony of Bruckner, like Mahler, a composer long neglected in Symphony Hall. All four of the symphonies of Schumann will be performed this year, and Boston will hear for the first time a symphony by Frederick the Great, who was composer as well as skillful performer on the flute.

During the summer Mr. Koussevitzky was occupied with the hearing and the conducting of music in Paris and with mountaineering, in company with his friend Prokofieff, in the French Alps. It may be added that in the course of the four concerts which he conducted in Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky introduced no less than 13 works to the Parisian public.

Bos. Sunday Globe Sep 30 '29

PICTURES AND MUSICIANS

Music Notes and Comment

The Boston Symphony season which begins this week gives promise of being one of the most successful the orchestra has ever had. All subscription tickets for both Friday and Saturday were sold last Spring to people on the waiting list. Very few places for the five Monday and five Tuesday concerts now remain unsubscribed.

Mr Koussevitzky's first program is as usual composed chiefly of familiar repertory pieces, since rehearsal time has been limited. Hindemith's concerto for orchestra is the only unfamiliar number. It has been played here but once before. The composer is a German modernist much discussed of late years.

The People's Choral Union will open ... season Oct 7 with a rehearsal at Recital Hall, New England Conservatory of Music. James R. Houghton has been retained as conductor, and all of last year's chorus have signified their intention of continuing to be members. Mr Houghton will accept new singers, as he wishes to enlarge the chorus. Three concerts at Jordan Hall are planned for this year. The works to be sung will include Schubert's "Miriam's Song of Triumph," Franck's Mass in A, and Handel's "Samson." Rehearsals will be held Sundays from 4 to 5:30 p m. Classes in voice building and tone placement will be held Sundays at 3. This chorus offers an admirable and worth-while opportunity for everyone who likes to sing. Under Mr Houghton's conductorship it was last season notably successful in all it undertook.

Jean Kayaloff, a Russian cellis... will make his Boston debut Thursd... evening at Jordan Hall, in a progr... of unusually high musical qua..., including Beethoven's great sonat... A. This is the first recital of ... promises to be a very crowded m... season.

Ruth Redefer, who will giv... her first Boston recital at Jordan Hall Oct 17, is a young pianist from ... Nashville, Tenn, where her father wa... professor of Greek in Vanderbilt U... versity. She is herself a college grad... uate and a member of Phi Beta Ka... and holds the degree of master of arts from Northwestern Univer... in economics and political scienc... She has been a pianist from child... hood and has given successful re... citals in Chicago and many Western and Southern cities.

Prof Theremin's demonstration next Sunday at Symphony Hall of his new instrument, described at length in this section of last Sunday's Globe, is rousing much interest not only among ... but among students of ap... plied science and people interested in the technical side of radio.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to mark the centenary of Schubert's death next November by playing a program of his music.

Mrs W. O. Taylor, soprano, and ... us J. Broadfield, tenor, will give next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 in Jordan Hall a joint recital, featuring ... matic excerpts ...

Rome." These works have caused Alfredo Casella to nickname him "the Baedecker of Italian Music." Signor Respighi will attend the Metropolitan's first performance of his opera, "The Sunken Bell," and play the piano part of his new Toccata with the Philharmic-Symphony Orchestra in New York on Nov 29 and 30. The composer will be accompanied to this country by his wife, Elsa Olivieri Sanglacomo, a soprano.

Hope Hampton, who started her career by winning a beauty contest at Houston, Tex, and then became a movie star, has at last attained the grand opera stage She will make her debute Nov 29 as Mimi in "Boheme" with the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company and later is scheduled to sing "Manon."

Miss Hampton first sang in Philadelphia in "Madame Pompadour" some seasons back, but was dropped from the cast when the company came to New York. She appeared here last year in "My Princess." Miss Hampton's teacher is Estelle Liebling.

George Gershwin has been invited to compose an original symphony to be played by the 110-piece orchestra of the Roxy Theatre in New York.

Fritz Kreisler will open a crowded and important month of recitals in Symphony Hall when he gives the first Sunday afternoon concert there Oct 14.

Geraldine Farrar will sing on the following Sunday afternoon, Oct 21, and the English Singers will return Sunday afternoon, Oct 28.

Vladimir Horowitz, the phenomenal young Russian pianist, will give his second Boston recital Sunday evening, Oct 21. Pompeo's Band, with Maria Mantovani, soprano, as soloist, will ... Sunday ...

Concerted music of the 18th century, written for the double-bass and viola d'amore, will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus, foremost masters of these old instruments, at their recital to be given in Symphony Hall Monday evening, Oct 15.

Koussevitzky will then also play his own double-bass Concerto, and for the first time in this country, his own Valse Miniature—together with other short solo numbers. This will be Koussevitzky's second double-bass recital in America.

Henri Casadesus, founder of the French "Society of Ancient Instruments," is coming from Europe for the purpose of assisting in this program.

The ... Music Association of Chicago and the Orchestral Association announce that the Civic Orchestra will resume its work for the season early in October. Examinations for membership in the orchestra will be held Oct 9th. As in the past the destinies of the organization will be guided by Frederick Stock assisted by Eric DeLamarter and there will be free classes in Orchestra Repertory, Chamber Music, Sight Reading, etc, as well as full rehearsals under the direction of Mr Stock and Mr DeLamarter. That the work of the Civic Orchestra in training young musicians for the career of symphony playing has borne good fruit may be realized from the fact that its members are found in such famous organizations as the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, the Minne... Orchestra ...

SUN. HER. SEP 30 29

spoke. Sun. Globe Sep. 30

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERTS

With Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3 Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the 48th season of that organization and Mr. Koussevitzky's fifth as its conductor. Beethoven, too, will close the programme of this season's first pair of concerts, with the "Eroica" Symphony. Between will come Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the Concerto for Orchestra by Paul Hindemith first made known to Boston three seasons ago by Mr. Koussevitzky.

Globe Sept 9 1928

MUSI

OCTOBER CONCERTS ANNOUNCED

Advance announcements indicate that October, the first month of the new musical season, will be a busy one for musical reviewers. The season opens with the first pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Oct 5 and 6. All season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons and 24 Saturday evening concerts of the 48th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been sold. Those on the waiting list last Spring engaged every seat released.

The only places to be had for the regular series in this, the fifth year of Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship here, are the rush seats, unreserved, on Fridays, and such single tickets as may be turned in by subscribers to be sold at the box office for the benefit of the orchestra's endowment fund.

The Boston Symphony will offer the usual extra series of five Monday evening and five Tuesday afternoon concerts, nine concerts at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and several pension fund concerts at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoons.

Mr Koussevitzky's double bass recital, the second he has given here, will be at Symphony Hall Monday evening, Oct 15. He is also to make his New York debut as a double bass player at Carnegie Hall Tuesday evening Oct 23. Henri Casadesus, the distinguished French player on the viola d'amore, will assist Mr Koussevitzky. Leon Theremin, the young Rus...

Traveler Sep. 22, 1928.

Concert-Calendar

Serge Koussevitzky is now on his way from Europe on the Ile de France, which will dock in New York in the middle of next week. The famous conductor will immediately assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal, in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 5, and Saturday evening, Oct. 6. This will be the 48th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the fifth season under Koussevitzky's leadership.

Koussevitzky is bringing with him from Europe scores of considerable interest and importance which will figure on the coming season's programs.

In addition to the Friday and Saturday series of 48 concerts in Symphony hall, there will be the usual series of five Monday evening and five Tuesday afternoon concerts.

OCTOBER CONCERTS

The regular Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony hall will open on Oct. 14 with the appearance of Fritz Kreisler. Geraldine Farrar will sing on the following Sunday afternoon, Oct. 21, and the English Singers will appear on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 28.

Serge Koussevitzky, besides opening the Boston Symphony season on Oct. 5, will give a recital on his double-bass on Monday evening, Oct. 15. This will be his second recital in America as double-bass virtuoso. He will then be assisted by Henri Casadesus, the famous French specialist in old instruments.

Vladimir Horowitz, the young pianist who carried America by storm when he first came here last season, will give his second Boston recital when he appears in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, Oct. 21.

Pompeo's band will appear on Sunday evening, Oct. 28, with Maria Mantovani, as soloist.

chaff H. T. P. Sept 29

Concert-Calendar

Trans.

First Symphonies

THE forty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the fifth with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor will begin with the pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. The program will include: Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Hindemith's Concerto for Orchestra, Op. 38; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

Recitals, Variously

Kajaloff, Russian 'cellist, will play at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening at 8.30 P. M. The selections included on the program are: Beethoven's Sonata in A Major, Haydn's Concerto in D, adagio by Bach, minuet by Debussy, and sonata by Henry Eccles, arranged by Salmon.

Leon Theremin, young Russian inventor, with his new and strange device by which he produces "ether music," will be at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 7. Not content with his past accomplishments, he contemplates eventually a forty-piece electrical orchestra, but for the present and at his coming appearance he will confine himself to demonstration of the one "Theremin Vox." The program is yet to be announced.

Latest information forthcoming on Mr. Koussevitzky's recital on the double-bass, which is planned for Oct. 15, lets it be known that he will play for the first time in this country his Valse Miniature, together with his own double-bass Concerto. The rest of the program will be made up of short solo numbers with concerted music of the Eighteenth Century written for the double-bass and the viola d'amore. The latter instrument will be played by M. Henri Casadesus.

Bos. Eve. American.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1928

Koussevitzky Will Play Bass in Joint Recital

Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus, foremost living masters of the double-bass and viola d'amore, will play concerted music for these old instruments of the 18th century at their recital in Symphony Hall, on Monday evening, October 15. Koussevitzky will then play his own "Double-bass Concerto" and his own "Valse Miniature," together with other short solo numbers.

Boston Sunday Advertiser

SEPTEMBER 30, 1928

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT ON FRIDAY

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 48th season.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct in the following program: Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

KOUSSEVITZKY IN UNUSUAL RECITAL

Concerted music of the 18th century, written for the double-bass and viola d'amore, will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus at their recital in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, October 15.

Koussevitzky will then also play his own double-bass concerto and his own "Valse Miniature," together with other short solo numbers.

Sept 29-Traveler

Concert-Calendar

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 48th season. Serge Koussevitzky will then be heard in the following program: Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 3; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals;" Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, Op. 38, and Beethoven's symphony No. 3, Eroica."

KOUSSEVITZKY'S PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus, foremost living masters of the double-bass and viola d'amore, will play together concerted music for these old instruments of the 18th century at their recital to be given in Symphony Hall, on Monday evening, Oct. 15.

Koussevitzky will then play his own double-bass concerto and his own Valse miniature, together with other short solo numbers. Casadesus is journeying from Paris especially to assist Koussevitzky in this program.

CONCERTS IN PROSPECT

Jean Kayaloff, Russian 'cellist, will present this program at a concert in Jordan hall, Thursday evening, Oct. 4, at 8:30: Beethoven, sonata, A major; Haydn, concerto in D; Bach, adagio; Debussy, menuet; Eccles, sonata, arranged by Salmon.

The Roth quartet of Budapest, through the courtesy and generosity of Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge, will give a concert in John Knowles Paine hall of the Music building, Harvard University, Thursday evening, Oct. 4, at 8:15. The program, open to the public, admission free, will include quartets by Mozart and Bartok, and a quintet for strings by [illegible].

The Boston Symphony orchestra opens its 48th season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The program: Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, Op. 38, and Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

[illegible] soprano, and Mr. Claudius J. Broadfield, tenor, will give a joint recital in Jordan hall Sunday afternoon, Oct. 7, at 3:30.

Concerted music of the 18th century written for the double-bass and viola d'amore, will be played by Mr. Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus foremost masters of these old instruments, at their recital to be given in Symphony hall on Monday eve., Oct. 15.

SUN. HER. SEPT 30 '28

Bos. Sunday Globe Sep. 30 '28

PICTURES AND MUSICIANS

[illegible] ORKS T FOR PHONY

[illegible] ussevitzky to everal for First Time

SEPT 29-1928

[illegible] Koussevitzky is back in town, [illegible] eager for the opening of [illegible] symphony season next Friday [illegible]on, and as usual full of enthusiasm for the new works which he has in store for Boston.

DOUBLE BASS RECORDS

Four days ago Mr. Koussevitzky with Mme. Koussevitzky landed in New York after their customary summer in Europe, and while Mme. Koussevitzky proceeded immediately to Boston the conductor stayed behind to make phonograph recordings of his performance upon the double-bass, arriving here early yesterday morning.

At his Jamaica Plain home yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky was altogether willing to divulge his conductorial plans, touching first upon the two Pension Fund Concerts that will mark Boston's observance of the centenary of Schubert's death that now engrosses the entire musical world.

Three New Symphonies

But it was of his new pieces that the conductor was most eager to speak, and his recital was repeatedly punctuated with the comment that the forthcoming season would be "very, very interesting."

Again European as well as American composers have entrusted Mr. Koussevitzky and our orchestra with the first performances of their newest works. Among these world premiers will be those of new symphonies by Prokofieff, Martinu and the little-known younger Frenchman, Janin, and of new pieces, otherwise unspecified, by Aaron Copland and Roger Sessions, as well as of the orchestral fragments from a new ballet by Stravinsky, the music for whose "Apollo Musagetes" will also be made known to us. On the latter ballet, first performed in Washington last spring, Mr. Koussevitzky lavished praise, taking issue with a musician concerned in that performance who had dismissed the work as negligible. "You may like Stravinsky or you may dislike him," said Mr. Koussevitzky, "but he is never 'nothing.'"

By Frederick the Great

Among the pieces new to Boston will be compositions by the Germans, Hindemith, Toch and Hauer, the Hungarian Kodaly and the Swiss-American Bloch (the new prize symphony "America"), not to mention Gustav Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," which of itself fills an evening. For revivals will come Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "Don Quixote" and the Eighth Symphony of Bruckner, like Mahler, a composer long neglected in Symphony Hall. All four of the symphonies of Schumann will be performed this year, and Boston will hear for the first time a symphony by Frederick the Great, who was composer as well as skillful performer on the flute.

During the summer Mr. Koussevitzky was occupied with the hearing and the conducting of music in Paris and with mountaineering, in company with his friend Prokofieff, in the French Alps. It may be added that in the course of the four concerts which he conducted in Paris, Mr. Koussevitzky introduced no less than 13 works to the Parisian public.

Music Notes and Comment

The Boston Symphony season which begins this week gives promise of being one of the most successful the orchestra has ever had. All subscription tickets for both Friday and Saturday were sold last Spring to people on the waiting list. Very few places for the five Monday and five Tuesday concerts now remain unsubscribed.

Mr Koussevitzky's first program is as usual composed chiefly of familiar repertory pieces, since rehearsal time has been limited. Hindemith's concerto for orchestra is the only unfamiliar number. It has been played here but once before. The composer is a German modernist much discussed of late years.

The People's Choral Union will open [illegible] season Oct 7 with a rehearsal at Recital Hall, New England Conservatory of Music. James R. Houghton has been retained as conductor, and all of last year's chorus have signified their intention of continuing to be members. Mr Houghton will accept new singers, as he wishes to enlarge the chorus. Three concerts at Jordan Hall are planned for this year. The works to be sung will include Schubert's "Miriam's Song of Triumph," Franck's Mass in A, and Handel's "Samson." Rehearsals will be held Sundays from 4 to 5:30 p m. Classes in voice building and tone placement will be held Sundays at 3. This chorus offers an admirable and worth-while opportunity for everyone who likes to sing. Under Mr Houghton's conductorship it was last season notably successful in all it undertook.

Jean Kayaloff, a Russian cellist, will make his Boston debut Thursday evening at Jordan Hall, in a program of unusually high musical quality, including Beethoven's great sonata in A. This is the first recital of [illegible] promises to be a very crowded musical season.

Ruth Redefer, who will give her first Boston recital at Jordan Hall Oct 17, is a young pianist from Nashville, Tenn, where her father was professor of Greek in Vanderbilt University. She is herself a college graduate and a member of Phi Beta Kappa, and holds the degree of master of arts from Northwestern University in economics and political science. She has been a pianist from childhood and has given successful recitals in Chicago and many Western and Southern cities.

Prof Theremin's demonstration next Sunday at Symphony Hall of his new instrument, described at length in this section of last Sunday's Globe, is rousing much interest not only among [illegible]ng but among students of applied science and people interested in the technical side of radio.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to mark the centenary of Schubert's death next November by playing a program of his music.

Mrs W. O. Taylor, soprano, and [illegible]us J. Broadfield, tenor, will give next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 in Jordan Hall a joint recital, featuring [illegible]matic excerpts.

Rome." These works have caused Alfredo Casella to nickname him "the Baedecker of Italian Music." Signor Respighi will attend the Metropolitan's first performance of his opera, "The Sunken Bell," and play the piano part of his new Toccata with the Philharmic-Symphony Orchestra in New York on Nov 29 and 30. The composer will be accompanied to this country by his wife, Elsa Olivieri Sanglacomo, a soprano.

Hope Hampton, who started her career by winning a beauty contest at Houston, Tex, and then became a movie star, has at last attained the grand opera stage She will make her debute Nov 29 as Mimi in "Boheme" with the Philadelphia, Grand Opera Company and later is scheduled to sing "Manon."

Miss Hampton first sang in Philadelphia in "Madame Pompadour" some seasons back, but was dropped from the cast when the company came to New York. She appeared here last year in "My Princess." Miss Hampton's teacher is Estelle Liebling.

George Gershwin has been invited to compose an original symphony to be played by the 110-piece orchestra of the Roxy Theatre in New York.

Fritz Kreisler will open a crowded and important month of recitals in Symphony Hall when he gives the first Sunday afternoon concert there Oct 14.

Geraldine Farrar will sing on the following Sunday afternoon, Oct 21, and the English Singers will return Sunday afternoon, Oct 28.

Vladimir Horowitz, the phenomenal young Russian pianist, will give his second Boston recital Sunday evening, Oct 21. Pompeo's Band, with Maria Mantovani, soprano, as soloist, will [illegible] Sunday.

Concerted music of the 18th century, written for the double-bass and viola d'amore, will be played by Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus, foremost masters of these old instruments, at their recital to be given in Symphony Hall Monday evening, Oct 15.

Koussevitzky will then also play his own double-bass Concerto, and for the first time in this country, his own Valse Miniature—together with other short solo numbers. This will be Koussevitzky's second double-bass recital in America.

Henri Casadesus, founder of the French "Society of Ancient Instruments," is coming from Europe for the purpose of assisting in this program.

[illegible] Music Association of Chicago and the Orchestral Association announce that the Civic Orchestra will resume its work for the season early in October. Examinations for membership in the orchestra will be held Oct 9th. As in the past the destinies of the organization will be guided by Frederick Stock assisted by Eric DeLamarter and there will be free classes in Orchestra Repertory, Chamber Music, Sight Reading, etc, as well as full rehearsals under the direction of Mr Stock and Mr DeLamarter. That the work of the Civic Orchestra in training young musicians for the career of symphony playing has borne good fruit may be realized from the fact that its members are found in such famous organizations as the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, the Minne[illegible] Orchestra.

Sun. Globe Sep. 30

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERTS

With Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3 Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the 48th season of that organization and Mr. Koussevitzky's fifth as its conductor. Beethoven, too, will close the programme of this season's first pair of concerts, with the "Eroica" Symphony. Between will come Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the Concerto for Orchestra by Paul Hindemith first made known to Boston three seasons ago by Mr. Koussevitzky.

Globe Music Sept 9 1928

OCTOBER CONCERTS ANNOUNCED

Advance announcements indicate that October, the first month of the new musical season, will be a busy one for musical reviewers. The season opens with the first pair of Boston Symphony concerts. Oct 5 and 6. All season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons and 24 Saturday evening concerts of the 48th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been sold. Those on the waiting list last Spring engaged every seat released.

The only places to be had for the regular series in this, the fifth year of Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship here, are the rush seats, unreserved, on Fridays, and such single tickets as may be turned in by subscribers to be sold at the box office for the benefit of the orchestra's endowment fund.

The Boston Symphony will offer the usual extra series of five Monday evening and five Tuesday afternoon concerts, nine concerts at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, and several pension fund concerts at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoons.

Mr Koussevitzky's double bass recital, the second he has given here, will be at Symphony Hall Monday evening, Oct 15. He is also to make his New York debut as a double bass player at Carnegie Hall Tuesday evening, Oct 23. Henri Casadesus, the distinguished French player on the viola d'amore, will assist Mr Koussevitzky. Leon Theremin, the young Rus[illegible]

Traveler Sep. 22, 1928.

Concert Calendar

Serge Koussevitzky is now on his way from Europe on the Ile de France, which will dock in New York in the middle of next week. The famous conductor will immediately assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for rehearsal, in preparation for the season's opening in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 5, and Saturday evening, Oct. 6. This will be the 48th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the fifth season under Koussevitzky's leadership.

Koussevitzky is bringing with him from Europe scores of considerable interest and importance which will figure on the coming season's programs.

In addition to the Friday and Saturday series of 48 concerts in Symphony hall, there will be the usual series of five Monday evening and five Tuesday afternoon concerts.

OCTOBER CONCERTS

The regular Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony hall will open on Oct. 14 with the appearance of Fritz Kreisler. Geraldine Farrar will sing on the following Sunday afternoon, Oct. 21, and the English Singers will appear on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 28.

Serge Koussevitzky, besides opening the Boston Symphony season on Oct. 5, will give a recital on his double-bass on Monday evening, Oct. 15. This will be his second recital in America as double-bass virtuoso. He will then be assisted by Henri Casadesus, the famous French specialist in old instruments.

Vladimir Horowitz, the young pianist who carried America by storm when he first came here last season, will give his second Boston recital when he appears in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, Oct. 21.

Pompeo's band will appear on Sunday evening, Oct. 28, with Maria Mantovani, as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 1 - 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Comes to Buffalo October 30

The Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's baton, comes to Buffalo on [illegible] evening, October 30, to give the first evening of tonal splendor in the symphony series outlined for this season by the Buffalo Musical Foundation. There will be 110 men in the celebrated ensemble, as it goes on its brief tour covering Rochester, Buffalo, Columbus, Cleveland and Pittsburgh. The Boston's appearances outside this tour and its Boston and New York concerts will include only single concerts this season at Harvard, Yale, Wellesley, Smith and Cornell. It gives its time almost entirely to the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, and Carnegie Hall, New York, and the intervening rehearsals.

Serge Koussevitzky, whose eloquent back and wrist are inseparably involved in the eloquence of a Boston symphony concert, is said to be an exhausting but exhilarating conductor. Every morning, except Friday and Saturdays which are concert days, is spent in rehearsal.

He requires of his men the utmost in perfection, and then something. Afternoons are spent in program making, score corrections, going over new music. Mr. Koussevitzky does much more than read a score. He gets on intimate terms with it, tries and, indeed, succeeds in identifying himself with the emotional point of view of the composer.

Mengelberg Differs Widely.

Willem Mengelberg, who conducts the Philharmonic symphony in Elmwood Music Hall on Thursday evening, November 15, in the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, differs widely in temperament from the Russian conductor of the Boston forces.

The Hollander is among the two or three excelling masters of technique. He is temperamentally an Elizabethan, immensely sanguine, robust, opulent in feeling and suggestion. Mengelberg made his first visit to America in 1905, appearing as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic. In 1921 he returned to conduct the National symphony orchestra. When that orchestra was absorbed by the New York Philharmonic the following season, he became one of the regular conductors, directing half of each season ever since.

Tuesday, December 4, will bring the Detroit Symphony in its brilliant first concert of a group of three Detroit appearances; Thursday, January 17, the Prague choir, that marvelous human symphony of Czecho-Slovakia; Tuesday, January 29, the Detroit with Sir Thomas Beecham conducting; Tuesday, February 19, the Cleveland orchestra with Nikolai Sokoloff; March 12, the Detroit with Kolar conducting.

The Buffalo Musical Foundation is still filling mail orders for its symphony series of seven concerts and will be glad to send information about the concerts to anyone applying to its office in Denton, Cottier & Daniels' store, Seneca 2307 and Seneca 6692.

Artistic Recital Series.

Besides its symphony series, the Foundation is presenting Mme. Matzenauer, E. Robert Schmitz, Harold Samuel, Andres Segovia and Arthur Honegger, the composer, in a remarkably artistic recital series in the Hotel Statler ballroom. Mme. Margaret Matzenauer opens the series on Thursday evening, October 18, in a song recital. Junoesque in person and magnificent in voice and art, this fascinating singer is including Buffalo in a brief tour before the opening of her Metropolitan season this autumn.

Following her in this varied and brilliant series is the sparkling art of E. Robert Schmitz, pianist, who is well-known to Buffalo; the superb program by Segovia, the Spanish guitarist who is the new luminary on the musical heavens; the peerless recital by Harold Samuel, and the composer, Atthur Honegger, assisted by his wife, Andree Vaurabourg Honegger.

This series will continue to be sold as a series through the first concert date, and the single sale for Matzeenauer will open on October 16.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1928 POST

FOUR NEW ARTISTS IN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

GEORG BOETTCHER
First horn of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra assembles next Friday for its first concert of the present season four new faces will be disclosed in its ranks. Of these the most conspicuous will be that of Georg Boettcher, the new first horn, who fills the place so long held by Georg Wendler, now returned to Germany. Mr. Boettcher comes to Boston from Berlin, where for 16 years he has been solo horn in the orchestra of the former Royal Opera. Previously connected with the Breslau Opera and the Dortmund Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Boettcher has also been conspicuous in the performance of chamber music. As guest artist he has appeared as solo horn with the notable orchestra of the Dresden Opera.

The other new players will be Y. Chardon, 'cello; N. Lauga, violin, and L. White, percussion. Two musicians returning to the orchestra after a year's absence are M. Lafosse, trumpet, and E. Coughey, second harp. Bernard Zighera, pianist and second harp during the season just passed, now takes his place as first harp.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1928

Concert-Chronicle

Hindemith—His Very Self

UPWARDS of two years ago—to be exact, on March 6, 1926—Mr. Koussevitzky introduced a new composer to Boston. This in itself was hardly an event, for he had introduced many a new composer before that time and has introduced many a one since. But this particular new composer had been heralded, and continues to be heralded, as the leader of young Germany. Indeed, in the two intervening years the stature of Paul Hindemith's reputation has grown, even though his "Cardillac," a child of these years, did not measure up to expectation. His name flows from the pen of every writer upon contemporary music in central Europe. Where an example is wanted of a sane and well-balanced exponent of the modern in Germany, the name Hindemith is used; where further it is desired to point to talent and inspiration, perhaps even to genius, in the welter of brain-made and theory-manufactured products of the new composers' artifice, again Hindemith is the first to be thought of.

The work with which Mr. Koussevitzky introduced Paul Hindemith to Boston two years ago was the then new Concerto for Orchestra, Opus 38. Now again, upon the first program of the season of 1928-29, he gives it place. The Concerto is in every sense a product of its day, a day that shuns romanticism, that has torn to shreds the nineteenth century conception of harmony, that glories in a counterpoint in which each single tone is as a law unto itself, that points the finger of shame at "feeling" in music, that can be as frigid as an iceberg or as biting as tempered steel even while it piles up mountains of sound, that has indeed set up mechanism as one of its gods.

The Concerto Opus 38, then, having no commerce with such harmonic procedure as our students are likely to learn from their excellent teachers, but relying rather upon the spare counterpoint of the day and age, seeks out also a form suitable to that contrapuntal language. Such a form it finds in the concerto of a Bach or a Handel, or perhaps of a Corelli. The underlying principle of this Concerto—that of the antithesis of two groups of instruments, one a "solo" group, the other "tutti"—it seeks to employ (or to vary) in the modern dissonant, passionless style. To this style belongs the tendency toward the mechanistic, a tendency perhaps stronger in Central Europe than in any other part of the musical universe. Certainly it shows itself in Paul Hindemith's Concerto for Orchestra Opus 38. For in this Concerto rhythms move and pound relentlessly. The composer warns in a dozen ways against "expressive" playing. There is no pause of any consequence between the four movements. One may not gain the feeling of finality until the last crashing chords of the Finale. All that goes before it is a ceaseless flow of endless motion.

Above the first movement Hindemith has written "Mit Kraft, Mässig schnelle Viertel, ohne Pathos und stets lebendig" ("With power, moderately rapid quarter-notes, without pathos and always lively"). Passages for full orchestra alternate with passages for the solo group, which consists of an oboe, a bassoon and a violin—good, orthodox, old-concerto procedure. The orchestra plays a theme engendered from a motif weightily energetic; the solo instruments in the contrasting divisions indulge in fugue-like imitations of a short, snappy motif, themselves set against a flowing violin obbligato.

A crash interrupts this solo group and the second movement has begun. "Sehr schnelle Halbe" ("Very fast half-notes") Hindemith labels it. The concerto-idea is carriede out by wood-winds playing a marked jazz-rhythmed theme against rapidly buzzing strings. Eventually, for contrast, three solo instruments sing their own blended themes. Others enter, the music grows, the rhythms become more and more agitated, while Hindemith in the score urges on with an "Immer sehr wild ("Always very wild"). After this climax has run its course, jazzing winds and buzzing strings, now with increased vigors of their own, return to conclude the movement. Abruptly they break off. Four drums sound a single stroke. "Nur ganz kurze Pause" ("Only a very short pause"), warns Hindemith.

After which we find ourselves in the March for Woodwinds. "Nicht zu langsame Viertetl." (The quarter-notes not too slow") is the direction. The movement is both short and slight. In length it numbers but forty-four measures. Its orchestra comprises ten solo instruments. In its essence it is practically of the chamber music to which Hindemith had devoted so many of his previous efforts. Sharply rhythmed instruments in low registers furnish foundation for more smoothly flowing instruments of higher pitch. Cadenza-like passages for flute are the contrast of the middle of the movement. At the end there is not even a pause. "Sofort weiter" ("Proceed at once") conductor and orchestra are directed. And the last movement, "Basso ostinato" ensues. "Schnelle Viertel" ("rapid quarters") in seven-four meter. The music is that of a wild tarantella over five-note persistent bass. At the height of this swirling, seething dance the movement, and with it the Concerto, comes to a close.

Two words of warning. Reading the above, the insistence on rhythmic activity, the indications of the growth of "wildness," it might be natural to assume a music of swollen proportions, a maelstrom such as a Wagner or a Strauss might foment. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Hindemith, writing this Concerto has just come from the practice of chamber-music. The orchestra is not an exaggerated one, and what is more to the point, is not used as an exaggerated one. Secondly, from the emphasis upon the mechanistic, it might easily be inferred that the music is of a dryness akin, let us say, to the music of Stravinsky before "Œdipus." Let Mr. Alfred Einstein, in his article on Hindemith in "Modern Music" of March, 1926, give his paradoxical answer. He has pictured Stravinsky as playing his game, "coolly, intently, remaining 'raffiné,'" and Hindemith as shaking "his jester's cap in secret fury and sadness." Whereupon he observes dryly, "The German is never more of a romanticist than when he scorns romanticism." Perhaps in this paradox many a one will find the answer to whatever in Hindemith has seemed a puzzle.

A. H. M.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Stephen Townsend, chorus-master of the Boston Orchestra in Dr. Muck's day, familiar figure as well in the musical life of the town, has taken a new post in New York as chorus-master of the recently assembled choir to assist the Philharmonic Society. To accept it, he put by the similar place that he has filled of late years, and notably, with The Friends of Music. The new choir will be at the disposal of Mr. Mengelberg and Mr. Toscanini as conductors. The Hollander will utilize it in Brahms's Rhapsody and in a recent piece from Strauss; the Italian in Beethoven's Solemn Mass. As usual where Mr. Toscanini is concerned, an Italian, Adriano Ariani, will share in the preparatory work. From Germany Mr. Bodanzky has brought a new chorus-master to The Friends.

At the first concert of the season to increase the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky will return to Beethoven's Choral Symphony, last heard here in the centenary ceremonies of 1927. Again the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and Dr. Davison will provide the choir. The tentative date for the concert is Sunday afternoon, Nov. 14.

The annual series of informal explanations of the programs at the Symphony Concerts will be resumed this afternoon at 5.15 in the Public Library. They will continue every Thursday afternoon at the same hour through the weeks in which there are Symphony Concerts. As heretofore there will be musical illustrations of the pieces in hand. The first lecture is open to the public without charge. For the series, or half the series, small fees will be collected. Professor Marshall of Boston University and Mr. Appel of the Brown Library will be the regular lecturers. From time to time composers, virtuosi, teachers or reviewers of music will take their turn.

reactionary credo, will resent any radical change, and will sneer at knowledge, as opposed to instinct. The poor souls know their history none too well. The "matchless methods" of Gutenberg did not kill poetry. The scientific spirit of sound explorers will not kill music.

NICHOLAS SLONIMSKY

Concert-Chronicle

TRANS OCT 2

Hear the Other Side

A WEEK and more ago, the reviewer for The Transcript demurred with some severity to the version of de Falla's Concerto for Harpsichord (or Piano), Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Violin and Violoncello heard at the Anniversary Festival of Chamber-Music in Pittsfield. A piano there replaced the harpsichord used by Mme. Landowska in the first performance in America at Symphony Hall, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting, on Dec. 31, 1926. In the Berkshires Mr. Salzedo was the pianist, the occasional conductor and the general inspirer of the deed. Now he takes issue with the reviewer and writes to this department:

When de Falla gave the initial hearings of that work, he himself played it twice in the same evening: once on the harpsichord, once on the piano, last year in the Salle Pleyel, Paris. Most of us present agreed that the piano-version was far better than the harpsichord-version, for the whole character of the work exacted a more sounding medium than the harpsichord. When Landowska played it in New York, the work met with the complete disapproval of the musicians present—because of the harpsichord. I therefore felt it my duty to readjust the situation in presenting the Concerto as it ought to be presented—and this with the approval of de Falla, who sent me a score very flatteringly dedicated on that occasion. So, the "strange," "perverse," "distorted," "violation" of the Concerto was in truth but a rehabilitation.

On page 862 of the usually accurate program-book of the Symphony Concerts in Boston—Number 11, Season of 1926-[illegible]—appears the flat assertion that the Concerto was played for the first time—in an initial hearing—at the de Falla Festival in Barcelona on Nov. 5, 1926; that de Falla himself conducted; that Mme. Landowska sat at the harpsichord; that she was the dedicatee of the piece. By these signs she was acquainted with the composer's intentions and followed them. The same program-book also contained this note from Mme. Landowska:

The story of de Falla's Concerto is very intersting. Four years ago I spent several days with my friend de Falla in Granada and at the very moment that he was working at his "Retablo," a part of which he devoted to the harpsichord, I had my harpsichord with me (being of course, on a concert tour in Spain), and I was able to play for him a great deal and to speak about the various possibilities of the instrument. He became more and more interested, and after a few days of conversations between us he grew so enthusiastic that he resolved to write a concerto for the harpsichord. He took three years to compose this work, which was finished in September, 1926. But when one becomes acquainted with the music, one understands that the master carried with him a long time such a deep work that needed to come to life little by little.

Unless Señor de Falla is "playing both ends against the middle"—the hapless reviewer—it rests with him to decide which is the authoritative interpreter of his intentions with the Concerto, Mme. Landowska with her harpsichord, or Mr. Salzedo with his piano. Until that word comes, the reviewer will persist in his notion that Mme. Landowska's plastic and poetized version was nearer to the contents of de Falla's music than the hammer-and-nails version of Mr. Salzedo battering it into pseudo-Stravinsky, manner of "Le Sacre." He might even cherish his delusion were Mr. Salzedo declared to be the only authentic priest and prophet.

Incidents and Prospects

The Roth String Quartet—[illegible]'s guests from Budapest at her recent festival of chamber-music—will be heard not only at Harvard College on Thursday evening, but also at Wellesley College on Wednesday. There they will play Beethoven's Quartet in F major (Op. 18, No. 1); Ravel's Quartet; Schumann's Quartet in A minor (Op. 41, No. 1) —a wholly different program from that announced for Cambridge. [illegible] resounded sufficiently with praises of a remarkable four.

There are four fresh comers to the Symphony Orchestra for the new season: Emil Böttcher from the orchestra of the State Opera at Berlin and the State Opera at Dresden, to be first horn with which instrument he is renowned virtuoso; Mr. Chardon to the violoncellos; Mr. Lauga to the violins; Mr. White to the percussion-group. Mr. Bernard Zighera succeeds Mr. Holy at the first harp; while Mr. Coughey returns to take the second. Mr. Lafosse also rejoins the trumpets. Mr. Salzedo, the distinguished harpist and [illegible] harp, is planning a concert in Boston in the course of the season—a city that he rarely revisits. Miss Lucille Lawrence, his associate, will share it. Among the pieces to be heard are his Concerto for Harp and Wind Choir, his Sonata for Harp and Piano, his recent "Pentacle" for Two Harps played at Pittsfield.

MUSIC World Leader in Columbus Thursday

SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY.

SYMPHONY BRINGS IN 110 MUSICIANS

OHIO STATE JOURNAL

First Concert of Boston Orchestra Here Since Two Years Before War.

Oct 5

One of the greatest personalities in the music world today will come to Columbus Thursday to direct the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Memorial Hall.

Serge Koussevitzsky, a Russian nobleman with the appearance and manner of a statesman, has for four years successfully led the greatest orchestra in America. Without the long hair and the usual flourishes which mark the efforts of many of his contemporaries, Koussevitzsky, critics say, commands the mammoth 110-piece organization as if it were a single instrument, and he the artist.

Koussevitzsky is the champion of young composers, the "enfants terrible" whose modern music frequently startles and outrages the conservative ears of concert-goers. He believes in them, publishes their work, and when it is worthy, introduces it himself.

Last summer he conducted his annual "Concerts Koussevitzsky" in Paris, where he introduced 13 works to the Parisian public. One of these was Carpenter's "Skyscrapers."

When he returned from Europe, packed in his trunk were new symphonies by the youthful Prokofieff, Martinu, Copeland and Sessions. Some of these will have their first public hearings this season.

Stravinsky, now firmly entrenched in the favor of music lovers here and in Europe, was discovered by Koussevitzsky, who still publishes his works.

With the orchestra will be a stranger, Georg Boettcher, from Berlin, French horn virtuso, persuaded into the ranks of the American orchestra by Koussevitzsky.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its last appearance in Columbus two years before the world war, when the organization boasted only 80 members. Since then its growing popularity has held it in the east, where it plays before packed houses in its own Symphony Hall, Boston.

Programs to Hand

TRANS. OCT 5

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the second pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday and Saturday of next week:

"Apollo Musagetes (Protector of The Muses)" Ballet in Two Scenes, Played as Concert-Piece ..... Stravinsky
"Háry János," Suite for Orchestra. ...Kodály
Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat major. . . Schumann

"Apollo Musagetes" is the ballet written by Stravinsky for the Festival of Chamber Music, last April, at the Library of Congress in Washington, where Mr. Bolm was producer and principal dancer. Last summer in Paris and London, it passed into the repertory of the Diaghilev Company with Mr. Lifar as the god. The music is written for strings only. Often it sounds Bellini-like. "Háry János" celebrates in serio-comic measures an Hungarian Munchausen, beginning with an orchestral sneeze that has amused audiences ever since Kodály's Suite rose to world-wide vogue. Outside a forgotten Quartet and a recent Sonata for Violoncello, little or none of Kodály's music has been heard in Boston. Yet he ranks with Bartók among Hungarian composers.

Double Bass Recital Date Changed to 17th

POST OCT 4

opened.

In deference of the coming visit to Boston of Herbert Hoover, Serg Koussevitzky has postponed the date of his pending double-bass recital. The recital was announced to be given in Symphony Hall on Monday, October 15, and will be given instead on Wednesday, Oct. 17.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will then make his second American appearance as virtuoso of the unusual instrument by which

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 6,

Symphony

In High Mettle A New Season Is Well Begun

Mr. Koussevitzky and His Orchestra Resume the Symphony Concerts

NONE of the usual rites was lacking; but the arrangement of the program lessened the usual volume of applause. Orchestra and audience, at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, rose in salutation to the conductor and to the new season. The players smiled; the listeners clapped their hands; Mr. Koussevitzky, a shade stouter at the end of the leisure-months, returned becoming thanks. Beethoven's third "Leonora Overture" began the concert. For the familiar piece, vividly dramatized, the applause was long, loud and general. At the end of Debussy's Nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Fêtes"—it was hardly less ea tv and widespread. Then ensued Hindemith's Concerto for Orchestra, repeated after eighteen months. He writes as a modernist, convinced and unafraid. Therefore his piece baffled or irritated or distressed most of the matinée company. Applause ran slow and light; there was no call, as there often is on the first Friday, before the intermission, for a standing orchestra.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony filled the second part of the concert. It is long even when Mr. Koussevitzky dispels every tedium. Beethoven might have been an arrant offender, so numerous were the departures. At half-past four the depleted audience declined to linger for the plaudits that would have been earned reward to orchestra and conductor. All of which is to say that Friday at Symphony Hall remains Friday. . . . The evening audience is likely to mend these matters. Hindemith will nothing daunt the considerable part of it that is youthful or open-minded. Few will leave such a performance of "The Eroica" unacclaimed. Other times, other manners. It is Saturday that brings the Symphony Concert.

The close season, inevitable for Beethoven after the centenary surplusage of 1927, is relaxed. He sits again in the conductorial sun; twice Mr. Koussevitzky bade him into yesterday's program. With both the third "Leonora Overture" and the "Eroica" Symphony orchestra and leader excel. Wagner spreads his music-dramas over four hours. Before and after him, until the new day of brevity dawned, most operatic composers required proportionate room. "Fidelio," by and large, is no lengthy piece. Yet the striving Beethoven would not rest until he had distilled and concentrated the essence of his opera into an Overture less than twenty minutes long.

Probably the "Third Leonora" is the compactest music-drama in the world; hardly less is it graphic and poignant. Throughout Mr. Koussevitzky overlooks nothing, underplays nothing. He enlarges and intensifies Beethoven's climaxes; flings up the ejaculations, holds the suspensions taut; deepens songful measures, keeps the progress all alert and all up-springing. Into our ears the music is outpoured; upon our imaginations the drama is acted. When, however, he first did these things, he made his way through the music section by section, through the drama scene by scene. Episodic was his version. Momentary intensities beguiled him from the far-sweeping curve of the Overture, the unfolding, unflagging advance from the fortissimo chord that lifts the curtain and compels the audience to the last chromatic frenzy of salvation. Now he diminishes no episode, yet sustains the line, upswings the course. The conductor is tireless pursuer of his ideal of performance. He considers his ways and corrects them until he has gained it. What conductor, worthy the name, does not live days of discontent between intervals of accomplishment?

Through a century and a quarter orchestras have played this "Third Leonora." "The Eroica" is as old a comer to the concert-halls. The orchestras have them by heart; the audiences know the way about within them. With either piece, it is hard task to gain what the theater calls "the illusion of the first time." That is to say, now are the characters finding words for the thought or the mood behind; now from notes upon staves is musical sound brought to voice, motion, significance. With "The Eroica" Mr. Koussevitzky works this illusion; upon the maturing Beethoven opens wide the door. He wrests out the first movement, of man embattled against destiny, as Beethoven wrested it from his own spirit. He sweeps through the Scherzo as the wind blows and the waters leap from the hills—gladly. He maintains the variations of the Finale as variations of exultation. As some of us like to believe, he exalts the slow movement, because he frees that long-drawn Funeral March from any suggestion of sentiment. He unfolds it gravely; keeps it spare and lofty; cuts accents, lays on color, both deep. Pedantry and precedent may quarrel here and there with Mr. Koussevitzky's detailing of "The Eroica." None may justly accuse him of distortion or "effect," contriving, for his greater glory, a Symphony as clear-spoken as it is renowned. He takes Beethoven at his word; sets free his speech, as though it were new-found, intensified, aglow. The program of the concert that first disclosed "The Eroica" labelled it "A new grand Symphony." The second adjective was a convention of the time. The actual grandeur lay all within. For Mr. Koussevitzky, in the simplicity of mind that sometimes leads him to his largest achievements, such grandeur still persists.

The Nocturnes of Debussy, the Concerto of Hindemith, were well placed side by side. The Parisian of the eighteen-nineties wrote a music of insinuation; the Frankforter of the nineteen-twenties a music of assertion. Into a romantic form the Frenchman slipped his impressionistic substance. Into an ancient mold, the Concerto Grosso, the German presses his modernistic matter. Debussy's workmanship blends adroit craft with sensitive imagination. Hindemith's procedure goes straightforward and hard-hitting. Debussy's goal is the arrested moment of beauty that is fleeting—clouds in procession, ever dissolving, ever re-forming, the melancholy of evanescence. Or in "Fêtes" the pageant of star-dust, light, color, rhythm, glint—the mood of obsession. Debussy writes the poetry of tones, suggestively, Hindemith writes the prose of tones, factually. Debussy courts imagery; Hindemith, actuality.

There in the Concerto are the chosen courses of a full man resolved to live and write in his own day. Take them or leave them; find them empty and disconcerting; count them fertile and stimulating. There they stand uncompromising and unashamed—the snapping motivs, swirling rhythms, biting counterpoint, brusque modulations, steely surfaces, hard-edged timbres, incessant dissonance—a literal music, distempered, seething, in its own restless energies. The drive, the gusto, the efficiency, of the Concerto are irresistible. They are its reasons for being, its impulse from the time and the world in which Hindemith lives, its reflection of himself, its impact upon his own generation. He bids us forget all things in this zest of motion; beat out and buzz out ourselves like the machines around us; sometimes, as in the "March for Woodwinds," leer, chuckle, and call it humor. The Debussyan, the Hindemithian, conceptions and procedures are the antipodes of music. They glare at each other from Euterpe's outstretched hands. A single lot unites the two composers. As many once "loathed" Debussy; others now "loath" Hindemith. It was possible to grow into Debussy; it may be possible to grow into Hindemith. Clear and keen came the Concerto yesterday; whereas eighteen months ago it was din and confusion. Though we fondly shut ourselves in ivory towers, the voice of the new generation will pierce through.

In all these pieces, the orchestra was the voice of the composer, the instrument of the conductor. It gained superb sonorities through the first movement of "The Eroica." The magic of its tone-color renewed many a measure of the "Funeral March." Its rhythm winged the Scherzo. Variation upon variation the Finale never lost impetus. In both, the new first-horn, Mr. Boettcher from Berlin, had room to prove his quality. Through the Nocturnes of Debussy, euphonies, shadings, incessant play of tonal light and shadow, might have seemed the salient merits of the re-gathered band. Yet at the beginning of the concert, its quiver of excitement had propelled the crescendi, caught the suspensive moments, of the "Leonora Overture." The ampler periods wore well its tonal magnificence; the final pages bore witness to its virilities. Through Hindemith's Concerto it flailed and snapped, rough-coated and exuberant. Mr. Koussevitzky has infused into the orchestra the final virtue. Whatever it plays, it characters.

H. T. P.

3

Smiling Skill

Georg Boettcher (Purdy)

New First-Horn of the Symphony Orchestra

TRANS OCT 6-

BEGIN MUSIC SEASON AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

At the very first concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, settled into an easy, comfortable routine. The program, though it opened with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and closed with his "Eroica" symphony, was not ultra-conservative. Containing for middle numbers Debussy's first two Nocturnes of the beginning of the century and Paul Hindemith's Concerto for Orchestra of this second quarter of the century, the program was discreetly balanced.

The audience greeted Mr. Koussevitzky at the opening of the concert warmly—but routinely. The same audience began to disperse shortly after intermission, just as it does regularly of a Friday afternoon throughout the season. The program, being a little long, might have accounted for the rather steady exodus while the later pages of the symphony were being played. Perhaps two ladies who left soon after the beginning of the symphony were disturbed by a typically Koussevitzkean retard in playing the concussion theme of the first movement.

In actual performance orchestra and conductor tended to routine—or, at any rate, as near to routine as Koussevitzky will ever allow. There were ragged edges, as was to be expected at an opening concert, notably the first crashing sounds that opened the first number. Mr. Koussevitzky has conducted better renditions of this overture.

The Debussy Nocturnes were finely done and must have pleased everyone in the audience. To say whether the Hindemith Concerto was well or ill done would require courage, for even though we heard this piece two years ago it still remains a welter of sound, with what seem occasional flashes of a master hand.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to have lost a little of his zest for the symphony. What it gained in orchestral balance over the overture it lost in dramatic fire. The standard for comparison in performance of the "Eroica" remains the one at the Beethoven Festival two years ago.

BOS. EVE AMER. OCT 6-

SECOND SYMPHONY

Stravinsky's new score, "Apollon Musagete" (Apollo, Leader of the Muses), will have its first Boston presentation at the second regular Boston Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will also introduce to Boston music of Kodaly, the noted Hungarian composer. This will be his suite "Hary Janos." The latter part of the program will comprise Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1.

TRANS OCT 6

The Deficit Rises

The Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Ask $132,000 as Guarantee Fund for 1928-29

AS USUAL, the program-book for the Symphony Concert yesterday—the first of the new season — contained a financial summary from the Trustees of the Orchestra. For the year 1927-28, the income from receipts was $677,960.76; from the Endowment Fund, $15,928.47; in all, $693,889.23. The outgo was $780,957.46, leaving a net deficit of $87,068.23. Subscriptions to the Guarantee Fund cleared away $73,179.99 of this loss. The remainder—the inference is—was contributed privately.

For the new season, salaries paid to members of the orchestra—wise and just expenditure—will increase by nearly $15,000. Since neither the Symphony Concerts nor the Pops are to be broadcast on Saturday evenings, the treasury will be the poorer by $32,000—$1000 per concert. Add to these sums an estimated deficit equal to that of last season, and the Guarantee Fund for 1928-29 is in need of $132,000. The Trustees end laconically:

As these concerts can only be carried on by the generosity of the public, subscriptions to meet this deficit are requested.

MUSIC World Leader in Columbus Thursday

SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY.

SYMPHONY BRINGS IN 110 MUSICIANS

OHIO STATE JOURNAL OCT 5

First Concert of Boston Orchestra Here Since Two Years Before War.

One of the greatest personalities in the music world today will come to Columbus Thursday to direct the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Memorial Hall.

Serge Koussevitzsky, a Russian nobleman with the appearance and manner of a statesman, has for four years successfully led the greatest orchestra in America. Without the long hair and the usual flourishes which mark the efforts of many of his contemporaries, Koussevitzsky, critics say, commands the mammoth 110-piece organization as if it were a single instrument, and he the artist.

Koussevitzsky is the champion of young composers, the "enfants terrible" whose modern music frequently startles and outrages the conservative ears of concert-goers. He believes in them, publishes their work, and when it is worthy, introduces it himself.

Last summer he conducted his annual "Concerts Koussevitzsky" in Paris, where he introduced 13 works to the Parisian public. One of these was Carpenter's "Skyscrapers."

When he returned from Europe, packed in his trunk were new symphonies by the youthful Prokofieff, Martinu, Copeland and Sessions. Some of these will have their first public hearings this season.

Stravinsky, now firmly entrenched in the favor of music lovers here and in Europe, was discovered by Koussevitzsky, who still publishes his works.

With the orchestra will be a stranger, Georg Boettcher, from Berlin, French horn virtuso, persuaded into the ranks of the American orchestra by Koussevitzsky.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its last appearance in Columbus two years before the world war, when the organization boasted only 80 members. Since then its growing popularity has held it in the east, where it plays before packed houses in its own Symphony Hall, Boston.

opened.

POST OCT 4

Double Bass Recital Date Changed to 17th

In deference of the coming visit to Boston of Herbert Hoover, Serg Koussevitzky has postponed the date of his pending double-bass recital. The recital was announced to be given in Symphony Hall on Monday, October 15, and will be given instead on Wednesday, Oct. 17.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will then make his second American appearance as virtuoso of the unusual instrument by which

Programs to Hand

TRANS. OCT 5

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the second pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday and Saturday of next week:

"Apollo Musagetes (Protector of The Muses)" Ballet in Two Scenes, Played as Concert-Piece ..... Stravinsky
"Háry János," Suite for Orchestra. ... Kodály
Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat major ... Schumann

"Apollo Musagetes" is the ballet written by Stravinsky for the Festival of Chamber Music, last April, at the Library of Congress in Washington, where Mr. Bolm was producer and principal dancer. Last summer in Paris and London, it passed into the repertory of the Diaghilev Company with Mr. Lifar as the god. The music is written for strings only. Often it sounds Bellini-like. "Háry János" celebrates in serio-comic measures an Hungarian Munchausen, beginning with an orchestral sneeze that has amused audiences ever since Kodály's Suite rose to world-wide vogue. Outside a forgotten Quartet and a recent Sonata for Violoncello, little or none of Kodály's music has been heard in Boston. Yet he ranks with Bartók among Hungarian composers.

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 6,

Symphony

In High Mettle A New Season Is Well Begun

Mr. Koussevitzky and His Orchestra Resume the Symphony Concerts

NONE of the usual rites was lacking; but the arrangement of the program lessened the usual volume of applause. Orchestra and audience, at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, rose in salutation to the conductor and to the new season. The players smiled; the listeners clapped their hands; Mr. Koussevitzky, a shade stouter at the end of the leisure-months, returned becoming thanks. Beethoven's third "Leonora Overture" began the concert. For the familiar piece, vividly dramatized, the applause was long, loud and general. At the end of Debussy's Nocturnes—"Clouds" and "Fêtes"—it was hardly less ... ea tv and widespread. Then ensued Hindemith's Concerto for Orchestra, repeated after eighteen months. He writes as a modernist, convinced and unafraid. Therefore his piece baffled or irritated or distressed most of the matinée company. Applause ran slow and light; there was no call, as there often is on the first Friday, before the intermission, for a standing orchestra.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony filled the second part of the concert. It is long even when Mr. Koussevitzky dispels every tedium. Beethoven might have been an arrant offender, so numerous were the departures. At half-past four the depleted audience declined to linger for the plaudits that would have been earned reward to orchestra and conductor. All of which is to say that Friday at Symphony Hall remains Friday. . . . The evening audience is likely to mend these matters. Hindemith will nothing daunt the considerable part of it that is youthful or open-minded. Few will leave such a performance of "The Eroica" unacclaimed. Other times, other manners. It is Saturday that brings the Symphony Concert.

The close season, inevitable for Beethoven after the centenary surplusage of 1927, is relaxed. He sits again in the conductorial sun; twice Mr. Koussevitzky bade him into yesterday's program. With both the third "Leonora Overture" and the "Eroica" Symphony orchestra and leader excel. Wagner spreads his music-dramas over four hours. Before and after him, until the new day of brevity dawned, most operatic composers required proportionate room. "Fidelio," by and large, is no lengthy piece. Yet the striving Beethoven would not rest until he had distilled and concentrated the essence of his opera into an Overture less than twenty minutes long.

Probably the "Third Leonora" is the compactest music-drama in the world; hardly less is it graphic and poignant. Throughout Mr. Koussevitzky overlooks nothing, underplays nothing. He enlarges and intensifies Beethoven's climaxes; flings up the ejaculations, holds the suspensions taut; deepens songful measures; keeps the progress all alert and all up-springing. Into our ears the music is outpoured; upon our imaginations the drama is acted. When, however, he first did these things, he made his way through the music section by section, through the drama scene by scene. Episodic was his version. Momentary intensities beguiled him from the far-sweeping curve of the Overture, the unfolding, unflagging advance from the fortissimo chord that lifts the curtain and compels the audience to the last chromatic frenzy of salvation. Now he diminishes no episode, yet sustains the line, upswings the course. The conductor is tireless pursuer of his ideal of performance. He considers his ways and corrects them until he has gained it. What conductor, worthy the name, does not live days of discontent between interludes of accomplishment?

Through a century and a quarter orchestras have played this "Third Leonora." "The Eroica" is as old a comer to the concert-halls. The orchestras have them by heart; the audiences know the way about within them. With either piece, it is hard task to gain what the theater calls "the illusion of the first time." That is to say, now are the characters finding words for the thought or the mood behind; now from notes upon staves is musical sound brought to voice, motion, significance. With "The Eroica" Mr. Koussevitzky works this illusion; upon the maturing Beethoven opens wide the door. He wrests out the first movement, of man embattled against destiny, as Beethoven wrested it from his own spirit. He sweeps through the Scherzo as the wind blows and the waters leap from the hills—gladly. He maintains the variations of the Finale as variations of exultation. As some of us like to believe, he exalts the slow movement, because he frees that long-drawn Funeral March from any suggestion of sentiment. He unfolds it gravely; keeps it spare and lofty; cuts accents, lays on color, both deep. Pedantry and precedent may quarrel here and there with Mr. Koussevitzky's detailing of "The Eroica." None may justly accuse him of distortion or "effect," contriving, for his greater glory, a Symphony as clear-spoken as it is renowned. He takes Beethoven at his word; sets free his speech, as though it were new-found, intensified, aglow. The program of the concert that first disclosed "The Eroica" labelled it "A new grand Symphony." The second adjective was a convention of the time. The actual grandeur lay all within. For Mr. Koussevitzky, in the simplicity of mind that sometimes leads him to his largest achievements, such grandeur still persists.

The Nocturnes of Debussy, the Concerto of Hindemith, were well placed side by side. The Parisian of the eighteen-nineties wrote a music of insinuation; the Frankforter of the nineteen-twenties a music of assertion. Into a romantic form the Frenchman slipped his impressionistic substance. Into an ancient mold, the Concerto Grosso, the German presses his modernistic matter. Debussy's workmanship blends adroit craft with sensitive imagination. Hindemith's procedure goes straightforward and hard-hitting. Debussy's goal is the arrested moment of beauty that is fleeting—clouds in procession, ever dissolving, ever re-forming, the melancholy of evanescence. Or in "Fêtes" the pageant of star-dust, light, color, rhythm, glint—the mood of obsession. Debussy writes the poetry of tones, suggestively, Hindemith writes the prose of tones, factually. Debussy courts imagery; Hindemith, actuality.

There in the Concerto are the chosen courses of a full man resolved to live and write in his own day. Take them or leave them; find them empty and disconcerting; count them fertile and stimulating. There they stand uncompromising and unashamed—the snapping motivs, swirling rhythms, biting counterpoint, brusque modulations, steely surfaces, hard-edged timbres, incessant dissonance—a literal music, distempered, seething, in its own restless energies. The drive, the gusto, the efficiency, of the Concerto are irresistible. They are its reasons for being, its impulse from the time and the world in which Hindemith lives, its reflection of himself, its impact upon his own generation. He bids us forget all things in this zest of motion; beat out and buzz out ourselves like the machines around us; sometimes, as in the "March for Woodwinds," leer, chuckle, and call it humor. The Debussyan, the Hindemithian, conceptions and procedures are the antipodes of music. They glare at each other from Euterpe's outstretched hands. A single lot unites the two composers. As many once "loathed" Debussy; others now "loath" Hindemith. It was possible to grow into Debussy; it may be possible to grow into Hindemith. Clear and keen came the Concerto yesterday; whereas eighteen months ago it was din and confusion. Though we fondly shut ourselves in ivory towers, the voice of the new generation will pierce through.

In all these pieces, the orchestra was the voice of the composer, the instrument of the conductor. It gained superb sonorities through the first movement of "The Eroica." The magic of its tone-color renewed many a measure of the "Funeral March." Its rhythm winged the Scherzo. Variation upon variation the Finale never lost impetus. In both, the new first-horn, Mr. Boettcher from Berlin, had room to prove his quality. Through the Nocturnes of Debussy, euphonies, shadings, incessant play of tonal light and shadow, might have seemed the salient merits of the re-gathered band. Yet at the beginning of the concert, its quiver of excitement had propelled the crescendi, caught the suspensive moments, of the "Leonora Overture." The ampler periods wore well its tonal magnificence; the final pages bore witness to its virilities. Through Hindemith's Concerto it flailed and snapped, rough-coated and exuberant. Mr. Koussevitzky has infused into the orchestra the final virtue. Whatever it plays, it characters.

H. T. P.

Smiling Skill

Georg Boettcher (Purdy)

New First-Horn of the Symphony Orchestra

TRANS OCT 6-

BEGIN MUSIC SEASON AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

At the very first concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, settled into an easy, comfortable routine. The program, though it opened with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture and closed with his "Eroica" symphony, was not ultra-conservative. Containing for middle numbers Debussy's first two Nocturnes of the beginning of the century and Paul Hindemith's Concerto for Orchestra of this second quarter of the century, the program was discreetly balanced.

The audience greeted Mr. Koussevitzky at the opening of the concert warmly—but routinely. The same audience began to disperse shortly after intermission, just as it does regularly of a Friday afternoon throughout the season. The program, being a little long, might have accounted for the rather steady exodus while the later pages of the symphony were being played. Perhaps two ladies who left soon after the beginning of the symphony were disturbed by a typically Koussevitzkean retard in playing the confusion theme of the first movement.

In actual performance orchestra and conductor tended to routine — or, at any rate, as near to routine as Koussevitzky will ever allow. There were ragged edges, as was to be expected at an opening concert, notably the first crashing sounds that opened the first number. Mr. Koussevitzky has conducted better renditions of this overture.

The Debussy Nocturnes were finely done and must have pleased everyone in the audience. To say whether the Hindemith Concerto was well or ill done would require courage, for even though we heard this piece two years ago it still remains a welter of sound, with what seem occasional flashes of a master hand.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to have lost a little of his zest for the symphony. What it gained in orchestral balance over the overture it lost in dramatic fire. The standard for comparison in performance of the "Eroica" remains the one at the Beethoven Festival two years ago.

BOS. EVE AMER. OCT 6-

SECOND SYMPHONY

Stravinsky's new score, "Apollon Musagete" (Apollo, Leader of the Muses), will have its first Boston presentation at the second regular Boston Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will also introduce to Boston music of Kodaly, the noted Hungarian composer. This will be his suite "Hary Janos." The latter part of the program will comprise Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1.

TRANS OCT 6

The Deficit Rises

The Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Ask $132,000 as Guarantee Fund for 1928-29

AS USUAL, the program-book for the Symphony Concert yesterday—the first of the new season — contained a financial summary from the Trustees of the Orchestra. For the year 1927-28, the income from receipts was $677,960.76; from the Endowment Fund, $15,928.47; in all, $693,889.23. The outgo was $780,957.46, leaving a net deficit of $87,068.23. Subscriptions to the Guarantee Fund cleared away $73,179.99 of this loss. The remainder—the inference is—was contributed privately.

For the new season, salaries paid to members of the orchestra—wise and just expenditure—will increase by nearly $15,000. Since neither the Symphony Concerts nor the Pops are to be broadcast on Saturday evenings, the treasury will be the poorer by $32,000—$1000 per concert. Add to these sums an estimated deficit equal to that of last season, and the Guarantee Fund for 1928-29 is in need of $132,000. The Trustees end laconically:

As these concerts can only be carried on by the generosity of the public, subscriptions to meet this deficit are requested.

+ Boston Globe
oct 6 '28 THE B

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT

Orchestra's 48th Season Opens Brilliantly

Koussevitzky Warmly Welcomed, Audience Stands to Greet Him

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of its 48th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. When Mr Koussevitzky, now entering upon his fifth season as conductor, came onto the stage, the orchestra and most of the audience stood and applauded him heartily.

All the season tickets for both Fridays and Saturdays were sold last Spring, the people on the waiting list taking the small number of places not re-engaged by last season's subscribers. For next season there is already a long waiting list.

Yet this week's program books contain an appeal from the trustees for contributions toward an estimated deficit of $134,000 on the current season. This figure, the largest in the history of the orchestra, is produced by an increase in orchestra salaries and by the fact that the broadcasting privilege, for which $32,000 was paid last year, has not been sold this year. Last year's actual deficit is now announced as $87,068.23. It was estimated at $85,000, and contributions of $73,179 were made toward it.

The trustees again remind the public that "These concerts can be carried on only by the generosity of the public." Subscriptions should be sent to E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon st, Boston.

Whatever the financial result, there is no doubt that this season will be among the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history.

As usual, the first program was made up of numbers already in the orchestra's repertory. Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture, his "Eroica" Symphony, two of Debussy's "Nocturnes" and Hindemith's Concerto for Orchestra, opus 38, were the chosen pieces. The Debussy pieces are now almost as familiar as the Beethoven.

Hindemith's concerto was first played here in 1926. The audience did not then like it. Yesterday, though it came just before the intermission when almost any number is applauded to the echo, Hindemith's music was greeted by nearly everyone with a silence plainly hostile. Handclaps were few and faint. There was at least one valiant and outraged hiss.

The orchestra has so few changes of personnel that the players were able after very few rehearsals to go on almost from where they left off last Spring. Mr Holy's place as first harp is filled by the promotion of the young second harpist, Mr Zighera, to the first desk. There is a new first horn, George Boettcher, from Berlin and Dresden, and two or three new faces in places less prominent. The Boston Symphony remains an orchestra unsurpassed by any in the world in the number of first-rate players it contains. Not half a dozen bands can compare with it. Hence, in large part, the deficit aforesaid.

Of Mr Koussevitzky's Beethoven little remains unsaid. He takes his own way with classics as with moderns, giving his temperament free rein. The beginning of "Leonore No. 3" sounded turgid and confused. The tutti were imperfectly played. The great climax at the famous trumpet calls were superbly dramatic, however.

The pace of the "Eroica" seemed at times unduly languid. The strings suffered more than usual from the damp, warm atmosphere. Mr Koussevitzky did not succeed in imparting his own enthusiasm to some of the audience. Departures between the movements were more numerous than usual. Program books rustled constantly. When the coda of the finale began, a surprising number of women put on their hats.

The two Debussy pieces, favorites with Mr Koussevitzky, were as usual very brilliantly played and warmly applauded. In them he excels.

Hindemith's concerto may not prove an immortal masterpiece, but it is an interesting and not exceptionally noisy or discordant modernist work that deserved to be heard a second time.

The case against Hindemith is very cleverly but rather unfairly stated by Ernest Newman in a review reprinted in the program book. In his favor should be alleged the rhythmic vitality and the intensely personal style of his work. You may not like the flavor, but the flavor is there. Young Germany, like young France, Italy, Russia and America, deserves a hearing in a series of orchestral concerts designed, as this one is, to include representative pieces of orchestral music old and new from every school and writer of importance.

Luckily Mr Koussevitzky's zeal for modern music cannot be dampened by any amount of apathy or hostility on the part of the audience. If they do not like it, well, then he will play it until they learn to; as Theodore Thomas is said to have remarked of Wagner when Wagner was dangerously modern.

Next week's program includes excerpts from Stravinsky's recent ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," a suite by the Hungarian composer Kodaly, also new, and Schumann's First Symphony.

P. H.

28 Boston Herald oct 6 '28

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By PHILIP HALE

The 48th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, opened yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Debussy, nocturnes, "Clouds," "Festivals"; Hindemith, concerto for orchestra, op. 38; Beethoven, "Eroica" symphony. There were a few new members—an excellent first horn player from Berlin, Mr. Boettcher; a violoncellist, two violinists. Mr. B. Zighera, harpist, has replaced Mr. Holy; Mr. Caughey is the second harpist. Mr. Koussevitzky was warmly welcomed when he came on the platform. The audience and the orchestra rose to greet him.

The season opened brilliantly. In former years it was the custom to say of the first concert that the players would no doubt soon recover from the enforced rest and a few more rehearsals would restore the euphony, plasticity and technical proficiency which had made the orchestra famous. Yesterday's performance did not call for this time-honored observation.

Nor do the compositions chosen demand extended comment. Some day, perhaps, we shall hear the three nocturnes with the music for the Sirens (nocturne III) sung by a few capable singers, not as in former years by a lusty chorus exulting in the fact that they could overpower Debussy's orchestra. We have been unfortunate in our Sirens; the hearers should have put sweet soft wax in their ears, as did the fellow-voyagers of the wily Ulysses.

Objection was made some seasons ago by a stickler for literal interpretation to Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of "Festivals," especially the dazzling vision of a procession—"Debussy never wanted it to go that way." Now, no one of us in Boston knows exactly how Debussy wished "Festivals" to be played. A printed score is at the best only a suggestion to a conductor. It is the conductor's duty—as has been wisely said—to find out and express what is not in the printed page. The composer may have thought better than he knew, but failed to make his thoughts clear. Eloquent in thought, he may have stammered in writing. It is our own belief that if Debussy could have heard his "Festivals" yesterday he would have gone on the platform and, in the face of the public, embraced Mr. Koussevitzky.

Hindemith's concerto was produced here—for the first time in this country—in March, 1926. Eminent critics in Europe believe that Hindemith is the coming man; equally eminent critics look upon him as a fresh and arrogant person who strives to make the bourgeoisie sit up. Some insist that his music is interesting only for its rhythmic intensity and fire; that his melodic ideas are thin; his polytonality confusion and the abomination of desolation. To us the first movement of this concerto is chiefly a waste of energy; in itself as conventional as any academic allegro of a third rate sweating German Kapellmeister. Let it be noted that "Kapellmeister" music is often written by extreme modernists. The uninspired Kapellmeister is found in every century. In the other pages of the concerto we find genuine fancy—especially in the march with its introduction and conclusion—and indisputable originality.

The overture, which is the dramatic condensation of "Fidelio," a nobler work than the opera itself, free from superfluities and commonplaces, and the symphony were superbly played. Whenever the "Eroica" is announced, there is curiosity as to the pace at which the Funeral March will be taken. Some conductors are so overcome by the word "funeral," so in awe of the name Beethoven, that they drag the music beyond endurance. Mr. Koussevitzky gave an eloquent reading. He did not try to cast a gloom over the funeral.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week is as follows: Stravinsky, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses"; ballet (first time here); Kodaly, suite from the comic opera "Hary Janos" (first time here); Schumann, symphony, B flat major, No. 1.

Rent-Free Periods for Magrane's Tenants

Patrick B. Magrane, Lynn department store proprietor and owner of a large number of tenement and apartment houses, announced yesterday that all present and new tenants of his properties will be rent free for two periods of two weeks each during the course of the year.

A year ago Mr. Magrane put into effect a 20 per cent. reduction of his rents. He estimates that from 1500 to 1800 will be affected by his new offer.

2 BOSTON STATIONS ASK POWER HEARING

WMES and WNAC-WBIX Are To Apply to Federal Radio Commissioner

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

WASHINGTON, Oct. 5—The federal radio commission today decided to allow station WLW, Cincinnati, to increase its power from 5000 to 50,000 watts. This was done despite the fact that Judge Ira E. Robinson, chairman of the committee, and who is the commissioner in Chicago, the zone which embraces Cincinnati, opposed the increase, suggesting that it be limited to 10,000 watts. The power increase will be effective at once and stay in effect under the reallocation plan. Of the power 50,000 watts authorized, 25,000 watts is to be permanent and 25,000 for experimental use under the ruling of the commission. This will be the first 50,000-watt station in that section of the country.

There are also pending before the commission applications for four other 50,000-watt stations. Construction permits have already been issued by the commission for these four stations, but no action has been taken as to their power. They are WNR, Chicago; WTIC, Hartford, Ct., and WPAG and WFAA, both at Dallas, Tex.

While hearing dates under the reallocation plan have not yet been announced by the commission, it was indicated that no hearings would begin before Oct. 15. Formal application has been made to the commission by a large number of broadcasters for hearings.

Among stations which have asked for hearings by the commission are WMES, Boston, and WNAC-WBIX, Boston, and WEAN, Providence, R. I.

TRANS

Concert-Chronicle

As It Should Be

OCT 8 1928

THERE was no questioning it. On Saturday evening the new year at the Symphony Concerts really began. The applause for Mr. Koussevitzky, entering, was longer and heartier than on Friday. At the end of the Third "Leonora" Overture the audience, promptly and deservedly, called the orchestra to its feet, as if to salute it as well as the conductor. Though it was ten o'clock and twenty minutes when the concert ended, there was no hasty departure, but vigorous clapping that brought back Mr. Koussevitzky and bade the orchestra rise again. Not for nothing had they repeated the performance of the "Eroica" Symphony from which the matinée company shamelessly trickled away. Hindemith, however, again took the audience unawares. He himself ends his Concerto abruptly; the program-sheet, like the score, divided it into four movements; whereas the conductor paused but once, between divisions two and three. Hence an instant of confusion; then more than enough applause to recall the con- and set modernist ears pleasantly [illegible] Response or no response, each time the Concerto is repeated it stands bravely on its own merits.

It is rather a pity that the third of Debussy's Nocturnes—"Sirens" with a small humming chorus of women's voices—has dropped from the active repertory. In Symphony Hall, unless memory slips, it has not been heard through many years; rarely does it come to performance elsewhere. Did conductors join it habitually to "Clouds" and "Fêtes," it might save them from a pit into which most of them fall and on the edge of which Mr. Koussevitzky perilously hovers. Accustomed to play only these two, they take them as contrasting pieces and stress the contrast. They slow the pace, lower the voice, subdue the tonal coloring, of "Clouds." Next they pounce upon "Fêtes," quickening, sharpening, heightening, until the whole music speeds and flashes. They stay themselves—and make another contrast—only when the aerial pageant passes in tonal vision.

The outcome is an exaggeration, rather than an intensification, of the quality of either piece; while Debussy loved the golden mean and had no mind to effects for the effects' sake. Not to be behindhand, Mr. Koussevitzky "plays up" this tempting contrast. A beat slower and he would be dragging "Clouds." Those who mistakenly believe that Debussy never spoke out, should hear the conductor's version of "Fêtes." As it is, he plays with peril and by the turn of two hairs escapes it. Enough that he and his orchestra gain the beauty for which there is no word when above the rustling, darkening strings, the wood-winds dissolve into the air the final measures of "Clouds."

"Ohne Pathos," commands Hindemith over the first division of his Concerto, by which he means without emotion, sentiment or even expression. Yet in the third division, the "March for Woodwinds," there is a lyrical interlude, unless a fourth hearing still deceives the ear, over which he might have written "mit Pathos." It is distinctly songful; the mood, unmistakably, is German-romantic; only the means are quasi-modernistic. The chortling double-bassoons before and behind are stilled; the gentler wood-winds do the young lion's purring. A lyrical vein runs in Hindemith. It was clear in the early Quartet for Strings that, at Pittsfield, first commended him to American ears. It persists overtly or latently in his subsequent work, running full in his nearest approach to a masterpiece, the "Marienleben" songs. Hindemith would not be Hindemith did he not pretend to check it and profess to treat it prosaically. Yet up it springs, as in this "March for Woodwinds," and for the time possesses him.

Detractors like to taunt Hindemith with the use of old forms for modernistic aggression, to call him "cheeky," "gabbling," or by any other disparaging adjective in fashion. As it happens, the "gabble" proves—in the Concerto, for example—to be a fresh-sounding, full-bodied, quick-spirited music; while the "cheekiness" brings off such a blood-stirring tumult of rhythm as ends the second movement. Hindemith knows the orchestra instrument by instrument. With all his haste and hardness every timbre, every mating or parting, tells. As audiences hear more and more modernist music, instinctively they separate the lasting wheat from the passing chaff, the vitalized from the willed staves. Four times Mr. Koussevitzky has played this Concerto and four times it has bitten home.

— END

POST
OCT. 6-

SYMPHONY MARVEL OF VIRTUOSITY

Fifth Season Under Koussevitzky Begins

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Beginning his fifth term of conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon led that band through the initial concert of this, its 48th season.

By report, in the four days of rehearsal the conductor had spared neither the players nor himself. Yesterday there resulted a series of performances that, as it seemed, disclosed the orchestra at something better than its wonted best.

A FEW CHANGES

Outwardly there were changes. Gone are the microphones that formerly hung suspended over the orchestral semi-circle, since for the present the concerts are not to be broadcasted. When the players grouped themselves upon the stage it might be observed that Mr. Wendler had departed and that a new first horn, Mr. Boettcher, sat in his place, while no longer will the leonine head of Mr. Holy be seen at the first harp. Instead there now sits at this latter post Mr. Zighera, partnered by Mr. Kaughey, returned after a brief absence. A new 'cellist, Mr. Chardon, a new violinist, Mr. Lauga, and a new percussion player, Mr. White, have also joined the ranks.

Stepping briskly out upon the stage, Mr. Koussevitzky was greeted according to custom by a rising orchestra and audience. There were a few moments of applause, then the conductor turned to the first music before him, Beethoven's Overture to Leonora, No. 3. No piece better serves to head an opening programme, and interpretative eloquence and instrumental skill could scarcely go farther than in the performance yesterday accorded it.

Old as New Pieces Go

With the exception of Paul Hindemith's Concerto for Orchestra, Opus 38, introduced here by Mr. Koussevitzky in the spring of 1926 and most deservedly repeated, the programme of yesterday was, in a sense, of less moment than the playing of it. Many times now have Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra given us the Leonora Overture, Debussy's Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Yet their already signal achievements with these pieces were yesterday exceeded and surpassed.

It would be gratifying to record that the enthusiasm of the audience testified to these wonders. Truth to tell, however, the applause was at best little more than ordinarily cordial, and at the end it did not suffice to return Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage.

Hindemith Over the Heads

As for Hindemith's Concerto, the audience as a whole would have none of it, although the performance was one of a bewildering virtuosity that should have excited warm appreciation for itself alone. But the music, while a notable accomplishment, is still in its uncompromising harshness and severity, a stiff dose for the casual listener, and the single hiss vouchsafed it from somewhere in the balcony had in it more of conviction than did any of the desultory hand-claps.

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's belief that this concerto is destined to occupy a permanent place in the repertory; but only devotion such as his will fix it there. Not yet do audiences clamor for these polytonal, mechanistic moderns whose goal is seemingly to arouse the mind, not to caress to titillate the ear.

A strange fish nearly six feet long and having small eyes with lids, was recently caught near the Farne Islands off the coast of England.

SUN GLOBE OCT 7

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky has put two new works on this week's Boston Symphony program, excerpts from Stravinsky's latest composition, the ballet "Apollo Musagetes," written for the festival of chamber music at the Library of Congress last Spring, and a suite by the Hungarian composer Kodaly, known here only by his chamber music. Stravinsky's ballet was not regarded by those who heard it at Washington as one of his important works. Kodaly, to judge by the few pieces of his already played in Boston, is not a modernist.

The deference of the coming visit to Boston of Herbert Hoover, Serge Koussevitzky has postponed the date of his pending double-bass recital. The recital was announced to be given in Symphony Hall Monday, Oct 15, and will be given instead on Wednesday, Oct 17.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will then make his second American appearance as virtuoso of the unusual instrument by which he became famous before his career as conductor began. Koussevitzky will make his New York debut as a virtuoso Oct 22.

Tickets for the Boston recital marked Oct 15 will be good for Oct 17.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, opened its forty-eighth season last Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, Op. 38, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. This week's program includes Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollon Musagète," first heard last April at Mrs. F. S. Coolidge's Washington festival at the Library of Congress; Kodaly's "Hary Janos" suite and Schumann's symphony in B flat.

The Boston Symphony's first Carnegie Hall concerts this season will be on Thursday and Saturday, November 22 and 24.

OCT 7 1928
N.Y. HER. & TRIB

STAGE and STUDIO

Columbus Dispatch

THE Boston Symphony orchestra launched into its forty-eighth season, Friday evening, in Symphony hall at Boston. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated European and American conductor, at the same time began his fifth year as the mentor of the famous band of musicians.

At press time for this page, comments by eastern cities on this concert, which is considered in Boston as the greatest musical event of the season, had not yet reached Columbus.

What the sages have to say, however, is of vital interest in central Ohio, because Koussevitzky and his Boston orchestra will open the symphony season in Columbus at Memorial hall on Nov. 1.

OCT 7

ARRIVES FROM PARIS.

Koussevitzky arrived in America from Paris only ten days ago and in the interim he put his orchestra through a strenuous pace of rehearsals preparatory to the first concert. Recenty he completed his "Concerts Koussevitzky," a series which he has sponsored annually for the past decade in Paris.

The famous conductor is expected to bring some new music in the symphonic category before the public this season. Upon his return from abroad Koussevitzky had in his trunks scores of new symphonies by Prokofieff; Martinu, the Czecho-Slovakian, and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions. Another American premier will be a symphony by Freedrick the Great, the versatile statesman whose symphonies and skill upon the flute were not the least of his abilities.

In the meanwhile the Symphony club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring its fifth season of symphony concerts in Columbus, is preparing for a concerted drive, beginning Tuesday, to sell out Memorial hall for all four concerts in the series.

DRIVE STARTS MONDAY.

Monday, at 2:30, Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the club, will preside at a meeting of members of all divisions of the organization, at which plans for the drive will be discussed.

The box office for the sale of seats will open at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, Monday, Oct. 22. In the meanwhile season reservations can be made with Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue, executive secretary of the club.

MMENT OF THE CURR

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Conductor, Who Gives Double-Bass Recital Oct. 23.

TRANS. OCT 10

...reen

For Mr. Hoover

Mr. Koussevitzky Makes Known a Political Preference

MUSICAL AMERICA, the weekly journal, is asking musicians to declare their choice for the presidency between Hoover, Smith and Thomas. To its inquiry Mr. Koussevitzky replied:

I. My choice for President of the United States: Mr. Hoover.

II. Why: Personally, like all Russians, I feel a great sympathy for him and am deeply grateful to him. For it is his will and his energy that saved millions of lives in Russia, during those years of misery and famine, 1921 and 1922; and one might easily imagine that a man who acted so generously towards a foreign country, would bring the greatest welfare to his own.

The conductor, of course, casts no vote. His civic status, as they call it in Europe, is a singular one: A Russian emigré, domiciled in Paris.

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Koussevitzky will bring out two unfamiliar compositions at the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: "Apollon Musagete," by Stravinsky, and a suite from the comic opera, "Hary Janos," by Zoltan Kodaly. The remaining number is Schumann's Symphony No. 1, B flat major.

"Apollo Leader of the Muses" is a ballet. It was composed for Mrs. Coolidge's chamber music festival the Library of Congress, Washington D. C., and performed there in April of this year, with Adolf Bolm miming Apollo. The Ballet Russe brought out the ballet at the Sarah Bernhardt Theatre, Paris, in June, and at His Majesty's Theatre, London, in the same month. M. Lifar mimed Apollo in the performances by the Ballet Russe.

The ballet has no story. There is a series of divertissements representing "the birth of the god and his inspiration of the Muses." Dancing is the thing, not action, and there is no symbolic significance—which may disappoint those who are fond of extracting sunbeams from cucumbers. It was said in Paris that the choregraphy is based on steps and movements of the classic school with an avoidance of the queer attitudes which have been in fashion for some years. "M. Lifar is the Etruscan Apollo of Veii come to life. From the moment when he emerges from the rock upon which his mother Leto is sitting until the chariot descends from the sky to carry him and the Muses to their new home upon Parnassus, he maintains the lines and gestures of archaic sculpture. Compared with the god, the Muses Terpsichore, Calliope and Polymnia seem strangely 19th century in their formal ballet skirts and tight mauve bodices, but the contrast is not unpleasant."

The critic of the London Times was amused. "A young woman sits astride an archway from which hangs a muslin curtain; a young man swathed in silk hops behind the muslin. He is Apollo. Two young women remove the swathings; he now has very little on and hops more freely; the lights go out; when they go up again he has put on a red garment. He goes through the motions of playing on a strangely shaped instrument. Three Muses, all in conventional ballet dresses, visit him. He goes through further elaborate movements with them and gives them appropriate symbols for their arts—a writing tablet, a mask, and a lyre. They put them down, and all shuffle round on their heels, holding each other's heads. That must be difficult, and there are other difficult things, especially the movements done in the time of a slow motion picture. At last the four horses and a chariot of Apollo appear on the back cloth; Apollo stands on a rock and points at them. The three Muses and the young women who had unwound him in the first scene assist in a tableau. Every one seemed very much impressed because it all means so much; the only question is 'What'?"

The music is for strings only. Some think that Stravinsky sought to write in the spirit of Lulli's ballet music.

"Musagetes." This characterization of Apollo appears in a Pindaric ode—also in the Mystical Hymn of Orpheus "To Apollo."

"Titanic, Grunian, Smynthian, thee I sing,
Python-destroying, hallow'd Delphian King:
Rural, light-bearer, and the Muses' head,
Noble and lovely, arm'd with arrows dread."

We quote from the prosaic translation by Thomas Taylor. It is far from Matthew Arnold's

"'Tis Apollo comes leading
His choir, the Nine.
—The leader is fairest,
But all are divine."

The epithet "Musagetes" was also joined by the Greeks to the name of Hercules.

The suite from Kodaly's opera was played for the first time anywhere by the Philharmonic Society in New York, Mr. Mengelberg conductor, on Dec. 15, 1927. The opera was produced at Budapest in the year before.

Hary Janes is a famous person in Hungarian folk lore. The libretto is based on an epic poem written about the middle of the 19th century by Janos Garay. Some say Hary really existed. He was a peasant, who, having served in the Napoleonic wars, went back to his village and told incredible, Munchausen-like tales of his heroic deeds. Repeating them often, he finally believed in them. The opera deals with five of his adventures. There is a prologue at the village inn. The scheme of the opera is similar to that of "Contes d'Hoffmann."

A sneeze in Hungary is believed to attest the truth of any statement that has been made; so, when Hary tells an amazing yarn, an accidental sneeze from one of the listeners stamps the yarn as true.

The suite begins with a prodigious orchestral sneeze.

Hary tells of the musical clock he saw in the palace at Vienna, a clock furnished with puppets. He and his sweetheart with him long for their fatherland: there is a love song, a Hungarian melody. He overcomes Napoleon in battle, and takes him prisoner in Milan. Napoleon trembled and wept when he caught sight of Hary. The snowbound empire of the Tsar is divided by a rail from the Austrian empire on which a spring sun is shining. "At the end of the world the stars are as big as loaves of bread, and the moon's sickle touches the earth;" here Hary fights a seven-headed dragon and rescues Marie Louise, whom he carries back to her father, the Emperor in Vienna. The suite ends with a march for the Emperor and his court entering in triumph. There is an Intermezzo with only musical significance.

Kodaly, composer, collector of folk songs, critic, was born in Hungary in 1882. In 1900 he studied composition with Hans Koessler at the High School for Music at Budapest, where, since 1906, he has taught composition. He has written songs, chamber music, and published collections of folk songs. His "Psalmus Hungaricus," an important work, performed at Salzburg for the International Society for Contemporary Music in 1923, was produced in this country by the Philharmonic Society, with the Pro-Musica Society in New York on Dec. 19, 1927.

The program of the Symphony concerts next week comprises Haydn's Symphony, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6); Rubin Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody," and Cesar Franck's Symphony.

5

MMENT OF THE CURR

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Conductor, Who Gives Double-Bass Recital Oct. 23.

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Koussevitzky will bring out two unfamiliar compositions at the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: "Apollon Musagete," by Stravinsky, and a suite from the comic opera, "Hary Janos," by Zoltan Kodaly. The remaining number is Schumann's Symphony No. 1, B flat major.

"Apollo Leader of the Muses" is a ballet. It was composed for Mrs. Coolidge's chamber music festival at the Library of Congress, Washington, D. C., and performed there in April of this year, with Adolf Bolm miming Apollo. The Ballet Russe brought out the ballet at the Sarah Bernhardt Theatre, Paris, in June, and at His Majesty's Theatre, London, in the same month. M. Lifar mimed Apollo in the performances by the Ballet Russe.

The ballet has no story. There is a series of divertissements representing "the birth of the god and his inspiration of the Muses." Dancing is the thing, not action, and there is no symbolic significance—which may disappoint those who are fond of extracting sunbeams from cucumbers. It was said in Paris that the choregraphy is based on steps and movements of the classic school with an avoidance of the queer attitudes which have been in fashion for some years. "M. Lifar is the Etruscan Apollo of Veii come to life. From the moment when he emerges from the rock upon which his mother Leto is sitting until the chariot descends from the sky to carry him and the Muses to their new home upon Parnassus, he maintains the lines and gestures of archaic sculpture. Compared with the god, the Muses Terpsichore, Calliope and Polymnia seem strangely 19th century in their formal ballet skirts, and tight mauve bodices, but the contrast is not unpleasant."

The critic of the London Times was amused. "A young woman sits astride an archway from which hangs a muslin curtain; a young man swathed in silk hops behind the muslin. He is Apollo. Two young women remove the swathings; he now has very little on and hops more freely; the lights go out; when they go up again he has put on a red garment. He goes through the motions of playing on a strangely shaped instrument. Three Muses, all in conventional ballet dresses, visit him. He goes through further elaborate movements with them and gives them appropriate symbols for their arts—a writing tablet, a mask, and a lyre. They put them down, and all shuffle round on their heels, holding each other's heads. That must be difficult, and there are other difficult things, especially the movements done in the time of a slow motion picture. At last the four horses and a chariot of Apollo appear on the back cloth; Apollo stands on a rock and points at them. The three Muses and the young women who had unwound him in the first scene assist in a tableau. Every one seemed very much impressed because it all means so much; the only question is 'What'?"

The music is for strings only. Some think that Stravinsky sought to write in the spirit of Lulli's ballet music.

"Musagetes." This characterization of Apollo appears in a Pindaric ode—also in the Mystical Hymn of Orpheus "To Apollo."

"Titanic, Grunian, Smynthian, thee I sing,
Python-destroying, hallow'd Delphian King:
Rural, light-bearer, and the Muses' head,
Noble and lovely, arm'd with arrows dread."

We quote from the prosaic translation by Thomas Taylor. It is far from Matthew Arnold's

"'Tis Apollo comes leading
His choir, the Nine.
—The leader is fairest,
But all are divine."

The epithet "Musagetes" was also joined by the Greeks to the name of Hercules.

The suite from Kodaly's opera was played for the first time anywhere by the Philharmonic Society in New York, Mr. Mengelberg conductor, on Dec. 15, 1927. The opera was produced at Budapest in the year before.

Hary Janes is a famous person in Hungarian folk lore. The libretto is based on an epic poem written about the middle of the 19th century by Janos Garay. Some say Hary really existed. He was a peasant, who, having served in the Napoleonic wars, went back to his village and told incredible, Munchausen-like tales of his heroic deeds. Repeating them often, he finally believed in them. The opera deals with five of his adventures. There is a prologue at the village inn. The scheme of the opera is similar to that of "Contes d'Hoffmann."

A sneeze in Hungary is believed to attest the truth of any statement that has been made; so, when Hary tells an amazing yarn, an accidental sneeze from one of the listeners stamps the yarn as true.

The suite begins with a prodigious orchestral sneeze.

Hary tells of the musical clock he saw in the palace at Vienna, a clock furnished with puppets. He and his sweetheart with him long for their fatherland: there is a love song, a Hungarian melody. He overcomes Napoleon in battle, and takes him prisoner in Milan. Napoleon trembled and wept when he caught sight of Hary. The snowbound empire of the Tsar is divided by a rail from the Austrian empire on which a spring sun is shining. "At the end of the world the stars are as big as loaves of bread, and the moon's sickle touches the earth;" here Hary fights a seven-headed dragon and rescues Marie Louise, whom he carries back to her father, the Emperor in Vienna. The suite ends with a march for the Emperor and his court entering in triumph. There is an Intermezzo with only musical significance.

Kodaly, composer, collector of folk songs, critic, was born in Hungary in 1882. In 1900 he studied composition with Hans Koessler at the High School for Music at Budapest, where, since 1906, he has taught composition. He has written songs, chamber music, and published collections of folk songs. His "Psalmus Hungaricus," an important work, performed at Salzburg for the International Society for Contemporary Music in 1923, was produced in this country by the Philharmonic Society, with the Pro-Musica Society in New York on Dec. 19, 1927.

The program of the Symphony concerts next week comprises Haydn's Symphony, "The Surprise" (B. & H. No. 6); Rubin Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody," and Cesar Franck's Symphony.

SUN. GLOBE OCT 7

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky has put two new works on this week's Boston Symphony program, excerpts from Stravinsky's latest composition, the ballet "Apollo Musagetes," written for the festival of chamber music at the Library of Congress last Spring, and a suite by the Hungarian composer Kodaly, known here only by his chamber music. Stravinsky's ballet was not regarded by those who heard it at Washington as one of his important works. Kodaly, to judge by the few pieces of his already played in Boston, is not a modernist.

The deference of the coming visit to Boston of Herbert Hoover, Serge Koussevitzky has postponed the date of his pending double-bass recital. The recital was announced to be given in Symphony Hall Monday, Oct 15, and will be given instead on Wednesday, Oct 17.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will then make his second American appearance as virtuoso of the unusual instrument by which he became famous before his career as conductor began. Koussevitzky will make his New York debut as a virtuoso Oct 22.

Tickets for the Boston recital marked Oct 15 will be good for Oct 17.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, opened its forty-eighth season last Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, Op. 38, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. This week's program includes Stravinsky's ballet; "Apollon Musagète," first heard last April at Mrs. F. S. Coolidge's Washington festival at the Library of Congress; Kodaly's "Hary Janos" suite and Schumann's symphony in B flat.

The Boston Symphony's first Carnegie Hall concerts this season will be on Thursday and Saturday, November 22 and 24.

OCT 7 1928
N.Y. HER. & TRIB

STAGE and STUDIO

Crumbies Dispatch

THE Boston Symphony orchestra launched into its forty-eighth season, Friday evening, in Symphony hall at Boston. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated European and American conductor, at the same time began his fifth year as the mentor of the famous band of musicians.

At press time for this page, comments by eastern cities on this concert, which is considered in Boston as the greatest musical event of the season, had not yet reached Columbus.

What the sages have to say, however, is of vital interest in central Ohio, because Koussevitzky and his Boston orchestra will open the symphony season in Columbus at Memorial hall on Nov. 1.

OCT 7

ARRIVES FROM PARIS.

Koussevitzky arrived in America from Paris only ten days ago and in the interim he put his orchestra through a strenuous pace of rehearsals preparatory to the first concert. Recenty he completed his "Concerts Koussevitzky," a series which he has sponsored annually for the past decade in Paris.

The famous conductor is expected to bring some new music in the symphonic category before the public this season. Upon his return from abroad Koussevitzky had in his trunks scores of new symphonies by Prokofolieff; Martinu, the Czecho-Slovakian, and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions. Another American premier will be a symphony by Freedrick the Great, the versatile statesman whose symphonies and skill upon the flute were not the least of his abilities.

In the meanwhile the Symphony club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring its fifth season of symphony concerts in Columbus, is preparing for a concerted drive, beginning Tuesday, to sell out Memorial hall for all four concerts in the series.

DRIVE STARTS MONDAY.

Monday, at 2:30, Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the club, will preside at a meeting of members of all divisions of the organization, at which plans for the drive will be discussed.

The box office for the sale of seats will open at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, Monday, Oct. 22. In the meanwhile season reservations can be made with Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue, executive secretary of the club.

TRANS. OCT 10

reen

For Mr. Hoover

Mr. Koussevitzky Makes Known a Political Preference

MUSICAL AMERICA, the weekly journal, is asking musicians to declare their choice for the presidency between Hoover, Smith and Thomas. To its inquiry Mr. Koussevitzky replied:

I. My choice for President of the United States: Mr. Hoover.

II. Why: Personally, like all Russians, I feel a great sympathy for him and am deeply grateful to him. For it is his will and his energy that saved millions of lives in Russia, during those years of misery and famine, 1921 and 1922; and one might easily imagine that a man who acted so generously towards a foreign country, would bring the greatest welfare to his own.

The conductor, of course, casts no vote. His civic status, as they call it in Europe, is a singular one: A Russian emigré, domiciled in Paris.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Music and Musicians --- Plays and Players --- The

From Hungary Comes Kodaly, With His Hary

Composer, Background, Hero, As They Emerge Friday At Symphony Hall

THERE ARE two novelties on Mr. Koussevitzky's current program —the one from a composer tried and proved, Igor Stravinsky; the other from a composer as yet unknown to the Symphony Concerts and all but unknown to Boston, Zoltán Kodály. Indeed, it is Kodály's first orchestral piece that Mr. Koussevitzky brings to Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday. Stravinsky's "Apollo" is described elsewhere on this page. To Kodály and his Suite from "Háry Janos" this column addresses itself.

Among living Hungarian musicians two names stand out prominently, Bartók's and Kodály's. Kodály was born at Kecskemét, Dec. 16, 1882. At the age of eighteen he entered the Royal High School for Music at Budapest. During his student days his style of composition was influenced first by Brahms, later by Debussy. Since 1905 he has been active as a collector and editor of Hungarian folk-music. It became the dominating influence in his style, as it did in the style of the better known Bartók. Nevertheless it would be a mistake to say that the influence of this folk-music has made their musical styles run in closely similar molds. To the contrary, each presents a musical individuality of his own, in which the folk-element is no more than a large factor. Bartók, employing folk-music, sounds different from Kodály using that same folk-music.

It was Bartók who first made a scientific study of the folk-music of Hungary. Previously he had composed, as has many another, using popular music as he found it for flavor of the soil, without subjecting it to careful scrutiny as to origin or genuine character. His "Kossuth," his Rhapsody, Op. 1, other minor works, belong to this period in his career. Delving more deeply into folk-lore, Bartók discovered that the popular music he had been using was mongrel—a music in which the old Hungarian melodies were overlaid with a mixture of additions from gypsies, from Roumanians and Slovenes, from less closely allied races. His publication of his discoveries and the change of his own musical style to this new basis led to definite and unmistakable unpopularity. At this juncture Kodály, who had been appointed a teacher at the Royal High School (1906), one year earlier than Bartók, came to the rescue with staunch support.

Since that time the two have worked side by side in this harvest of folk-music, often collaborating. Most of their Hungarian tunes are put into notation directly as sung to the collector by peasants; but sometimes the tunes are recorded by a phonograph. Bartók is said to have collected some 2700 melodies, while the number gathered by Kodály mounts to 3500; two less known enthusiasts add 2000 more. Such of the melodies as give evidence of going back into antiquity are generally in the pentatonic scale in Æolian or Dorian modes. The rhythm is a sort of "parlando-rubato." Lines of an irregular number of syllables abound. Melodies in a faster tempo, frequently with the "Hungarian" rhythmic "catch" dear to violinists' show-pieces a generation ago, are usually no more than seventy or seventy-five years old. Their rhythmic structure is more regular than that of the elder melodies. Even more numerous is a body of tunes which cannot be ascribed to purely Hungarian sources, presenting also no uniform characteristics.

As a composer Kodály, until recently, confided himself to the smaller or more intimate forms and styles. His published work includes piano-pieces which have been described as "predominantly harmonic and percussive;" songs; chamber-music in which the true polyphonic spirit reigns; several choral pieces for voices unaccompanied. The chamber-music includes besides string-quartets, piano-trios, sonatas, several experimental combinations, such as a Duet for Violin and 'Cello; a noble and musicianly Sonata for Violoncello alone; a Serenade for Two Violins and Viola. With the year 1923 Kodály begins to command larger tonal masses. In that year he published Opus 18, a sixteenth-century Hungarian version of Psalm LV, for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra, commonly known as the "Psalmus Hungaricus," widely known and well received over all Europe. Following this Psalm came the opera, "Háry Janos," first produced at the Royal Opera in Budapest, Oct. 16, 1926. Kodály is also author of "The Pentatonic Scale in Hungarian Folk Music," and contributes occasionally to La Revue Musicale and The Musical Courier.

Of Kodály's style Bartók has written that it "owes much of its character to the individual musical idiom he has created for himself out of the Hungarian peasant-music he has personally collected." Another writer describes that idiom as one of "startling originality." Still another affirms that Kodály "does not abandon tonality and the accepted forms, but creates new music of astonishing vitality within their limits."

At the first performance in America of the Suite from "Háry Janos" by Mr. Mengelberg and the New York Philharmonic Society (Dec. 15, 1927) Kodály furnished the following sketch of the opera:

The story recounts the adventures of Háry Janos, a national hero of folk-lore. A peasant and ex-soldier, with great powers of imagination, Háry sits in the village-inn day after day telling of his wonderful exploits. In typical peasant-fashion, these glorious products of his fancy are presented in terms of extreme realism and naiveté, yielding a curious mixture of comedy and pathos. Yet Háry is not to be viewed as merely an Hungarian Muenchausen. The apparent swaggerer is at bottom the enthusiastic dreamer, a born fanatic and rhapsodist. His stories are not true, but that is unimportant. They are expressions of the beauty of his fantasy, which builds for himself and others an artistic and absorbing world of the imagination. We all dream of these impossible deeds of glory and grandeur; only we lack the naive courage of Háry, and dare not reveal them. A deeper significance is given to the story by regarding Háry as symbolic of the Hungarian nation, whose strivings and ambitions can be fulfilled only in dreams.

From one who heard the opera at the first performance in Budapest it appears that it is an extravagant comedy, partly spoken, partly sung. The imagined heroisms of the story-teller grow into action upon the stage: The rescue of the imperial Princess Marie-Louise across the Russo-Austrian border; the victory over Napoleon before the gates of Milan; the conquest of the dragon; Háry's advancement to the position of general; his life, quiet and respected, in the imperial castle at Vienna; his constancy to the daughter of his native village. The music is said to fit these folk-tales as hand in glove. The dances, the choruses, the solos are taken from the composer's collection of folk-tunes in a union of folk-tale with apposite folk-music. Only the orchestral interludes are original work by Kodály. But the harmonization, the contrapuntal and orchestral handling of the folk-pieces, are as characteristic and descriptive as the interludes themselves. The folk-tunes are adroitly chosen; as adept and as close-fitting is the workmanship.

For orchestral performance Kodály has drawn from his opera a Suite of six numbers. Let him continue his description as found in the program book of the Philharmonic Society: "According to a Hungarian superstition, if a statement is followed by a sneeze of one of the hearers, it is regarded as confirmation of the truth of the assertion. The Háry Suite begins with a sneeze of this kind. One of Háry's group of faithful listeners, who sneezes at the wildest assertions of the old tale-spinner, is equal to the occasion even when Háry declares that he once had occasion to subdue Napoleon himself! With a suggestion of this sneeze [amusing glissandi, in which pianos take part] "The Tale Begins" Number One of the Suite—con moto, tranquillo, molto moderato. The other movements run:

"II. (Allegretto) The scene is laid in the Imperial Palace in Vienna, where the ingenuous Hungarian is amazed and enraptured by the famous 'Musical Clock', with its little soldier figures in their brave uniforms appearing at every rotation of the marvellous machinery.

"III. (Andante, poco rubato) Háry and his sweetheart are longing for their village home, their quiet evenings vocal with love songs. An ancient Hungarian melody is used.

"IV. (Alla marcia) Háry, as general in command of his hussars, confronts the French army. He brandishes his sword and lo! the French begin to fall before him like tin soldiers! First, two at a time, then four—eight—ten, and so on. Finally there are no more French soldiers left, and Napoleon is forced to engage in person with the invincible Háry. Háry's fantasy pictures a Napoleon made in the image of his own burly peasant imagination—an immensely tall and formidable Napoleon, who, shaking in every limb, kneels before his conqueror and pleads for mercy. The ironical French March of Victory is transformed into a dirge.

"V. is an intermezzo without special significance. [A whirling Hungarian dance.]

"VI. An ironical march of triumph, in which Háry pictures the ... Emperor and the Imperial Court at Vienna; but it is not the Austrian reality —only a Hungarian peasant's way of imagining the rich happiness of the celebrated Wiener Burg."

After the first performance of the Suite in London a reviewer rose to the occasion as follows: "Last week Zoltan Kodály woke London's musical deadheads with a gigantic sneeze,—quite a new kind of wheeze in fact. ... Janos' proved as 'monstrous good fooling' as has ever pleased British fancy since Shakspeare's day. Intrinsically and by association of ideas, everyone found something for his humor. The music is imbued with a superlative quality of caricature, an exaggeration without mutilation of its originals.

"Behind it all there is ... rous novelty in this music of a folk-enthusiast who can laugh at folk-cults. . . . With this whimsical, sometimes wistful and ironically wit y music Kodály ... stakes own particular place among the world's sardonic thinkers. He allies his Muse to the line of music in the comic spirit, descending through Stravinsky, Prokofiev, Berners, Milhaud, Carpenter, Converse and others of today. True to all real satire, emotion has its due place, and the grotesque sense is emphasized by vivid contrast with real beauty. A theme is woven between viola and oboe which has haunting poignancy; there is an Intermezzo which radiates imaginative blazonries. The score is an immense fresco, in which a master-colorist in orchestral pigments unifies his design with bold, but impeccable draftsmanship and combines these in a fine piece of construction. Humanly speaking, the Suite touches profundity of the inner sort, conveying realization of the pathetically narrow line which often divides insanity and inspiration."

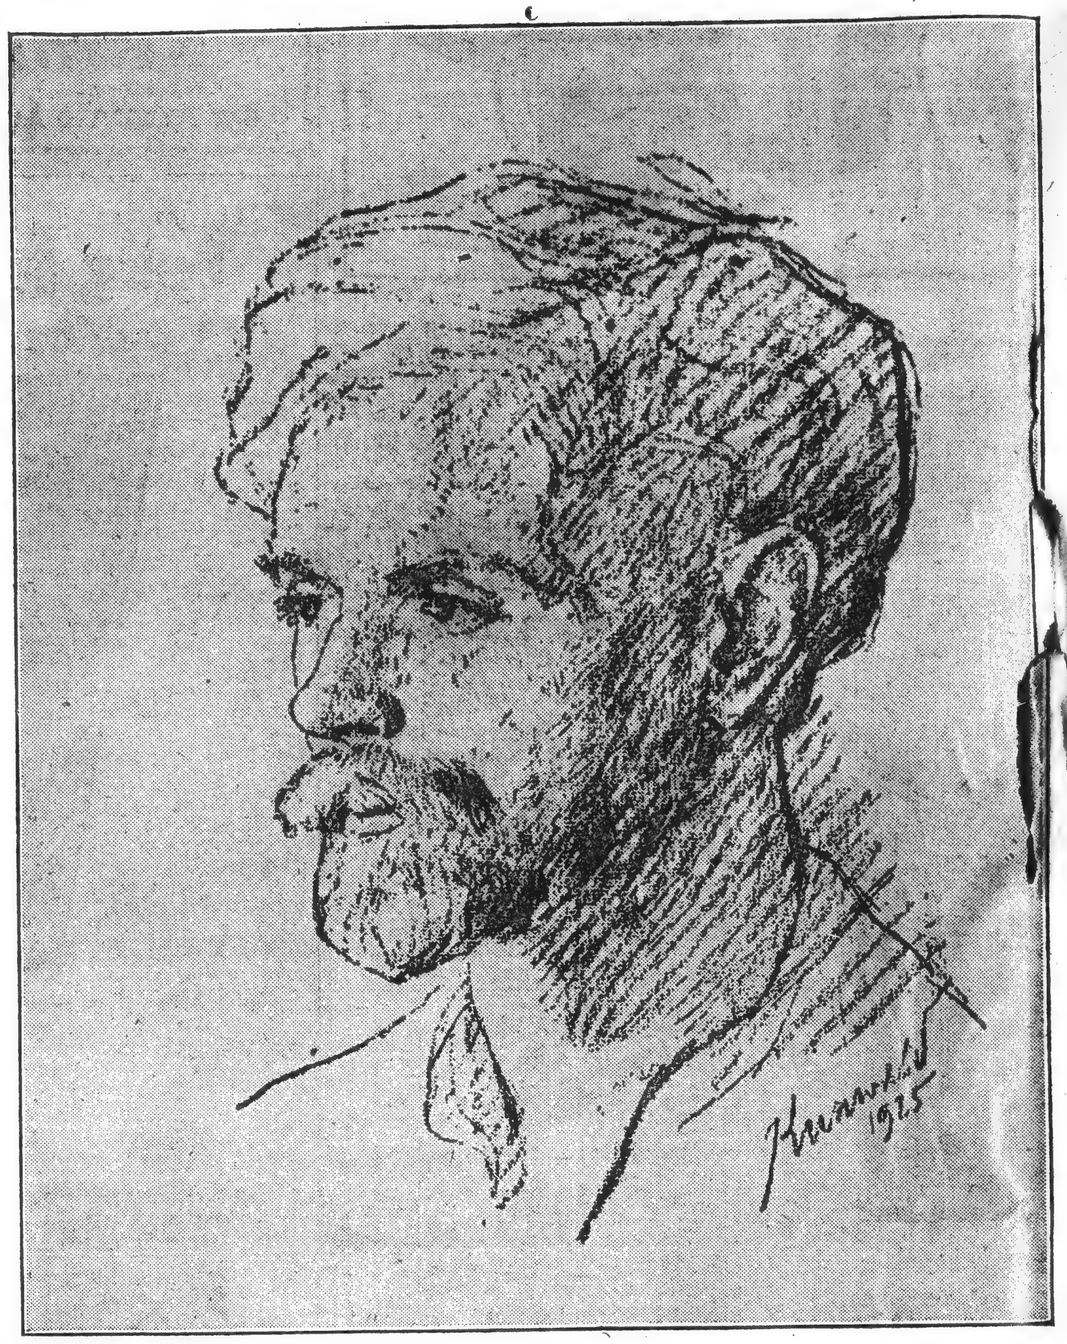
A. H. M.

Ellen Terry's Will

A Substantial Estate and Interesting Bequests

THE London newspapers make public Miss Terry's will, disposing of a fortune above £20,000. She died, it appears, not as a British subject, but as the wife of an American citizen, James Carew, the actor, from whom she had long been separated. "As a token of good will," she gives him £200. Her house in Kent and half her estate falls to her daughter, Miss Edith Craig. The other half goes as a trust-fund to her son, Gordon Craig—not the most provident of men,—to his wife and ultimately to their children. Many of her possessions—among them the youthful portrait by Watts and the mature portrait (as Lady Macbeth) by Sargent—are to be dispersed by auction. Her cottage may be set apart as a memorial.

The Rhapsodist



Zoltan Kodaly (Modern Music)

New Composer at the Symphony Concerts This Week

Concert-Chronicle

"Necessary and Evil"

PROGRAM-NOTES or program-books are a matter of course at most "serious" concerts. We take them for granted at the Symphony Concerts, unthinkable without these brick-red pamphlets of forty years standing. Wherever else a leaflet is proffered, we open it, con it, and let it go at that. Whoever reflected on a program-book, though now and then to devotees or partisans a passing sentence may bring momentary irritation? Even when they lose themselves in too technical or too

Continued on Page Fourteen

Mr. Hampden's Asia

Authorship

WALTER HAMPDEN, the celebrated actor-manager — indeed, the only actor-manager now extant in New York — opened his new season in the theater which carries his name uptown. He opened with an earnestly sensuous and devotional spectacle, "The Light of Asia," achieving that state of calm wherein Buddha might contemplate his Columbus Circle.

This pageant of "The Light of Asia" —a play in a prologue and four acts, according to the kindly program—is the work of one Georgina Jones Walton. True, some small type on the second page does express the author's modest desire to "render full acknowledgement to Sir Edwin Arnold's poem, 'The Light of Asia,' for the title and for certain passages in the dialogue."

Of Georgina Jones Walton I know not. Her pageant seems to have been written for the rarer pleasure of some Theosophica congress, and to have been produced on the Pacific coast several years ago with none other than Mr. Hampden in the holy Buddha's role, then as now. [Sun

Argument

It follows the career of Siddartha, prince of the Sakyas, who is marked by the high gods for a sublime mission. Faced with the awful spectacle of death in the second act, he renounces worldliness and goes into the wilderness to seek for the truth that shall save all men—for the changeless, for the eternal, for the all-filling light and the crest jewel of wisdom. There in the wilderness, among the meditative ascetics, he tears the veils asunder and finds the eternal radiance. He becomes Buddha. Those who have awaited his coming recognize the inscrutable truth in his eyes. [Times

Misfortunes

The truly sad fact about "The Light of Asia" is that it fails to move the spectator. The intentions of all who take part in it are worthy. Here are all the requirements of an impressive play, except the vital requirement of inspiration. There is an air of cold culture about the play which renders it more of a museum piece than of a drama. The language does not glow, nor is there any fervor in the thought. Occasionally the author interjects a colloquial expression into her lines which shatters any illusion she proceeds in creating. When Draupadi ... arrived at the Pleasure Pal... asserts of Siddartha, "I'll win rich pearls from him before I'm through," the ... perishes and the east side prevails. ... must be used with great discretion. They can increase the sense of intimacy or they can destroy it. Miss Walton's colloquialisms never failed to destroy it. "You know that for a fact?" one of the Sakyas said, and with the words blew up the illusion. [World

Incidentals

When songs are to be sung the expert Ratan Devi is brought in from her many years of recitals of Oriental ... them. When dances are ... order, Sri Ragini dances them. Wh... Buddha is tempted of the flesh, Ru... St. Denis stages the weaving of wel... ded limbs of evil and opulent hou... When offstage music is due, Elliott ... nenck delivers profuse numbers of ... ndsomely curried hymns. [Sun.

Acting

As Buddha Mr. Hampden ... layed with his usual equanimity. The ... actors who surrounded him ranged in ... competence from tolerable to satisfa... and the stage direction was the s... movement of a procession drama. ... best aides were Claude Bragdon, wi... supervision of the scenery was excell... and a band of gymnosoph Nautch g... twisted their bare torsos interes... [Herald Tribune.

Mr. Hampden, both as ... youth and godlike martyr, is equally ... y, luscious-voiced and benignly lev... I may be alone in finding his princ... mostly unmoving performance. ... be coming mitting blasphemy in rep... g that, just once in a while when ... Hampden's back was turned and hi... eyed grandeur momentarily stille... seemed to me just a gentleman at a ... masquerade in an embarrassing big ... of pants. [Sun

Mr. Hampden's Siddartha ... the early scenes was weak and ind... minate and often inarticulate, but he ... gathered strength and dignity as he ... ent along, and he ended well. The setting ... were good, and some of the incidentals, ... such as the singing and the dancing, we... excellent, but for the most part the ... cting was poor. Some of it would ha... been considered bad in a performanc... given in a school for young ladies. ... Eugene Powers, as the father of Sidd... fine, and Miss Ingeborg Torr... dartha's wife, Yashodara, wa... middling. [World

On Boston Sta...

"Good Fun"

LAST MONTH in New York, ... Littell of The Evening ... joyed his evening in t... with Mr. Dempsey. Therefor... prepare the way for the like... in the same company, that ... will take at the Opera House ... "For four weeks only" he wro... Jack Dempsey, champagne, m... bets, double-crossing, murder... drops, another murder, suic... state gambling syndicates, pri... tors, squealers, manicures, ba... music off stage, mobs yelli... wings, two hundred and ninet... of real live ex-world-champ, ... of real live fighting to a kn... four weeks only? I don't beli... rather, in the middle of the pa... believe it, but at the end I w... clined to.

"Two-thirds of it was f... trated, joyous, familiar h... good fun just the same. ... chief pleasure of the eve... the pleasure of seeing your... come to life before your ... the celebrities were so nice ... and inaudible and out of place... the expert snarling villains ... quite won the hearts of th... Jack Dempsey, six feet of ... beef and iron, as soon as he ... his dressing room, and eve... champ in action in the ring, ... his lines much as you or I w... up to him, with a do or die ... Yet somehow his simple, artle... of the part written for "Tiger ... most attractive. No fuss, n... no theatrics, no faking, just ... forward recital in a high and ... voice."

Finger-Post

By word from the Plymo... Bound" will keep the stage ... fortnight—that is through Sa... 27—five weeks in all, a ru... days in Boston for a comedy ... the conventions and addres... wise audiences. No doubt ... has helped the play. Miss ... nedy, set free from trifling, ... of full-bodied and fine-strun... The other players are well ... parts and well-tuned to each ... whole performance goes s... though all concerned like the... had no mind to be mechanica... Mr. Hopkins's original rel... "Paris Bound" contributed t... able end. For, as one who ... counts them, "they are quiet ... point. Mr. Hopkins gets good ... then tells them to go ahea... their parts. If they step o... he speaks to them about it. ... always quietly. After the ... One by one. Actors seldom ... he has told other actors, ... want to tell each other. O... sions, if he feels that the ... needs interpretation, he will ... cast generally. At such time... succinctly, brilliantly. His ... playwrights are also brief ... point. It all looks very simpl... he has finished with a play, ... plete job, the way he wants

Forward and Backward

Everyone calls the theater ... ago someone must have lab... house of imitation"—not wit... Ransacking his brain for a ... a producer of musical pieces ... chorus-girls, frontward, in ... their sex, bright-colored, ple... terned. Rearward, they we... or wooden grotesques. As ... they turned in the dance. L... the spectators. Now, both ... Taste," "Americana" and, ... dozen other reviews of mu... nightly turn the trick. ... Queen's Taste," Miss Wats...

Continued on Page Fo...

The Season Be...

Miss Hayes and "Coquette... a Fortnight

THE exacting playgoer ... heart. For the pr... Boston he has only "Pari... A week more, and he wi... from Mr. Belasco, "The ... Father." A week bey... "Coquette," with Mis... Hayes, will await him. ... Wilbur on Oct. 29 comes ... from an undiminished ... most, an unaltered ca... Eliot Cabot, passed to th... Guild, is the absentee, ... placed.

The piece, actually put ... in rehearsals, is irregul... able, poignant. Lif... might take such cours... Southern household—th... antries of the daily r... background of traditi... codes, the swift-coming ... of passion and family-... void, the dread, the b... Through it all Miss Hay... in ampler range and ... purposes—a ripening act... familiar graces, to ... powers.

nd Players --- The Screen

(Modern Music)

rts This Week

sia ebratthe xtant on in e up-sen-

"The te of plate

Asia" acts, s the alton.
cond odest ment Light rtain not. tten heo pro-ears pden now.

rtha, d by ssion.
death oridlio seek men—l, for jewel rness, tears ternal
Those ognize eyes.

Light
ve the ll who ere are pressive nt of in-cold culnders it an of a elow, nor
ght. Occasionally the author interjects a colloquial expression into her lines which shatters any illusion she proceeds in creating. When Draupadi [illegible] rived at the Pleasure Pa[illegible] Siddartha, "I'll win rich [illegible] before I'm through," th[illegible] and the east side pr[illegible] must be used with great discre[illegible] can increase the sense of intimacy or they can destroy it. Miss Walton's colloquialisms never failed to destroy it. "You know that for a fact?" one of the Sakyas said, and with the words blew up the illusion. [World

Incidentals

When songs are to be sung the expert Ratan Devi is brought in from her many years of recitals of Oriental music to sing them. When dances are [illegible] order, Sri Ragini dances them. Whe[illegible] Buddha is tempted of the flesh, Ru[illegible] St. Denis stages the weaving of well-r[illegible] nded limbs of evil and opulent houris[illegible] When off-stage music is due, Elliott[illegible] nenck delivers profuse numbers o[illegible] ndsomely curried hymns. [Sun.

Acting

As Buddha Mr. Hampden [illegible] his usual equanimity. The[illegible] surrounded him ranged in[illegible] from tolerable to satisfact[illegible] stage direction was the stil[illegible] of a procession drama.[illegible] were Claude Bragdon, wh[illegible] of the scenery was excelle[illegible] of gymnosoph Nautch gi[illegible] their bare torsos interes[illegible] Tribune.

Mr. Hampden, both as g[illegible] godlike martyr, is equally[illegible] voiced and benignly lev[illegible] alone in finding his prince[illegible] moving performance. I[illegible] mitting blasphemy in rep[illegible] once in a while when [illegible] back was turned and his[illegible] deur momentarily stilled[illegible] me just a gentleman at a[illegible] in an embarrassing big [illegible] [Sun

Mr. Hampden's Sidd[illegible] scenes was weak and indecis[illegible] often inarticulate, but he[illegible] strength and dignity as he[illegible] and he ended well. The setting[illegible] and some of the incidentals,[illegible] singing and the dancing, wel[illegible] but for the most part the[illegible] poor. Some of it would hav[illegible] sidered bad in a performanc[illegible] school for young ladies.

Powers, as the father of Siddartha, was fine, and Miss Ingeborg Torrup as Siddartha's wife, Yashodara, was fair to middling. [World

On Boston Stages

"Good Fun"

LAST MONTH in New York, Mr. Robert Littell of The Evening Post enjoyed his evening in the theater with Mr. Dempsey. Therefore he shall prepare the way for the like pleasure, in the same company, that Bostonians will take at the Opera House next week. "For four weeks only" he wrote. What? Jack Dempsey, champagne, million-dollar bets, double-crossing, murder, knockout drops, another murder, suicide, interstate gambling syndicates, private elevators, squealers, manicures, barber shops, music off stage, mobs yelling in the wings, two hundred and nineteen pounds of real live ex-world-champ, two rounds of real live fighting to a knockout, for four weeks only? I don't believe it. Or rather, in the middle of the party I didn't believe it, but at the end I was mere inclined to.

"Two-thirds of it was fun, concentrated, joyous, familiar hokum, but good fun just the same. But the chief pleasure of the evening was the pleasure of seeing your headlines come to life before your eyes. And the celebrities were so nice and modest and inaudible and out of place among all the expert snarling villains that they quite won the hearts of the audience. Jack Dempsey, six feet of magnificent beef and iron, as soon as he stripped in his dressing room, and every inch a champ in action in the ring, stood up to his lines much as you or I would stand up to him, with a do or die resolution. Yet somehow his simple, artless speaking of the part written for 'Tiger Dillon' was most attractive. No fuss, no nonsense, no theatrics, no faking, just a straightforward recital in a high and often timid voice."

Finger-Post

By word from the Plymouth, "Paris Bound" will keep the stage for another fortnight—that is through Saturday, Oct. 27—five weeks in all, a run in these days in Boston for a comedy that shuns the conventions and addresses worldly wise audiences. No doubt the acting has helped the play. Miss Madge Kennedy, set free from trifling, gives proof of full-bodied and fine-strung abilities. The other players are well within their parts and well-tuned to each other. The whole performance goes spiritedly, as though all concerned like their jobs, and had no mind to be mechanical. Perhaps Mr. Hopkins's original rehearsals of "Paris Bound" contributed to this desirable end. For, as one who knows recounts them, "they are quiet and to the point. Mr. Hopkins gets good actors and then tells them to go ahead and play their parts. If they step out of focus, he speaks to them about it. But nearly always quietly. After the rehearsal. One by one. Actors seldom know what he has told other actors, unless they want to tell each other. On rare occasions, if he feels that the whole play needs interpretation, he will talk to the cast generally. At such times he speaks succinctly, brilliantly. His talks with playwrights are also brief and to the point. It all looks very simple, but when he has finished with a play, it is a complete job, the way he wants it."

Forward and Backward

Everyone calls the theater names. Long ago someone must have labelled it "the house of imitation"—not without reason. Ransacking his brain for a new device, a producer of musical pieces dressed his chorus-girls, frontward, in the garb of their sex, bright-colored, pleasantly patterned. Rearward, they were grinning or wooden grotesques. As upon pivots they turned in the dance. Loud laughed the spectators. Now, both "The Queen's Taste," "Americana" and, doubtless, a dozen other reviews of musical plays nightly turn the trick. . . . In "The Queen's Taste," Miss Watson and Mr.

Continued on Page Fourteen

Yet Again New Tonal Courses For Stravinsky

Mr. Koussevitzky Proffers His Ballet of Apollo As Concert-Piece

IN THE SPRING of 1927 Stravinsky received a commission from the Library of Congress to write a ballet for performance at its Festival of Chamber Music in April, 1928. He fulfilled it with "Apollo Musagetes," ballet in two scenes for four major and three incidental personages, scored for an orchestra of strings only—twelve violins, three violas, six violoncellos, three double basses. The new piece was represented for the first time on any stage on Friday, April 27, 1928, in the Auditorium of the Congressional Library at Washington. It was set in Piranesi-like scenery—a ruined temple to the right, a pile of massive rocks mounting toward the left. Mr. Bolm devised the dancing and the miming; himself took the part of Apollo. Miss Ruth Page and two young dancers seconded him as the three Muses: Calliope for Poetry; Polymnia for the miming arts; Terpsichore for the blending dance. Mr. Hans Kinder of Philadelphia conducted. In the following June, at Paris, "Apollo Musagetes"—that is to say, Apollo, inspirer and protector of the Muses—was added to the repertory of Mr. Diaghilev's company. Mr. Balanchine then arranged the dances; Mr. Lifar, as the god, and three women of the company danced them. At most of the performances Stravinsky himself was conductor. Now, at Symphony Hall, tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky and the string choir of the Boston Orchestra will play the music as concert-piece.

"Apollo Musagetes" begins with a prologue, the birth of Apollo. At Washington it was impossible to achieve it scenically. The music was played while two nameless goddesses posed and gestured above a glowing altar-like tripod. Possibly, their movements foretold a glorious moment. In Paris the spectators looked upon a great tree, sturdy of trunk, far-spreading of bough and leafage. High upon the trunk was outspread the figure of Latona, the nymph of whom Apollo was born. From a hollow in the tree, he emerged, full-grown but in swaddling bands. The two goddesses stripped them away; gave him nectar, ambrosia and a golden girdle; conducted him toward Olympus. The second scene befell beside "stylized" crags, muddy brown and gray. At the end, a painted and conventionalized chariot, four-horsed descended along the back-drop to convey the god and the Muses to the Olympian summit.

Here, writing in the magazine Modern Music, of the performance, Mr. Frederick Jacobi may take up the tale: "In 'Apollo Musagetes' Stravinsky evidently desires to revive the spirit of the classic French ballet, the ballet which, with modifications, had supreme sway in Europe from the days of Lully and Rameau until the advent of Isadora Duncan. Here we have the familiar mythological characters, reminding us that the Florentines who originated the opera and the ballet, as we know them, had in their minds the resuscitation of the true Grecian drama. We have Apollo, Leader of the Muses, doubly resplendent because of the fact that he is both Greek and French, that his cuirasse is that of the Grecian god, his perruque that of the Roi Soleil. We have the three Muses, Calliope, Polymnia and Terpsichore, suggesting, in their arm-bands and golden fillets, Mount Parnassus; in their palo bodices and their drooping tulle skirts, the Académie Nationale. We have a ballet divided into two scenes (a Ballet d'Action, it was called), each scene composed of a series of separate numbers: Variations, Pas de Deux, Pas d'Action, ensemble numbers for all the dancers, the whole closing with the customary Apotheosis. It is the ballet whose lineage may be found in antiquity but whose ancestral home is Versailles.

The prologue done, "Apollo in dance, celebrates his coming into life. The Muses appear and dance a Pas d'Action before Apollo. There follows the dance of Calliope, an Allegretto in six-eighths time which, in the score, bears the motto, a quotation from Boileau:

Que toujours dans vos vers le sens coupant les mots
Suspende l'hémistiche et marque le repos.

Polymnia dances an Allegro; Terpsichore performs an intricate and difficult Allegro Moderato. Apollo dances for the Muses. Apollo and the Muses join in an animated Coda which is followed by the Apotheosis, Apollo rising higher and higher while the orchestra brings the ballet softly to an end on a singularly touching B-minor chord.

"The most striking feature of 'Apollo Musagetes' is its seeming simplicity. The music is constantly 'melodic'; that is, the counterpoint and harmony are completely subservient to a leading melodic line and this line, as in the classic French ballet and the typical nineteenth-century Italian opera, occurs most frequently in the upper voice. There are indeed 'cello melodies accompanied by figures in the higher strings but there are no typical bass melodies and there are never two

Continued on Page Fourteen

The Season Betters

Miss Hayes and "Coquette" Within a Fortnight

THE exacting playgoer may take heart. For the present in Boston he has only "Paris Bound." A week more, and he will receive from Mr. Belasco, "The Bachelor Father." A week beyond, and "Coquette," with Miss Helen Hayes, will await him. Into the Wilbur on Oct. 29 comes the play from an undiminished and, almost, an unaltered cast. Mr. Eliot Cabot, passed to the Theater Guild, is the absentee, well replaced.

The piece, actually put together in rehearsals, is irregular, inevitable, poignant. Life itself might take such course in this Southern household—the pleasantries of the daily round, the background of traditions and codes, the swift-coming gravities of passion and family-feud; the void, the dread, the bitter end. Through it all Miss Hayes acting in ampler range and to deeper purposes—a ripening actress from familiar graces to new-found powers.

Yet Again New Tonal Courses For Stravinsky

Continued from Page Eleven

or more strands of equal importance such as one finds going on at the same time in a more contrapuntal music. The harmonies are, to the greatest extent, consonant, an incalculable distance from the harmonic schemes of 'Le Sacre,' a considerable simplification even of that of the piano-concerto. Rhythmically we are far from the fascinating distortions of 'L'Histoire du Soldat.' The changing units of measurement, the dislocated accents of 'Le Sacre' are not with us here. But there is, beneath this lack of the expected rhythmic irregularity, a rhythmic freedom which is magnificent; the phrases are frequently of uneven lengths and they balance each other with a symmetry which is subtle and distinguished by a Tanagra-like grace. The phrases are marked by that admirable precision so characteristic of Stravinsky's recent music.

"As in 'Oedipus,' there is a strange mixture of styles. In the Variation of Apollo, the first number of the second scene, there is a disturbing pseudo-oriental flavor, an orientalism of Europe, 1845. The dance of Apollo and the Muses, in three-fourths time, strongly suggests a slow waltz. It is as though Stravinsky found an anachronistic pleasure in bringing together the styles of various epochs and in showing the slightly bewildered onlooker that in his hands all things are possible: like a dexterous chef-de-cuisine who might wish to demonstrate the ability to create a palatable dish by combining the most far-fetched ingredients, to bring into logical relationship things which ordinarily seem to be far apart. . . . And there are the same imperious endings, admirable in their conciseness and infinitely telling."

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Page Eleven

intricate an analysis, the dutiful try not to flag. Maybe music is educational as well as pleasure-giving. The English, being a more meditative and also a more grumbling race, take another way. Read, then, this questioner of programmatic theory and practice in the Literary Supplement of the London Times:

> Every concert-goer needs a program; what ought he to find in it? He may reasonably demand historical or biographical detail, provided it is strictly relevant to the piece in hand. There is a tradition that he expects also to find some sort of technicca analysis of abstract instrumental music. It may, however, be doubted whether the ordinary enthusiast who attends concerts but has little interest in "second subjects," "recapitulations," "augmentations," and the like really appreciates what is done for him. For, in the first place, it is inevitably almost unreadable; while, in the second, analytical listening is not the right way in which to approach music.
>
> None the less, proportion and structure are important in a complicated symphonic work, and since music takes place in time which has only one dimension, the whole design cannot be appreciated until it is already too late. The listener therefore demands landmarks. Landmarks are dangerous, because they will, from their very obtrusion, draw undue attention to themselves. This danger is particularly great when examples in music type are offered. Yet without music type analytical notes are, from the nature of the case, so uncouth as to damp the curiosity of the most enthusiastic concert-goer. Program-notes then are both necessary and evil. The ideal analytical note would be a running commentary on the architecture of the music so simple and so clear as to be taken in with one-fifth of the reader's attention by an occasional glance of the eye.

Programs to Hand

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of Friday, Oct. 19 and Saturday, Oct. 20:

Symphony in G major, "The Surprise," (B. & H. No. 6).....Haydn
A Negro Rhapsody.....Rubin Goldmark
Symphony in D minor.....Franck

From Mr. Horowitz, the pianist who made furore last season, for his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Oct. 21:

Sonata Appassionata.....Beethoven
Intermezzi (Op. 117, 118, 119)—Rhapsody (Op. 119).....Brahms
Fantasia in F minor—Two Mazurkas...Chopin
Doctor Gradus ad Parnassum—Serenade to The Doll from "Children's Corner"...Debussy
Dumka (Rural Russian Scene).....Chaikovsky
Spanish Rhapsody.....Liszt

From Miss Farrar for her concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 21:

Frühlingsglaube—Allinde—Der Lindenbaum—Lob der Thränen—In der Ferne....Schubert
Schöne Wiege meiner Leiden—Seit ich ihn gesehen—Liebeslied—Herzensleid—Wanderlied.....Schumann Chi vuol innamorarsi.....Scarlatti
Voi, che sapete.....Mozart
Dites que faut-il fair.....Eighteenth Century
Mon petit coeur.....Eighteenth Century
Snow.....Lie
The Lark.....Rubinstein
In a Boat.....Grieg
E'er Since Thine Eyes.....Strauss
Love's Rapture.....Jensen

Incidents and Prospects

It is a pleasure to announce the return to Boston of Mr. Roland Hayes, the 8

Composers, Conductor, Orchestra

Stravinsky, Kodaly, Schumann, New and Old, for a Full Symphony Concert

AFTER Stravinsky the lion, Stravinsky the lamb. . . . At the Symphony Concert yesterday, Mr. Koussevitzky repeated a favorite experiment—the playing of ballet-music as concert-piece. For once, it was altogether successful. At the end, the applause was instant, honest, general, hearty, directed to the conductor, the orchestra and to Mr. Burgin at the first violin who had borne conspicuous part. No doubt it included also the composer who—the program-book assured readers—was "now living." He is, indeed, being no other than Igor Stravinsky, domiciled in Paris, probably the most influential and significant figure in the music of his generation. The piece in question was "Apollo Musagetes"—Apollo, Inspirer and Protector of the Muses—ballet in two scenes. They filled twenty-five minutes, during which there was not a sign of restlessness or boredom. They constituted a ballet of action—as Stravinsky indicated in a program-note overlooked by the venerable editor—not a ballet with a plot: Prologue representing the birth of Apollo, saluted by two goddesses, receiving nectar, ambrosia and a girdle of gold, conducted toward Olympus; Variation of Apollo, testing his limbs; Entrance of Calliope, Polymnia, Terpsichore, each receiving from the god the symbol of her function (Pas d'action), each exemplifying it for his pleasure (More Variations); Second Variation of Apollo, to the glory of the newborn arts of Poetry, Miming and The Dance; Pas de Deux for Apollo and Terpsichore as significant and pleasing above her sisters; Coda for the assembled four; Apotheosis as they move together toward Oympus.

No one, yesterday, thought twice about any lacking "synopsis;" sufficiently the music spoke for itself. As a stage-show, except among a few remembering spectators who had seen it in Washington, Paris or London, "Apollo" had no existence in Symphony Hall and needed none. Once more Stravinsky had written a music self-contained and self-expressing. In the theater, however, his full purpose stood clearer. He was seeking to revive the classical ballet as it flourished through the eighteenth, and drooped through the nineteenth, century. There are the personages out of Græco-Roman mythology, arrayed half as becomes their legendary state, half in the conventional trappings of the dancing stage. (Is not Stravinsky at fault when he makes Polymnia the Muse of Miming ("La mimique") and gives her a mask; whereas she commonly passes for the Lyric Muse wearing the laurel, bearing stylus and parchment?) There is the simple, static fable, unfolding itself, so far as it unfolds at all, in exercises and embroideries according to the old technique—Variations, Pas d'action, Pas de Deux, Coda, Apotheosis. There is the archaic suggestion in the dancing and the miming, as Mr. Balanchine devised and ordered them for Paris and London. And there is the exhibition of virtuosity in the classic dance from the day of Vestris to the day of Fokine. Finally, a simplified music and a reduced orchestra. Stravinsky employs the strings only. In the original draft of the ballet he listed twenty-five. Mr. Koussevitzky assembled nearly his whole string choir. The gain in depth and sonority was appreciable and desirable.

Throughout, Stravinsky writes a singular limpid and plastic music. At every turn the melodic line runs clear. No counterpoint may divide it; no play with rhythm divert it; no harmonies smother it; no instrumental coloring overlay it. Only rarely does it desiccate, so to say, into figures obviously provided for the virtuoso-dance. At moments, Bellini himself has not more chosen with a find hand to woo the ear. As this line is limpid, so also is it supple. The impression is as though Stravinsky saw in imagination his measures transmuted into the motions of the dancers, shaped and rhythmed them accordingly. These rhythms, simple as they seem, are adroitly poised and balanced; bring not a moment of monotony. Now and again, as in the Variation of Terpsichore, they run—to make a paradox—in clear intricacy. Once, Stravinsky even permits himself a few bars of paper-music—his play, in the Variation of Calliope, with the mid-pause in classic French verse. Melodically there is little development and scanty modulation. The smooth and luminous harmony obtrudes hardly a dissonance. The instrumental coloring, though it discloses a deep knowledge and a sensitive feeling for the range of a string choir, is always transparent. Phrasing his melodies in a music of line, Stravinsky leaves not an edge unrounded. He ends, and the final cadence melts into the air. The orchestra—he has said to himself—shall be as susceptible as the human voice.

Hearing this music, the restless spirits who are always harking back to some one or other, surge. Back to Rameau and Monteclair, back to Chaikovsky and Gounod, back to Mendelssohn and Delibes, they shout, pointing at Stravinsky derisive fingers. "This is your classic ballet," they say in scorn, "with one dance (Apollo and Terpsichore) verging on a waltz, and another (First Variation of Apollo) so pseudo-oriental that Delibes might have tucked it into the second act of 'Lakmé'! Is this the Igor we have followed from 'Petrushka' through 'Œdipus'?" And so forth with occasional wringing of the hands. . . . There is another point of view as plausible and rather more satisfactory to such of us as do not believe that everyone in this world must be ticketed and act accordingly ever after. "Apollo" is return to a species of ballet that persisted through nearly two centuries (1700-1900). During those years it knew many sorts of music—from Rameau through Delibes. If it pleases Stravinsky to proffer a synthesis of these styles, let him take his pleasure. Any one with a grain of imagination can guess the mental exhilaration in the making of it.

Let Stravinsky also be his rich and many-sided self. He is upon many a page of "Apollo." Thence upspring the grave and lofty measures of preluding; the clean-cut vigors of the fugue to which Apollo is born; the grace, the charm, the inexhaustible delicacy and finesse of the Muses' dances; the deepening and upswelling of the music toward the close as though the god had achieved a consecration; the close itself in measures of proud and profound ecstasy. For beauty is the charioteer of these four as to Olympus they ascend. . . . A pendant to "Œdipus" is this "Apollo." Again has Stravinsky transmuted his model into his own abounding self. Never before has this music sounded as yesterday across Symphony Hall. Monsieur Igor is a workaday conductor. With any of his scores Mr. Koussevitzky far outdoes him. And the strings of the orchestra were paragons.

After this theater-music, more music of the stage, again in fortunate transfer. At Buda-Pest Kodály's "Háry János" was a play with music, a comic opera with plentiful dialogue. The Suite for the concert-hall strips away much that encumbered it; preserves and distills the musical essence. There emerges a four-fold piece—of Kodály the technician in the modernist sense; of Kodály the folklorist; of comic invention out of folk-tale; of the half-hidden pathos that is little sister to comedy. The Hungarian has the modernist feeling for instruments individualized; matches imagination with skill; has not written until he knows how to write; produces a music teeming with vivid strokes, graphic and unlabored in the play of orchestral voices. He is abundantly acquainted with the new devices and procedures. At will and need he uses them — unobtrusively, unarrogantly, without toil by the midnight lamp—for a clear end clearly gained. There is no quarreling with dissonance or anything else that is modernistic when it has such pith and point as Kodály gives it. Not many in that clapping matinée audience suspected that though they listened to folk-music, it had been run through a modernistic sieve.

The word is that only the Prelude and the Intermezzo are music made wholly out of the composer's head. All else is directly derived from Hungarian folk-tunes, harmonized, clothed orchestrally, otherwise made presentable in theater or concert-hall by Kodály. Be it so; but his mind, spirit and hand are so impregnated with this native matter that the whole Suite sounds as a single music indivisible. Kodály, besides, is wiser in folk-ways than was his compatriot and colleague, Bártok. His Piano-Concerto, last winter, was nearly incomprehensible to those without an Hungarian ear and background. Page after page seemed uncouth sequences of dissonant sound. Kodály's Suite is well on the way around the non-Hungarian world and every audience grasps both the musical and the delineative content. He has laid hand upon folk-melodies that convey and animate his design; adapted and clothed them so that they are defined, enlarged, enriched, made universally viable. The ear hears an exotic native music, but with no half-vague, half-piquant, impression of mere strangeness. Here go musical ideas for the mind; fantasy, humor, irony, pathos, for the imagination. The only measures in the whole Suite that do not "come off" instantly and fully is that feat of virtuosity at the beginning designed to generate an orchestral sneeze.

Háry János is a legendary Hungarian peasant—he cannot be older than the last century—who dreamed dreams and recounted them as realities. He saw himself rescuing Marie-Louise, the Hapsburg Princess who wedded Napoleon, thereby winning her love; at the Hofburg in Vienna engrossed, child-like, in the wonders of a clock with soldier-figures stepping in and out; beating to his knees the French Emperor in battle; standing by, nay, joining the procession, when the Imperial Family marches ceremonially through that same Hofburg. Once, between whiles, holding his wife's hand, he pines for the sights and sounds, the quiet and content, of his village. The Suite must needs put by the adventure with Marie-Louise; but for all else Kodály writes a many-voiced music. Now it is exuberantly comic rodomontade, as in the battle with Napoleon overthrown. Again it is the gentle, quasi-ironic comedy of the soldier-clock. What children we all are to gape and nudge and grin—along with Háry—at such toys! Last the big-bow-wow of the Imperial March; for so Háry sees and hears it. Withal, humorous, not to say ironic, undertones. Can it be that Kodály makes a wry face at these pageants?

Between: the intermezzo of the Hungarian dance, flinging out and drawing in with the moods of a blessedly temperamental race; the intermezzo of the homesick Háry—the stillness of the night, the piercing, longing, fervid Hungarian tune; the tears to the eye, the tug at the heart in the hearing. A music of nostalgia written with a candor and poignancy that are almost cruel. Here it is outspoken; elsewhere in the Suite it is undernote, unexpectedly and artfully emerging, as suddenly and adroitly caught in again. Wherever Háry goes, he remains the peasant; under all his rodomontade hears the voice of home. It is the pathos of Kodály's comedy, the half-hidden keynote, the finer atmosphere.

Last, the third novelty of the day, though it stood upon the program as Schumann's Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, originally played at Leipzig, eighty-seven years ago. . . . Nowadays, most conductors play Schumann dutifully. He is, or he was, a classic; no doubt he deserves occasional place; give it to him and have done; audibly he is ageing. Not so Mr. Koussevitzky, who plays Schumann as though he believed in him, bathing him in the outflow of another romantic temperament. Never more so than yesterday when this "Spring Symphony" seemed miraculously transfigured. Schumann passes for a composer deficient in instrumental color. The orchestra abounded in it; by its tone made good the shortcoming. Schumann, the books say, repeated rather than developed his musical thoughts. Mr. Koussevitzky, imagining for him, gave each repetition new voice, fresh ardor. The conductor can overdo sentiment; by the same token he can call from Schumann's Larghetto the sentiment still deep and warm within it. Add the exuberance of the first movement until it sounded like an upleaping, overflowing music, the freed hand, the warming spirit. (Perhaps the brass blew a bit too hard.) Recall the finale—the like mood idealized into lighter but still ecstatic tones. Count in the Scherzo with repetitions that were new glows. Here at last was Schumann, the romantic of romantics, borne full, rich and sweet into the ears of a more prosaic time. The half-century of the Symphony Concerts may hardly recall a more life-giving deed. Mr. Koussevitzky, they say, will go forward, this very season, to the other symphonies of Schumann. Apollo, speed him.

H. T. P.

Stravinsky and Kodaly Played at Symphony

ADV OCT 13

For the second concert of the Symphony season, Mr. Koussevitzky chooses two novelties, Stravinsky's "Appollon Musagete" and Kodaly's "Hary Janos" suite. Both of them are new to Boston and yesterday's audience was startled not by the modernity but by the simplicity of Stravinsky's ballet.

Herein the composer discards the style hitherto associated with him. His music is a ballet pure and simple; clear, limpid, untroubled by the rhythms of the day. Carping critics will call it shallow and trivial; actually, it holds hidden depths, remarkable melodic lines, phrases that are pure pleasure to the ear. It will even, one suspects, be better liked upon a second hearing.

With drum, trumpet, and the bright blare of English horns, Zoltan Kodaly strode onto the scene; the newest Hungarian composer to stand side by side with his compatriot, Bela Bartok. To make an opera, he took one Hary Janos—braggart and liar akin to Paul Bunyan and the Chevalier Gerard, let him tell his saga through the scenes and later through an orchestral suite.

The real Hungarian idiom is Kodaly's; he eschews gypsy rhythms. His music is fierce, fiery, florid. At times the brass burlesques the theme; at times, the hero himself is heard in a gigantic sneeze Inevitably it is strong stuff, barbaric melody; lilt and thread and pattern of music that come close from the soil. Folk music, it might be called, but it bears the stamp of a technical master for all that. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra lost not one jot of its fierce flavor.

For contrast, Schumann's Symphony in B flat Major stood at the program's end

TRANS OCT 13. 28

HERALD OCT 13 '28

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Stravinsky, "Apollon Musagete" ("Apollo, Leader of the Muses"), a ballet (first time in Boston); Kodaly, suite from his comic opera, "Hary Janos" (first time in Boston); Schumann, Symphony, B flat, No. 1.

The disappointment of those who seeing the name of Stravinsky went prepared to sulk, pout, rage and find fault with Mr. Koussevitzky for daring to conduct another piece by this son of Belial, flushed with insolence and vodka, this Antichrist in contemporaneous musical life, must have been keen. For in this ballet there was no orgy of dissonances, no thunderous crashes, no drums beaten as if by madmen. There was simple music, often tuneful, often beautiful; when there were commonplace passages they were not disturbing to Stravinsky's admirers; and these commonplaces reassured and pleased the reactionaries who are suspicious of anything they think is mildly or audaciously original. The prevailing spirit of this ballet is of the 18th century.

"Apollo," scored for strings only, was first heard at the indefatigable Mrs. Coolidge's chamber musical festival in the music room of the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C., on April 27, 1928. Mr. Bolm then mimed Apollo. At the later performances in Paris and London Serge Lifar of the Ballet Russe was the god.

Here is the rare instance of ballet music that does not suffer by being transferred to the concert platform. There is hardly any story for the theatre stage; the action is negligible. It would seem as if Stravinsky, now tired of his futile attempt to write in the manner of Bach when that composer was dull and merely a weaver of insignificant patterns, and in the manner of Handel's oratorios—there has been only one Handel—the superb—forgot his piano concerto and his "Oedipus Rex" and bethought him of Lulli and Rameau. Thus he has joined the band of modern Frenchmen who praise these composers of the 18th century and would submit to their influence. Did not Debussy at a performance of a ballet suite from Rameau's "La Guirlande" performed in Paris 25 years ago, stand up and shout: "Hurrah for Rameau! Away with Gluck!" For in Rameau's music Debussy found the pure French musical tradition, tenderly and delicately charming, "without the affectation of German depth, without the italicization with blows of the fist, without long-winded explanations which seem to say: 'You are a parcel of idiots, who understand nothing unless one forces you in advance to accept 'bladders for lanterns.'"

No wonder that the audience yesterday enjoyed Stravinsky's dance tunes which might have served the old leaders of the ballets in the Parisian opera house moving vivaciously or with solemn poses as goddesses or nymphs.

No wonder that the applause was so general, so hearty, so long continued that Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled after the excellent performance; that the players shared in the tribute.

The suite drawn from Kodaly's comic opera, which was produced at Budapest in 1926, is another matter; more dependent, no doubt, on the action, with the effect increased by the scenery, costumes and the dramatic dialogue or soliloquy. This Hary Janos, a boastful peasant, having returned to his village, tells, as an old man of the wonders he has seen, the deeds that he has done. He overthrew in battle Napoleon at Milan—Napoleon trembled and wept as soon as he caught sight of Hary; and Hary rescued Marie Louise and took her to her imperial father in Vienna—hence the boisterous march in the nature of a Hungarian Rhapsody that ends the suite.

The burlesque battle scene is amusing, but how much more entertaining it would be in the opera house! The prodigious orchestral sneeze with which the prelude opens is also amusing, a clever instrumental trick, but what would a hearer make of it, were he not told that in Hungary when any one perpetuates a whopper, an accidental sneeze from man of woman in the company is an assurance of the narrator's truthfulness, however incredible the tale may seem. There is beautiful music in the section entitled "Song," where Hary and his sweetheart long to see again their fatherland. Here, as elsewhere in the suite, Kodaly uses Hungarian melody. This suite, as we have said, is entertaining, the work of an accomplished musician, who, while understanding and able to write in the ultra-modern idiom, is not afraid of melody even when it is frankly national or has undergone sophistication. Although Kodaly is known as an enthusiastic lover and collector of folk songs, his hobby has not made him a parochial composer. He is not forced for inspiration to sit in a village belfry.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a brilliant and eloquent reading of Schumann's symphony; so eloquent that one forgot for the time being the oft repeated slurs on Schumann's orchestration and the oft heard remark that he wrote as if for a piano and then awkwardly handed the music to the orchestra. All in all a delightful concert.

It will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Haydn's Symphony in G major called "The Surprise"; Rubin Goldmark's "Negro Rhapsody" and Cesar Franck's Symphony.

GLOBE
2 OCT 13

TWO NEW PIECES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Stravinsky and Kodaly Numbers Applauded

Schumann Symphony Brilliantly Interpreted by Koussevitzky

Two pieces new to Boston and Schumann's First Symphony filled yesterday's Symphony program. The novelties, suites from Stravinsky's latest ballet "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," and Zoltan Kodaly's opera, "Hary Janos," were not too modern in musical character to win hearty applause. The performance of Schumann's familiar symphony was exceptionally brilliant.

Stravinsky's "Apollo," a series of conventional divertissements for ballet, was first performed at the chamber music festival of the Library of Congress in Washington last April. It has since been given in London and Paris as a ballet. Yesterday's performance of the suite was apparently the first in any concert hall. The music, scored for strings only, is composed of eight more or less fragmentary episodes.

Stravinsky's recent works have been so various in style and so astonishingly different from his earlier and better known productions that those critics who delight in finding and consistently employing one or two descriptive adjectives to pigeonhole a man's work have been baffled. They said of the piano concerto that it was "like Bach," or "Oedipus" that it was derived from Handel's opera, and of "Apollo" some have written that it is an attempt to emulate the ballets of Lulli.

It is true enough that Stravinsky's recent work lacks the obvious radicalism that breaks startlingly with the whole past history of music. It is not true, however, that he has in any one of his recent productions been particularly an imitator of any one classic composer.

Conventional Dance Rhythms

The suite heard yesterday suggested by its bits of conventional dance rhythms the opera ballet music of the 18th and 19th centuries. But one was reminded of plain song, as well as of Johann Strauss, of Pergolese as well as Tchaikovsky. Stravinsky's musical vocabulary is here familiar and time-worn, but what he has to say is still very much his own. One does not judge even a tone poem by the strangeness of the vocabulary used.

The real test of a new work of art is not its style but its substance. The real and grave defect of much of "Apollo" is not its conventionality but its lack of emotional intensity, of driving power. Of the eight episodes only two, a beautiful suave melody flowing in graceful curves, meant to characterize Apollo; and the apothesis at the end seemed yesterday powerful and memorial music.

The rest was essentially original. Nobody but Stravinsky could have written it. But it did not rouse that emotional response in the hearer without which listening to music is a weariness to the flesh.

When Stravinsky actually practices what he has sometimes preached of late years, that music is devoid of emotion, one parts company with him. Whatever he may have said about the concerto for piano, the piano sonata, and "Oedipus," they have an intensity, ar emotional vitality much of the new work lacks.

Kodaly's suite consists of fragments from an opera dealing with a hero from Hungarian folk lore. Hary Janos, whose tales of his prodigious adventures recall those of Munchausen, or the Paul Bunyan of the American Northwest, but with an essential naivete that links Hary with Daudet's "Tartarin" rather than with the more cynical type of braggart.

Music Brilliantly Scored

The music, very brilliantly scored for full modern orchestra, in which the pianoforte is more skillfully used as an orchestral instrument than by any composer one recalls, is light and often humorous in character. The themes are said to be taken from Hungarian popular music before it was influenced by Gipsy music. This suite is one of the most ingratiating things of its kind written in the present century. It is tuneful without being obviously sprightly without a trace of conventionality. It ought to become a permanent part of the orchestral repertory. The performance was eloquent.

With Schumann, all of whose symphonies Mr Koussevitzky purposes to play during the present season here, the conductor has often proved himself remarkably successful. The First Symphony yesterday was full of rhythmic energy and melodic grace and warmth. One forgot, for once, the obvious comment that it must have been written (as in fact it was) at the piano and scored for orchestra with clumsy haste.

Composers like Brahms, Schumann, Debussy and Ravel whose music needs to have eloquence and warmth breathed upon it by the interpreter to bring out the very best of Koussevitzky's many and great musical gifts.

Next week's program includes Haydn's "Surprise Symphony," Rubin Goldmark's "Negro Rhapsody," and the Franck Symphony.

P. R.

, OCTOBER 13, 1

SYMPHONY AROUSES A RESPONSE

Enthusiasm Greets Kodaly and Stravinsky Pieces

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There are two ways of persuading reluctant audiences to an acceptance of modern music—to play them the pieces that they have at first disliked until they have learned to like them, and to give them the occasional compositions that must win their hearts on a single hearing.

SPONTANEOUS ENTHUSIASM

The latter method was employed by Mr. Koussevitsky at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. Offering his sometimes unwilling listeners Stravinsky's "Apollo Musagetes" and the "Hary Janos" suite of Zoltan Kodaly, the conductor was rewarded by spontaneous and unaffected enthusiasm.

Since the momentous afternoon when "Le Sacre du printemps" first outraged Bostonian ears the name Stravinsky has in many minds been synonymous with cacaphony. To be sure, such impression of the Russian's musical disposition must have been somewhat dispelled by the "Oedipus Rex" of last season. But who, not warned beforehand, could have been prepared for the dulcet sounds of this music to "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," ballet in the classic style, written for and first performed at Mrs. Elizabeth Coolidge's Festival in Washington last spring and, together with Kodaly's suite, played in Boston for the first time yesterday?

Suave and Sprightly

The strings, alone, are employed in this latest Stravinskian score, and they are busied with suave or sprightly tunes, with rhythms simple and ingratiating, with harmony that is for the most part blandly consonant. Listening, one may be persuaded by the plastic beauty, the unaffected charm of this artful composition. Or, one may be disturbed by a recurrent suspicion of insincerity and pose and by a style that knows not only Lully and Gluck, but also Delibes and Bellini.

In any event the audience of yesterday rose to this "Apollo," and was not content until the conductor had summoned the deserving players to their feet.

Ingenious and Beautiful

Only a little less rapturous was the reception accorded the fanciful, humorous, amazingly ingenious and often beautiful music of Kodaly. The opera, now two years old, from which this suite is drawn, recounts the incredible adventures of the figure of Hungarian folk-lore akin to Baron Munchausen, and Kodaly's music has a freshness and an imaginative quality that had seemed wellnigh lost to the tonal art of our day. Popular this music must surely become with audiences here and elsewhere, and not only for such amusing conceits as the Garagantuan orchestral sneeze with which it begins, while at the same time the critical musician can have nothing but admiration for the skill and resource that have gone into the making of it. From the newer Hungary has come at least one piece whose claim to enduring fame must be everywhere apparent.

From first to last yesterday, conductor and orchestra were at top bent, and the concluding number, Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, appropriate to the temperature if not to the season, received a performance that was nothing short of re-creation, miraculously restoring to its fading pages its one-time raptures and romantic beauty. And like Stravinsky and Kodaly before him, Schumann found yesterday a responsive audience.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to Boston, Rubin Goldmark's "Negro Rhapsody" at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Two symphonies will also figure upon this program—Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, and the Symphony of Cesar Franck.

TRAV OCT 13

KOUSSEVITZKY'S RECITAL

Before Serge Koussevitzky began his career as conductor, he was famous as the foremost living master of the double-bass. His coming double-bass recital in Symphony hall next Wednesday evening, at 8:30, will be his second in America and his only appearance in Boston this season.

Europe still fondly remembers the recitals in which Koussevitzky and Casadesus played the 17th and 18th century music written for bass and viola d'amore. Casadesus is coming from Europe especially to appear with Koussevitzky for the first time in America.

9

"The Readiness Is All"

TRAVS OCT 13

Mr. Koussevitzky (Marcovitch, Paris)

At Private Practice Upon the Double-Bass

SUN. ADVERTISER
OCT. 14

—Boston's Greatest Circulati

KOUSSEVITZKY'S ONLY RECITAL

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will give his only double-bass recital of the season here Wednesday evening at Symphony Hall. The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will then for the second time play the instrument, his skill upon which has ranked him with the two great double-bass players in musical history, Dragonetti and Bottesini.

Henri Casadesus, founder of the Societe des Instruments Anciens, and master of the viola d'amore, will also take part. The two musicians unearthed together the sonatas and concertos for viola d'amore and double-bass, which had been composed in the era of these instruments. They played them together in Paris, London, Berlin, Moscow and other cities. Casadesus is crossing from France thus to appear for the first time in America with his confrere.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

OCT 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Brings Orchestra Here.

The Boston Symphony orchestra probably holds first place in the affections of the Pittsburgh public, an their coming is always awaited with the keenest interest. This orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, wil open the symphony season in Pittsburgh Friday night and Saturday afternoon, and their program is announced here for the first time:

FRIDAY NIGHT

Apollou Musagete Ballet . . . . . Stravinsky
Birth of Apollo Apollo and the Muses.
Nocturnes . . . . . Debussy
Nuages. Fetes.
Prelude to Die Meistersinger . . . . . Wagner
Symphony No 3 in E-flat major—Eroica . . . . . Beethoven

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra . . . . . Handel
Bacchanale (Der Venusberg) from Tannhauser . . . . . Wagner
La Valse, Chorreographic Poem . . . . Ravel
Symphony No. 2 in D major . . . . Brahms

Other orchestras to be heard in this course of seven evenings and six afternoons at Syria Mosque are the New York Philharmonic for three pairs, with Mengelberg and Toscanini conducting; the Chicago orchestra with Frederick Stock; the Cleveland orchestra, with Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis orchestra, with Verbrugghen.

10

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Orchestra Finances

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra printed in the programs of the first concerts this season, Oct 5 and 6, a financial statement showing the receipts and the expenses of the past three seasons. They did this as part of an appeal for gifts toward the deficit on the current season, which is expected to be $134,000. Some remarks about Symphony Orchestra finances are therefore in order.

Nobody expects a series of symphony concerts to make money. Tickets to the Boston Symphony here for years past have been exempt from the United States tax on admissions, the so-called "war tax," on the ground that the orchestra is not a money-making enterprise.

Nowhere in the world is there a comparable series of orchestral concerts which avoids a deficit. In Europe the deficit is often paid by municipal or national governments, out of funds raised by general taxation. Formerly many of the leading European orchestras were supported by reigning monarchs.

In the United States symphony concerts have always been supported private benefactors, either individuals like Maj Higginson, who paid all deficits of the Boston Symphony for 36 seasons out of his own pocket, spending, all told, more than a million dollars, or by groups of givers. For the past few seasons about 500 givers have subscribed varying amounts toward Boston Symphony deficits, ranging from $50,000 to $80,000 per year.

The Philadelphia Orchestra raised, a few years ago, an endowment fund of $2,000,000, the income from which now pays its deficits. The Chicago Orchestra owns its hall and an office building. The rentals plus income from an endowment fund much smaller than Philadelphia's pay the deficits.

Meeting the Deficit

The Boston Symphony has a small endowment which brings in about $15,000 a year. The rest of the deficit must be met by annual subscriptions. The trustees have frequently reminded the public that "These concerts can be carried on only by the generosity of the public."

There is no lack of sale for season tickets to Boston Symphony concerts. For Friday afternoons there is an enormously long waiting list. For Saturday evenings also there is already a waiting list for next season. Every seat for the regular series, and almost every seat for the brief Monday and Tuesday series was subscribed for before the end of last season for the current year.

Prices for season tickets to subscribers average from not quite $4 a concert down to a little less than $1 a concert. It is possible that the Friday afternoon prices, already greatly increased, might be still further raised. But the tickets for the other series could probably not all be sold if any notable further increase were levied upon them.

A comparison of the receipts and expenses of the Boston Symphony with those of the Chicago Orchestra indicates that it might be possible to cut down expenses on the Boston Symphony concerts. Chicago figures for the season of 1924-25 and Boston figures for 1925-26, years reasonably comparable, indicate that our orchestra costs about twice what the Chicago Orchestra costs to maintain. Both sets of figures are official, issued by the respective trustees.

The Chicago Orchestra's total receipts from concerts, including concerts outside Chicago, and the net receipts from such sundries as program advertising were for the 1924-25 season $232,165. The Boston Symphony gross receipts from concerts alone were for the 1925-26 season $490,-821. To get a fair comparison with the Chicago figures about $15,000 of extra sundry receipts should be added to the Boston total above.

Comparison With Chicago

The Chicago Orchestra spent in 1924-25 on orchestra, conductors, soloists, business management, advertising and sundries $297.371. The Boston Symphony spent in 1925-26 on concerts, rents, traveling expenses, soloists, etc, $158,-230; on orchestra salaries $361,756, on other salaries and etc, about $50,000.

The total expenses of the Chicago Orchestra for 1924-25 were $397,592, to which a bookkeeping charge of $31,000 for rental of orchestra hall for which the orchestra, as owner, does not actually pay rent, must be added. The total expenses of the Boston Symphony for 1925-26 were $729,487. Thus our orchestra costs about $300,000 a season more than the Chicago Orchestra costs to run, and takes in about $250,-000 a season more than the Chicago Orchestra receives from all sources.

Part of this huge discrepancy comes from the Pops, since the Chicago Orchestra has nothing comparable to them. But the Chicago Orchestra has 28 pairs of concerts in its regular series to Boston's 24 pairs and gives all told more concerts than our orchestra does in its season, exclusive of the Pops.

The Chicago Orchestra numbers all told only about 90 players to the 112 now enrolled in the Boston Symphony. Figures for individual salaries are not published by either orchestra, but plainly neither Mr Stock nor the first desk men in the Chicago Orchestra are paid as much as Mr Koussevitzky and the Boston first desk men get. Yet the Chicago Orchestra, like the Boston Symphony is now, and has for years been among the foremost in the world, so that no obvious difference of musical worth is discernible between the two.

The decision as to the policies of the Boston Symphony can be made only by the trustees, who are responsible for its financial management. They, and they alone, are in full possession of all the facts about orchestra finances. One merely wonders, in passing, whether if the burden of raising the annual deficit should become unbearably great, it would be possible, without grave sacrifice of musical quality, to cut down the expenses of the Boston Symphony concerts to something nearer the Chicago figures.

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky had by exception set two symphonies on this week's Boston Symphony program, Haydn's "Surprise", and the Franck Symphony. The novelty this time is not likely to rouse the wrath of those who dislike modernist pieces. It is the "Negro Rhapsody" of Rubin Goldmark, New York teacher and composer, a suave and tuneful piece already heard at the Pops but not before played at the regular Symphony concerts.

To avoid conflict with Mr Hoover's visit to Boston, Mr Koussevitzky has changed the date of his double bass recital to Wednesday at 8.30. Tickets dated Monday will be good Wednesday.

Mr H. L. Mencken, in a letter to his friend and biographer, Isaac Goldberg, lately wrote about music with his usual vigor and emphasis as follows, according to Musical America:

"The so-called moderns interest me very much," he wrote, "for I am fond of experiments in the arts. But I'd rather read their music than hear it. It always fails to come off: it is Augenmusik. So far as I can make out, Stravinsky never had a musical idea in his life—that is, in the sense that Schubert and Mozart had them. He makes up for his lack of them by tuning his fiddle strings to G flat, D sharp, B and B sharp, and playing above the bridge. That such preposterous rubbish is solemnly heard and applauded is sufficient proof that there is a sucker born every minute. . . .

"I never go to hear virtuosi if I can help it. It offends me greatly to see a performer getting applause that belongs to the composer. I take little interest in conductors, although I know a number of them and like them as men. Their importance is immensely overestimated.

"Of all the conductors I am familiar with I like Muck the best. His conducting is intelligent, painstaking and in good taste. He does not give a show: he plays the music. His competence naturally makes him unpopular with the frauds who constitute a majority of the Boston Orchestra audiences, and at first chance, during the late war, they fell on him.

"I seldom go to the opera. I believe that most of the best music thus far written is in the form of symphonies for grand orchestra; I'd rather hear it than any other kind. I greatly enjoy chamber music, particularly when I am helping to play it. I believe, with Franz Kneisel, that most quartets would be improved if they had parts for bull fiddles and were quintets.

"As a boy I used to like Moszkowski. I got over it when I began to smoke. . . ."

The Sunday concert series at Symphony Hall, which begins with Kreisler this afternoon is to bring to Boston a number of celebrities in the near future. Next Sunday Miss Farrar will again reveal the delicate and polished artistry with which she delighted an audience here last season on emerging from a period of retirement. Next Sunday evening Horowitz, the astonishing Russian pianist whose local debut was the great sensation of last season returns to dazzle his admirers once more. Oct 28 the English Singers will offer a completely new program of old English concerted vocal music. Nov 4 Mme Galli-Curci is to be heard for the first time this season in a city where her popularity has always seemed unbounded. Nov 11 Roland Hayes, a great artist in whom Boston takes an especial pride will be heard, no doubt by a huge audience.

The length of the programs printed in this department today shows that the new season is getting underway full steam ahead. The Boston debuts at Jordan Hall include Ruth Rodefer, a pianist from Nashville, who has studied in Chicago. She is a college graduate and member of Phi Beta Kappa, with not merely an AB but also the degree of Master of Arts in Economics, an unusual cultural background for a pianist. Her father was a college professor of Greek.

Another local debut is that of Jean Duncan, a New York soprano. Abbie Mitchell, a singer to be heard at Jordan Hall today, has given a New York recital which won her favorable comment.

Boston artists to be heard this week at Jordan Hall, all of them previously known to local concert halls, include George Brown, 'cellist; Luther Emerson, baritone, a Boston teacher and church singer, and Albion Metcalf, a young pianist first heard here last season.

Ruth Webb, the soloist at the opening concert of the People's Symphony next Sunday afternoon, was born in New York of French and German parents. She has studied under Phillipp in Paris. Last spring Mr Casella selected her to play the piano solo in his "Scarlattiana" at the Pops, under his conductorship. She has chosen a Mozart concerto.

Concerts next week at Jordan Hall include a violin recital Monday Oct 22, by Nicolai Kassmann, one of the first violins in the Boston Symphony, an attractive program of chamber music by four local artists Tuesday evening, the debut here of a new English pianist Rita Neve Wednesday evening Oct 24; a recital Thursday by Mr Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, at which Felix Fox, well-known Boston pianist and teacher, will play the piano part in a sonata; a Saturday morning program for young people by Guy Maier, with Carpenter's ballet, "Krazy Kat," as the chief item on a varied program; and the local debut Saturday afternoon, Oct 27, of the Brahms' Quartet of female voices, already heard in New York.

Frank van der Stucken is to be honored by his fellow musicians and some music-loving friends on his 70th birthday. Probably many young music lovers do not know the brilliant record of this admirable American, who was born in Texas. He went to Europe in 1865 and met all the great men of that time. In 1882 he became conductor of the Breslau Stadt Theatre, for which he composed his music to Shakespeare's "Tempest." In 1883, under the patronage of Liszt, he gave a concert of his own works in the Grand Ducal Theatre of Weimar. Siloti was the pianist.

The next year he returned to his native land as conductor of the Arion Society of New York, making his debut on April 4 in the old Steinway Hall. In the seasons of 1884-5 he gave a series of novelty concerts in the same hall, producing among other things the third symphony of Brahms and Chabrier's very useful "Espana." The fourth concert of the series was devoted to American composers—J. K. Paine, E. C. Phelps, Dudley Buck, George E. Whiting, Edward MacDowell and himself. In 1886 he gave at the old Chickering Hall four concerts of American music. He produced works by Chadwick, Bird, Templeton, Strong. Arthur Whiting, Kelley, Huss, MacDowell, Silas Pratt, Shelley, Horatio Parker and others. These concerts attracted wide attention and gave a stimulus to American composition which has not yet been exhausted.

In 1889 he conducted in Paris the first concert of American compositions ever given in Europe. MacDowell played his own D minor piano concerto and the program contained also works by Paine, Huss, Parker, Chadwick and Van der Stucken. In 1892 he took the first musical organization on tour in Europe, when he conducted the Arion in Berlin, Vienna and other cities. From 1895 till 1907 he was conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra and was conductor of the Cincinnati Festival from 1906 to 1912, succeeding Theodore Thomas, and again from 1923 to 1927. He conducted the first "Concerts Ysaye" after the war in Brussels from 1920 to 1922. He was made an Officier de l'Instruction Publique by the French Government and a Chevalier de l'Ordre Leopold and Officier de l'Ordre de la Couronne by King Albert of Belgium. In this country his fellow workers in the domaine of literature and the fine arts have made him a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

Wednesday, Oct 17, at 8:30, Serge Koussevitzky will give his only double-bass recital of the season here. The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will then for the second time in America play the instrument, his skill upon which has ranked him with the two great double-bass players in musical history, Dragonetti and Bottesini.

Koussevitzky does not use a chamber instrument bowed 'cello fashion as did Bottesini, but a full size concert bass—a product of Gironimo Amati, in 17th century Italy.

Koussevitzky first took up the bass when, as a boy of 14, he entered the Moscow Conservatory. The institution required from this special class the study of some brass instrument—or the double-bass. He was fortunate in having Rambaussec for his master. His skill developed to an extraordinary degree. For the first 10 years of his career he toured Europe giving recitals and playing his own double-bass concerto with orchestra. In this way the name of Koussevitzky was known the world over even before his conducting days.

Koussevitzky's fondness for the music of the 17th and 18th centuries is of course quite in accord with his devotion to this last surviving member of the viol family. A common interest thus naturally allied him with Henri Casadesus, founder of the "Societe des Instruments Anciens," and master of the viola d'amore. The two musicians unearthed together the sonatas and concertos for viola d'amore and double-bass, which had been composed in the era of these instruments. They played them together in Paris, London, Berlin, Moscow and other cities. Casadesus is crossing from France thus to appear for the first time in America with his confrere.

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL—Today, at 3:30, Fritz Kreisler, violin, assisted by Carl Lamson, pianist. Sonata, in A major, Brahms; Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Bruch; Havanaise, Ravel; "Piece en forme de Havanaise," Ravel; "Songs My Mother Taught Me," Dvorak-Kreisler; "Two Slavonic Dances," Dvorak-Kreisler; "Airs Russes," Wieniawski-Kreisler.

Wednesday, at 8:30, Serge Koussevitzky, double bass, assisted by Henri Casadesus, viola d'amore. Symphonie Concertante, Lorenziti; Concerto for Double-Bass, Koussevitzky; Sonata No. 3, Borghi; Petite Suite, Lorenziti; Largo from Sonata, Eccles; Minuet, Beethoven; Berceuse, Lasca; Valse Miniature, Koussevitzky.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, third program, "Surprise Symphony," Haydn; "Negro Rhapsody," Rubin Goldmark; Symphony, Cesar Franck. There is no soloist.

Sunday, Oct 21, at 3:30, Geraldine Farrar, soprano.

Fruhlingslaube," "Alinde," "Der Lindenbaum," "Lob der Thranen," "In der Ferne," Schubert; "Schone Weige meiner Leiden," "Seit ich ihn gesehan," "Liebeslied," "Herzensleid," "Wanderlied," Schuman; "Chi vuol innamorarsi," Scarlatti; "Voi che sapete," Mozart; "Dites que faut-il fair," "Mon petit coeur," 18th Century; "Snow," Lie; "The Lark," Rubinstein; "In a Boat," Grieg; "E'er Since Thine Eyes," Strauss; "Love's Rapture," Jensen.

Sunday, Oct 21 at 8:15, Vladimir Horowitz, pianist. Sonata (Appassionata) op. 57, Beethoven;"Three Intermezzi" (op. 117, 118, 119), "Rhapsody," op. 119, Brahms; "Fantasy in F Minor, "Two Mazurkas," Chopin; "Doktor Gradus ad Parnassum," "Serenade a la poupee," Debussy; "Doumka," Tchaikovsky; "Rhapsody Espagnole," Liszt.

JORDAN HALL—Today at 3:30, Abbie Mitchell, soprano. "O Wusst Ich Doch Den Weg Zuruck," "Verrath," Brahms; "Aus Meinen Grossen Schmerzen," Franz; "Der Erlkonig," Schubert; "L'Invitation au Voyage," Duparc; "Les Papilons," Chausson; "Dieu De Grace," Franco Alfano; "God Took From Me Mine All," "Sorrow In Spring," Rachmaninoff; "Wounded Birch," Gretchaninoff; "Oxana's Song," Rimsky - Korsakoff; "Down De Lover's Lane," "Exhorbation," "Wid De Moon, Moon, Moon," Cook; "I'm Troubled in Mind," Will Marion Cook; "City Called Heaven," Hall Johnson; "Lonesome Valley," "Didn't It Rain," Harry T. Burleigh.

Tuesday at 8:15—George Brown, 'cellist. Grave, Sammartini; Sonata in D major, Locatelli; Adagio from Concerto in B minor, Dvorak; Tre Canti, Pizzetti; Suite Populaire Espagnole, de Falla-Marechal; "Apres un Reve," Faure; "Piece en forme de Habana," Ravel; "The Blackbird Reel," Hughes.

Wednesday at 8:15—Ruth Redefer, pianist (Boston debut). Sonata, C Sharp Minor, Padre Antonio Soler; Prelude and Fugue, E Minor, Mendelssohn; Ballade, G Minor, Grieg; Three Preludes, Striabin; "L'Isle Joyeuse," Debussy; Two Diversions, Carpenter; "Danza Iberica," Joaquin Nin.

Thursday at 8:15. Luther Emerson, baritone. "An die Musik," Schubert; 'Liebster Herr Jesu," Bach; Eine Schon "Tageweis," Melody by Bohme; Gagliarda, Hassler; "The Water Lily," Franz; "Not With Angels," Rubinstein; "The Cloths of Heaven," Dunhill; "The Oak Tree," Edward Ballantine; "Brookland Road," Martin Shaw; "Sea-Song of Gafran," Cyril Scott: "L'Heure Exquise," Hahn; "Amour d'Antan," Chausson; "Cloches de Pentecote," Delmas; Three Songs from Heine's "Nacht in der Kajute," Helen Hopekirk; "Freundliche Vision," "Winterliebe," Strauss.

Friday at 8:15. Jean Duncan, soprano (Boston debut). "Mit einem gemalten Band," Beethoven; "Amor dormiglione," Strozzi; "My Mother Bids Me Bind My Hair," "The Mermaids Song," Haydn; "Ich bin eine Harfe," Erich Wolff; "Und gestern hat er mir Rosen gerbracht," Marx; "Das Rosenband," Richard Strauss; "Nixe Binsefuss," Hugo Wolff; "Clair de lune," Szulc; "Les tres petits chats," Pierne; "Serenade melancolique," Rhene Baton; "Mai," Saint Saens; "At the Time of Parting," Hadley; "To a Young Gentleman," Carpenter; "She Rested by the Broken Brook," Coleridge Taylor; "Me Company Along," Hageman.

Saturday at 3: Albion Metcalf, pianist.

HOTEL STATLER BALLROOM, Sunday, Oct 21 at 3. People's Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Fischer, guest conductor. First program, "Pathetic Symphony," Tchaikovsky; "Irish Rhapsody," in D minor, Stanford; Concerto for pianaforte, Mozart; "In Autumn," Greig. Soloist, Ruth Webb.

Sun Globe, Oct 14

PASTE OVER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will give a double bass recital in Carnegie Hall on October 23rd, evening

"MY GREAT admiration for Steinway piano, the only instrument which includes the whole scale of orchestral tones."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Any Steinway piano may be purchased with a cash deposit of 10%, with the balance extended over a period of two years. Used pianos accepted in partial exchange. Prices: $875 and up. In Greater New York, Steinway pianos are sold only at Steinway Hall. Steinway pianos may also be obtained on rental, at reasonable rates, for town and country.

STEINWAY & SONS, Steinway Hall
109 West 57th Street, New York City

STEINWAY

The Instrument of the Immortals

OCT 16

12

The Week-End Around Boston Concert-Halls

Kodaly Affirms His Prowess, Kreisler in the Manner Of His Latter Days

TRANS — OCT 15

STRAVINSKY'S "Apollo" fell not a whit below expectation at the repetition on Saturday evening. Again Mr. Koussevitsky's version of Schumann's Symphony in B-flat carried all before it. Yet "Háry János" most sharpened and pleasured the curious ear. Out from Kodály's Suite, in mettlesome performance, sprang detail after detail unnoted at a first hearing or put by in the reviewer's duty to proffer a generalized impression. The Prelude—"The Story Begins"—does double office, sounding the homesick note to be the pathos of the comedy, yet upheaving Háry of the monstrous imagination and tongue, about to embark on his Munchausen-like course. Follow him to the scene of battle; out of the trumpets he rises portentious; from the tuba he upswells formidable; no wonder Napoleon grovelled before such a conqueror. What a battle it is! No: Herr Doktor Strauss did not "go the limit" in the fight in "Ein Heldenleben." Kodály has invented additional sounds no less ear-piercing, better serving his serio-comic purpose.

For Kodály, waiting until middle life to write for orchestra and acquiring much knowledge along the way, is modernist master of his medium, to resource adding wit, humor, imagination. No more than Stravinsky does he blush at a frank trumpet-tune for his puppet-clock so long as he can garnish it with ingenuities. The throb of the piano rhymthms the nostalgic song; the flute embroiders it bird-voiced. Like a fiddle under a Hungarian hand, stirred and con amore, the solo-viola thrums out the tune. What a virtuoso-storm is the burlesque-march at the Imperial Court with a virtuoso-orchestra to rise to it! Kodály, however, is more than craftsman; against the adapted folk-tunes he holds his own as composer. For Intermezo he writes—out of his own invention—a Hungarian dance. It sounds more Hungarian than the folk-measures. It is "gorgeous stuff" as the lads say, especially when the strings bite out the rhythm, while the wood-winds and horns are deepening and carrying the melody. Alike on Friday and on Saturday the audience loosed its hands and would not be stilled. Finally, the gusto of the whole Suite. With all his skill and choice Kodály writes like a composer in flood. . . . There is good reason to believe that Mr. Koussevitzky has added a piece to the "standard repertory." The world over, he keeps us in touch with the musical times.

WHEELING, W. VA.
INTELLIGENCER

OCT 1 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN PITTSBURGH NOV. 2

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY AND ORCHESTRA TO OPEN PITTSBURGH SYMPHONY SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchesra probably holds first place in the affections of the Pittsburgh and Wheeling public, and their coming to the eastern city is always awaited with the keenest interest. This orchestra, with their distinguished leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will open the Symphony seasen in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3, and their program is announced here for the first time:

FRIDAY NIGHT.

Stravinsky . . . Apollon Musagete Ballet
Birth of Apollo, Apollo and the Muses.

Debussy . . . . . Nocturnes
Nuages. Fetes.

Wagner . . . . . .
. . . . Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"

Beethoven . . . . . .
Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major—"Eroica"

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Handel . . . . . .
Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra.

Wagner . . . . . .
Bacchanale (Der Venusberg), from Tannhauser.

Ravel . . 'La Valse" Choreographic Poem
Brahms . Symphony No. 2 in D major

Other orchestras to be heard in this course of seven evenings and six afternoons at Syria Mosque are the New York Philharmonic for three pairs, with Mengelberg and Toscanini conducting; the Chicago Orchestra with Frederick Stock; the Cleveland Orchestra, with Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis Orchestra, with Verbrugghen.

Winter Music Sounds Across Summer Night

TRANS — OCT 18

Koussevitzky's Double Bass and Casadesus's Viola to Rapturous Hearers

INEVITABLY the first curiosity had abated. Most of us, at all interested, discovered a year ago that Mr. Koussevitzky plays the double-bass as signal virtuoso and susceptible musician; that the double-bass, so played, is an instrument in its own right, no mere "foundation" for the string-choir in the symphonic concert room. Upon the Manhattanese, who will hear Mr. Koussevitzky, single-voiced, for the first time next Wednesday, will the earlier sensation be renewed. Consequently there were empty seats at Symphony Hall last evening; but in those that were filled—quite three-quarters of the whole—sat an ardent company. It was not the audience of Friday or of Saturday at the Symphony Concerts. Nor was it a blending of the two. Rather it was a Koussevitzkian assemblage bound together, high and low, by a single, devoted admiration.

The conductor has been warmly welcomed to his stand, but not as the double-bassist was thrice and four times applauded when yesterday he came to his place. The end of every number, whether it was solo-piece for Mr. Koussevitzky or duet with the assisting Casadesus of the viola d'amore, rekindled these raptures. "Extras" were demanded—asked is too mild a word—and accorded even before the end of the program. Flowers were conveyed along an aisle and handed up to the platform. Behold—and consider—the reward for "personalities" when they tread (as the saying is) the American scene. . . . And all this on a soggy summer evening that more invited a concert on the terrace than a concert indoors. If the audience panted—and also fanned—greater were the burden and heat upon the two players. Though they screwed at the frets and passed the drying handkerchief along the strings, moisture laid traps for true intonation. Yet only rarely and briefly—to the glory of their ears and fingers—was it snared.

Since Mr. Casadesus was side-partner, the ancients had liberal inning. Doubtless they wrote for the double-bass as solo-instrument; certainly they mated it with other instruments of their string choir upon which, in chamber-pieces, they liked to ring the changes. Out of Lorenziti (XVIII Century) and Borghi (XVIII Century)—who that frequents concert-halls does not love these programmatic chaplets laid upon old heads?—came a Sinfonia Concertante and a Sonata for Viola d'Amore and Double Bass. Lorenziti yielded Mr. Casadesus a "Little Suite," possibly more or less arranged; while for one of his solo-pieces, transcribed from the violoncello, Mr. Koussevitzky went back to an eighteenth-century Eccles.

The duets and the Suite, with or without Mr. Casadesus's revising hand, were not of that ancientry which ravishes the ear and melts the heart in slow movements, flicking the senses as well through opening Allegro and closing Rondo. The Largo or the Adagio exhaled grace, charm, sentiment, in the measured eighteenth-century sense of the word and the quality. The introductions and finales were agreeable pieces of workmanship turned off with a pretty readiness. Sinfonia, Sonata and Suite were "house-music" in the adept and elegant practice of their time. As such, for their own pleasure, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Casadesus have played them in Parisian salons. As such, albeit across the broad, high spaces of Symphony Hall, the audience heard them spell-bound. A whisk through a Finale, the songful-sentimental curve of an Adagio, and its ear and heart were won. A domestic race are we Anglo-Saxons. Though in these lazy days we prefer to seek our "house-music" in the concert-room, there we unfeignedly enjoy it.

So it was that the palm for composition, even as last October, fell to Mr. Koussevitzky. Again he played his Concerto of 1904; again it proved well-invented, well-conducted, well-decorated piece. It has musical substance and it gives musical pleasure. It is written with unobtrusive skill. The learned say that it assimilates, rather than imitates, earlier models. Certainly, it displays the double-bass, yet keeps mood, manner and musical chastity. Next in quality was the little piece of another double-bassist, the Cradle Song of Laska—the lyric note, the flowing hand, the smooth and muted instrument. Though Mr. Casadesus renewed the tone of the viola d' amore—the liqueur, pale-surfaced, subtle-sweet, fine-edged upon the ear, among the heady, bodied wines of the string choir—decidedly the evening was the evening of double bassists.

Modestly but distinctly, Mr. Koussevitzky asserted the superiority of the double bass over the violoncello as instrument of song and gave reason for the assertion. Recall the voice of the 'cello as it has sounded slow movements in concertos and melancholy sighs in salon-pieces times without number. Oftener than not the tone-quality is clouded; the musical speech thickens as it flows; ornament fattens; the whole impression is coagulated. In the old Adagios and Largos, in Mr. Koussevitzky's own Andante, in the transcription from Eccles, his double-bass—in comparison—sang clear and light and slender; twined in and out with garlands; dulled no rhythms; caught the very image of the music. Through the duets, upon its darker tone, as upon a velvet cushion, lay the bright, quasi-metallic arabesques of the viola d'amore. Now and then, as well, came euphonies between the two instruments—of Beauty and the Beast, exceeding smooth-tongued at the hands of its present Russian dompteur. (The French word implies more mastery than does our "tamer"). Yet once and twice Mr. Koussevitzky bade it rumble in its throat quite as though Beethoven were laying on the lash. Even with pet instruments these Russians—it is half the pleasure of contact with them—will show their teeth.

H. T. P.

RECITAL GIVEN ON BASS VIOL

Koussevitzky Amazes Audience by His Virtuosity

POST — OCT 18

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening at Symphony Hall Bostonians were for a second time permitted to hear the extraordinary art of Serge Koussevitzky as performer on the double-bass. On this occasion, however, Mr. Koussevitzky shared his recital with another, or, as the programme stated, he was "assisted" by Henri Casadesus, virtuoso of the viola d'amore, already known to the Symphony Concerts.

IN SOLO AND DUET

Together the two musicians were heard in a Symphonie Concertante by the 18th century Lorenziti, the orchestral accompaniment replaced by the piano of Bernard Zighera, and later in a Sonata by Borghi, likewise an obscure 18th century Italian, for viola d'amore and double-bass unaccompanied. Alone, to continue this enumeration, Mr. Koussevitzky played his own Concerto, in the performance of which he astonished his hearers of last season, a group of solo pieces drawn from Eccles, Beethoven and Lasca, and, in conclusion, a Valse Miniature of his own making. A strange title, this last, to be given to a piece for double-bass, though as it chances in Mr. Koussevitzky's hands this giant of the viol family is capable of an almost bird-like gentleness and agility. Finally Mr. Casadesus gave further evidence of his artistry and skill in a Petite Suite by the Lorenziti aforementioned.

To those in last evening's audience who were being vouchsafed their first experience of Mr. Koussevitzky's virtuosity, his amazing prowess must have come, as it did to virtually all of last season's audience as surprise and revelation. For those already made aware of the ease with which he overcomes what would appear to be insuperable limitations of his instrument and already acquainted with his rare persuasiveness as interpreter and with the widely varying beauties of his tone, last evening's concert could renew and deepen impressions already gained.

HER — OCT 17

The announcement that Mr. Koussevitzky will play the double-bass tonight, assisted by the excellent Henri Cascadenes, should surely fill Symphony hall. It is seldom that musicians of so marked technical ability and exquisite taste playing the double-bass and the viola d'amore come before the public of Boston. The program is an interesting one. Music by Luigi Lorenziti and Luigi Borghi, composers of the 18th century, has been heard here. Mr. Koussevitzky will play his own Concerto and Valse Miniature, and the beautiful Largo from a sonata by Eccles. But which Eccles? There was Solomon the elder, who turned Quaker, sold his music and instruments, then bought them back, and to prevent Satan from using them to gain souls for his blazing dominion, burned them all on Tower Hill. It occurred to him during the great plague in London to walk about stark naked with a dish of burning sulphur on his head. When he turned Quaker he was earning at least £500 a year as a teacher, a good sum for that time. Solomon the younger was possibly a son of the Quaker. Then there was Henry, undoubtedly a son of the elder Solomon, and there was John the elder brother of Henry.

"Lasca," whose Berceuse will be performed by Mr. Koussevitzky, is an unfamiliar name to our audiences. The foreign dictionaries of music spell his name with a "k." Born at Prague in 1847, he was a famous player of the double-bass. He wrote a mass of music. For the double-bass he composed a concerto, a suite, three fantasias, a rhapsody, smaller pieces, and he wrote a "Kontrabassschule." Lasca was also a painter.

From "Spirituals" To Full Orchestra

Goldmark's 'Negro Rhapsody' for Next Novel Number at Symphony Hall

TRANS — OCT 18

THIS WEEK an American "novelty," by no means new elsewhere than Boston, stands upon Mr. Koussevitzky's program—the "Negro Rhapsody" of Rubin Goldmark. Mr. Goldmark, distant relative of his Viennese namesake, was born in New York City on Aug. 15, 1872. There, as the program-book will doubtless tell us, he is "still living." For subject-matter, however, in his music-making he does not turn to the sidewalks of New York but to the negro-music of the South. The most parochial Manhattanese should pardon him. For in 1919 when Mr. Goldmark began to think about the Rhapsody no one could have predicted that the said sidewalks would find place in American music, chaperoned by American national politics. An opportunity seems to be opening before Il Signore Respighi who often visits us. He might change his geographical-musical base and begin a new series of tone-poems with "Marciapiedi di New York."

"A Negro Rhapsody" was begun at Fisher's Island in August, 1919, was mostly composed at Woodland Park, Colorado, in the summers of 1921 and 1922. (Mr. Goldmark has spent a considerable part of his life in Colorado on account of his health.) It received its first performance from the Philharmonic Society under Mr. Mengelberg on Jan. 18, 1923. The rhapsody takes the form of an introduction followed by a large three-part structure, which proceeds Tempo giusto—Andante non troppo—Allegro moderato (Tempo giusto). The seven themes are based entirely upon five Negro Spirituals and a song said to have been noted as sung by Negro workmen at their labors upon a river in Tennessee. The songs utilized by Mr. Goldmark are named hereunder in the order of their appearance in the Rhapsody:

1. "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen."
2. "O Peter, Go Ring dem Bells."
3. "O, Religion is a Fortune."
4. "Sometimes I Feel Like a Motherless Child."
5. "Oh When I Come to Die."
6. The Song from Tennessee.

The introduction, at a somewhat slow tempo, concerns itself chiefly with a development of the first song. Low strings sing a strophe in unison. A little later, it provides the second theme, taken first by flutes, clarinets and bassoons. After a climax in which both these themes are much used, the introduction ends with another unison passage in low strings, this time announcing "O Peter, Go Ring dem Bells."

The first section of the main body of the rhapsody follows at once. "Nobody Knows" and "O Peter," provide the thematic material; but here they are not heard in the languorous manner of the familiar singer of Spirituals, nor with the lyric voice of the introduction. Rythmically they have been "ragged" and the mood is now one of bustling activity. Soon another theme enters, energetically, in the first violin—"O Religion." A considerable climax is built up, chiefly upon the new version of "Nobody Knows." As the tension relaxes comes a succession of sustained chords which (on paper at least) recall the shifting chords at the end of the working-out section in the first movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Next a quieter mood prevails and we find ourselves in the division "Andante non troppo." An English horn sings "Sometimes I Feel"; a solo-violin soon takes it up. As sentiment grows, a solo 'cello introduces "Oh When I Come to Die." (Mr. Gilman calls this "the chief lyric subject of the work"). Then the theme enters the horns and woodwinds and is finally heard from the horn quartet. Meanwhile the orchestra has been gathering force and intensity. The highest emotional stage of the piece is reached at the end of this division, with trombones going back to "Nobody Knows," while at the peak the full orchestra sings a glorified version of "Oh When I Come to Die."

Sharp, snappy chords begin the third division. The tempo and the mood are again energetic and aggressive, with the addtion of something almost martial. Against this accompaniment is heard the Song from Tennessee. Many of the themes are passed in review in the final summary. But the climax is on the Tennesee River Song with brass for "O Peter, Ring Dem Bells" as a final "apotheosis."

As was to be expected, some one raised the question of the genuineness of the negro songs. The discussion is singularly out of place in relation to this rhapsody. That Mr. Goldmark used the Spirituals much to the form in which concert-singers have been singing them these many years, anyone who can read music or hear a tune will be able to discover. If the doubts are in place anywhere, they have to do with Spirituals in themselves—a much larger question than that of the content of any adaptation. Nevertheless one must call attention to the difference in character between the first five songs (the Spirituals) and the Tennessee River Song.

More to the point is the question of what Mr. Goldmark did with his materials in the fashioning of the rhapsody. Did he use the imagination and the skill of a Kodály upon his folk-stuff? Was he as wise in the choice of his songs? Do the many counter-themes, original with Mr. Goldmark, carry on as fully the temper of the negro music, as did the Hungarian with his Magyar and gypsy tunes? Such questions one may well leave to the hearers of Friday and Saturday, and perhaps more particularly to the reviewers of those concerts. For to tell too much in advance would be to dull appetite.

A. H. M.

ALWIN SCHROEDER, NOTED 'CELLIST, DIES

Was for Many Years in Boston Symphony

Funeral services for Alwin Schroeder, one of the world's most noted 'cellists, who died yesterday afternoon at his home at 94 Perkins street, Jamaica Plain, will be held tomorrow at the Forest Hills crematory, and burial will be at Forest Hills.

Mr. Schroeder, who suffered a shock last Friday night, was born of a musical family in Germany 73 years ago. For many years he played with the Boston symphony orchestra, and he was a member of the formerly renowned Kneisel quartet of Boston. He has played in many sections of this country and abroad.

He came here in 1891 at the request of Maj. Higginson and Arthur Nikisch, conductor of Symphony orchestra. He took the conductor's place as first 'cellist of the orchestra, and also as a member of the Kneisel quartet.

After spending 15 years here and playing all over the country, he returned to Germany to accept the position of 'cellist in Dr. Hoch's conservatory at Frankfort-on-the-Main, in the museum quartet, which is the post of highest honor accorded any 'cellist in Germany.

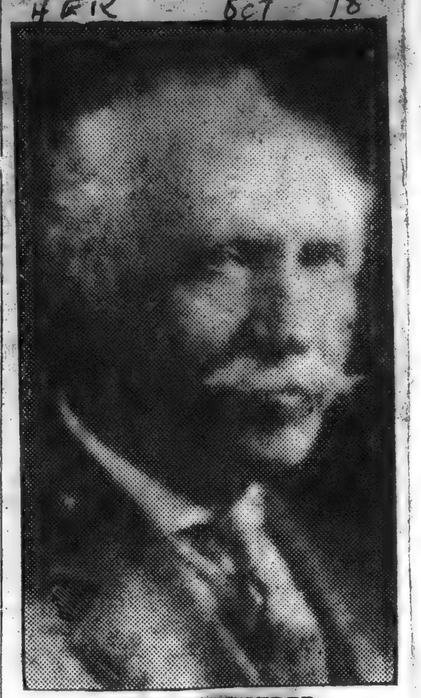
He again returned to Boston, coming back to spend the rest of his life. During the last few years, he has appeared in concerts before the music loving public and he has taught persons of great music renown.

Schroeder never took a lesson on the 'cello. He was taught the violin and the piano, and, as early as the age of 7 showed proficiency in these studies. As he became older, he became enamored of the dulcet tones and wonderful possibilities of the 'cello. During leisure moments, he practiced on an old 'cello and, before anyone knew he could properly draw the 'cello bow, he offered to play in a prominent orchestra as soloist. His services were accepted and from that time on Schroeder played nothing but the 'cello and the music world has listened.

He leaves a son, Rolf A. Schroeder, Boston architect; two daughters, Hedwig Schroeder, teacher at the New England Conservatory of Music, and Mrs. Elfriede Hamblin of Brookline.

Noted Musician Who Died Yesterday

HER OCT 18



ALWIN SCHROEDER

MR KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS DOUBLE-BASS

M Casadesus With Viola d'Amore Cooperates

GLOBE—OCT 18

At Symphony Hall last evening Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared before a very large and fashionable audience once again in the role of virtuoso of the double-bass. It is almost exactly a year since his first revelation to a Boston audience of the unexpected potentialities of the double-bass as a solo instrument, and of his own remarkable powers to display them. The size and the plauditory enthusiasm of last evening's throng indicated unmistakably that last year's impression had been a durable as well as a favorable one.

Having already familiarized an audience here with the beauty of the tones which skill may evoke from his chosen instrument, he elected at this recital to introduce to his hearers some very beautiful chamber music of the 18th century. In this Mr Koussevitzky had the cooperation—and probably the counsel—of M Henri Casadesus, eminent performer upon the viola d'amore and authority upon ancient music. M Bernard Zighera of the Boston Symphony assisted excellently at the pianoforte.

A "Symphonie Concertante" by Lorenziti, having three contrasted movements, brought the three artists together upon the platform and inspired a sensitive and spirited ensemble to which Mr Koussevitzky's delicately self-effacing playing contributed notably. The slightly clangorous brightness of the viola d'amore blended happily with the rich but characteristically reedy tones of the double-bass to produce a resonance exquisitely suited to the old world charm of this delightful music, to the sparkling exuberance of its first and last movements and the sweet dignity of the intervening Largo. In Borghi's Third Sonata, whose final Gigue had to be repeated, M Koussevitzky and Casadesus again joined forces, but without the piano's aid. In a "Petite Suite" for viola d'amore, beautiful in itself and providing an interesting vehicle for the instrument, M Casadesus showed himself the accomplished player and sensitive musician.

Mr Koussevitzky took the center of the platform as composer and as virtuoso in his concerto for double-bass, for which the composer himself would probably not claim first rank importance, but which provides for the performer the utmost variety of opportunity to display his almost miraculous gifts of agility, of delicate cantabile—now so soft as to be all but inaudible, now warmly sonorous—and of dramatic effect. A final group of short pieces contributed to the same end. One apparent fault alone stood out, a frequently excessive glissando in progressing from note to note. But this was not enough to blunt the edge of the pleasure which the audience had received from a most exceptional concert.

There were floral tributes to both the principal performers.

MUSIC

KOUSSEVITZKY RECITAL

By PHILIP HALE

Serge Koussevitzky, double-bass, assisted by Henri Casadesus, viola d'amore; Bernard Zighera, accompanist, gave a concert in Symphony hall last night. The program was as follows: Lorenziti, Symphonie Concertante for viola d'amore and double bass. Koussevitzky, Concerto for double bass. Borghi, Sonata, No. 3, for viola d'amore and double bass. Lorenziti, Petite Suite for viola d'amore. For double bass solo: Eccles, Largo from Sonata in G minor; Beethoven, Minuet; Laska, Berceuse; Koussevitzky, Valse Miniature.

An enthusiastic audience that filled the hall heard old and beautiful music beautifully played. It would be interesting to know how much editors and instrumentalists have done to compositions by Lorenziti and Borghi; whether this music in its original and naked form would have today the same charm; whether the "revision" has been strictly in keeping with the spirit of the 18th century. Hans von Buelow took all manner of impertinent liberties with the sonatas of Scarlatti. Modern music has suffered from editors. Rimsky-Korsakov's sandpapering and polishing of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" is an instance of an editor's willingness to improve a work, to correct original ideas which seemed to him crudities or errors in musical grammar. Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" has been maltreated within recent years.

Whether there were textual emendations in the ancient music performed last night was a question not asked by those who were quick in response to the emotional simplicity of the slow movements; music that was spiritual in its serenity, its purity; music that came as from the air and returned there, as Hazlitt said of melodies by Mozart. The lively pages were not mere chatter, mere notes to test the technical agility of a virtuoso; these pages required a virtuoso to bring forward what was in and behind the printed page, but a virtuoso in the higher and nobler sense.

The fine art of Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Casadesus had already been fully appreciated by the Boston public as by the public in European cities. Last night this art was again recognized: a technical ease that was at times surprising in the conquest of difficulties; an ease that led the layman only to enjoyment of the music itself; phrasing that seemed inevitable; the dash that vitalized quick passages that otherwise might have been regarded as mere padding; above all, the poetic spirit which found expression in ravishing euphony of tone.

These accomplished artists were not fulfilling a set task; they played as if for their own pleasure, realizing that their pleasure would be shared by the rapt hearers. While one marvelled at Mr. Koussevitzky's mastery of the double-bass, the manner in which he sang a melody, the dominant thought was not of the instrument itself but of the music that Mr. Koussevitzky brought from it. His Concerto, written no doubt, to suit his uncommon technic, is more than a parade piece. His little Valse, while it is frankly salon music, has individuality.

Lorenziti's Largo and the Sonata by Borghi will long be remembered, for the music itself and for the perfection of the performance. Did the composers ever think that their names would be gratefully remembered in the 20th century? Could they have dreamed that their music would be so admirably performed?

Rubin Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody" will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. The thematic material is derived from "Spirituals." The rhapsody was composed in 1921-22 and performed for the first time by the Philharmonic Society of New York in 1923. It has been performed by other orchestras in this country and it was played recently in London. HER OCT 18

The other pieces to be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky are a symphony, "The Surprise," by Haydn and the symphony by Cesar Franck.

The program of next week comprises Prokofieff's Classical Symphony; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Pick-Mangiagalli's Introduction and Fugue, and Brahms's Symphony No. 2.

Programs to Hand.

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of Oct. 26 and 27, the last before the orchestra's first journey of the season: TRANS OCT 19

Classical Symphony ..... Prokofieff
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, 'The Afternoon of A Faun' ..... Debussy
Partita ..... Kondracsi
(New: First Times)
Symphony, No. 2, in D major ..... Brahms

From Mr. Horowitz for his concert of piano-pieces in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening with sundry changes from earlier announcements:

T... C major .....

Virtuoso to Conductor

MONITOR OCT 20

By L. A. SLOPER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY reappeared this week in the rôle of contrabass player as well as orchestral conductor. Interest ran high in his recital, which in a sense might be called his first public appearance in America as doublebass virtuoso; since the occasion which drew him to play at Brown University was quite private, and his concert of last season, which was for a charitable purpose, was open to the public only at very high prices.

In Symphony Hall on the evening of Oct. 17, he was heard at usual recital prices in a program in which he was assisted by Henri Casadésus, performer on the viola d'amore. Together they played a "Symphonie Concertante" by Lorenziti and a Sonata of Borghi. M. Casadésus played a "Little Suite" by Lorenziti for viola d'amore, and Mr. Koussevitzky played his own Double-bass Concerto and a group of short solo numbers.

The impression made at last year's recital by Mr. Koussevitzky was renewed at this one. His astonishing technique was devoted to musical purposes, not to display. In the ensemble pieces, the voice of his instrument was always held to its proportional value. His full-bodied, vibrant tone, his tasteful phrasing, his architectural sense, above all, his poetic imagination, profoundly stirred the large audience whose applause was spontaneous, general and long-continued.

M. Casadésus Appreciated

Nor was M. Casadésus less appreciated. The founder of the Société des Instruments Anciens is no stranger in Boston. His collection of old instruments now rests in Symphony Hall. He appeared as soloist with the orchestra last season, and had previously been heard with his organization in chamber concerts. Not only his virtuosity, but his modesty and his musicianship made him on the present occasion a full member of a partnership whose pleasure in their music was as evident as that of their listeners. Mr. Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Orchestra, deserves a word for his discreet piano accompaniments.

In fine, this concert afforded one of those opportunities that come not too often of hearing pure music devotedly as well as expertly performed. It is a pity that Mr. Koussevitzky's duties as conductor prevent him from appearing oftener as solo player. In a remarkably viv... interview with Rena Gardner, printe... recently in the Boston Herald, th... conductor was enabled to present the case of the hard-working artist, in sharp contrast to that of the ease-loving critic. "This delicate subject causes Mr. Koussevitzky to quiver. 'The poor artiste work, he work, he work!' clasping his iron-gray head with a gesture of profound fatigue. 'He play!' sawing passionately at an imaginary bass viol —'He practice late at night, he rehearse, he have not sleep!'"

But then the critic! "'It is fine morning. He choose his tie, his handkerchief, he say, "Ha, hum, I must go criticize!" He listen, he has never heard that piece before, he hear it once, and the next day, "This piece was very bad," or, "This piece was so-and-so."'"

The Symphony Concert

That is probably the world's best statement of the ancient complaint of artist against critic. It is touching; it makes one hesitate to say that no doubt it was the extra work of the recital that caused Mr. Koussevitzky to lead off his program for the week's symphony concerts with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony. But it would be a mistake to conclude that he gave the symphony a perfunctory reading. That would be a feat very difficult for Mr. Koussevitzky to accomplish. He cannot help giving himself to what he does. Although, with this orchestra of drilled experts, in this transparent music, he did not find it necessary to use great physical exertion, the results of his training were evident. Because the music is transparent, it is likely to betray shortcomings. But the performance yesterday was limpid and beautifully balanced. The agreeable little surprise was carefully prepared, and was not over-stressed when it arrived. The Finale was taken briskly and indefectibly.

The position of honor on the program was occupied by Rubin Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody," heard for the first time in Boston, with the composer present to acknowledge the applause. This composition, based on tunes of Negro folk character, is vividly and effectively scored for a large orchestra. It contains nothing to distress, in this second quarter of the twentieth century, those who deplore the course taken by music since the third quarter of the nineteenth.

We were made familiar two years ago with Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Franck Symphony. Some complained at that time that he had deprived it of its grandeur. Fortunately he had. Too long had we sat reverently before this masterpiece. The banality of some of its material was becoming too evident. There was once an exponent of the less reputable press who used to lecture on the subject, "Yellow Versus Colorless Journalism." Without becoming "yellow," Mr. Koussevitzky is never colorless in his readings. This symphony, which was in danger of becoming dull, he has revitalized and dramatized. The audience yesterday rewarded him by lingering to applaud until the men were called to their feet for the third time in the afternoon.

RHAPSODY B GOLDMARK A SYMPHONY

AMER OCT 20

By MOSES SMITH

Serge Koussevitzky pays es homage this season to Ameri music, for the novelty on this wee program of Symphony concerts "A Negro Rhapsody" by Ru Goldmark, New York composer. piece was first played in New Y five years ago, and received its B Boston hearing yesterday aftern at Symphony Hall.

It is a far cry from the ul modernist music to this score of own time and country. Goldm bases his Rhapsody on negro f tunes, after the manner of his mer teacher, Anton Dvorak, more frankly. The harmonic idi is comparatively gentle. Once th things are said, however, the com sition remains a work of original The thematic material, parts which are original, is handled w expert skill, and the orchestratio worthy a master. Goldmark f his own way among the conflict tendencies of music today.

Following a colorful performa the Rhapsody was enthusiastic applauded, the composer being p ent to receive his share of tribute. The balance of the con was equally brilliant, and it something in the nature of a f day for Mr. Koussevitzky and men. The opening number, Hayt "Surprise" Symphony, was given exquisite performance.

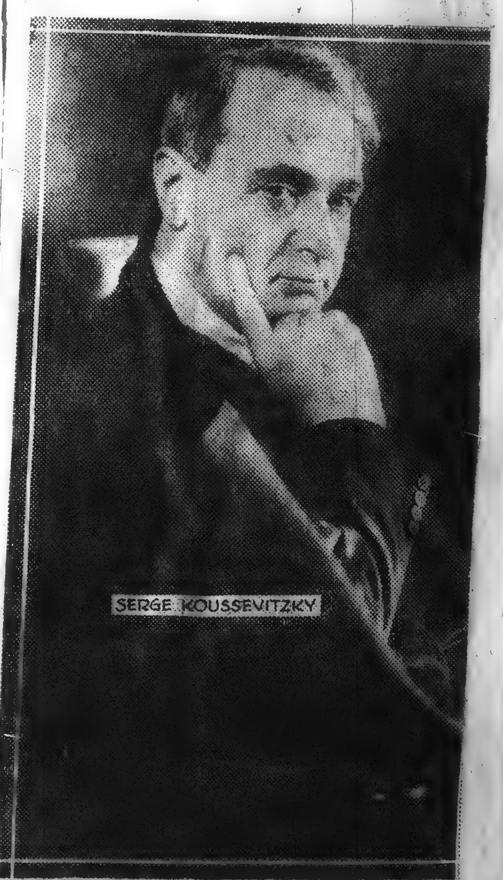
Only to the exceedingly s tempo of the adagio introductio the first movement could one t exception. Otherwise the choic tempo, notably in the second m ment, was happy. Mr. Koussevit used the full string sec... for delicate music, but the performa was not thereby thickened.

Cesar Franck's Symphony clo the program. Mr. Koussevitzk dramatic interpretation of masterpiece was already familia listeners of previous seasons, yesterday's rendition went to very limit of drama, perhaps e occasionally descended into atricalism. But on the whole performance in this piece, as in whole concert, was a joy to hearer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

The Wor...

as vie...



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Bo... 29 to the Eastman Theater, and Guy Mar... concert.

ALWIN SCHROEDER, NOTED 'CELLIST, DIES

Was for Many Years in Boston Symphony

Funeral services for Alwin Schroeder, one of the world's most noted 'cellists, who died yesterday afternoon at his home at 94 Perkins street, Jamaica Plain, will be held tomorrow at the Forest Hills crematory, and burial will be at Forest Hills.

Mr. Schroeder, who suffered a shock last Friday night, was born of a musical family in Germany 73 years ago. For many years he played with the Boston symphony orchestra, and he was a member of the formerly renowned Kneisel quartet of Boston. He has played in many sections of this country and abroad.

He came here in 1891 at the request of Maj. Higginson and Arthur Nikisch, conductor of Symphony orchestra. He took the conductor's place as first 'cellist of the orchestra, and also as a member of the Kneisel quartet.

After spending 15 years here and playing all over the country, he returned to Germany to accept the position of 'cellist in Dr. Hoch's conservatory at Frankfort-on-the-Main, in the Museum quartet, which is the post of highest honor accorded any 'cellist in Germany.

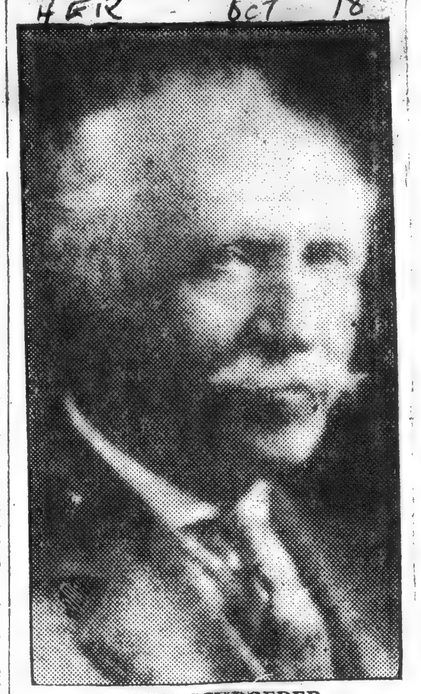
He again returned to Boston, coming back to spend the rest of his life. During the last few years, he has appeared in concerts before the music loving public and he has taught persons of great music renown.

Schroeder never took a lesson on the cello. He was taught the violin and the piano, and, as early as the age of 7 showed proficiency in these studies. As he became older, he became enamored of the dulcet tones and wonderful possibilities of the 'cello. During leisure moments, he practiced on an old 'cello and, before anyone knew he could properly draw the 'cello bow, he offered to play in a prominent orchestra as soloist. His services were accepted and from that time on Schroeder played nothing but the 'cello and the music world has listened.

He leaves a son, Rolf A. Schroeder, Boston architect; two daughters, Hedwig Schroeder, teacher at the New England Conservatory of Music, and Mrs. Elfriede Hamblin of Brookline.

Noted Musician Who Died Yesterday

HER - OCT 18



ALWIN SCHROEDER

MR KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS DOUBLE-BASS

M Casadesus With Viola d'Amore Cooperates

GLOBE — OCT 18

At Symphony Hall last evening Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared before a very large and fashionable audience once again in the role of virtuoso of the double-bass. It is almost exactly a year since his first revelation to a Boston audience of the unexpected potentialities of the double-bass as a solo instrument, and of his own remarkable powers to display them. The size and the plauditory enthusiasm of last evening's throng indicated unmistakably that last year's impression had been a durable as well as a favorable one.

Having already familiarized an audience here with the beauty of the tones which skill may evoke from his chosen instrument, he elected at this recital to introduce to his hearers some very beautiful chamber music of the 18th century. In this Mr Koussevitzky had the cooperation—and probably the counsel—of M Henri Casadesus, eminent performer upon the viola d'amore and authority upon ancient music. M Bernard Zighera of the Boston Symphony assisted excellently at the pianoforte.

A "Symphonie Concertante" by Lorenziti, having three contrasted movements, brought the three artists together upon the platform and inspired a sensitive and spirited ensemble to which Mr Koussevitzky's delicately self-effacing playing contributed notably. The slightly clangorous brightness of the viola d'amore blended happily with the rich but characteristically reedy tones of the double-bass to produce a resonance exquisitely suited to the old world charm of this delightful music, to the sparkling exuberance of its first and last movements and the sweet dignity of the intervening Largo. In Borghi's Third Sonata, whose final Gigue had to be repeated, M Koussevitzky and Casadesus again joined forces, but without the piano's aid. In a "Petite Suite" for viola d'amore, beautiful in itself and providing an interesting vehicle for the instrument, M Casadesus showed himself the accomplished player and sensitive musician.

Mr Koussevitzky took the center of the platform as composer and as virtuoso in his concerto for double-bass, for which the composer himself would probably not claim first rank importance, but which provides for the performer the utmost variety of opportunity to display his almost miraculous gifts of agility, of delicate cantabile—now so soft as to be all but inaudible, now warmly sonorous—and of dramatic effect. A final group of short pieces contributed to the same end. One apparent fault alone stood out, a frequently excessive glissando in progressing from note to note. But this was not enough to blunt the edge of the pleasure which the audience had received from a most exceptional concert.

There were floral tributes to both the principal performers.

MUSIC

KOUSSEVITZKY RECITAL

By PHILIP HALE

Serge Koussevitzky, double-bass, assisted by Henri Casadesus, viola d'amore; Bernard Zighera, accompanist, gave a concert in Symphony hall last night. The program was as follows: Lorenziti, Symphonie Concertante for viola d'amore and double bass. Koussevitzky, Concerto for double bass. Borghi, Sonata, No. 3, for viola d'amore and double bass. Lorenziti, Petite Suite for viola d'amore. For double bass solo: Eccles, Largo from Sonata in G minor; Beethoven, Minuet; Laska, Berceuse; Koussevitzky, Valse Miniature.

An enthusiastic audience that filled the hall heard old and beautiful music beautifully played. It would be interesting to know how much editors and instrumentalists have done to compositions by Lorenziti and Borghi; whether this music in its original and naked form would have today the same charm; whether the "revision" has been strictly in keeping with the spirit of the 18th century. Hans von Buelow took all manner of impertinent liberties with the sonatas of Scarlatti. Modern music has suffered from editors. Rimsky-Korsakov's sandpapering and polishing of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" is an instance of an editor's willingness to improve a work, to correct original ideas which seemed to him crudities or errors in musical grammar. Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" has been maltreated within recent years.

Whether there were textual emendations in the ancient music performed last night was a question not asked by those who were quick in response to the emotional simplicity of the slow movements; music that was spiritual in its serenity, its purity; music that came as from the air and returned there, as Hazlitt said of melodies by Mozart. The lively pages were not mere chatter, mere notes to test the technical agility of a virtuoso; these pages required a virtuoso to bring forward what was in and behind the printed page, but a virtuoso in the higher and nobler sense.

The fine art of Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Casadesus had already been fully appreciated by the Boston public as by the public in European cities. Last night this art was again recognized: a technical ease that was at times surprising in the conquest of difficulties; an ease that led the layman only to enjoyment of the music itself; phrasing that seemed inevitable; the dash that vitalized quick passages that otherwise might have been regarded as mere padding; above all, the poetic spirit which found expression in ravishing euphony of tone.

These accomplished artists were not fulfilling a set task; they played as if for their own pleasure, realizing that their pleasure would be shared by the rapt hearers. While one marvelled at Mr. Koussevitzky's mastery of the double-bass, the manner in which he sang a melody, the dominant thought was not of the instrument itself but of the music that Mr. Koussevitzky brought from it. His Concerto, written no doubt, to suit his uncommon technic, is more than a parade piece. His little Valse, while it is frankly salon music, has individuality.

Lorenziti's Largo and the Sonata by Borghi will long be remembered, for the music itself and for the perfection of the performance. Did the composers ever think that their names would be gratefully remembered in the 20th century? Could they have dreamed that their music would be so admirably performed?

Rubin Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody" will be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. The thematic material is derived from "Spirituals." The rhapsody was composed in 1921-22 and performed for the first time by the Philharmonic Society of New York in 1923. It has been performed by other orchestras in this country and it was played recently in London. HER Oct 18

The other pieces to be conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky are a symphony, "The Surprise," by Haydn and the symphony by Cesar Franck.

The program of next week comprises Prokofieff's Classical Symphony; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Pick-Mangiagalli's Introduction and Fugue, and Brahms's Symphony No. 2.

Programs to Hand

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of Oct. 26 and 27, the last before the orchestra's first journey of the season: TRANS OCT 19

Classical Symphony ..... Prokofiev
Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, 'The Afternoon of A Faun ..... Debussy
Partita ..... Kondraczi
(New: First Times)
Symphony, No. 2, in D major ..... Brahms

From Mr. Horowitz for his concert of piano-pieces in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening with sundry changes from earlier announcements:

T[illegible] C major .....

Virtuoso to Conductor

MONITOR — OCT 20

By L. A. SLOPER

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY reappeared this week in the rôle of contrabass player as well as orchestral conductor. Interest ran high in his recital, which in a sense might be called his first public appearance in America as doublebass virtuoso; since the occasion which drew him to play at Brown University was quite private, and his concert of last season, which was for a charitable purpose, was open to the public only at very high prices.

In Symphony Hall on the evening of Oct. 17, he was heard at usual recital prices in a program in which he was assisted by Henri Casadésus, performer on the viola d'amore. Together they played a "Symphonie Concertante" by Lorenziti and a Sonata of Borghi. M. Casadésus played a "Little Suite" by Lorenziti for viola d'amore, and Mr. Koussevitzky played his own Double-bass Concerto and a group of short solo numbers.

The impression made at last year's recital by Mr. Koussevitzky was renewed at this one. His astonishing technique was devoted to musical purposes, not to display. In the ensemble pieces, the voice of his instrument was always held to its proportional value. His full-bodied, vibrant tone, his tasteful phrasing, his architectural sense, above all, his poetic imagination, profoundly stirred the large audience whose applause was spontaneous, general and long-continued.

M. Casadésus Appreciated

Nor was M. Casadésus less appreciated. The founder of the Société des Instruments Anciens is no stranger in Boston. His collection of old instruments now rests in Symphony Hall. He appeared as soloist with the orchestra last season, and had previously been heard with his organization in chamber concerts. Not only his virtuosity, but his modesty and his musicianship made him on the present occasion a full member of a partnership whose pleasure in their music was as evident as that of their listeners. Mr. Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Orchestra, deserves a word for his discreet piano accompaniments.

In fine, this concert afforded one of those opportunities that come not too often of hearing pure music devotedly as well as expertly performed. It is a pity that Mr. Koussevitzky's duties as conductor prevent him from appearing oftener as solo player. In a remarkably vivi interview with Rena Gardner, printe recently in the Boston Herald, th conductor was enabled to present the case of the hard-working artist, in sharp contrast to that of the ease-loving critic. "This delicate subject causes Mr. Koussevitzky to quiver. 'The poor artiste work, he work, he work!' clasping his iron-gray head with a gesture of profound fatigue. 'He play!' sawing passionately at an imaginary bass viol —'He practice late at night, he rehearse, he have not sleep!'"

But then the critic! "'It is fine morning. He choose his tie, his handkerchief, he say, "Ha, hum, I must go criticize!" He listen, he has never heard that piece before, he hear it once, and the next day, "This piece was very bad," or, "This piece was so-and-so."'"

The Symphony Concert

That is probably the world's best statement of the ancient complaint of artist against critic. It is touching; it makes one hesitate to say that no doubt it was the extra work of the recital that caused Mr. Koussevitzky to lead off his program for the week's symphony concerts with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony. But it would be a mistake to conclude that he gave the symphony a perfunctory reading. That would be a feat very difficult for Mr. Koussevitzky to accomplish. He cannot help giving himself to what he does. Although, with this orchestra of drilled experts, in this transparent music, he did not find it necessary to use great physical exertion, the results of his training were evident. Because the music is transparent, it is likely to betray shortcomings. But the performance yesterday was limpid and beautifully balanced. The agreeable little surprise was carefully prepared, and was not over-stressed when it arrived. The Finale was taken briskly and indefectibly.

The position of honor on the program was occupied by Rubin Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody," heard for the first time in Boston, with the composer present to acknowledge the applause. This composition, based on tunes of Negro folk character, is vividly and effectively scored for a large orchestra. It contains nothing to distress, in this second quarter of the twentieth century, those who deplore the course taken by music since the third quarter of the nineteenth.

We were made familiar two years ago with Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Franck Symphony. Some complained at that time that he had deprived it of its grandeur. Fortunately he had. Too long had we sat reverently before this masterpiece. The banality of some of its material was becoming too evident. There was once an exponent of the less reputable press who used to lecture on the subject, "Yellow Versus Colorless Journalism." Without becoming "yellow," Mr. Koussevitzky is never colorless in his readings. This symphony, which was in danger of becoming dull, he has revitalized and dramatized. The audience yesterday rewarded him by lingering to applaud until the men were called to their feet for the third time in the afternoon.

RHAPSODY B GOLDMARK A SYMPHONY

AMER — OCT 20

By MOSES SMITH

Serge Koussevitzky pays es homage this season to Ameri music, for the novelty on this wee program of Symphony concerts "A Negro Rhapsody" by Ru Goldmark, New York composer. piece was first played in New Y five years ago, and received its f Boston hearing yesterday aftern at Symphony Hall.

It is a far cry from the ul modernist music to this score of own time and country. Goldm bases his Rhapsody on negro f tunes, after the manner of his mer teacher, Anton Dvorak, more frankly. The harmonic idi is comparatively gentle. Once th things are said, however, the con sition remains a work of origina The thematic material, parts which are original, is handled w expert skill, and the orchestratio worthy a master. Goldmark his own way among the conflict tendencies of music today.

Following a colorful performa the Rhapsody was enthusiastic applauded, the composer being p ent to receive his share of tribute. The balance of the con was equally brilliant, and it something in the nature of a f day for Mr. Koussevitzky and men. The opening number, Hayd "Surprise" Symphony, was given exquisite performance.

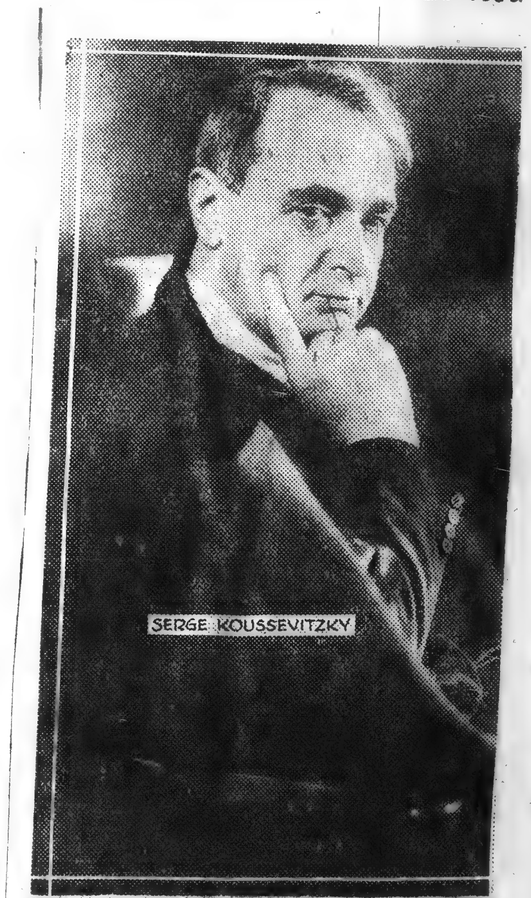
Only to the exceedingly s tempo of the adagio introductior the first movement could one t exception. Otherwise the choic tempo, notably in the second m ment, was happy. Mr. Koussevit used the full string section for delicate music, but the performa was not thereby thickened.

Cesar Franck's Symphony clo the program. Mr. Koussevitz dramatic interpretation of masterpiece was already familia listeners of previous seasons, yesterday's rendition went to very limit of drama, perhaps e occasionally descended into atricalism. But on the whole performance in this piece, as in whole concert, was a joy to hearer.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

The Wor

as viewe



Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Bo 29 to the Eastman Theater, and Guy Mare concert

(First tim[illegible] in Co[illegible]bus)

14

Symphony

Two Symphonies With Spirituals Placed Between

Mr. Koussevitzky Proffers a Native Rhapsodist, Haydn and Franck

1 RANS — Oct 20

SIGNS of the times are evident in Mr. Koussevitzky's programs for the Symphony Concerts. They could be read in the list of pieces yesterday afternoon. They are plain upon the list proposed for next week. The first journey of the orchestra in the current season draws near. Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Pittsburgh are included cities. Numbers pleasing to those communities, displayful also of conductor and band, should be made ready. . . . It is also the outset of the symphonic year nearer home. An "active" repertory must be reconstituted, available not only in Boston, Cambridge and New York, but serviceable likewise for chance occasions. Hence, possibly, Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, and Franck's as well, on yesterday's program. Hence, with equal reason, Prokofiev's Classical Symphony and Brahms's in D major for next Friday and Saturday. All of which is to say that these are the inevitable weeks of preliminary paces, offset, it is true, by so fresh and stimulating a program as that of last week and by the stately list, less the intrusive Hindemith, for autumnal beginning.

These repertory programs—as it is not unfair to call them—serve a further purpose, creditable to the conductor's tact. The larger part of the symphonic public hears gladly these familiar pieces. Yesterday, though the performance was hardly remarkable, it clapped and clapped again over Haydn's agreeable little Symphony. It was as content with Franck's and in far less numbers than usual disposed to regard a symphonic finale as an exit march. Add the middle piece—Mr. Rubin Goldmark's "Negro Rhapsody"—written with dutiful regard for most of the conservatisms, teeming with obvious, familiar melodies—and the delights of the day were full rounded for most that received them. A week on and they will take like pleasure in the light fingers and the quick wit of Prokofiev through his Classical Symphony; while only to churlish reviewers—the outcasts of the occasion—will it occur that the conductor administered Brahms plentifully last season and might reasonably give hearers respite as he then did from Beethoven. Mr. Koussevitzky, however, is wise with the wisdom of the children of light. Before long, he will be leading forth his modernists. He has, it is said, a stable full of them, all "r'aring to go." The incurious and the conservative will give signs of resentment. "But I must balance the programs," the conductor might reply courteously, running a finger down his present lists. "After these classics, the moderns as well."

None the less there are other symphonies of Haydn that would have given equal pleasure with the little "surprise"; that are seldom, or maybe never, heard at Symphony Hall. He wrote abundantly; from his "collected works" custom has chosen this and that; to the upper shelf, where busy conductors seldom look, relegated the rest. By many proofs Mr. Koussevitzky can be delver and discoverer in eighteenth century music. Most creditable "finds" have been his reward. They are also possible among Haydn's Symphonies. Sometimes he wrote them out of his graver moods, with an invention, imagination, device, that drew nearer to his loftier contemporaries and curiously anticipated these latter days. There are slow movements in which he sings as one under reflective emotion; first movements in which he does more than weave skilful, pleasing patterns; pages upon which he is craftsman with "surprises" rather more subtle, certainly more unexpected, than the dividing chords of yesterday's Symphony. Not always was he court-musician to serene Esterházy highnesses, purveyor to fashionable concerts in Paris and London.

Too often for his own good, Papa Haydn—cocked hat under his arm, smile on his face, playful piper in the symphonic choir—patters down the centuries. In the "Surprise" Symphony the play with the theme and variations of the slow movement is neat and amusing, drum-taps, tutti and the rest. The Finale twinkles out a pleasing tune, runs at a gay pace. The Minuet is a Minuet, and there were scores of them, written almost hourly, in Haydn's Vienna. The first movement unfolds and decorates an easy-going design. In short, Haydn fanciful, skilful and merry, ministering comfortably to his public—not the Haydn who spans deeper, bolder, richer, even to this day, to heart and hand joining also a mind. Nor did the performance trip too lightly and gracefully along the pleasant hills and valleys of the music. A sultry summer day, dripping into autumn, does not clarify strings or put conductors to their full mettle.

The times are not too favorable to the once celebrated Symphony of Franck. Nowadays most of us are not so sure as were his devoted followers thirty years ago that he speaks with the tongues of men and of angels. "Father Franck," as they called him—it was rather a paternal conceit—wrote out of an innocent mind and an aspiring heart. Innocence has gone out of the fashion in this third decade of the twentieth century. When we aspire we look around the earth rather than imitate his heavenward glance up from the organloft in the Gothic arches of Saint Clotilda's church. We thrust through rather than grope as did he. When we have found our way and made our affirmations, it is not in us to be so honestly joyous and full-throated. (What is that doubt we are muttering under our breaths?) Besides, the Franckian way of making a symphony—"cyclic" progress and the like—no longer irritates or pleasures us. By this time "Franck in D minor" has become rather an institution.

It is even within belief that the conductors suspect—if they are as ambitious as Mr. Koussevitzky—that something ought to be done. For his part, the Russian releases his own temperament and sets to "le bon père" as though he were half-brother or at least first cousin, to Peter Iltych Chaikovsky. He wrings the last expressive drop from the pervasive and songful theme of the first movement; sends it up-soaring upon proclaiming strings and deepening winds. Over the second division he distributes sentiment, sweetness and light with Russian flavors unmistakable. The Finale ascends in pomps and splendors. Franck is sonorous and Mr. Koussevitzky loves sonorities. Give both the brass choir of the Boston Orchestra—above all, Mr. Böttcher and his fellow-horns—and Rimsky-Korsakov, hearing, would have embraced conductor and composer. The devotées say that Franck was a universal genius. In Symphony Hall, at any rate, he can wear a Chaikovskian mantle and achieve a Korsakovian apotheosis. All things to all men said the Apostle—even Franck à la Russe.

Out of five Negro Spirituals, each, by this time more or less familiar, plus a work-song heard in Tennessee, Mr. Goldmark made his "Negro Rhapsody." He sets forth his basic matter unmistakably. As the piece proceeds it returns as easy to recognize as the neighbor next door. He makes play with sundry counter-subjects and the ear remains quite sure that the Spirituals have the better voice. He leads them along an harmonic and an instrumental course. full-voiced, warmly clad in the orthodox fashion of the nineteen-tens. Intent upon them, the hearer begins to believe them capable, like Voltaire's Habakuk, of all things. The other evening they figured in an American review. Yesterday they furnished forth a symphonic Rhapsody. In three weeks Mr. Hayes will be singing them with a poignant simplicity; a fortnight more and a Negro Choir will give them camp-meeting voice. And through all these migrations they will remain spontaneous song and lay hold upon the white folks' ears and imaginations.

These Spirituals, and nothing else, are the source of the long and wide vogue of Mr. Goldmark's Rhapsody. They have carried it to Europe as well as through these United States—music of the Afro-American soil. Twenty, fifty, composers prevail in these days by their workmanship. Mr. Goldmark prevails by his subject-matter. For he is no Kodály adding another imagination to folk-music, sharpening, intensifying, enriching, even as he assimilates. Transfer and exhibition over a symphonic counter, well arranged and lighted, are Mr. Goldmark's all. . . . The good gray composer rose from his place to acknowledge hearty, honest plaudits. Over his shoulders, to half an imaginative eye, black faces were peering, black lips moving.

H. T. P.

Copley-Plaza, Edith Mason, soprano of the Chicago Civic Opera Company, will be heard in the first of the series of recitals being sponsored by Mme. Amelia Conti. Two operatic arias and songs, chiefly of this and the previous century, makes her programme.

* * * *

This evening at the Boston Public Library Mme. Alice Baschi and assisting artists will present an operatic and ballad recital that is open to the public without charge.

1285 Oct 24

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Yet another composer, and one wholly unknown hereabouts, will be introduced by Mr. Koussevitzky to the audiences of the Symphony Concerts this Friday and Saturday when a Partita by the young Pole Michal Kondraczki receives its first American performance. The "Classical Symphony" of Prokofieff, the Second Symphony of Brahms and Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" are the other pieces announced.

* * * *

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

Monday evening at Jordan Hall, Nicholai Kassman, violinist heard here last season, will play, with Samuel

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

Serge Koussevitzky

Who gives his first double-bass recital here Tuesday night in Carnegie Hall

COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Great "Boston" 11 Days Hence

Oct 21

Boston has placed its indelible stamp of approval on Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra. This is revealed in press criticisms of the Boston's first concert this season, hardly a fortnight ago, in Symphony hall at Boston.

Koussevitzky and his orchestra will open the Symphony club series in Columbus with a performance in Memorial hall Thursday evening, Nov. 1.

When the famous Russian conductor stepped out upon the stage for the first concert he was greeted with a long ovation from a standing audience and orchestra, according to an account in the Boston Globe.

The Boston music critics described the occasion in the newspapers in the following manner:

Penfield Roberts, in the Boston Globe—"There is no doubt that this season will be among the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history. The Boston Symphony remains an orchestra unsurpassed by any other in the world in the number of first-rate players it contains. Not a half a dozen bands can compare with it."

Philip Hale, in the Boston Herald—"The season opened brilliantly. In former years it was the custom to say of the first concert that the players would no doubt soon recover from the enforced rest and a few more rehearsals would restore the euphony, plasticity and technical proficiency which had made the orchestra famous. Yesterday's performance did not call for this time honored observation.

"It is our own belief that if Debussy could have heard his 'Festivals' yesterday he would have gone on the platform and, in the face of the public, embraced Mr. Koussevitzky."

The box office sale of tickets for the Boston concert as well as for the entire series, will open Monday morning at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets. Other symphonies in the series are the Cincinnati, Fritz Reiner directing, Dec. 3; the Cleveland, under Nikolai Sokoloff, Feb. 4, and the Detroit, with Victor Kolar at the helm, on March 4.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr Koussevitzky, is to give Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for the benefit of its pension fund Nov 18. The chorus will, as usual, be the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr Davison. The Harvard Glee Club will also assist the Symphony later in the season at the first Boston performances of Bloch's prize-winning symphony, "America," and in a scene from Wagner's "Parsifal." Gossip also speaks of a contemplated performance of Bach's B minor Mass, news especially welcome since that masterpiece has not been heard here within the memory of the younger generation. The Harvard Glee Club is to give its usual annual series at Symphony Hall. Oct 21

REDUCTION

RATIO

17x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

INFORMATION OBSCURED

N.Y. MUSICAL COURIER
OCT 24
By OLIN DOWNES.

Recital by Koussevitzky.

Serge Koussevitzky is evidently one of the musicians and men who would accomplish brilliant things, whatever they set out to do. Until last night the public of New York knew him only as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He first appeared here in that capacity Nov. 27, 1924—and as one of the most interesting figures among the virtuoso leaders of the day. But long before Mr. Koussevitzky was a conductor he was one of the three greatest players of the double-bass that the world has known. The other two were Dragonetti (1768-1846) and Bottesini (1822-1889). Ad. Hartmann, Anton Mueller (1810-1847), was a well known but secondary figure. To all records, computations, authorities and the evidence of yesterday evening, when Mr. Koussevitzky gave his first New York recital on the double-bass in Carnegie Hall, he is fully the equal of his celebrated predecessors, although his phenomenal accomplishments on the bass viol—an instrument that he was obliged to study through lack of circumstances in his youth—have been only the prelude to his achievements with the orchestra.

Years before Koussevitzky was spoken of as a conductorial possibility for America there were repeated rumors of his engagement for a tour of the United States as a virtuoso of the bass viol. There came to nothing, although Mr. Koussevitzky had toured Europe and made an international reputation for himself as a solo performer before 1900. Born in 1854, he commenced the study of the double-bass at the age of 14. In a phenomenally short time he had mastered the customary technic of the instrument and looking for fresh fields of technic and interpretation to conquer. He has done more than become one of the brilliant players of his generation, he has apparently added to the acknowledged resources of the double-bass those of the 'cello or even the higher pitched string instruments. Best of all, these technical accomplishments are at the service of the qualities of a great musician.

Mr. Koussevitzky was assisted last night by Henri Casadesus, player of the viola d'amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, pianist. The program consisted of A. Lorenzi's "Symphonic Concertante" for viola d'amore and double-bass; Koussevitzky's concerto for double-bass; L. Borghi's Third Sonata for viola d'amore and double-bass; Lorenziti's "Petite Suite for viola d'amore, and smaller pieces in arrangement for double-bass—the Largo from H. Eccles's 'cello sonata in G minor; a minuet, arranged from the original piano piece of Beethoven; G. Lasca's Berceuse and Koussevitzky's "Valse Miniature."

At first, when Lorenziti's symphonic Concertante was sounded, the dominating impression was of music too slight and an instrumental tone no large enough to fill an immense hall. Mr. Koussevitzky's tone was carefully controlled until he had opportunity, in other music, to reveal its sonorous possibilities. Then it was evident that he had been most carefully adjusting his style to the demands of the old music, which, like everything else on the program, was played with the most gratifying finish, taste and high musicianship. It might not be well to inquire too closely in regard to the absolute authenticity of every note, phrase and expression mark in these old pieces, revived with the cooperation of Mr. Casadesus. Let it be sufficient here to remark that the latter gentleman is a very accomplished performer on the viola d'amore and that he and Mr. Koussevitzky fairly matched tone and styles.

Came Mr. Koussevitzky as soloist and composer. His concerto is well written, very much better written than one might have expected of a piece which is avowedly a virtuoso's vehicle. But this piece is form and coherency and clearly stated ideas. As soon as Mr. Koussevitzky played his opening phrase, he had commanded the attention of the audience. Thereafter the listener surrendered himself to an astonishing exhibition. Everything the double-bass is supposed to do, and many things it was not expected to do, were brought to pass, and this without the suggestion of ostentation or technical gymnastics, but purely as an integral part of the musical expression.

Mr. Koussevitzky uses an Amati double bass, which is not as large as the instrument customarily used in the orchestra. He also tunes his strings higher than the accepted tuning of the double bass for the sake of clarity and brilliancy of effect.

It was probably inevitable, with this special treatment of the double-bass, which has very little solo music in its repertory, that the soloist should eke out his program with some compositions never intended for the double-bass, and bearing too obviously the mark of gratuitous arrangement. It is also true that the further he departed from the double-bass style and literature, the more the audience applauded his efforts.

The unaccompanied sonata of L. Borghi for viola d'amore and double-bass was the best in point of musical value of the concerted numbers and it was played with the finest art by both performers. It was repeatedly a cause of fresh wonder to observe how Mr. Koussevitzky matched the tone of his immense instrument with that of the delicate old aristocrat of the string family, the viola d'amore. Mr. Casadesus gave a solo performance of Lorenziti's Petite Suite, a performance of excelling finish and expression. A ditty which he played as encore, with occasional banjo effects, enlisted the immense enthusiasm of the audience.

Mr. Koussevitzky was compelled to add to the program. The audience was loath to let him go. Those who have not heard him have probably little conception of what the double-bass can become in the hands of a master. In other hands, of course, it remains an element of instrumental ensembles. A man of genius last night gave it momentarily a great significance.

Incidents and Prospects TRANS OCT 25

Mr. Koussevitzky purposed to play a piece by the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, at the Symphony Concerts this week—and discovered that the orchestral parts were unobtainable on this side of the Atlantic. Next he turned to a Partita by the Pole, Kondraczki—and the parts required so many corrections that performance on Friday and Saturday was impossible. Now he has pitched upon "Feerique," or "Faerie," imaginative exercise in tones by the Parisian Ibert. At present it still stands. [illegible]

Bass Fiddles Hold Musical Spotlight

The ancient and honorable order of bass fiddles moved to the center of the musical arena last night and enjoyed the dazzling glare of the spotlight at Carnegie Hall last night.

The contra bass left its accustomed place in the back of the orchestra and took the solo position, in the arms of the conductor himself, the pride of staid Boston's honored symphony—Serge Koussevitzky.

In the imagination of those who listened, pages of history turned back and as Henri Casadesus with the viola d'amore, played to the double-bass of Koussevitzky and the piano of Pierre Luboshutz, we knew that our great-grandparents and their grandparents had experienced. That Rondo! Dear readers, it had the spell of long-forgotten incarnate memories wrapped in it. It had something of the roughness of an old dress, and yet was sweet and fragrant and elusive.

Elusiveness was the chief quality of this program. It was realized at the opening notes of the Lorenzi Symphonic Concertante. It grew on the audience, as the moments progressed. There was a vague and haunting mystery to it all.

Well can I understand the love which Koussevitzky held for his instrument, which he caresses to wave the baton. And well can we understand the fame which he knew as virtuoso.

V.Y. TELEGRAPH
Full range of tone OCT 24

... giant was as a violin in his hands; it whispered as well as thundered. It exceeded itself, and it did unbelievable things, yet it never went outside its province. Thank the good taste of a great artist that, with all his powers, he never once asked the instrument to do a single "trick" or perform for the crowds. He never demanded that it be other than itself. Consequently there was the realization that such a recital is really no, for general consumption or frequent consumption, perhaps. The voice of the bass violin was given many colors, within its own spectrum.

The artist knew no bounds. His technique was tremendous; he played as a violinist would do. He even brought us harmoniques, which drew overtones, way above the ordinary range. We delighted in Koussevitzky's own Concerto. It was of the bass and for the bass.

Praise is due that indefatigable laborer for the redemption of ancient instruments, M. Casadesus, who came over from Paris for this concert. Pierre Luboshutz shared in the applause as well he deserved to do.

The program included further, Borghi's Third Sonata for Viola d'Amore, and double bass; and Lorenziti's "Petite Suite" for d'Amore, and a group of little numbers transposed and written for the bass violin.

NOTES and LINES

HER By PHILIP HALE OCT 25

There have been two changes in the program of the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday this week. An Introduction and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli was announced for performance. This was put aside because the orchestral parts did not arrive in time. It was said that a Partita by Kondraczki, a young composer born in the Ukraine region, now living in Paris, would be substituted. For some reason or other the performance of this Suite has been postponed. Ibert's "Feerique" for orchestra will be played for the first time in Boston, if not for the first time in this country. The first performance was in Paris three years ago. The other number on the program are Prokofieff's pretty little "Classical" symphony; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the Symphony in D major (No. 2) by our old and ever revered friend, Johannes Brahms.

The orchestra next week will give concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. The next concerts in Boston will be on Nov 9 and 10.

Mr. Sanromá, schooled as pianist in Boston, was heard in a concert of his own at Berlin ten days ago. He played pieces by the eighteenth-century Soler, Beethoven, Schumann, Albeniz, Honegger. In the course of the season he will return to Boston to play the Concerto of Toch—witty and newly risen German—with the Symphony Orchestra.

TRANS Amusements OCT 26

Paris-Boston

THE STORY of the "novelty" at this week's Symphony Concerts is one of kaleidoscopic change. First an Introduction and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli was announced. But publishers sent word that the parts were not to be had in this country. Then a Partita by Kondraczki was substituted. The first reading at Monday's rehearsal proved that the youthful composer, inexperienced in practical matters, had relied too much upon his copyist. Thickets abounded in such numbers in both score and parts that the learned doctors at Symphony Hall whose duty it is to mend such matters found the task too great to be accomplished in the available time during the current week. The last word is that "Féerique," by Jacques Ibert, will fill the gap. Monsieur Ibert is by no means new to Symphony Hall. In seasons past Mr. Koussevitzky has favored him.

"Féerique" was written in 1924, published by Leduc in 1925, received first performance from the Colonne Orchestra under Gabriel Pierné, Dec. 6, 1925. It is slight both in structure and content. The composer describes it as a "choreographic scherzo built on a single theme, in which the title is justified by the general atmosphere." It begins with ethereal chords, high in divided strings. An oboe sings a cantilena of lovely contour, the single theme of the piece. Other instruments in turn take it up. The speed increases, an active rhythmical design enters, the mood becomes agitated. Quiet is restored, a muted violin solo completes with its theme. A short ending of the apotheosis type soon follows. One feature, after the first performance, found the music "too precious." Another, Paul Bertrand, contributed to the Paris Mercure these informative paragraphs:

TRANS OCT 25

M. Jacques Ibert is a musician of great delicacy, considerable finesse, and rare facility. A musician who has shown a singular sureness of touch in his various symphonic works. All this together with a gift toward the precious and toward subtlety as a colorist. "Féerique" confirms this impression, but without displaying as yet that harmonic evolution in this remarkable artist which one had hoped for. The composer informs us that his work has no literary program or commentary, that everything occurs in a purely imaginary realm, the realm of sounds, rhythms, timbres. This purely symphonic work may be classed neither as a symphony, for the symphony even in its freest form is nevertheless subject to certain architectural principles, nor as a symphonic poem, which always rests upon the basis of a program. A theme of pastoral character runs through the entire piece. This theme undergoes such a variety of transformations that its appearances are often rather vague. The work assembles a piquant succession of harmonies in which there is an insistent admixture of polytony. It abounds in studied and singular effects. With an unusual dexterity M. Ibert multiplies matters of detail analogous to those which characterize certain works of M. Ravel, to which "Féerique" is related to the general conception if not by its writing, which is highly personal. But one had hoped for a work from the dexterous composer of "Escales" that would be both ampler and more significant.

H. M.

In Turn New York

15

Enter, Koussevitzky

SHORTLY before an audience of celebrities and a few others crowded streaming down the aisles of Carnegie Hall, Tuesday night, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, unchaperoned by his Boston Symphony Orchestra, walked a bit nervously across the stage and took his place to windward of an accompanist's grand piano. Behind him came a white-robed attendant, bearing one of those big instruments that had never in our recollection been played in recital within these faint ancient walls. There was no less august a vehicle of music than a double-bass—the double-bass of the greatest living virtuoso upon that gargantuan fiddle. Mr. Koussevitzky was companioned for his opening number (and one other), by Mr. Henri Casadesus, distinguished specialist in old instruments and old music, on this occasion presented as player of the viola d'amore. [Lawrence Gilman, Herald Tribune

The program consisted of A. Lorenzi's "Symphonic Concertante" for viola d'amore and double-bass; Koussevitzky's concerto for double-bass; L. Borghi's Third Sonata for viola d'amore and double-bass; Lorenziti's Petite Suite for viola d'amore, and smaller pieces in arrangement for double-bass—the Largo from H. Eccles's 'cello sonata in G minor; a minuet, arranged from the original piano piece of Beethoven; G. Lasca's "Berceuse and Koussevitzky's "Valse Miniature." [Olin Downes, Times

Tempered Praise TRANS OCT 25

The double bass is not a solo instrument. So, at least, consent an authority as Grove's Dictionary establishes that. The amazing performances of Domenico Dragonetti and Giovanni Bottesini in the last century were merely the exceptions that prove the rule. Besides, Bottesini used the bass as di canera, which is not the full-sized orchestral double bass. Therefore, when Serge Koussevitzky came to Carnegie Hall in the role of recital contrabassist, possessed of an instrument that yielded nothing in bulk to those that provide an undertone for his Boston Symphony, he was presentified to clinch the case for the writer in Greece. He did so, by providing another exception after the fashion of Dragonetti and Bottesini. One was reminded of what Spontini said to Wagner: he had done better than he could do. Without a solo instrument, the Boston conductor supplied the most astonishing solo playing. His double-bass was not for such purposes; it merely achieved them like the violin of Fritz Kreisler or the cello of Pablo Casals. [Oscar Thompson, Post

Mr. Koussevitzky was content with a conventional bass of moderate size and having four strings, of which the upper two did the major portion of the work. He played with a bow such as all our orchestral players formerly used, called the "underhand" bow, and not the cello type adopted by the Parisian bass players about 1830. But his bowing was entirely free from the "ripping" effect observed in old fashioned bass playing. It was suave and elegant and caressed the strings so that they responded with their loveliest tonal secrets. [W. J. Henderson, Sun

He tunes his strings higher than the accepted tuning of the double bass for the sake of clarity and brilliancy of effect. It was probably inevitable, with this special treatment of the double-bass, which has very little solo music in its repertory, that the soloist should eke out his program with some compositions never intended for the double-bass, and bearing too obviously the mark of gratuitous arrangement. It is also true that the further he departed from the double-bass style and literature, the more the audience applauded his efforts. [Olin Downes

STAGE and STUDIO

Columbus Dispatch OCT 25

THE Columbus season of symphonies, that field in which music is most amazing, tremendous in its magnitude and awe-inspiring in its profundity, will open Thursday at 8:15 p. m. in Memorial hall with a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. TRANS OCT 25

It is not a mere publicity ballyhoo to say that Columbus is mighty fortunate in having as its guests the Boston and its celebrated Koussevitzky. In the first place, Columbus is only one of five cities outside of Boston and New York which will hear the great band this season. And, secondly, it is an orchestra with a conductor selected by such writers as Olin Downes of the New York Times and Arthur M. Abell of the Musical Courier as a symphony and leader without peers.

Another good reason for hearing the Boston is that Koussevitzky has arranged what is without a doubt the most remarkable program of music to be played by an orchestra in central Ohio.

PROKOFIEFF NOVELTY.

Particularly outstanding is the program in that two of the numbers have never been played in Columbus and only a few times in America. These are the "Classical Symphony" by Prokoieff and the orchestral excerpts from the second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite by Ravel.

Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, with its four movements comprising the entire [illegible] [illegible] ...ensemble of music lovers [illegible] ...TERRIBLE [illegible] ...the Good [illegible] ...defiant [illegible] ...ssian music [illegible] ...level Symphon[illegible] ...time bring hi[illegible] ...symphonies.

Babylonia, now in thirty-seven[illegible] Prokofieff composed this little work in 1916-17. Felix Borowski quotes the composer as saying that his "idea in writing this music was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his score."

Of the virtuoso performances by the Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitzky, which are the standing wonder of present day music, nothing has made a more remarkable impression than Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which is on the Columbus program.

Last season when the distinguished French composer, Ravel, landed in America, he went to Carnegie hall, New York, and sat in a box while Koussevitzky and his orchestra surprised him with the homage of a "Ravel program." After this suite in particular, composer, conductor and orchestra were given a tremendous ovation.

A RAVEL MASTERPIECE.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of the tone-painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." This score is probably also his largest canvas and never did he use so broad a brush with such overwhelming effect as in the tumultuous dance which closes this suite.

Space will not permit a lengthy discussion of that awe-inspiring Symphony No. 2 by Johannes Brahms. Felix Weingartner, probably the greatest German critic of his time, in discussing it in his pamphlet of symphonies, says that "the stream of invention has never flowed so fresh and spontaneous in other works by Brahms and nowhere else has he colored his orchestration so successfully." And after a eulogy of the various movements he puts the symphony among the very best of the new classic school since the death of Beethoven and "far above all the symphony of Schumann."

NOTE TO LATE-COMERS.

The program will commence promptly at 8:15 p. m. and all patrons are urged to be in their seats at that time. No one will be seated between movements of a symphony.

The single seat sale for the Boston will not be opened at the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, until Wednesday morning. Until that time season tickets for the entire series, including the Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit orchestras, will be sold exclusively.

LECTURE BY TICHLITER.

Rev. Dr. McIlyar H. Lichliter, pastor of the First Congregational church, Sunday evening will deliver a lecture on the composers and their symponies on the Boston orchestra's program. G. G. Grabill, organist, will play movements from several Brahms symphonies. The lecture begins at 7:30 o'clock.

THE BOSTON PROGRAM.

Following is the Boston's program:

Overture to Leonore No. 3 op. 72 Beethoven
Classical Symphony op. 25 Prokofieff
Allegro
Larghetto
Gavotte
Finale
(First time in Columbus)
Orchestral excerpts from Daphnis and Chloe ballet second suite Ravel
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale
(First time in Columbus)

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

INFORMATION OBSCURED

15

N.Y. MUSIC TIMES
Oct 24

By OLIN DOWNES.

Recital by Koussevitzky.

Serge Koussevitzky is evidently one of the musicians and men who would accomplish brilliant things, whatever they set out to do. Until last night the public of New York knew him only as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—he first appeared here in that capacity Nov. 27, 1924—and as one of the most interesting figures among the virtuoso leaders of the day. But long before Mr. Koussevitzky was a conductor he was one of the three greatest players of the double-bass that the world has known. The other two were Dragonetti (1768-1846) and Bottesini (1822-1889). A fourth, August Mueller (1810-1867), was a well-known but secondary figure. By all records, computations, authorities and the evidence of yesterday evening, when Mr. Koussevitzky gave his first New York recital on the double-bass in Carnegie Hall, he is fully the equal of his celebrated predecessors, although his phenomenal accomplishments on the bass viol—an instrument that he was obliged to study through force of circumstances in his youth—have been only the prelude to his achievements with the orchestra.

Years before Koussevitzky was spoken of as a conductorial possibility for America there were repeated rumors of his engagement for a tour of the United States as a virtuoso of the bass viol. These came to nothing, although Mr. Koussevitzky had toured Europe and made an international reputation for himself as a solo performer before 1900. Born in 1864, he commenced the study of the double-bass at the age of 14. In a phenomenally short time he had mastered the customary technic of the instrument and was looking for fresh fields of technic and interpretation to conquer. He has done more than become one of the brilliant players of his generation, he has apparently added to the acknowledged resources of the double-bass those of the 'cello or even the higher pitched string instruments. Best of all, these technical accomplishments are at the service of the qualities of a great musician.

Mr. Koussevitzky was assisted last night by Henri Casadesus, player of the viola d'amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, pianist. The program consisted of A. Lorenzi's "Symphonic Concertante" for viola d'amore and double-bass; Koussevitzky's concerto for double-bass; L. Borghi's Third Sonato for viola d'amore and double-bass; Lorenziti's "Petite Suite for viola d'amore, and smaller pieces in arrangement for double-bass—the Largo from H. Eccles's 'cello sonato in G minor; a minuet, arranged from the original piano piece of Beethoven; G. Lasca's Berceuse and Koussevitzky's "Valse Miniature."

At first, when Lorenziti's Symphonic Concertante was sounded, the dominating impression was of music too slight and an instrumental tone not large enough to fill an immense hall. Mr. Koussevitzky's tone was carefully controlled until he had opportunity, in other music, to reveal its sonorous possibilities. Then it was evident that he had been most carefully adjusting his style to the demands of the old music, which, like everything else on the program, was played with the most gratifying finish, taste and high musicianship. It might not be well to inquire too closely in regard to the absolute authenticity of every note, phrase and expression mark in these old pieces, revived with the cooperation of Mr. Casadesus. Let it be sufficient here to remark that the latter gentleman is a very accomplished performer on the viola d'amore and that he and Mr. Koussevitzky fairly matched tone and styles.

Came Mr. Koussevitzky as soloist and composer. His concerto is well written, very much better written than one might have expected of a piece which is avowedly a virtuoso's vehicle. But this piece has form and coherency and clearly stated ideas. As soon as Mr. Koussevitzky played his opening phrase, he had commanded the attention of the audience. Thereafter the listener surrendered himself to an astonishing exhibition. Everything the double-bass is supposed to do, and many things it was not expected to do, were brought to pass, and this without the suggestion of ostentation or technical gymnastics, but purely as an integral part of the musical expression. Mr. Koussevitzsky uses an Amati double bass, which is not as large as the instrument customarily used in the orchestra. He also tunes his strings higher than the accepted tuning of the double bass for the sake of clarity and brilliancy of effect.

It was probably inevitable, with this special treatment of the double-bass, which has very little solo music in its repertory, that the soloist should eke out his program with some compositions never intended for the double-bass, and bearing too obviously the mark of gratuitious arrangement. It is also true that the further he departed from the double-bass style and literature, the more the audience applauded his efforts.

The unaccompanied sonata of L. Borghi for viola d'amore and double-bass was the best in point of musical value of the concerted numbers and it was played with the finest art by both performers. It was repeatedly a cause of fresh wonder to observe how Mr. Koussevitzky matched the tone of his immense instrument with that of the delicate old aristocrat of the string family, the viola d'amore. Mr. Casadesus gave a solo performance of Lorenziti's Petite Suite, a performance of excelling finish and expression. A ditty which he played as encore, with occasional banjo effects, enlisted the immense enthusiasm of the audience.

Mr. Koussevitzky was compelled to add to the program. The audience was loath to let him go. Those who have not heard him have probably little conception of what the double-bass can become in the hands of a master. In other hands, of course, it remains an element of instrumental ensembles. A man of genius last night gave it momentarily a great significance.

Incidents and Prospects

TRANS

Mr. Koussevitzky purposed to play a piece by the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, at the Symphony Concerts this week—and discovered that the orchestral parts were unobtainable on this side of the Atlantic. Next he turned to a Partita by the Pole, Kondraczki—and the parts required so many corrections that performance on Friday and Saturday was impossible. Now he has pitched upon "Féerique," or "Faerie," imaginative exercise in tones by the Parisian Ibert. At press-time it still stands.

Oct 24

Bass Fiddles Hold Musical Spotlight

The ancient and honorable order of bass fiddles moved to the center of the musical arena last night and enjoyed the dazzling glare of the spotlight at Carnegie Hall last night.

The contra bass left its accustomed place in the back of the orchestra and took the solo position, in the arms of the conductor himself, the pride of staid Boston's honored symphony—Serge Kousslovitzky.

In the imagination of those who listened, pages of history turned back; and as Henri Casadesus with the viola d'amore, played to the double-bass of Koussevitzky and the piano of Pierre Luboshutz, we knew what our great-grandparents and their grandparents had experienced. That Rondo! Dear readers, it had the spell of long-forgotten incarnate memories wrapped in it. It had something of the roughness of an old dance, and yet was sweet and fragrant and elusive.

Elusiveness was the chief quality of this program. It was realized at the opening notes of the Lorenziti Symphonic Concertante. It grew on the audience, as the moments progressed. There was a vague and haunting mystery to it all.

Well can I understand the love which Koussevitzky holds for his instrument, which he forsook to wave the baton. And well can we understand the fame which he knew as virtuoso.

N.Y. TELEGRAPH
OCT 25

Full Range of Tone.

The giant was as a violin in his hands; it whispered as well as thundered. It exceeded itself, and it did unbelievable things, yet it never went outside its province. Thank the good taste of a great artist that, with all his powers, he never once asked the instrument to do a single "trick" or perform for the crowds. He never demanded that it be other than itself. Consequently there was the realization that such a recital is really no for general consumption or frequent consumption, perhaps. The voice of the bass violin was given many colors, within its own spectrum.

The artist knew no bounds. His technique was tremendous; he played as a violinist would do. He even brought us harmoniques, which drew overtones, way above the ordinary range. We delighted in Koussevitzky's own Concerto. It was of the bass and for the bass.

Praise is due that indefatigable laborer for the redemption of ancient instruments, M. Casadesus, who came over from Paris for this concert, Pierre Luboshutz shared in the applause as well he deserved to do.

The program included further, Borghi's Third Sonata for Viola d'Amore, and double bass; and Lozenziti's "Petite Suite" for d'Amore, and a group of little numbers transposed and written for the bass violin.

NOTES and LINES

HER By PHILIP HALE OCT 25

There have been two changes in the program of the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday this week. An Introduction and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli was announced for performance. This was put aside because the orchestral parts did not arrive in time. It was said that a Partita by Kondracki, a young composer born in the Ukraine region, now living in Paris, would be substituted. For some reason or other the performance of this Suite has been postponed. Ibert's "Feerique" for orchestra will be played for the first time in Boston, if not for the first time in this country. The first performance was in Paris three years ago. The other numbers on the program are Prokoñeff's pretty little "Classical" symphony; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the Symphony in D major (No. 2) by our old and esteemed friend, Johannes Brahms.

The orchestra next week will give concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. The next concerts in Boston will be on Nov. 9 and 10.

Mr. Sanromá, schooled as pianist in Boston, was heard in a concert of his own at Berlin ten days ago. He played pieces by the eighteenth-century Soler, Beethoven, Schumann, Albeniz, Honegger. In the course of the season he will return to Boston to play the Concerto of Toch—witty and newly risen German—with the Symphony Orchestra.

TRANS Amusements Oct 26

Paris-Boston

THE STORY of the "novelty" at this week's Symphony Concerts is one of kaleidoscopic change. First an Introduction and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli was announced. But publishers sent word that the parts were not to be had in this country. Then a Partita by Kondraczki was substituted. The first reading at Monday's rehearsal proved that the youthful composer, inexperienced in practical matters, had relied too much upon his copyist. Mistakes abounded in such numbers in both score and parts that the learned doctors at Symphony Hall whose duty it is to mend such matters found the task too great to be accomplished in the available time during the current week. The last word is that "Féerique," by Jacques Ibert, will fill the gap. Monsieur Ibert is by no means new to Symphony Hall. In seasons past Mr. Koussevitzky has favored him.

"Féerique" was written in 1924, published by Leduc in 1925, received first performance from the Colonne Orchestra under Gabriel Pierné, Dec. 6, 1925. It is slight both in structure and content. The composer describes it is a "choreographic scherzo built on a single theme, in which the title is justified by the general atmosphere." It begins with ethereal chords, high in divided strings. An oboe sings a cantilena of lovely contour—the single theme of the piece. Other instruments in turn take it up. The speed increases, an active rhythmical design enters, the mood becomes agitated. Quiet restored, a muted violin solo continues with the theme. A short ending of the apotheosis type soon follows. One reviewer, after the first performance, found the music "too precious." Another, Paul Bertrand, contributed to the Paris Mènestrei these informative paragraphs:

TRANS OCT 25

M. Jacques Ibert is a musician of great delicacy, considerable finesse, and rare intelligence, a musician who has shown a singular sureness of touch in his various symphonic works. All this together with a gift toward the precious and toward subtlety as a colorist. "Féerique" confirms this impression, but without displaying as yet that harmonic evolution in this remarable artist which one had hoped for. The composer informs us that his work has no literary program or commentary, that everything occurs in a purely imaginary realm the realm of sounds, rhythms, timbres. This purely symphonic work may be classed neither as a symphony, for the symphony even in its freest form is nevertheless subject to certain architectural principles, nor as a symphonic poem, which always rests upon the basis of a program. A theme of pastoral character runs through the entire piece. This theme undergoes such a variety of transformations that its appearances are often rather vague. The work assembles a piquant succession of harmonies in which there is an insistent admixture of polytony. . . . It abounds in studied and singular effects. With an unusual dexterity M. Ibert multiplies matters of detail analogous to those which characterize certain works of M. Ravel, to which "Feerique" is related to the general conception if not by its writing, which is highly personal. But one had hoped for a work from the dexterous composer of "Escales" that would be both ampler and more significant.

A. H. M.

In Turn New York

Enter, Koussevitzky

SHORTLY before an audience of celebrities and a few others ceased streaming down the aisles of Carnegie Hall, Tuesday night, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, unchaperoned by his Boston Symphony Orchestra, walked a bit nervously across the stage and took his place to windward of an accompanist's grand piano. Behind him came a white-gloved attendant, bearing rather gingerly an instrument that had never in our recollection been played in recital within those fairly ancient walls. This was no less august a vehicle of music than a double-bass—the double-bass of the greatest living virtuoso upon that gargantuan fiddle. Mr. Koussevitzky was companioned for his opening number (and one other), by Mr. Henri Casadesus, distinguished specialist in old instruments and old music, on this occasion presented as player of the viola d'amore. [Lawrence Gilman, Herald Tribune.

The program consisted of A. Lorenzi's "Symphonic Concertante" for viola d'amore and double-bass; Koussevitzky's concerto for double-bass; L. Borghi's Third Sonata for viola d'amore and double-bass; Lorenziti's Petite Suite for viola d'amore, and smaller pieces in arrangement for double-bass—the Largo from H. Eccles's 'cello sonata in G minor; a minuet, arranged from the original piano piece of Beethoven; G. Lasca's Berceuse and Koussevitzky's "Valse Miniature." [Olin Downes, Times

Tempered Praise

TRANS OCT 25

The double bass is not a solo instrument. So eminent an authority as Grove's Dictionary establishes that. The amazing performances of Domenico Dragonetti and Giovanni Bottesini in the last century were merely the exceptions that prove the rule. Besides, Bottesini used the basso di camera, which is not the full-sized orchestral double bass. Therefore, when Serge Koussevitzky came to Carnegie Hall in the role of recital contrabassist, possessed of an instrument that yielded nothing in bulk to those that provide an undertone for his Boston Symphony, he was predestined to clinch the case for the writer in Grove. He did so, by providing another exception after the fashion of Dragonetti and Bottesini. One was reminded of what Spontini said to Wagner; he had done better than he could do. Without a solo instrument, the Boston conductor supplied the most astonishing solo playing. His double-bass was not for such purposes; it merely achieved them like the violin of Fritz Kreisler or the cello of Pablo Casals. [Oscar Thompson, Post

Mr. Koussevitzky was content with a conventional bass of moderate size and having four strings, of which the upper two did the major portion of the work. He played with a bow such as all our orchestral players formerly used, called the "underhand" bow, and not the cello type adopted by the Parisian bass players about 1830. But his bowing was entirely free from the "ripping" effect observed in old fashioned bass playing. It was suave and elegant and caressed the strings so that they responded with their loveliest tonal secrets. [W. J. Henderson, Sun

He tunes his strings higher than the accepted tuning of the double bass for the sake of clarity and brilliancy of effect. It was probably inevitable, with this special treatment of the double-bass, which has very little solo music in its repertory, that the soloist should eke out his program with some compositions never intended for the double-bass, and bearing too obviously the mark of gratuitous arrangement. It is also true that the further he departed from the double-bass style and literature, the more the audience applauded his efforts. [Olin Downes

STAGE and STUDIO

COLUMBUS DISPATCH

THE Columbus season for symphonies, that field in which music is most amazing, tremendous in its magnitude and awe-inspiring in its profundity, will open Thursday at 8:15 p. m. in Memorial hall with a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Oct 25

It is not a mere publicity ballyhoo to say that Columbus is mighty fortunate in having as its guests the Boston and its celebrated Koussevitzky. In the first place, Columbus is only one of five cities outside of Boston and New York which will hear the great band this season. And, secondly, it is an orchestra with a conductor selected by such writers as Olin Downes of the New York Times and Arthur M. Abell of the Musical Courier as a symphony and leader without peers.

Another good reason for hearing the Boston is that Koussevitzky has arranged what is without a doubt the most remarkable program ever to be played by an orchestra in central Ohio.

PROKOFIEFF NOVELTY.

Particularly outstanding is the program in that two of the numbers have never been played in Columbus and only a few times in America. These are the "Classical Symphony" by Prokofieff and the orchestral extracts from the second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite by Ravel.

Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, with its four movements, will consume the entire last half of the Boston [illegible] is the most tre[illegible]ning on this symphonic [illegible]possibility that this [illegible]so has never been [illegible], followers of sym[illegible]being unable to [illegible]2 or 16 years. [illegible]be entirely new [illegible]tion of music lov[illegible]

[illegible] TERRIBLE.

[illegible]of the most [illegible]reat compo[illegible] enfant terrib[illegible]ssian music. [illegible]assical Sympho[illegible]he time being hi[illegible]ancient Scythia [illegible]Babylonian demons.

Prokof[illegible] now in thirty-seven year[illegible]mposed this little work in 191[illegible]17. Felix Borowski quotes the composer as saying that his "idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores."

Of the virtuoso performances by the Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitzky, which are the standing wonder of present day music, nothing has made a more remarkable impression than [illegible]

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY —

'cello sonata in G minor; a minuet, arranged from the original piano piece of Beethoven; G. Lasca's Berceuse and Koussevitzky's "Valse Miniature."

At first, when Lorenziti's Symphonic Concertante was sounded, the dominating impression was of music too slight and an instrumental tone not large enough to fill an immense hall, Mr. Koussevitzky's tone was carefully controlled until he had opportunity, in other music, to reveal its sonorous possibilities. Then it was evident that he had been most carefully adjusting his style to the demands of the old music, which, like everything else on the program, was played with the most gratifying finish, taste and high musicianship. It might not be well to inquire too closely in regard to the absolute authenticity of every note, phrase and expression mark in these old pieces, revived with the cooperation of Mr. Casadesus. Let it be sufficient here to remark that the latter gentleman is a very accomplished performer on the viola d'amore and that he and Mr. Koussevitzky fairly matched tone and styles.

Came Mr. Koussevitzky as soloist and composer. His concerto is well written, very much better written than one might have expected of a piece which is avowedly a virtuoso's vehicle. But this piece has form and coherency and clearly stated ideas. As soon as Mr. Koussevitzky played his opening phrase, he had commanded the attention of the audience. Thereafter the listener surrendered himself to an astonishing exhibition. Everything the double-bass is supposed to do, and many things it was not expected to do, were brought to pass, and this without the suggestion of ostentation or technical gymnastics, but purely as an integral part of the musical expression.

Mr. Koussevitzsky uses an Amati double bass, which is not as large as the instrument customarily used in the orchestra. He also tunes his strings higher than the accepted tuning of the double bass for the sake of clarity and brilliancy of effect.

It was probably inevitable, with this special treatment of the double-bass, which has very little solo music in its repertory, that the soloist should eke out his program with some compositions never intended for the double-bass, and bearing too obviously the mark of gratuitious arrangement. It is also true that the further he departed from the double-bass style and literature, the more the audience applauded his efforts.

The unaccompanied sonata of L. Borghi for viola d'amore and double-bass was the best in point of musical value of the concerted numbers and it was played with the finest art by both performers. It was repeatedly a cause of fresh wonder to observe how Mr. Koussevitzky matched the tone of his immense instrument with that of the delicate old aristocrat of the string family, the viola d'amore. Mr. Casadesus gave a solo performance of Lorenziti's Petite Suite, a performance of excelling finish and expression. A ditty which he played as encore, with occasional banjo effects, enlisted the immense enthusiasm of the audience.

Mr. Koussevitzky was compelled to add to the program. The audience was loath to let him go. Those who have not heard him have probably little conception of what the double-bass can become in the hands of a master. In other hands, of course, it remains an element of instrumental ensembles. A man of genius last night gave it momentarily a great significance.

Pierre Hobosbutz shared in the applause as well he deserved to do.

The program included further, Borghi's Third Sonata for Viola d'Amore, and double bass; and Lozenziti's "Petite Suite" for d'Amore, and a group of little numbers transposed and written for the bass violin.

NOTES and LINES

HEIR By PHILIP HALE OCT 25

There have been two changes in the program of the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday this week. An Introduction and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli was announced for performance. This was put aside because the orchestral parts did not arrive in time. It was said that a Partita by Kondracki, a young composer born in the Ukraine region, now living in Paris, would be substituted. For some reason or other the performance of this Suite has been postponed. Ibert's "Feerique" for orchestra will be played for the first time in Boston, if not for the first time in this country. The first performance was in Paris three years ago. The other numbers on the program are Prokofieff's pretty little "Classical" symphony; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the Symphony in D major (No. 2) by our old and esteemed friend, Johannes Brahms.

The orchestra next week will give concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. The next concerts in Boston will be on Nov. 9 and 10.

Mr. Sanromá, schooled as pianist in Boston, was heard in a concert of his own at Berlin ten days ago. He played pieces by the eighteenth-century Soler, Beethoven, Schumann, Albeniz, Honegger. In the course of the season he will return to Boston to play the Concerto of Toch—witty and newly risen German—with the Symphony Orchestra.

TRANS Amusements Oct 26

special treatment of the double-bass, which has very little solo music in its repertory, that the soloist should eke out his program with some compositions never intended for the double-bass, and bearing too obviously the mark of gratuitous arrangement. It is also true that the further he departed from the double-bass style and literature, the more the audience applauded his efforts. [Olin Downes

STAGE and STUDIO

Columbus Dispatch

THE Columbus season for symphonies, that field in which music is most amazing, tremendous in its magnitude and awe-inspiring in its profundity, will open Thursday at 8:15 p. m. in Memorial hall with a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Oct 25

It is not a mere publicity ballyhoo to say that Columbus is mighty fortunate in having as its guests the Boston and its celebrated Koussevitzky. In the first place, Columbus is only one of five cities outside of Boston and New York which will hear the great band this season. And, secondly, it is an orchestra with a conductor selected by such writers as Olin Downes of the New York Times and Arthur M. Abell of the Musical Courier as a symphony and leader without peers.

Another good reason for hearing the Boston is that Koussevitzky has arranged what is without a doubt the most remarkable program ever to be played by an orchestra in central Ohio.

PROKOFIEFF NOVELTY.

Particularly outstanding is the program in that two of the numbers have never been played in Columbus and only a few times in America. These are the "Classical Symphony" by Prokofieff and the orchestral excerpts from the second "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet suite by Ravel.

Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, with its four movements, will consume the entire last half of the Boston [illegible] thing on this symphonic [illegible] so has never been [illegible] followers of sym- [illegible] ing unable to [illegible] 12 or 16 years.

[illegible] be entirely new [illegible] tion of music lov-

TERRIBLE.

[illegible] of the most [illegible] gest compo- [illegible] enfant terrible [illegible] ssian music. [illegible] ssical Symphon [illegible] he time being hi [illegible] ancient Scythi [illegible] Babylonian demons.

Prokofieff, now in thirty-seven year, composed this little work in 1916-17. Felix Borowski quotes the composer as saying that his "idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores."

Of the virtuoso performances by the Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitzky, which are the standing wonder of present day music, nothing has made a more remarkable impression than Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," which is on the Columbus program.

Last season when the distinguished French composer, Ravel, landed in America, he went to Carnegie hall, New York, and sat in a box while Koussevitzky and his orchestra surprised him with the homage of a "Ravel program." After this suite in particular, composer, conductor and orchestra were given a tremendous ovation.

A RAVEL MASTERPIECE.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of the tone-painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." This score is probably also his largest canvas and never did he use so broad a brush with such overwhelming effect as in the tumultuous dance which closes this suite.

Space will not permit a lengthy discussion of that awe-inspiring Symphony No. 2 by Johannes Brahms. Felix Weingartner, probably the greatest German critic of his time, in discussing it in his pamphlet of symphonies, says that "the stream of invention has never flowed so fresh and spontaneous in other works by Brahms and nowhere else has he colored his orchestration so successfully." And after a eulogy of the various movements he puts the symphony among the very best of the new classic school since the death of Beethoven and "far above all the symphony of Schumann."

NOTE TO LATE-COMERS.

The program will commence promptly at 8:15 p. m. and all patrons are urged to be in their seats at that time. No one will be seated between movements of a symphony.

The single seat sale for the Boston will not be opened at the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, until Wednesday morning. Until that time season tickets for the entire series, including the Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit orchestras, will be sold exclusively.

LECTURE BY LICHLITER.

Rev. Dr. McIlyar H. Lichliter, pastor of the First Congregational church, Sunday evening will deliver a lecture on the composers and their symphonies on the Boston orchestra's program. G. G. Grabill, organist, will play movements from several Brahms symphonies. The lecture begins at 7:30 o'clock.

THE BOSTON PROGRAM.

Following is the Boston's program:

Overture to Leonore, No. 3, Op. 72.... Beethoven

Classical Symphony, Op. 25....Prokofieff
- Allegro
- Larghetto
- Gavotte
- Finale

(First time in Columbus)

Orchestral excerpts from Daphnis and Chloe ballet (second suite).....Ravel
- Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

(First time in Columbus)

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY —

Koussevitzky, Boston's Conductor, Finds American Audiences Give Close Sympathy

Columbus Dispatch Oct 26

His Orchestra Opens Symphony Club Season Thursday at Memorial.

FROM a Boston correspondent comes excerpts from an interview with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear with the world-famous band of musicians in Memorial hall next Thursday evening.

The scribe visited Mr. Koussevitzky at his home at Jamaica Plain, a suburb of Boston.

"There was nothing Slavic about the old colonial house which bore the assigned number, nor about the entry hall, which was hung with a canvas of a Union general, a sword and other Civil war relics," says the Boston writer.

"The conductor entered to extend a courteous welcome. His tweeds and spats bespoke a good tailor, and perhaps a shade more attention to dress than is customary with Americans.

"Asked what he thought of his audiences in America, he spoke with quick enthusiasm.

"'I have come in contact with a number of American audiences,' he said, 'not only in Boston and New York and the cities of our regular visits, but further afield in the orchestra's occasional tours into Canada, New York state and the South. The audiences everywhere I have found particularly responsive, their reactions interesting. The only measure of success in a symphony concert is a close sympathy between orchestra and audience. I usually find there is an intimate contact, a close "rapport".'"

Fourth Program of Boston Orchestra

Monitor Oct 27

One novelty graced the fourth program of the Boston Symphany Orchestra, given Oct. 26 and 27 in Symphony Hall. This was Jacques Ibert's "Féerique," which was played for the first time in Boston. Following as it did the "Prélude à L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," it gave the impression in its opening measures that its composer had rewritten Debussy, trusting to the lapse of 30 years to hide his plagiarism, and that Mr. Koussevitzky, setting the two compositions side by side, was giving the game away. Either that, it seemed, or the conductor had offered a deplorably constructed program.

We were quickly undeceived. Ibert's fairyland presently was demolished by gusty winds from the Mediterranean, and we sailed off to some more Ports of Call, in the last of which we heard another "Chant de Folie." This curious composition came to a close with a crashing chord, which, whatever its musical value, was an effective close to the first half of the program. Thus it is seen that Mr. Koussevitzky knew quite well what he was about.

In order to realize just how well, one must know that the opening number was Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony. Was it not natural for an audience to expect that since the composer of "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" had given us such a pretty piece, the author of the "Chant de Folie" would be as gentle? The rending of the gossamer veil was the little surprise of M. Ibert, and its effect was enhanced by the clever stage management of the conductor.

The concert closed with a fervid performance of Brahms' Second Symphony. Except for one or two minor slips, the orchestra played throughout the afternoon yesterday with amazing precision and flexibility. Mr. Koussevitzky, with reason, is obviously proud of his instrument.

L. A. S.

MUSIC

Her Oct 27

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 48th season, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony Hall: Prokofieff, "Classical" symphony. Debussey, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Ibert, "Feerique." Brahms, symphony No. 2, D major.

Ibert's name was not unkonwn in Boston before yesterday. His orchestral pieces, "Escales" and "Les Recontres," his "Chant de Folie" for chorus and orchestra have been played at the Symphony concerts. The flute players club gave a performance of two movements for two flutes, clarinet and bassoon.

"Feerique," brought out in Paris three years ago, was played yesterday for the first time in Boston, probably for the first time in this country. An ingenious Parisian has said that it was Ibert's intention to evoke "a purely imaginary realm of sounds, rhythms and timbres," that the hearers should take their time in searching "either the poetic plan which they have not found there or the scheme and speech of pure music which they also have not found." A profound and Orphic saying, but what is the precise meaning of it? We are told that there is no "literary" program to the music.

"Feerique" not only means pertaining to the fairy kingdom; it also means magical, wonderful, marvellous. If this music is taken by the hearers to portray fairyland, the robust, not to say inexplicable, section suggests that ogres giants, ghouls and vampires are among the dwellers in that imaginary realm. The opening section has poetic feeling, though the solo for the oboe over the whispering strings is not fascinating. This mood is not long sustained. There is an abrupt change into orchestral violence. Here the listener is not tempted to say "Marvellous" to Ibert's musical narrative, after the manner of Dr. Watson punctuating the surprising story in which Sherlock Holmes reveals his shrewdness. Neither the rhythmic play, nor the musical ideas, nor the orchestration leads one to shout "Wonderful." "Feerique" is apparently an amorphous work without marked significance, without exquisite nuances, without glowing color.

Mr. Prokofieff is pleasingly versatile. He can be superbly barbaric, impressive by his wildness, as in his "Scythian Suite" "Seven, They Are Seven" and the "Ballet of Steel"; he can write admirably for the piano with orchestra; in his "Classical" symphony he has shown that he can be delightfully and artistically simple, employing his inventive ability and technical resources to charm the ear and refresh the spirit. They who go in for "thunder and guns and all that" in a musical composition may sniff at this symphony, complain of its small dimensions, its apparent naivete. Ah, how hard it is to write simply and say something in each sentence! As in literature, so in music. Here is a work without superfluity, redundancy, padding. There is no attempt to startle, to thrill the hearer. How the quick movements sparkle and gaily bubble! What old-time, but not affected grace in the middle movements! And when Prokofieff has said his say, he stops. He is not overcome by his ability. He is not unduly enamortd of his speech.

There was a beautiful performance of Debussy's prelude, one of continuous and ravishing euphony. For the unalloyed enjoyment it was not necessary to think of Mollarme's cryptic poem or Edmund Gosse's explanation of it. If the prelude had been entitled "Summer Afternoon" or merely "Music," the effect on an audience would be the same, for the prelude is entrancing without suggestion of a faun remembering sensuously a vision of visiting nymphs—however "divinely tender and indulgent" they may have been to him. The whole orchestra was as a poetically inspired virtuouso, yet one cannot refrain from mentioning the flute of Mr. Laurent, the oboe of Mr. Gillet and the horn of Mr. Boettcher.

Mr. Koussevitzky is not afraid to give dramatic emphasis to the symphonies of Brahms when he detects the drama therein. For this reason, perhaps, his interpretation may disconcert those who, hearing the music of Johannes under preceding conductors, felt comfortably a disposition to sleep, believing that Brahms was a safe man who would do nothing musically indecent while they slumbered. Yet in spite of Mr. Koussevitzky's vivid interpretation, his poetically dramatic reading of details and the whole, his galvanizing the padding into momentary life—for Brahms could pad with the worst of his colleagues, including Bach—the symphony seemed yesterday inferior as a work of art to the first and the third; but when Brahms remembered Hungary, or was melodically and rhythmically piquant as in the third movement, then there was genuine enjoyment, with full appreciation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week, visiting Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Pittsburgh. The program for Nov. 9-10 will comprise Jacobi's Indian Dances, the Third Symphony of Sibelius and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Prokofieff's "Classical" and Brahms' Second

Globe Oct 27

Ibert's "Feerique" and Debussy's "Faun" Furnish Romantic Contrast

Mr Koussevitzky again put two symphonies on the program for yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, Prokofieff's "Classical," and Brahms' Second. A new tone poem by Jacques Ibert, entitled "Feerique," and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" furnished romantic contrast. Ibert's piece was chosen after works by Pick-Mangiagalli and Kendraczki had been announced and abandoned for various reasons. Mr Koussevitzky seldom settles on his program far in advance.

Prokofioff's idea in writing his "Classical Symphony," according to Felix Borowski, was "to catch the spirit of Mozart, and put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores."

There is a superficial imitation of Mozart's musical rhetoric in this modern attempt at 18th-century music, but Prokofioff has not been able to invent melodies, or to impart to his fluently-written score anything of the nobility and pathos that in all Mozart's major works stir the listener to the depths of his soul. He cannot even make his music graceful except after the rather wooden fashion of Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker Suite."

"Afternoon of a Faun"

Mr Koussevitzky no doubt had the orchestra repeat Prokofieff's already familiar jeu d'esprit because they can play it with such delightful smoothness and clarity. Seldom has the orchestra sounded better than it did in this number yesterday. But why waste such virtuosity on pseudo-Mozart when so little of the real Mozart has been heard at these concerts under Koussevitzky?

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" Mr Koussevitzky has always played here, as he did yesterday, much more slowly than other conductors take it, and in the spirit of Massenet, a composer who had very possibly more influence on Debussy than one likes to admit. This version makes the melody of almost cloying sweetness, displaying the virtuosity of the woodwind players in the orchestra and subduing all the other instruments unduly.

The performance was very warmly applauded, and obviously gave many listeners keen delight. But one wonders what Debussy, who had a caustic tongue, would have said about it. The nocturnes for orchestra heard the other day gain greatly by Mr Koussevitzky's brilliantly personal reading, but one feels that "The Afternoon of a Faun" might better be left to speak for itself.

Brahms' Second Symphony

Of Ibert's "Feerique" little need be said. The composer, a Parisian now just under 40, is known here by other works. This tone poem has no story, poem, or picture back of it. The title suggests an intention of evoking the atmosphere of fairyland. The music is fluently written and cleverly scored for orchestra. It says almost nothing but says it well. Mr Koussevitzky strove in vain to impart some of his own emotional fervor to Ibert's score. The audience gave it scant applause.

Paris seems to be full of musicians who can write music cleverly, without pedantry, sporting with sound and with orchestral color, and never resorting to obvious banality. But like Ibert, they invariably fail to put any imaginative intensity into their music.

Brahms, whose Second Symphony ended yesterday's concert, had not a tithe of Ibert's skill in writing for orchestra. He scores everything with the clumsiness of the proverbial Teuton; he is always ponderous, and not seldom a pedant. But he writes from the heart, and his music at its best goes straight to the listener's heart.

This D-major symphony is the lightest and least clumsy of his four. Mr Koussevitzky, who does not appear to believe that the first movement of a symphony can ever be lyric rather than dramatic in character, tried with yesterday's Brahms, as he usually does with Schubert's "Unfinished," to make the first movement heroic and profound. He gave the whole slow movement the character of a songful theme for violoncello, by which it gained in beauty over all previous interpretations.

The performance as a whole was an interesting and moving one, though the orchestra had not been as thoroughly rehearsed, to all appearances, as in the other numbers. The brass, in particular, was more than once at fault.

Next week the orchestra goes on a Western tour.

P. R.

SYMPHONY IN FINEST OF FETTLE

Debussy's "Faun" Is Made Beautiful by Players

Post Oct 27

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Next week the Boston Symphony Orchestra journeys Westward, and until this annual excursion is accomplished the hours of rehearsal must be devoted less to the extension of the repertory than to the polishing and repolishing of pieces already in hand.

Hence a programme yesterday, like that of the week before, with but one fresh and rather inconsiderable piece, Ibert's "Feerique," played for the first time in Boston.

NEW LUSTRE TO TONE

In the main, however, the Symphony subscribers like best of all these programmes of familiar music, while the above mentioned polishing process resulted yesterday, as it did a week ago, in performances of a rare finish. Excelling its previous self is the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, refining upon refinements, adding new glow and lustre to its tone, acquiring an even greater pliancy, a still more dazzling virtuosity, a vivider brilliance.

Yesterday these qualities were severally displayed in the so-called "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff, in Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and in Brahms' Symphony in D major, and an admiring audience was from first to last lavish of its applause.

Intrinsically Prokofieff's quasi-Mozartian Symphony is slight almost to inconsequentiality, but it admirably displays the present tonal and rhythmical virtues of the band, and not in memory has Debussy's Prelude received so ravishing a performance. From the air, in the first breaths of Mr. Laurent's flute, came this fragile music, and into the air it ultimately vanished, leaving in the mind of the listener, as in that of Mallarme's Faun, an impression in which the real and the imagined were inextricably mingled.

At first blush it seemed an infelicitous stroke of programme-making to follow this prelude with the music of the post-Debussyan Ibert. But if this "Feerique" adheres for a time to the outward pattern of "L'Apres midi d'un Faune," the sonorous, somewhat obvious conclusion is far removed alike from Debussy and from the Realm of Faery. Not too understandable is M. Ibert's musical purpose in this diverting but hardly important composition.

From Brahms' Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky now draws very nearly the utmost musical value. Here and there an over-eager brass marred in degree the serenity of the first movement, but in the rest was little enough of which to complain and much to call forth unstinted admiration.

SYMPHONY IN ASSORTED PROGRAM

Her Oct 27

By MOSES SMITH

The program of this week's symphony concerts, as finally assembled by Mr. Koussevitzky after several changes of mind and heart, is a rather curious assortment. It begins with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, which is the work of an ultra-modern writing in the supposed style of a contemporary Mozart; it continues with Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," exquisite musical impressionism; goes on to a first performance of Ibert's "Feerique," which it would be absurd to describe in terms of any one style; and ends with Brahms' second symphony, honest German music of virility.

The performance of the symphony carried all before it. Mr. Koussevitzky has displayed not only a liking for the mellow symphonist but a genius for interpreting his music, during his sojorun in Boston. No doubt some of the auditors may have murmured a bit resentfully in advance that Brahms was being played too often. But such performances—and such music—merit repetition. The musical fadists, eager for the latest novelty, reproach Brahms as old-fashioned. Some even call him dull. But most of us can listen to each of his symphonies once a year without falling asleep.

The Debussy number was also rendered beautifully. Mr. Koussevitzky has not always the sure touch with the delicate music of the French poet, but in this performance everything was in its place, the orchestral tints were judiciously assorted, and the general effect a work of art.

The novelty by Ibert made no definite impression. At times, especially at the opening, it was Debussyan impressionism without Debussy's genius; then it took on the aspect of the "smart" French ultra-modern composer; and it ended in what must have been intended to be an exciting climax. It seemed to us feeble.

A subway tieup prevented our hearing the Prokofieff number except through the cracks of the Symphony Hall doors. Perhaps it was just as well, for this work was most piquant on first hearing. Subsequent performances have dulled its edge.

Oct 27

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with choral finale, is announced for the fall pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 18. Serge Koussevitzky will then conduct both the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. The soloists will be Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van de Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

Koussevitzky, Boston's Conductor, Finds American Audiences Give Close Sympathy

COLUMBUS DISPATCH OCT 26

His Orchestra Opens Symphony Club Season Thursday at Memorial.

FROM a Boston correspondent comes excerpts from an interview with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear with the world-famous band of musicians in Memorial hall next Thursday evening.

The scribe visited Mr. Koussevitzky at his home at Jamaica Plain, a suburb of Boston.

"There was nothing Slavic about the old colonial house which bore the assigned number, nor about the entry hall, which was hung with a canvas of a Union general, a sword and other Civil war relics," says the Boston writer.

"The conductor entered to extend a courteous welcome. His tweeds and spats bespoke a good tailor, and perhaps a shade more attention to dress than is customary with Americans.

"Asked what he thought of his audiences in America, he spoke with quick enthusiasm.

"'I have come in contact with a number of American audiences,' he said, 'not only in Boston and New York and the cities of our regular visits, but further afield in the orchestra's occasional tours into Canada, New York state and the South. The audiences everywhere I have found particularly responsive, their reactions interesting. The only measure of success in a symphony concert is a close sympathy between orchestra and audience. I usually find there is an intimate contact, a close "rapport".'"

Fourth Program of Boston Orchestra

MONITOR OCT 27

One novelty graced the fourth program of the Boston Symphany Orchestra, given Oct. 26 and 27 in Symphony Hall. This was Jacques Ibert's "Féerique," which was played for the first time in Boston. Following as it did the "Prélude à L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," it gave the impression in its opening measures that its composer had rewritten Debussy, trusting to the lapse of 30 years to hide his plagiarism, and that Mr. Koussevitzky, setting the two compositions side by side, was giving the game away. Either that, it seemed, or the conductor had offered a deplorably constructed program.

We were quickly undeceived. Ibert's fairyland presently was demolished by gusty winds from the Mediterranean, and we sailed off to some more Ports of Call, in the last of which we heard another "Chant de Folie." This curious composition came to a close with a crashing chord, which, whatever its musical value, was an effective close to the first half of the program. Thus it is seen that Mr. Koussevitzky knew quite well what he was about.

In order to realize just how well, one must know that the opening number was Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony. Was it not natural for an audience to expect that since the composer of "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" had given us such a pretty piece, the author of the "Chant de Folie" would be as gentle? The rending of the gossamer veil was the little surprise of M. Ibert, and its effect was enhanced by the clever stage management of the conductor.

The concert closed with a fervid performance of Brahms' Second Symphony. Except for one or two minor slips, the orchestra played throughout the afternoon yesterday with amazing precision and flexibility. Mr. Koussevitzky, with reason, is obviously proud of his instrument.

L. A. S.

MUSIC

HER OCT 27

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, 48th season, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony Hall: Prokofieff, "Classical" symphony. Debussey, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Ibert, "Feerique." Brahms, symphony No. 2, D major.

Ibert's name was not unkonwn in Boston before yesterday. His orchestral pieces, "Escales" and "Les Recontres," his "Chant de Folie" for chorus and orchestra have been played at the Symphony concerts. The flute players club gave a performance of two movements for two flutes, clarinet and bassoon.

"Feerique," brought out in Paris three years ago, was played yesterday for the first time in Boston, probably for the first time in this country. An ingenious Parisian has said that it was Ibert's intention to evoke "a purely imaginary realm of sounds, rhythms and timbres," that the hearers should take their time in searching "either the poetic plan which they have not found there or the scheme and speech of pure music which they also have not found." A profound and Orphic saying, but what is the precise meaning of it? We are told that there is no "literary" program for the music.

"Feerique" not only means pertaining to the fairy kingdom; it also means magical, wonderful, marvellous. If this music is taken by the hearers to portray fairyland, the robust, not to say inexplicable, section suggests that ogres giants, ghouls and vampires are among the dwellers in that imaginary realm. The opening section has poetic feeling, though the solo for the oboe over the whispering strings is not fascinating. This mood is not long sustained. There is an abrupt change into orchestral violence. Here the listener is not tempted to say "Marvellous" to Ibert's musical narrative, after the manner of Dr. Watson punctuating the surprising story in which Sherlock Holmes reveals his shrewdness. Neither the rhythmic play, nor the musical ideas, nor the orchestration leads one to shout "Wonderful." "Feerique" is apparently an amorphous work without marked significance, without exquisite nuances, without glowing color.

Mr. Prokofieff is pleasingly versatile. He can be superbly barbaric, impressive by his wildness, as in his "Scythian Suite" "Seven, They Are Seven" and the "Ballet of Steel"; he can write admirably for the piano with orchestra; in his "Classical" symphony he has shown that he can be delightfully and artistically simple, employing his inventive ability and technical resources to charm the ear and refresh the spirit. They who go in for "thunder and guns and all that" in a musical composition may sniff at this symphony, complain of its small dimensions, its apparent naivete. Ah, how hard it is to write simply and say something in each sentence! As in literature, so in music. Here is a work without superfluity, redundancy, padding. There is no attempt to startle, to thrill the hearer. How the quick movements sparkle and gaily bubble! What old-time, but not affected grace in the middle movements! And when Prokofieff has said his say, he stops. He is not overcome by his ability. He is not unduly enamortd of his speech.

There was a beautiful performance of Debussy's prelude, one of continuous and ravishing euphony. For the unalloyed enjoyment it was not necessary to think of Mollarme's cryptic poem or Edmund Gosse's explanation of it. If the prelude had been entitled "Summer Afternoon" or merely "Music," the effect on an audience would be the same, for the prelude is entrancing without suggestion of a faun remembering sensuously a vision of visiting nymphs—however "divinely tender and indulgent" they may have been to him. The whole orchestra was as a poetically inspired virtuouso, yet one cannot refrain from mentioning the flute of Mr. Laurent, the oboe of Mr. Gillet and the horn of Mr. Boettcher.

Mr. Koussevitzky is not afraid to give dramatic emphasis to the symphonies of Brahms when he detects the drama therein. For this reason, perhaps, his interpretation may disconcert those who, hearing the music of Johannes under preceding conductors, felt comfortably a disposition to sleep, believing that Brahms was a safe man who would do nothing musically indecent while they slumbered. Yet in spite of Mr. Koussevitzky's vivid interpretation, his poetically dramatic reading of details and the whole, his galvanizing the padding into momentary life—for Brahms could pad with the worst of his colleagues, including Bach—the symphony seemed yesterday inferior as a work of art to the first and the third; but when Brahms remembered Hungary, or was melodically and rhythmically piquant as in the third movement, then there was genuine enjoyment, with full appreciation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week, visiting Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Pittsburgh. The program for Nov. 9-10 will comprise Jacobi's Indian Dances, the Third Symphony of Sibelius and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Prokofieff's "Classical" and Brahms' Second

GLOBE OCT 27

Ibert's "Feerique" and Debussy's "Faun" Furnish Romantic Contrast

Mr Koussevitzky again put two symphonies on the program for yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, Prokofieff's "Classical," and Brahms' Second. A new tone poem by Jacques Ibert, entitled "Feerique," and Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" furnished romantic contrast. Ibert's piece was chosen after works by Pick-Mangiagalli and Kendraczki had been announced and abandoned for various reasons. Mr Koussevitzky seldom settles on his program far in advance.

Prokofioff's idea in writing his "Classical Symphony," according to Felix Borowski, was "to catch the spirit of Mozart, and put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores."

There is a superficial imitation of Mozart's musical rhetoric in this modern attempt at 18th-century music, but Prokofioff has not been able to invent melodies, or to impart to his fluently-written score anything of the nobility and pathos that in all Mozart's major works stir the listener to the depths of his soul. He cannot even make his music graceful except after the rather wooden fashion of Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker Suite."

"Afternoon of a Faun"

Mr Koussevitzky no doubt had the orchestra repeat Prokofieff's already familiar jeu d'esprit because they can play it with such delightful smoothness and clarity. Seldom has the orchestra sounded better than it did in this number yesterday. But why waste such virtuosity on pseudo-Mozart when so little of the real Mozart has been heard at these concerts under Koussevitzky?

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" Mr Koussevitzky has always played here, as he did yesterday, much more slowly than other conductors take it, and in the spirit of Massenet, a composer who had very possibly more influence on Debussy than one likes to admit. This version makes the melody of almost cloying sweetness, displaying the virtuosity of the woodwind players in the orchestra and subduing all the other instruments unduly.

The performance was very warmly applauded, and obviously gave many listeners keen delight. But one wonders what Debussy, who had a caustic tongue, would have said about it. The nocturnes for orchestra heard the other day gain greatly by Mr Koussevitzky's brilliantly personal reading, but one feels that "The Afternoon of a Faun" might better be left to speak for itself.

Brahms' Second Symphony

Of Ibert's "Feerique" little need be said. The composer, a Parisian now just under 40, is known here by other works. This tone poem has no story, poem, or picture back of it. The title suggests an intention of evoking the atmosphere of fairyland. The music is fluently written and cleverly scored for orchestra. It says almost nothing but says it well. Mr Koussevitzky strove in vain to impart some of his own emotional fervor to Ibert's score. The audience gave it scant applause.

Paris seems to be full of musicians who can write music cleverly, without pedantry, sporting with sound and with orchestral color, and never resorting to obvious banality. But like Ibert, they invariably fail to put an imaginative intensity into their music.

Brahms, whose Second Symphony ended yesterday's concert, had not a tithe of Ibert's skill in writing for orchestra. He scores everything with the clumsiness of the proverbial Teuton; he is always ponderous, and not seldom a pedant. But he writes from the heart, and his music at its best goes straight to the listener's heart.

This D-major symphony is the lightest and least clumsy of his four. Mr Koussevitzky, who does not appear to believe that the first movement of a symphony can ever be lyric rather than dramatic in character, tried with yesterday's Brahms, as he usually does with Schubert's "Unfinished," to make the first movement heroic and profound. He gave the whole slow movement the character of a songful theme for violoncello, by which it gained in beauty over all previous interpretations.

The performance as a whole was an interesting and moving one, though the orchestra had not been as thoroughly rehearsed, to all appearances, as in the other numbers. The brass, in particular, was more than once at fault.

Next week the orchestra goes on a Western tour.

P. R.

SYMPHONY IN FINEST OF FETTLE

Debussy's "Faun" Is Made Beautiful by Players

POST OCT 27

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Next week the Boston Symphony Orchestra journeys Westward, and until this annual excursion is accomplished the hours of rehearsal must be devoted less to the extension of the repertory than to the polishing and repolishing of pieces already in hand.

Hence a programme yesterday, like that of the week before, with but one fresh and rather inconsiderable piece, Ibert's "Feerique," played for the first time in Boston.

NEW LUSTRE TO TONE

In the main, however, the Symphony subscribers like best of all these programmes of familiar music, while the above mentioned polishing process resulted yesterday, as it did a week ago, in performances of a rare finish. Excelling its previous self is the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, refining upon refinements, adding new glow and lustre to its tone, acquiring an even greater pliancy, a still more dazzling virtuosity, a vivider brilliance.

Yesterday these qualities were severally displayed in the so-called "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff, in Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and in Brahms' Symphony in D major, and an admiring audience was from first to last lavish of its applause.

Intrinsically Prokofieff's quasi-Mozartian Symphony is slight almost to inconsequentiality, but it admirably displays the present tonal and rhythmical virtues of the band, and not in memory has Debussy's Prelude received so ravishing a performance. From the air, in the first breaths of Mr. Laurent's flute, came this fragile music, and into the air it ultimately vanished, leaving in the mind of the listener, as in that of Mallarme's Faun, an impression in which the real and the imagined were inextricably mingled.

At first blush it seemed an infelicitous stroke of programme-making to follow this prelude with the music of the post-Debussyan Ibert. But if this "Feerique" adheres for a time to the outward pattern of "L'Apres midi d'un Faune," the sonorous, somewhat obvious conclusion is far removed alike from Debussy and from the Realm of Faery. Not too understandable is M. Ibert's musical purpose in this diverting but hardly important composition.

From Brahms' Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky now draws very nearly the utmost musical value. Here and there an over-eager brass marred in degree the serenity of the first movement, but in the rest was little enough of which to complain and much to call forth unstinted admiration.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

OCT 27

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with choral finale, is announced for the fall pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 18. Serge Koussevitzky will then conduct both the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. The soloists will be Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van de Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

SYMPHONY IN ASSORTED PROGRAM

HER OCT 27

By MOSES SMITH

The program of this week's symphony concerts, as finally assembled by Mr. Koussevitzky after several changes of mind and heart, is a rather curious assortment. It begins with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, which is the work of an ultra-modern writing in the supposed style of a contemporary Mozart; it continues with Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun", exquisite musical impressionism; goes on to a first performance of Ibert's "Feerique," which it would be absurd to describe in terms of any one style; and ends with Brahms' second symphony, honest German music of virility.

The performance of the symphony carried all before it. Mr. Koussevitzky has displayed not only a liking for the mellow symphonist but a genius for interpreting his music, during his sojorun in Boston. No doubt some of the auditors may have murmured a bit resentfully in advance that Brahms was being played too often. But such performances—and such music—merit repetition. The musical fadists, eager for the latest novelty, reproach Brahms as old-fashioned. Some even call him dull. But most of us can listen to each of his symphonies once a year without falling asleep.

The Debussy number was also rendered beautifully. Mr. Koussevitzky has not always the sure touch with the delicate music of the French poet, but in this performance everything was in its place, the orchestral tints were judiciously assorted, and the general effect a work of art.

The novelty by Ibert made no definite impression. At times, especially at the opening, it was Debussyan impressionism without Debussy's genius; then it took on the aspect of the "smart" French ultra-modern composer; and it ended in what must have been intended to be an exciting climax. It seemed to us feeble.

A subway tieup prevented our hearing the Prokofieff number except through the cracks of the Symphony Hall doors. Perhaps it was just as well, for this work was most piquant on first hearing. Subsequent performances have dulled its edge.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Celebrated Orchestra Conductors To Be Here This Season

From left to right above are Henry Verbrugghen of the Minneapolis Orchestra; Frederick Stock of the Chicago Orchestra; Arturo Toscanini of the New York Philharmonic, and Nikolai Sokoloff of the Cleveland Orchestra. Below from left to right are Willem Mengelberg of the New York Philharmonic, and Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PITTSBURGH POST GAZETTE
OCT. 27

Music Notes and Comments

Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the Passing . . Of Vincent B. Wheeler.

By HARVEY GAUL.

The most important series of our musical year begin this week, and they are the opening concerts of the Pittsburgh Symphony Society and the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

Tomorrow night at the Mosque the Pittsburgh Symphony will play to capacity. If you can get in count yourself lucky as many people will be disappointed. The course has been subscribed and enthusiasm according to the officers is running high.

In talking over the concert with the players they said that the organization was greatly improved, new strings and new brasses. The men are in fine fettle and have prepared an excellent program. Elias Breeskin, slave driver, has harried the men until they hardly have to count a tacit. He has polished off phrases, bowed the fiddle sections, and put a metronome under the percussions, and the result was the burning of much midnight oil on his part, and a thorough working out of the various tonal families.

Eugene Goosens, conductor chose the program, and we think it a fascinating one. First of all it introduces Rimsky-Korsakow's overture "Russian Easter," sometimes called "The Bright Overture." This work may have been played here but if it was, no one can remember when, and no one can say where.

Rimsky-Korsakow had a new idea in mind when he wrote his "Russian Easter," and we fancy it must have shocked the Moscow metropolitan when that high-hatted prelate heard it, as Rimsky makes his Easter quite pagan. It opens with ecclesiastical themes and then runs riot in caperings and pranks. This Rimsky says is the origin of Easter, a heathenish holiday marked with peasant merry-making. For further notes on this work we commend you to Rimsky's illuminating "My Musical Life," and the more comprehensive analytical notes of William Benswanger, custodian of the Blickensderfer.

Second in interest will be Dvorak's familiar "New World Symphony" a work which we think justifies its many repetitions. Perhaps Antonin Dvorak did lean heavily upon the Negro idiom, but to our mind it is his Bohemian colorings that mark the work. Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" will give us ample opportunity of judging the wood winds and the whole will close with Georges Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody," a brilliant coda.

The guest artist is Cyrena Van Gordon, a contralto much admired here. She will sing Schubert and Wagner and our guess is that she will stop the show.

It is wonderful to think that the blue law have faded into a cerulean haze and that we can have Sunday music without some moralist condeming everybody to Aime Semple Macpherson's favorite climate. It will be a program of great music and Pittsburgh will be the better for it.

* * *

The Boston Symphony To Play This Week.

Serge Koussevitzky brings his brilliant Boston Symphony to open the orchestra association series. It is a tradition that he shall be the first and he is a worthy lead-off man.

Next Friday night the Mosque should be jammed by people who want distinguished music rendered in a distinguished manner. Mr. Koussevitzky has drawn up two of the best programs Pittsburgh has been offered. They are high in contrast and embrace many schools. They are excellent in taste and marvelous in their catholic appeal.

Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete Ballet" begins the concert. At one time Igor Stravinsky was considered an ultra modernist, but in these zig-zag days of cacophony, the ultra part is forgotten. The work will be found to be agreeable and the instrumentation enticing. This will be followed by Debussy's engaging nocturnes, "Nuages," and "Fetes," two

FINE SYMPHONY SEASON BOOKED

Country's Greatest Orchestras Are To Be Heard.

Pittsburgh is to hear the world's greatest symphony orchestras, with their celebrated conductors this season, when the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association enters upon its thirteenth season.

The opening concert will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3, at Syria Mosque.

The New York Philharmonic comes for three visits. Willem Mengelberg will conduct for the first two visits, and Arturo Toscanini for the third visit. Frederick Stock and the Chicago orchestra will return after an absence of 15 years.

Othe rfavorites to return include the Cleveland orchestra, Nikolai Sokoloff, conductor, and the Minneapolis orchestra, with Henri Verbrugghen, conductor.

Three special Friday afternoon concerts will also be given for children.

CALENDAR OF NOVEMBER CONCERTS

November 3—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mosque.

November 4—Boston Symphony Orchestra, matinee.

November 9—Josef Hoffman, piano, recital, Mosque.

November 12—Bohm Ballet, Carnegie Music Hall.

November 16—New York Philharmonic, Mosque.

November 17—New York Philharmonic, matinee.

November 25—Yost String Quartet, Schenley ballroom.

November 26—Flonzaley Quartet, Carnegie Music Hall.

November 29—Doris Niles Ballet, Carnegie Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not only a conductor, but a player of the double-bass instrument. His mastery of this instrument brought him fame before his days of conducting. Mr. Koussevitzky is the first of the conductors to come to Pittsburgh this season under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. His coming is an event of next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens the symphony season with the following programs:

FRIDAY NIGHT.

Apollon Musagete, Ballet .....Stravinsky
Nocturnes .....Debussy
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"....Wagner
Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica" ..... Beethoven

SATURDAY MATINEE.

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25....Prokofieff
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune (The Afternoon of a Faun).....Debussy
Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" .....Ravel
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73..Brahms

Three Moderns and Brahms on Symphony List

OCT 27

An interesting if not exciting program provides the fourth Symphony concert of the season. For novelty, there is Jacques Ibert's "Feerique:" for solid, substantial matter Brahms' second symphony, while the moderns are fittingly represented by Prokofieff and Debussy.

The Prokoffeffi's "Classical" symphony Koussevitzky brought keen and quickened understanding. The agreeable little piece, wherein the Russian returns to the older ways of music, only to be detected now and then in the act of jeering pleasantly at the audience, sounds still better at a second hearing than it did at a first. This Prokofield is an ingenious fellow, he does all things well and not badly; he can even write a "Classical" symphony with a few little acid touches of his own.

For Debussy, there was the "Prelud- a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune." ballet that caused censorious stir when it was first presented. By now it has sunk into the category of long accustomed things. Years do not dull the glow and glitter of its measures, its notes still talk honeyed on the ear.

M. Ibert's piece begins as calm, mild and cerebral music; then its theme heightens and quickens with ingeniously patterned trumpet work. By all means an agreeable bit of music, though in no sense a great

In the World of Music

THE most interesting musical event of the week here was the recital given by Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall. Long before this distinguished musician entered the business of orchestral conducting he was known throughout Europe as a virtuoso performer on the double-bass; he was classed as one of the three greatest performers on this instrument the world has ever known.

Mr. Koussevitzky for many years startled the musical world abroad by his artistic playing upon an instrument not usually associated with solo performance, an instrument one thinks of as the backbone of orchestral structure. It is well known, of course, that for some years past Mr. Koussevitzky has been the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the time he has been associated with this great organization he has brought it back to the high standing it had for many years.

This recent appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky as a solo performer on the double-bass was at once of interest and attracted music lovers in great number to Carnegie Hall. Naturally, there was great curiosity to hear what this eminent musician and conductor could accomplish on this instrument.

USING an Amati double bass, which is smaller than ones seen in the usual orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky astounded his audience with a remarkable performance; it is astonishing the remarkable effects Mr. Koussevitzky extracted from this ungainly instrument. He made of it a solo instrument quite as much as is the cello. Naturally, the literature for the double-bass is very limited.

OLEY SPEAKS.

The player, however, grouped together a program which held the interest of the audience at all times. He had the assistance of Henri Casadeus, player of the Viola d' Amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, pianist. One of the numbers on the program was Koussevitzky's own concerto for double-bass. The recital was one of the most unique musical events heard here in a long time.

• • •

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be away from this city this week since concerts will be given in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, and Pittsburgh. The fifth regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 9 and 10. Third Symphony of Sibelius, which has not yet been heard in Boston, Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and Frederick Jacobi's "Indian Dances," are on the program.

PENSION FUND

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony is announced for the fall pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 18. Mr. Koussevitzky will then conduct the orchestra, and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, which are being trained by Dr. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists will be Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van de Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. There will be one performance only.

110 Musicians Comprise Boston Organization

The Boston Symphony Orchestra
MEMORIAL HALL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is away this week on a tour which will take in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, and Pittsburg. The program now announced for the next pair of Boston concerts, Nov 9 and 10, includes Sibelius' Third Symphony, unfamiliar here; Skirabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," and Frederick Jacoby's "Indian Dances." This is, of course, subject to change.

The American Opera, whose performances of standard operas in English with modern simplified staging, greatly pleased Boston audiences last March, is expected to return here at the end of November, though no official announcement has yet been made public. Of the San Carlo Opera, usually to be expected here in the Fall, no word is available. It gave its series at Asheville in August, but the visits to New York, Boston and Philadelphia, that have usually followed have seemingly been abandoed or postponed. Since this company, by admirable performances of standard Italian operas greatly pleased a numerous following in Boston, it is to be hoped that Mr Gallo will bring it here later in the season.

Boston at last has a prospect of hearing two of the chief choral works of Bach. The Handel and Haydn Society is to give his "Passion According to St Matthew" on Good Friday evening, a venture for which praise and hearty support are due from everyone hereabouts who cares for the best in music. Dr Davidson is contemplating a performance of his B minor Mass, by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, which if it takes place will win the gratitude of many who have long desired a chance to hear it.

Mr Koussevitzky's double bass recital in New York last week was a great success. Carnegie Hall was crowded by a distinguished audience. Every review was extremely favorable, as it could scarcely fail to be, in view of his astonishing mastery of the unwieldy instrument.

There will be but one performance of the Ninth Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchesra Harvard Glee Club, and Radcliffe Choral Society, Nov 18; it is announced from Symphony Hall. Moral: Buy your tickets early if you want to get in. The soloists are to be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. Mr Koussevitzky, of course, will conduct. The proceeds go to swell the pension fund for retired members of the Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky

ONE hundred and ten musicians, each one an artist on his respective instrument, compose the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its first concert in Columbus in many years at Memorial Hall at 8:15 p. m. Thursday.

Serge Youssevitzky, rated as one of the three greatest symphony conductors in the world, will make his initial appearance in Columbus as director.

He is in his fifth season with the Boston group, and the orchestra is now in its forty-eighth year.

The program, which the orchestra has in store for central Ohio, is considered one of the most remarkable ever to be played in Columbus.

The Boston Symphony Starts 48th Season

In Fifth Year of Regime of Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its forty-eighth season and its fifth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, has a busy schedule for 1928-'29, with its usual Symphony Hall series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and Saturday evening pairs, five Monday evenings and five Tuesday afternoons, besides occasional pension fund concerts also in Symphony Hall and nine concerts in Sanders Theater, Harvard University, Cambridge. The orchestra will also give single concerts at Smith, Wellesley and Yale.

During the first week in November the Boston Symphony will visit Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. The usual five Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and Friday evenings at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be given on November 22-24, January 3-5, January 31-February 2, March 7-9 and April 11-13.

Mr. Koussevitzky has already introduced this season Stravinsky's "Apollo Musagetes," Kodaly's "Hary Janos" suite and a new partita by Michal Kondraczki, young Polish composer. Novelties to be offered include new symphonies by Prokokieff and Bohuslav Martinu and works by Aaron Copland and Roger Sessions. A symphony by Frederick the Great is to have its American premiere, and special Schubert Centennial concerts are also announced.

Boston Group to Render Ambitious Program Here

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the celebrated Serge Koussevitzky, Thursday evening at Memorial Hall, is one of the most remarkable ever to be attempted by any orchestra in Columbus.

Particularly outstanding is the fact that two of the numbers have never been played in Columbus and only a few times in America. These are the "Classical Symphony," by Prokofieff, and the orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet, by Ravel.

BRAHMS Symphony No. 2 in D major, with its four movements will consume the entire last half of the program and is the most tremendous thing on this symphonic menu. There is a possibility that this Brahms symphony has never been done in Columbus before either, close followers of symphony performances in Columbus being unable to recall a rendition of it, at least, during the past 12 or 16 years.

Serge Prokofieff, one of the most modern of the young composers, is known as the "enfant terrible" of contemporary Russian music. When he wrote his "Classical Symphony" he put aside for the time being his barbarians of ancient Scythia and his Babylonian demons. There are those who find a pure, spontaneous melodic vein in Prokofieff, a distonic simplicity and a fondness for C major even in his primitive scores. In his "Classical Symphony" these virtues are unconcealed by terrorism.

Last season when the distinguished French composer, Ravel, landed in America, he went to Carnegie Hall, New York, and sat in a box while Koussevitzky and his orchestra surprised him with the homage of a "Ravel Programme."

MAURICE Ravel, foremost of the impressionist painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." This score is probably also his largest canvass and never did he use so broad a brush with such overwhelming effect as in the tumultous dance which closes this suite.

In view of the fact that the various movements of a symphony are integral parts of a masterpiece, delicately linked together, the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring the series of concerts, has given orders to its ushers not to permit any one to take their seats between movements of a number.

The program will commence promptly at 8:15 p. m. and all patrons are urged to be in their seats at that time. The single seat sale for the Boston concert will not be opened at the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., until Wednesday morning. Until that time season tickets for the entire series, including the Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit orchestras, will be sold exclusively.

The Boston program is as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72 ..... Beethoven

Classical Symphony, Op. 25—Prokofieff
Allegro. Larghetto. Gavotte. Finale.
(First time in Columbus.)

Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis and Chloe" Ballet (Second Suite) ..... Ravel

Pantomime—Danse Generale ..... Lever du Jour
(First time in Columbus.)
Intermission.

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non Troppo. Adagio non Troppo. Allegretto Grazioso. Quasi Andantino. Allegro con Spirito.

In the World of Music

THE most interesting musical event of the week here was the recital given by Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall. Long before this distinguished musician entered the business of orchestral conducting he was known throughout Europe as a virtuoso performer on the double-bass; he was classed as one of the three greatest performers on this instrument the world has ever known.

Mr. Koussevitzky for many years startled the musical world abroad by his artistic playing upon an instrument not usually associated with solo performance, an instrument one thinks of as the backbone of orchestral structure. It is well known, of course, that for some years past Mr. Koussevitzky has been the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the time he has been associated with this great organization he has brought it back to the high standing it had for many years.

This recent appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky as a solo performer on the double-bass was at once of interest and attracted music lovers in great number to Carnegie Hall. Naturally, there was great curiosity to hear what this eminent musician and conductor could accomplish on this instrument.

USING an Amati double bass, which is smaller than ones seen in the usual orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky astounded his audience with a remarkable performance; it is astonishing the remarkable effects Mr. Koussevitzky extracted from this ungainly instrument. He made of it a solo instrument quite as much as is the cello. Naturally, the literature for the double-bass is very limited.

OLEY SPEAKS.

The player, however, grouped together a program which held the interest of the audience at all times. He had the assistance of Henri Casadeus, player of the Viola d' amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, pianist. One of the numbers on the program was Koussevitzky's own concerto for double-bass. The recital was one of the most unique musical events heard here in a long time.

• • •

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be away from this city this week since concerts will be given in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, and Pittsburgh. The fifth regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 9 and 10. Third Symphony of Sibelius, which has not yet been heard in Boston, Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and Frederick Jacobi's "Indian Dances," are on the program.

PENSION FUND

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony is announced for the fall pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 18. Mr. Koussevitzky will then conduct the orchestra, and the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, which are being trained by Dr. Davison and G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists will be Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevad Van de Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. There will be one performance only.

110 Musicians Comprise Boston Organization

The Boston Symphony Orchestra MEMORIAL HALL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is away this week on a tour which will take in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, and Pittsburg. The program now announced for the next pair of Boston concerts, Nov 9 and 10, includes Sibelius' Third Symphony, unfamiliar here; Skiriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," and Frederick Jacoby's "Indian Dances." This is, of course, subject to change.

The American Opera, whose performances of standard operas in English with modern simplified staging, greatly pleased Boston audiences last March, is expected to return here at the end of November, though no official announcement has yet been made public. Of the San Carlo Opera, usually to be expected here in the Fall, no word is available. It gave its series at Asheville in August, but the visits to New York, Boston and Philadelphia, that have usually followed have seemingly been abandoed or postponed. Since this company, by admirable performances of standard Italian operas greatly pleased a numerous following in Boston, it is to be hoped that Mr Gallo will bring it here later in the season.

Boston at last has a prospect of hearing two of the chief choral works of Bach. The Handel and Haydn Society is to give his "Passion According to St Matthew" on Good Friday evening, a venture for which praise and hearty support are due from everyone hereabouts who cares for the best in music. Dr Davidson is contemplating a performance of his B minor Mass, by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, which if it takes place will win the gratitude of many who have long desired a chance to hear it.

Mr Koussevitzky's double bass recital in New York last week was a great success. Carnegie Hall was crowded by a distinguished audience. Every review was extremely favorable, as it could scarcely fail to be, in view of his astonishing mastery of the unwieldy instrument.

There will be but one performance of the Ninth Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchesra Harvard Glee Club, and Radcliffe Choral Society, Nov 18; it is announced from Symphony Hall. Moral: Buy your tickets early if you want to get in. The soloists are to be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. Mr Koussevitzky, of course, will conduct. The proceeds go to swell the pension fund for retired members of the Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky

ONE hundred and ten musicians, each one an artist on his respective instrument, compose the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its first concert in Columbus in many years at Memorial Hall at 8:15 p. m. Thursday.

Serge Youssevitzky, rated as one of the three greatest symphony conductors in the world, will make his initial appearance in Columbus as director.

He is in his fifth season with the Boston group, and the orchestra is now in its forty-eighth year.

The program, which the orchestra has in store for central Ohio, is considered one of the most remarkable ever to be played in Columbus.

The Boston Symphony Starts 48th Season

In Fifth Year of Regime of Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its forty-eighth season and its fifth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, has a busy schedule for 1928-'29, with its usual Symphony Hall series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and Saturday evening pairs, five Monday evenings and five Tuesday afternoons, besides occasional pension fund concerts also in Symphony Hall and nine concerts in Sanders Theater, Harvard University, Cambridge. The orchestra will also give single concerts at Smith, Wellesley and Yale.

During the first week in November the Boston Symphony will visit Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. The usual five Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and Friday evenings at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be given on November 22-24, January 3-5, January 31-February 2, March 7-9 and April 11-13.

Mr. Koussevitzky has already introduced this season Stravinsky's "Apollo Musagetes," Kodaly's "Hary Janos" suite and a new partita by Michal Kondraczki, young Polish composer. Novelties to be offered include new symphonies by Prokokieff and Bohuslav Martinu and works by Aaron Copland and Roger Sessions. A symphony by Frederick the Great is to have its American premiere, and special Schubert Centennial concerts are also announced.

Boston Group to Render Ambitious Program Here

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the celebrated Serge Koussevitzky, Thursday evening at Memorial Hall, is one of the most remarkable ever to be attempted by any orchestra in Columbus.

Particularly outstanding is the fact that two of the numbers have never been played in Columbus and only a few times in America. These are the "Classical Symphony," by Prokofieff, and the orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet, by Ravel.

BRAHMS Symphony No. 2 in D major, with its four movements will consume the entire last half of the program and is the most tremendous thing on this symphonic menu. There is a possibility that this Brahms symphony has never been done in Columbus before either, close followers of symphony performances in Columbus being unable to recall a rendition of it, at least, during the past 12 or 16 years.

Serge Prokofieff, one of the most modern of the young composers, is known as the "enfant terrible" of contemporary Russian music. When he wrote his "Classical Symphony" he put aside for the time being his barbarians of ancient Scythia and his Babylonian demons. There are those who find a pure, spontaneous melodic vein in Prokofieff, a distonic simplicity and a fondness for C major even in his primitive scores. In his "Classical Symphony" these virtues are unconcealed by terrorism.

Last season when the distinguished French composer, Ravel, landed in America, he went to Carnegie Hall, New York, and sat in a box while Koussevitzky and his orchestra surprised him with the homage of a "Ravel Programme."

MAURICE Ravel, foremost of the painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." This score is probably also his largest canvass and never did he use so broad a brush with such overwhelming effect as in the tumultous dance which closes this suite.

In view of the fact that the various movements of a symphony are integral parts of a masterpiece, delicately linked together, the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring the series of concerts, has given orders to its ushers not to permit any one to take their seats between movements of a number.

The program will commence promptly at 8:15 p. m. and all patrons are urged to be in their seats at that time. The single seat sale for the Boston concert will not be opened at the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., until Wednesday morning. Until that time season tickets for the entire series, including the Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit orchestras, will be sold exclusively.

The Boston program is as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72 ..... Beethoven

Classical Symphony, Op. 25—Prokofieff
Allegro. Larghetto. Gavotte. Finale.
(First time in Columbus.)

Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis and Chloe" Ballet (Second Suite).. Ravel
Pantomime—Danse Generale .....
..... Lever du Jour
(First time in Columbus.)
Intermission.

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non Troppo. Adagio non Troppo. Allegretto Grazioso, Quasi Andantino. Allegro con Spirito.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

vocal writing of the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The subdivisions of the first movement traverse "The Virgin's Dream," The Appearance of The Angel," "Dialogue of The Angel and Mary" (with a theme in heavy chords in the piano that is frequently heard throughout this and the succeeding movement), "O Sanctissima," "The Passion," "The Angel Tells of Her Glorification," "The Religious Ecstasy of the Virgin," "Disappearance of The Angel." Under "The Miracle" we hear "Mary's Anxiety and Pain," "Comforting Voice From Above," "Mary Remembers the Prophecy," "Her Fears again Gain The Upper Hand," "Again The Heavenly Voice Speaks," "Mary Fortified in Her Faith," "Preparation for the Miracle," "The Voice of the Searching Shepherds," "The Miracle is an Accomplished fact," "Heavenly Lullaby."

The third and fourth movements follow each other without pause. The essence of "The Lament" is a lyric duet between first and second violins over pizzicati-chords in lower strings and piano. "The Grave" is pictured by mournful descending imitative passages in strings over extremely dissonant chords, in the double basses. As an interlude the piano introduces material in repeated dissonant chords, which is soon taken up by strings. Then an ascending figure becomes the subject of many imitations; the rhythm grows more taut; the speed increases; there is a strong climax, by which tokens we have progressed to "The Transfiguration." Only these last two movements are to be played at Symphony Hall. The composer gives information that the inspiration for the work came from a triptych for an altar at Colmar painted by the artist, Grünewald. The Concerto was written in 1925.

From a review in the New York Times, written after the performance of the "Concerto Sacro" in that city by the orchestra of the Juillard Graduate School comes a final informing note: "Professor Josten's harmonic style in the work heard last night, which partakes appropriately of an archaic character, is his own. He has melodic invention, taste, and sincere and communicative feeling. The 'Concerto Sacro' might well have been inspired by some naive religioous painting of the thirteenth century. There is a half dramatic and to the imagination almost a pictorial conception of the music, or at least of much of the music. One sees the tone-picture, as it were, in simple, stiff, almost argus lines, illuminated in certain colors, which are sometimes relieved by a softer harmonic background. . . ."

A. H. M.

Last New Number At Symphony Hall

THE END of the Symphony Concerts draws near. The last "novelty" has been listed upon a program. The coming week-end will hear it—two movements of a "Concerto Sacro," or "Sacred Concerto," by Professor Werner Josten of the Department of Music at Smith College. He was born at Elberfeld in Germany, in 1888. He was destined early for banking, but found his way into music. He studied principally under Rudolf Siegel (composer, conductor, favored pupil of Humperdinck) and Emile Jacques-Dalcroze. Before the war he dwelt in Munich, Paris, and again in Munich. In 1921 he came to New York; in 1923 was appointed professor of composition and fugue at Smith College.

Mr. Josten has won many praises by his production at Smith College of early operas and cantatas—from Monteverdi, the first important composer in that field, but chiefly a name in a book for the music-loving public; from Handel, confidently asserted to be not "stageworthy" under modern conditions; from lesser composers. It is evident that in the ancient styles lies Mr. Josten's chief interest. A list of his ccompositions, which are not inconsiderable, indicates a kindred creative bent. The impending piece in entirety is a "Sacred Concerto" for string orchestra and piano. It runs in four movements which have to do with the birth, the life and death of Jesus: I. The Annunciation; II. The Miracle; III. The Lament; IV. The Grave and Transfiguration.

For the first two movements the composer provides an elaborate program by means of captions placed at frequent intervals along the score. The third and fourth movements have no sub-titles. But the fourth is called an "instrumental motet," which gives clue to its contrapuntal style, with frequent points of imitation, after the manner of the

Concert-Chronicle

New Wind-Choir

A NEW concert-room and a new Woodwind Ensemble are discoveries enough for a single evening in Bos-

The new concert-room is the hall of the American Academy of Arts and ences in Newbury Street. It is readaccessible, seats comfortably a hund or two listeners; seems a veritable nding board for the softest euphony he finest modulation played within it. ether it is available for concerts in t smaller dimensions, deponent saith n certainly it is ideal shelter for them.

. . . The new Ensemble enlists Mr. rent, the master-flutist of the Symny Orchestra; Mr. Gillet, first oboist at band; Mr. Laus, its first bassoon; Valkenier from its octet of horns. hem are joined Mr. Ralph McLane, hful clarinetist, who by the signs of erday can keep such company worthMr. Carl Lamson, the pianist, in the c eye and ear usually sitting beside Kreisler.

need each virtuoso can individualis instrument; at need also, all five fuse their tone, keeping it as well c, sensuous and alight. The level ill is high and equalized; only Mr. on seemed less accustomed than his s to ensemble-playing. Musical inence and feeling, the needful sense e from piece to piece, go warm and ocal. At every turn its beginnings d the sextet; its future beckons romise; it bids fair to fill the place ve the pleasure in our public pernce of chamber music, missed gretted since the dissolution of the Club.

In one respect the program set for this first concert was singular. The ancients held place when Mr. Laurent and Mr. Lamson played a Sonata for flute and piano—edited from the original

Continued on Following Page

TRANS Apr 18

crease in value."

Full Report of Symphony Poll

Continued from Preceding Page

all precedent of the past never will. The full poll then:

SYMPHONIES

Chaikovsky, No. 5	440
Franck	302
Brahms, No. 2	11[illegible]
Schubert, "Unfinished"	9[illegible]
Sibelius, No. 3	7[illegible]
Beethoven, No. 6 "Pastoral"	7[illegible]
Beethoven, No. 3 "Eroica"	6[illegible]
Prokofiev, "Classical"	5[illegible]
Bloch, "America"	[illegible]
Bruckner, No. 8
Mozart, "Jupiter"
Schumann, No. 1
Schubert, No. 7
Mahler, "Song of the Earth"
Beethoven, No. 1
Haydn, "Surprise"
Hanson, Nordic Symphony
Schubert, "Tragic"
Dukelsky
Hill
Frederick the Great
Schubert, No. 5
Halffter, Sinfonietta
Miaskovsky, No. 8

TONE-POEMS

Ravel, "The Waltz," Choreographic Poem
Strauss, "Zarathustra"
Debussy, "Afternoon of a Faun"
Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy" Carpenter, "Skyscrapers"
Strauss, "Decthco Transfigùration"
Debussy, "Iberia" Goldmark, "Negro Rhapsody"
Debussy, "Nocturnes"
Schelling, "Morocco"
Honegger, "Horace Victorieux"
Turina, "La Procession del Rocio"
Ravel, "Alborada del Grazioso" Martinu, "La Symphonie" Ibert, "Féeriques"

MUSIC IN OTHER FORMS

Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers"	3
Sibelius, Concerto for Violin	1
Beethoven, Overture, "Leonore" No. 3	1
Chaikovsky, Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"	1
Moussorgsky, Pictures at an Exhibition	1
Stravinsky, "Apollo"
Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 4
Strauss, Salome's Dance from "Salomé"
Handel, Concerto Grosso No. 12
Foote, Suite in E minor
Bach, C. P. E., Concerto for Orchestra
Toch, Concerto for Piano
Berlioz, Overture, "Roman Carnival" Kodaly, Suite "Hary Janos"
Honegger, 'Pacific 2-3-1'
Albeniz, Suite, "Iberia"
De Falla, Dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat" Coossens, Rhythmic Dance
Honegger, "Rugby"
Hindemith, Concerto for Orchestra
Jacobi, Indian Dances
Copland, Two Pieces for Orchestra
Honegger, "Pastorale d'Eté"
Janin, 'Symphonic Spirituelle' Honegger, "Chant de Nigamon"

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

bass—by Marcello of the seventeenth century. The modernists took turn in a Quintet by Hindemith new to most ears. The concert ended with Beethoven's Quintet (Op. 16) for Oboe, Clarinet, Horn, Bassoon and Piano, wherewith he took leave of chamber-music for wind choir, because it could yield nothing further to expanding invention and imperious will. The first piece had been a Sextet by Thuille, (the composer of the nineties whose early death Munich deplored), that the whole Ensemble might make simultaneous début. Two Germans, an Austrian, an Italian, but no Frenchman. Not that by race or residence a Parisian should take title to place upon the program; but because by common consent the French excell most other composers in artful, fanciful music for wind choir. No doubt succeeding concerts will adjust the reckoning.

As it stood, the program held interest and gave pleasure with little or none of the sense of surfeit and limitation that can haunt such concerts ill-planned. Thuille's Sextet is frankly, honestly, naturally German—over-written on occasional pages, preferring the voices warm, thick and sensuous rather than cool, transparent or piercing. Thuille writes songfully; is no stranger to mood; fills four movements as from young eagerness; in his Gavotte must even trip operatically. He is deft also with his wind choir; avoids the trap of monotonous imitation between the instruments; distributes, contrasts and blends them shrewdly and sensitively.

Hindemith was antidote—and also Hindemith. Hear the humors that can be extracted from a Quintet of Winds; note how pungent may be their voices [illegible]rgencies. Instantly the calm of their household is shattered; they are both attacked by the frenzies of jealousy, and the quarrels that result are explosive enough to raise the roof of Miss Elliott's sedate theater.

"Having carried his young couple to this point the playwright quite obviously doesn't know what more to do with them. His perplexity is thoroughly understandable and should bring him no chagrin, for it is a problem which has baffled other authorities on marriage like Westermarck and Keyserling before him. Unfortunately, however, this is a play and every play must have a final curtain, so Mr. Burke in desperation brings this one down with a dash of melodrama in which a delirious lover tries to shoot the husband and the wife risks her life to save him. As the safest manner of handling such explosive material he hit upon farce, and as farce it is played by a deft and expert cast. Violet Heming and Minor Watson are the embattled spouses, with Juliette Day and Malcolm Duncan playing another warring couple in a sort of jangled counter duet."

Ziegfeldiana

The Transcript has received the following telegram from Mr. Ziegfeld about the coming of "Show Boat" to Boston on May 6:

Acting upon your advice, although I intended to hold "Show Boat" until next fall, owing to fact that company is so enormously expensive, I have decided to play Boston four weeks at the Colonial, commencing May 6th, with the original cast direct from the Ziegfeld Theater. The small capacity of the Ziegfeld Theater necessitates my playing to absolute capacity to cover my expenditures for this organization, but I feel that Boston always treated my productions with such great consideration and liberal patronage that it should see "Show Boat" exactly as it was given in New York—the same com-

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Thursday

COLUMBUS DESPATCH Oct 25

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, consisting of 110 players, and selected because each one is an artist at his instrument, will pay Columbus a visit, Thursday evening, for the first time in many years. A concert, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will be given in Memorial hall at 8:15 p. m., under auspices of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, of which Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington is president.

With the Boston concert, the Symphony club will open its fifth annual series of symphony presentations. The organization is operating on a strictly philanthropical basis, all profits being diverted to an instrument and schclarship fund for Columbus schools and musically talented children.

It is the hope of the club this season to derive a surplus above expenses from its series of four evening concerts in order to endow its proposed scholarship fund. These evening concerts will be given, besides the Boston, by the Cincinnati orchestra, Dec. 3; the Cleveland, Feb. 4, and the Detroit, on March 4, each under celebrated conductors. The fund the club is striving for will provide financial assistance for children or students who otherwise would be unable to cultivate their innate talents.

From the proceeds of the club's two children's matinee concerts by the Cincinnati orchestra on Dec. 3, and the Detroit on Feb. 4, additional instruments will be purchased for Columbus school orchestras. Last year more than $1200 worth of instruments were bought for the schools under the supervision of Robert W. Roberts, supervisor of music in the public schools.

The Concert REVIEWED

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

At the Eastman Theater

ROCHESTER N.Y. TIMES-UNION - Oct 30

By A. J. WARNER

The Program

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25 .. .. Prokofieff
Allegro
Larghetto
Gavotte
Finale
Prelude a L'Apres-Midi D'un Faune" (The Afternoon of a Faun) ..... Debussy
Eclogue by S. Mallarme
Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet ..... Ravel
(Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, paid one of its all too infrequent visits to Rochester last night and gave a concert of memorable beauty in the Eastman Theater before a large and rapturous audience. Under the baton of a musician who has been wisely characterized as challenging, provocative and alive, New England's venerable and distinguished band has assumed a new and quickening splendor which has made its performances a synonym for orchestral "Eventfulness."

The conductorial qualities of Mr. Koussevitzky do not lend themselves readily to definition. They are by no means of a sort that calls forth unanimous approbation, especially among reactionary music lovers, and much has been said and written concerning his manner of dealing with the classics. Yet boredom takes flight at Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts and the magic of an amazingly arresting personality ensnares his listeners. He has a complete faith, so it seems, in his own interpretive point of view and he proceeds to proclaim it with an irresistible intensity.

The assertion of those who hail him as a sensationalist is difficult, I have always felt, to credit. Rather is he a master of communicative individualism, passionately eager to convey, through the medium of his players, what he is sure each composer means to say. Mr. Koussevitzky is almost invariably interesting and his orchestra—generally acknowledged to be one of the three or four greatest in the world—leaves behind it these days what W. J. Henderson has referred to as a resplendent trail of glory. Certainly last night's concert was a magnificent revelation of the present high attainments of the Boston Symphony in regard to technical proficiency—as an instrument whose various choirs sing as a single celestial voice.

Mr. Koussevitzky has a genius for choosing engrossing and harmonious programs. On this occasion he began with the "Classical" Symphony, op. 25, of Serge Prokefieff, the modern Russian, whose works he has so often elected to play for his Boston public. It was given a performance that was as transparent and spirited as the music is humorcus, innocuous and facile. Nowhere to be found were the raucous and bizarre characteristics of the Prokofieff of the ballet "Chout" or the "Scythian Suite," and in their stead is an attempt—according to Felix Borowski, compiler of the program notes of the Chicago Orchestra — "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." But, as Olin Downes has remarked, it would take at least a Mozart to imagine what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living today. To imitate the Mozartian idiom is indeed a rather "tall order." Mr. Prokofieff has, however, contrived some entirely agreeable music that is melodious and easy to hear. "Ersatz Mozart," Lawrence Gilman called it.

Debussy's masterwork in the realm of impressionism, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," came next on the program and was played in superlative fashion. There was a singular harmony of choice in having Ravel follow — with the excerpts from his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet, which reveal so bewilderingly the composer's necromancy in the realm of instrumentation. His score is a kaleidoscope of multi-colored sonorities and its performance last evening was an enchanting experience for the collective ear of the audience. One could only exclaim in wonder: "What an orchestra!"

The concert was brought to a close with Brahms' second symphony in D major op. 73 whose tenderness and serenity were exquisitely unfolded by a conductor who, though not controlled by tradition, never sacrificed the grace and beauty of the music to a desire to depart from the interpretive path of custom. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were accorded an ovation at the end of the program.

KOUSSEVITZKY MASTERLY IN CONCERT HERE

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS

Boston Symphony Orchestra wins mighty ovations with program here

OCT. 31

Superlatives seem indeed vain things when it comes to fittingly describing the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, in Elmwood Music hall last evening. This was the first of the symphony series under auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, with Marian de Forest, local manager, and a brilliant audience assembled, one which voiced its appreciation with repeated ovations both for the distinguished conductor and the members of the orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is a genius at program-making, and a master magician of tonal beauty, effective contrasts and building up of tremendous climaxes. His musicianship is superb, and elegance and aristocracy of style and the intellectual grasp which controls his readings never allows him to deviate from the high standards he preserves in all his interpretations.

The first part of the program was devoted to the modernists, and the opening number, Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Opus 25, was a performance of intriguing beauty and graceful charm, the larghetto being notably fascinating, and the entire work infused with a vitality and invigorating spirit that won a flattering testimonial from the audience. Next came Debussy's Prelude, The Afternoon of a Faun, as exquisite an example of tonal painting as has been heard here in many seasons. The eerie quality of the music, the radiant enchantment of the theme developed by the wood winds, with the far distant horns and the cloying sweetness of the harps, with the entrance of the flute singing its song of pastoral charm and the further entrance of the oboe and the clarinet were blended into an ensemble of loveliness. Then the gradual dying away of the melody which produced an uncanny effect. All won such approbation that Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled with loud acclaims and generously signaled his orchestra to rise and share the honors.

Other Numbers

In the Ravel number, Daphnis et Chlo's ballet in one act, a tonal poem of love, suggesting wood nymphs, the singing of birds, the pipes of Pan and the beauties of nature are woven into a musical tapestry of soft harmonies and delicate color. This again won great applause for Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians.

The final offering was the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major in which the tenderness and calm serene beauty of this composer, whom Von Bulow classed as one of the Three B's, with Bach and Beethoven, brought out the finest resources of the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky's inspired reading. It glowed with color and poetic imagination and the imposing grandeur of the final movement, which ended in a perfect blaze of orchestral glory, was such a triumphal achievement that the eminent conductor was accorded prolonged applause and recalls.

Chamber Music Recital

Music lovers were given a rare treat yesterday afternoon when nine members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were heard in one of the most beautiful programs of chamber music ever heard in this city. Robert Gundersen, violin; Carlos Pinfield, violin; Jean Lefranc, viola; Alfred Zighera, 'cello; George Laurent, flute; Fernand [illegible]

Boston Symphony Plays First Concert in Eastman Series B

ROCHESTER DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

By STEWART B. SABIN

OCT 30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitski, gave last evening the first of the Eastman Theater Series B concerts. The program consisted of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite, three movements, and Brahms' Second Symphony.

It was a program that at casual glance looked to be decidedly modern in slant in its first section, with a Brahms finale to tilt it back toward older music—all the more this impression because two of the first three numbers had not previously been played in Rochester. As an experience, it proved a program that had balance and proportion, if it lacked, in one particular, contrast.

Prokofieff is a most versatile personage among the present-day composers; he can be as declamatory and vociferous as any, and is on occasion. But his classical symphony proves that he can be in spirit and expression direct, clear, charming and consistent in mood with the title he chose for this composition. It is not a symphony built on large lines; if its extension of ideas is not great, its ideas are highly interesting, are expressed fully and concisely and not elaborated t[illegible]edom. There is a gay spirit in the quick movements and graceful repose that is charming in the slow movement. There is little clash or clatter in the piece but it gave genuine pleasure to the writer as music and the performance of it was a delight in its clarity, its tonal tints, its brilliance.

There followed a performance of Debussy's "Faun" which was very lovely in the sectional and solo instrument playing. It was a deliberate performance and one in which tonal color was spread with elegance. It had not the rhythmic definition in places which this writer happens to like, but it flowed along with constant joy to the hearer because of the beauty of sound heard.

tor's notion of that thought clearly given. The result was a performthat was exceedingly lovely much of the time, but which made seem to the writer that Brahms "loafed" in this symphony more than in his others; that there are a goodly number of passages in this score which are plain writing against space, not adding to the musical message.

The Boston Symphony seemed to the writer to be as worthy of encomium as ever it was. It gave a performance leaving the hearer satisfied with its technical and tonal excellence. The audience of the evening seemed to indicate this satisfaction by its reception of the conductor and players.

It was written above that in one particular the program seemed to lack contrast and this between numbers. Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" which followed the Debussy is music of the same school—that is, it is music which the two composers conceived from viewpoints akin as to method of expression through the orchestra. The Ravel begins with a panorama of hushed sound that was exquisitely produced by the orchestra and up out of this comes slowly form and substance, more solid substance as the suite progressed than is usual with Ravel; by this is not meant climax, but the texture of the music itself. It is music that needs virtuosity in an orchestra like to that of a Hofmann at the piano, and this virtuosity Mr. Koussevitski amply secures from his players. Moreover, whatever the demand for note playing, the quality remains undiminished in worth. The audience recalled the conductor after each program number in the first program section, recalled him so positively that on second returns to his stand he brought the orchestra to its several feet in acknowledgement.

Coming to the Brahms symphony Mr. Koussevitski proved himself consistent. So much in sympathy with modern music is he that when he first came to the Boston Orchestra there was suspicion that his treatment of the older music might be either perfunctory or peculiar. Last night his treatment of Brahms music was what it had been of the music played before. Detail was meticulously searched out and made manifest; the lovely tunes Brahms wrote into this symphony were carefully, almost tenderly, considered; where there was instrumentation to give contrasting color it was made much of; rhythms were distinct to dainty nicety. It was not a performance where the composer was left to take of himself through the literal playing of his music; the composer was examined for his innermost thought and the conduc-ance of a much played symphony

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Thursday

COLUMBUS DESPATCH Oct 28

19

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, consisting of 110 players, and selected because each one is an artist at his instrument, will pay Columbus a visit, Thursday evening, for the first time in many years. A concert, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will be given in Memorial hall at 8:15 p. m., under auspices of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, of which Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington is president.

With the Boston concert, the Symphony club will open its fifth annual series of symphony presentations. The organization is operating on a strictly philanthropical basis, all profits being diverted to an instrument and schclarship fund for Columbus schools and musically talented children.

It is the hope of the club this season to derive a surplus above expenses from its series of four evening concerts in order to endow its proposed scholarship fund. These evening concerts will be given, besides the Boston, by the Cincinnati orchestra, Dec. 3; the Cleveland, Feb. 4, and the Detroit, on March 4, each under celebrated conductors. The fund the club is striving for will provide financial assistance for children or students who otherwise would be unable to cultivate their innate talents.

From the proceeds of the club's two children's matinee concerts by the Cincinnati orchestra on Dec. 3, and the Detroit on Feb. 4, additional instruments will be purchased for Columbus school orchestras. Last year more than $1200 worth of instruments were bought for the schools under the supervision of Robert W. Roberts, supervisor of music in the public schools.

greatest symphony con- played in Columbus.

The Concert REVIEWED

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

At the Eastman Theater

ROCHESTER N.Y. TIMES-UNION - Oct 30

By A. J. WARNER

The Program

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25 .. .. Prokofieff
- Allegro
- Larghetto
- Gavotte
- Finale

Prelude a L'Apres-Midi D'un Faune" (The Afternoon of a Faun) .... Debussy
- Eclogue by S. Mallarme

Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet ..... Ravel (Second Suite)
- Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms
- Allegro non troppo
- Adagio non troppo
- Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
- Allegro con spirito

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, paid one of its all too infrequent visits to Rochester last night and gave a concert of memorable beauty in the Eastman Theater before a large and rapturous audience. Under the baton of a musician who has been wisely characterized as challenging, provocative and alive, New England's venerable and distinguished band has assumed a new and quickening splendor which has made its performances a synonym for orchestral "Eventfulness."

The conductorial qualities of Mr. Koussevitzky do not lend themselves readily to definition. They are by no means of a sort that calls forth unanimous approbation, especially among reactionary music lovers, and much has been said and written concerning his manner of dealing with the classics. Yet boredom takes flight at Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts and the magic of an amazingly arresting personality ensnares his listeners. He has a complete faith, so it seems, in his own interpretive point of view and he proceeds to proclaim it with an irresistible intensity.

The assertion of those who hail him as a sensationalist is difficult, I have always felt, to credit. Rather is he a master of communicative individualism, passionately eager to convey, through the medium of his players, what he is sure each composer means to say. Mr. Koussevitzky is almost invariably interesting and his orchestra—generally acknowledged to be one of the three or four greatest in the world—leaves behind it these days what W. J. Henderson has referred to as a resplendent trail of glory. Certainly last night's concert was a magnificent revelation of the present high attainments of the Boston Symphony in regard to technical proficiency—as an instrument whose various choirs sing as a single celestial voice.

Mr. Koussevitzky has a genius for choosing engrossing and harmonious programs. On this occasion he began with the "Classical" Symphony, op. 25, of Serge Prokefieff, the modern Russian, whose works he has so often elected to play for his Boston public. It was given a performance that was as transparent and spirited as the music is humorcus, innocuous and facile. Nowhere to be found were the raucous and bizarre characteristics of the Prokofieff of the ballet "Chout" or the "Scythian Suite," and in their stead is an attempt—according to Felix Borowski, compiler of the program notes of the Chicago Orchestra — "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." But, as Olin Downes has remarked, it would take at least a Mozart to imagine what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living today. To imitate the Mozartian idiom is indeed a rather "tall order." Mr. Prokofieff has, however, contrived some entirely agreeable music that is melodious and easy to hear. "Ersatz Mozart," Lawrence Gilman called it.

Debussy's masterwork in the realm of impressionism, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," came next on the program and was played in superlative fashion. There was a singular harmony of choice in having Ravel follow — with the excerpts from his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet, which reveal so bewilderingly the composer's necromancy in the realm of instrumentation. His score is a kaleidoscope of multi-colored sonorities and its performance last evening was an enchanting experience for the collective ear of the audience. One could only exclaim in wonder: "What an orchestra!"

The concert was brought to a close with Brahms' second symphony in D major op. 73 whose tenderness and serenity were exquisitely unfolded by a conductor who, though not controlled by tradition, never sacrificed the grace and beauty of the music to a desire to depart from the interpretive path of custom. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were accorded an ovation at the end of the program.

KOUSSEVITZKY MASTERLY IN CONCERT HERE

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS

Boston Symphony Orchestra wins mighty ovations with program here

Oct 31

Superlatives seem indeed vain things when it comes to fittingly describing the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, in Elmwood Music hall last evening. This was the first of the symphony series under auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, with Marian de Forest, local manager, and a brilliant audience assembled, one which voiced its appreciation with repeated ovations both for the distinguished conductor and the members of the orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is a genius at program-making, and a master magician of tonal beauty, effective contrasts and building up of tremendous climaxes. His musicianship is superb, and elegance and aristocracy of style and the intellectual grasp which controls his readings never allows him to deviate from the high standards he preserves in all his interpretations.

The first part of the program was devoted to the modernists, and the opening number, Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Opus 25, was a performance of intriguing beauty and graceful charm, the larghetto being notably fascinating, and the entire work infused with a vitality and invigorating spirit that won a flattering testimonial from the audience. Next came Debussy's Prelude, The Afternoon of a Faun, as exquisite an example of tonal painting as has been heard here in many seasons. The eerie quality of the music, the radiant enchantment of the theme developed by the wood winds, with the far distant horns and the cloying sweetness of the harps, with the entrance of the flute singing its song of pastoral charm and the further entrance of the oboe and the clarinet were blended into an ensemble of loveliness. Then the gradual dying away of the melody which produced an uncanny effect. All won such approbation that Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled with loud acclaims and generously signaled his orchestra to rise and share the honors.

Other Numbers

In the Ravel number, Daphnis et Chlo's ballet in one act, a tonal poem of love, suggesting wood nymphs, the singing of birds, the pipes of Pan and the beauties of nature are woven into a musical tapestry of soft harmonies and delicate color. This again won great applause for Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians.

The final offering was the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major in which the tenderness and calm serene beauty of this composer, whom Von Bulow classed as one of the Three B's, with Bach and Beethoven, brought out the finest resources of the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky's inspired reading. It glowed with color and poetic imagination and the imposing grandeur of the final movement, which ended in a perfect blaze of orchestral glory, was such a triumphal achievement that the eminent conductor was accorded prolonged applause and recalls.

Chamber Music Recital

Music lovers were given a rare treat yesterday afternoon when nine members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were heard in one of the most beautiful programs of chamber music ever heard in this city. Robert Gundersen, violin; Carlos Pinfield, violin; Jean Lefranc, viola; Alfred Zighera, 'cello; George Laurent, flute; Fernard Gillet, oboe; Paul Mimart, clarinet; Raymond Allard, bassoon, and Bernard Zighera, piano, were the artists who presented the program of numbers by Gluck, Beethoven, Mozart, Borodine, Bach Schubert and other composers, a full review of which will appear in the Sunday music page.

CHARLES BRIDGES

Wolcott, Oct. 29—Charles Bridges, 59, died at his home here Sunday. He is survived by his widow Martha Gray Bridges, one son, Thomas Bridges, of Akron, Ohio, and one brother, Dr. Edward Bridges, of Maine.

ELIZABETH GIBSON

Carlton, Oct. 29—Edith Eliza Gibson, 12, died here yesterday at Rochester, Oct. 12, 1928.

FRANK J. LINGE.

[illegible] written above that in one [illegible] seemed to [illegible] may seem right to those who make the laws, but to us younger would-be voters, it doesn't seem just.

It was a program that [illegible] glance looked to be decidedly modern in slant in its first section, with a Brahms finale to tilt it back toward older music—all the more this impression because two of the first three numbers had not previously been played in Rochester. As an experience, it proved a program that had balance and proportion, if it lacked, in one particular, contrast.

Prokofieff is a most versatile personage among the present-day composers; he can be as declamatory and vociferous as any, and is on occasion. But his classical symphony proves that he can be in spirit and expression direct, clear, charming and consistent in mood with the title he chose for this composition. It is not a symphony built on large lines; if its extension of ideas is not great, its ideas are highly interesting, are expressed fully and concisely and not elaborated t[illegible]edom. There is a gay spirit in the quick movements and graceful repose that is charming in the slow movement. There is little clash or clatter in the piece but it gave genuine pleasure to the writer as music and the performance of it was a delight in its clarity, its tonal tints, its brilliance.

There followed a performance of Debussy's "Faun" which was very lovely in the sectional and solo instrument playing. It was a deliberate performance and one in which tonal color was spread with elegance. It had not the rhythmic definition in places which this writer happens to like, but it flowed along with constant joy to the hearer because of the beauty of sound heard.

[illegible]tor's notion of that thought clearly given. The result was a perform[illegible] that was exceedingly lovely much of the time, but which made seem to the writer that Brahms "loafed" in this symphony more than in his others; that there are a goodly number of passages in this score which are plain writing against space, not adding to the musical message.

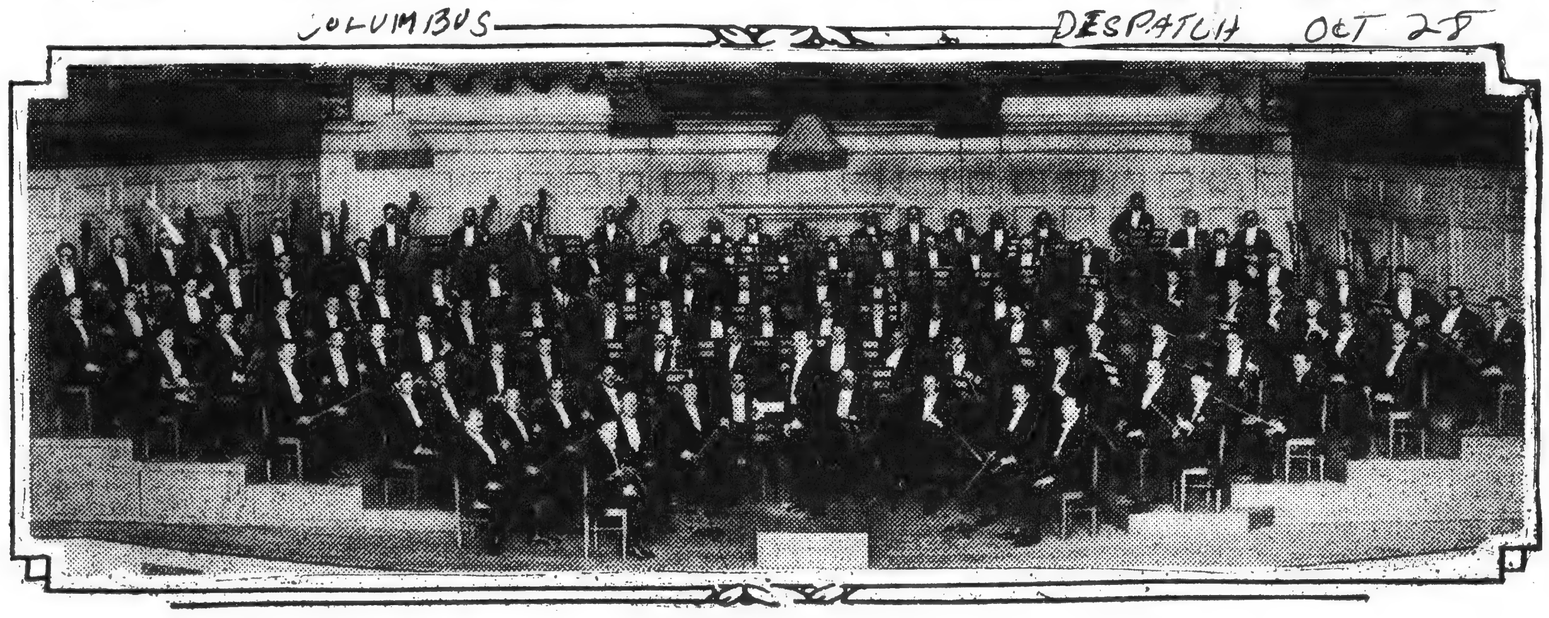
The Boston Symphony seemed to the writer to be as worthy of encomium as ever it was. It gave a performance leaving the hearer satisfied with its technical and tonal excellence. The audience of the evening seemed to indicate this satisfaction by its reception of the conductor and players.

[illegible]roduced by the orchestra and up out of this comes slowly form and substance, more solid substance as the suite progressed than is usual with Ravel; by this is not meant climax, but the texture of the music itself. It is music that needs virtuosity in an orchestra like to that of a Hofmann at the piano, and this virtuosity Mr. Koussevitski amply secures from his players. Moreover, whatever the demand for note playing, the quality remains undiminished in worth. The audience recalled the conductor after each program number in the first program section, recalled him so positively that on second returns to his stand he brought the orchestra to its several feet in acknowledgement.

Coming to the Brahms symphony Mr. Koussevitski proved himself consistent. So much in sympathy with modern music is he that when he first came to the Boston Orchestra there was suspicion that his treatment of the older music might be either perfunctory or peculiar. Last night his treatment of Brahms music was what it had been of the music played before. Detail was meticulously searched out and made manifest; the lovely tunes Brahms wrote into this symphony were carefully, almost tenderly, considered; where there was instrumentation to give contrasting color it was made much of; rhythms were distinct to dainty nicety. It was not a performance where the composer was left to take of himself through the literal playing of his music; the composer was examined for his innermost thought and the conductance of a much played symphony

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming Thursday

COLUMBUS DESPATCH Oct 28



THE Boston Symphony orchestra, consisting of 110 players, and selected because each one is an artist at his instrument, will pay Columbus a visit, Thursday evening, for the first time in many years. A concert, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will be given in Memorial hall at 8:15 p. m., under auspices of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, of which Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington is president.

With the Boston concert, the Symphony club will open its fifth annual series of symphony presentations. The organization is operating on a strictly philanthropical basis, all profits being diverted to an instrument and schclarship fund for Columbus schools and musically talented children.

It is the hope of the club this season to derive a surplus above expenses from its series of four evening concerts in order to endow its proposed scholarship fund. These evening concerts will be given, besides the Boston, by the Cincinnati orchestra, Dec. 3; the Cleveland, Feb. 4, and the Detroit, on March 4, each under celebrated conductors. The fund the club is striving for will provide financial assistance for children or students who otherwise would be unable to cultivate their innate talents.

From the proceeds of the club's two children's matinee concerts by the Cincinnati orchestra on Dec. 3, and the Detroit on Feb. 4, additional instruments will be purchased for Columbus school orchestras. Last year more than $1200 worth of instruments were bought for the schools under the supervision of Robert W. Roberts, supervisor of music in the public schools.

The Concert REVIEWED — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA At the Eastman Theater

ROCHESTER, N.Y. TIMES-UNION - Oct 30

By A. J. WARNER

The Program

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25 ..... Prokofieff
- Allegro
- Larghetto
- Gavotte
- Finale

Prelude a L'Apres-Midi D'un Faune" (The Afternoon of a Faun) ..... Debussy
Eclogue by S. Mallarme

Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet ..... Ravel (Second Suite)
- Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms
- Allegro non troppo
- Adagio non troppo
- Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
- Allegro con spirito

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, paid one of its all too infrequent visits to Rochester last night and gave a concert of memorable beauty in the Eastman Theater before a large and rapturous audience. Under the baton of a musician who has been wisely characterized as challenging, provocative and alive, New England's venerable and distinguished band has assumed a new and quickening splendor which has made its performances a synonym for orchestral "Eventfulness."

The conductorial qualities of Mr. Koussevitzky do not lend themselves readily to definition. They are by no means of a sort that calls forth unanimous approbation, especially among reactionary music lovers, and much has been said and written concerning his manner of dealing with the classics. Yet boredom takes flight at Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts and the magic of an amazingly arresting personality ensnares his listeners. He has a complete faith, so it seems, in his own interpretive point of view and he proceeds to proclaim it with an irresistible intensity.

The assertion of those who hail him as a sensationalist is difficult, I have always felt, to credit. Rather is he a master of communicative individualism, passionately eager to convey, through the medium of his players, what he is sure each composer means to say. Mr. Koussevitzky is almost invariably interesting and his orchestra—generally acknowledged to be one of the three or four greatest in the world—leaves behind it these days what W. J. Henderson has referred to as a resplendent trail of glory. Certainly last night's concert was a magnificent revelation of the present high attainments of the Boston Symphony in regard to technical proficiency—as an instrument whose various choirs sing as a single celestial voice.

Mr. Koussevitzky has a genius for choosing engrossing and harmonious programs. On this occasion he began with the "Classical" Symphony, op. 25, of Serge Prokefieff, the modern Russian, whose works he has so often elected to play for his Boston public. It was given a performance that was as transparent and spirited as the music is humorous, innocuous and facile. Nowhere to be found were the raucous and bizarre characteristics of the Prokofieff of the ballet "Chout" or the "Scythian Suite," and in their stead is an attempt—according to Felix Borowski, compiler of the program notes of the Chicago Orchestra — "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." But, as Olin Downes has remarked, it would take at least a Mozart to imagine what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living today. To imitate the Mozartian idiom is indeed a rather "tall order." Mr. Prokofieff has, however, contrived some entirely agreeable music that is melodious and easy to hear. "Ersatz Mozart," Lawrence Gilman called it.

Debussy's masterwork in the realm of impressionism, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," came next on the program and was played in superlative fashion. There was a singular harmony of choice in having Ravel follow — with the excerpts from his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet, which reveal so bewilderingly the composer's necromancy in the realm of instrumentation. His score is a kaleidoscope of multi-colored sonorities and its performance last evening was an enchanting experience for the collective ear of the audience. One could only exclaim in wonder: "What an orchestra!"

The concert was brought to a close with Brahms' second symphony in D major op. 73 whose tenderness and serenity were exquisitely unfolded by a conductor who, though not controlled by tradition, never sacrificed the grace and beauty of the music to a desire to depart from the interpretive path of custom. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were accorded an ovation at the end of the program.

KOUSSEVITZKY MASTERLY IN CONCERT HERE

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS Oct 31

Boston Symphony Orchestra wins mighty ovations with program here

Superlatives seem indeed vain things when it comes to fittingly describing the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, in Elmwood Music hall last evening. This was the first of the symphony series under auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, with Marian de Forest, local manager, and a brilliant audience assembled, one which voiced its appreciation with repeated ovations both for the distinguished conductor and the members of the orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is a genius at program-making, and a master magician of tonal beauty, effective contrasts and building up of tremendous climaxes. His musicianship is superb, and elegance and aristocracy of style and the intellectual grasp which controls his readings never allows him to deviate from the high standards he preserves in all his interpretations.

The first part of the program was devoted to the modernists, and the opening number, Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Opus 25, was a performance of intriguing beauty and graceful charm, the larghetto being notably fascinating, and the entire work infused with a vitality and invigorating spirit that won a flattering testimonial from the audience. Next came Debussy's Prelude, The Afternoon of a Faun, as exquisite an example of tonal painting as has been heard here in many seasons. The eerie quality of the music, the radiant enchantment of the theme developed by the wood winds, with the far distant horns and the cloying sweetness of the harps, with the entrance of the flute singing its song of pastoral charm and the further entrance of the oboe and the clarinet were blended into an ensemble of loveliness. Then the gradual dying away of the melody which produced an uncanny effect. All won such approbation that Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled with loud acclaims and generously signaled his orchestra to rise and share the honors.

Other Numbers

In the Ravel number, Daphnis et Chlo's baliet in one act, a tonal poem of love, suggesting wood nymphs, the singing of birds, the pipes of Pan and the beauties of nature are woven into a musical tapestry of soft harmonies and delicate color. This again won great applause for Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians.

The final offering was the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major in which the tenderness and calm serene beauty of this composer, whom Von Bulow classed as one of the Three B's, with Bach and Beethoven, brought out the finest resources of the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky's inspired reading. It glowed with color and poetic imagination and the imposing grandeur of the final movement, which ended in a perfect blaze of orchestral glory, was such a triumphal achievement that the eminent conductor was accorded prolonged applause and recalls.

Chamber Music Recital

Music lovers were given a rare treat yesterday afternoon when nine members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were heard in one of the most beautiful programs of chamber music ever heard in this city. Robert Gundersen, violin; Carlos Pinfield, violin; Jean Lefranc, viola; Alfred Zighera, 'cello; George Laurent, flute; Fernard Gillet, oboe; Paul Mimart, clarinet; Raymond Allard, bassoon, and Bernard Zighera, piano, were the artists who presented the program of numbers by Gluck, Beethoven, Mozart, Borodine, Bach Schubert and other composers, a full review of which will appear in the Sunday music page.

CHARLES BRIDGES

...ond Sympho...

59, died at his home here Sunday. He is survived by his widow Martha Gray Bridges, one son, Thomas Bridges, of Akron, Ohio, and one brother, Dr. Edward Bridges, of Maine.

Wolcott, Oct. 29—Charles Bridges

ELIZABETH GIBSON

Rochester, Oct. 12, 1928.

FRANK J. LINGE.

Carlton, Oct. 29—Edith Eliza Gibson, 12, died here yesterday at ...seemed to ...written above that in one ...months. Mr. and ...

...may seem right to those who make ...the laws, but to us younger would-be voters, it doesn't seem just.

...produced by the orchestra and up out of this comes slowly form and substance, more solid substance as the suite progressed than is usual with Ravel; by this is not meant climax, but the texture of the music itself. It is music that needs virtuosity in an orchestra like to that of a Hofmann at the piano, and this virtuosity Mr. Koussevitski amply secures from his players. Moreover, whatever the demand for note playing, the quality remains undiminished in worth. The audience recalled the conductor after each program number in the first program section, recalled him so positively that on second returns to his stand he brought the orchestra to its several feet in acknowledgement.

Coming to the Brahms symphony Mr. Koussevitski proved himself consistent. So much in sympathy with modern music is he that when he first came to the Boston Orchestra there was suspicion that his treatment of the older music might be either perfunctory or peculiar. Last night his treatment of Brahms music was what it had been of the music played before. Detail was meticulously searched out and made manifest; the lovely tunes Brahms wrote into this symphony were carefully, almost tenderly, considered; where there was instrumentation to give contrasting color it was made much of; rhythms were distinct to dainty nicety. It was not a performance where the composer was left to take of himself through the literal playing of his music; the composer was examined for his innermost thought and the conductance of a much played symphony

It was a program that ... glance looked to be decidedly modern in slant in its first section, with a Brahms finale to tilt it back toward older music—all the more this impression because two of the first three numbers had not previously been played in Rochester. As an experience, it proved a program that had balance and proportion, if it lacked, in one particular, contrast.

Prokofieff is a most versatile personage among the present-day composers; he can be as declamatory and vociferous as any, and is on occasion. But his classical symphony proves that he can be in spirit and expression direct, clear, charming and consistent in mood with the title he chose for this composition. It is not a symphony built on large lines; if its extension of ideas is not great, its ideas are highly interesting, are expressed fully and concisely and not elaborated t... edom. There is a gay spirit in the quick movements and graceful repose that is charming in the slow movement. There is little clash or clatter in the piece but it gave genuine pleasure to the writer as music and the performance of it was a delight in its clarity, its tonal tints, its brilliance.

There followed a performance of Debussy's "Faun" which was very lovely in the sectional and solo instrument playing. It was a deliberate performance and one in which tonal color was spread with elegance. It had not the rhythmic definition in places which this writer happens to like, but it flowed along with constant joy to the hearer because of the beauty of sound heard.

tor's notion of that thought clearly given. The result was a perform- that was exceedingly lovely much of the time, but which made seem to the writer that Brahms "loafed" in this symphony more than in his others; that there are a goodly number of passages in this score which are plain writing against space, not adding to the musical message.

The Boston Symphony seemed to the writer to be as worthy of encomium as ever it was. It gave a performance leaving the hearer satisfied with its technical and tonal excellence. The audience of the evening seemed to indicate this satisfaction by its reception of the conductor and players.

greatest symphony con- played in Columbus.

20

BOSTON GROUP SCORES WITH RAVEL WORK

Brilliant Conducting and Excellent Playing Marks Daphnis and Chloe

CLEVELAND PRESS NOV 1

By ARTHUR SHEPHERD

The Press Music Critic

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be recorded as a memorable event.

This far-famed organization, well-night symbolic in its historic and artistic importance, has had its periods of ups and downs, but in its present estate it stands forth in resplendent glory, equalling in most respects the highest standards of its past and surpassing on some counts its previous virtues.

Its personnel may not contain such a uniquely brilliant coterie of artists as in former days numbered in its ranks Loeffler, Kneisel, Schroeder, Longy, Pourteau, and a long list of extraordinarily gifted players; but, individual talents aside, there is a tonal splendor, virtuosity and vitality in the orchestra, as at present constituted, that is nothing short of superb.

Show Solidity, Stability

Not a few of the members have the appearance of grizzle-haired veterans, and there are enough bald heads to add to the appearance of venerable stability; all of which has the effect of a satisfying mellowness and solidity in tonal ensemble.

There was eager curiosity on the part of many to witness the performance of the distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the impression of whose personality and talents have had such a rejuvenating effect on the orchestra.

In the concert field, there is often an irritating over-stressing of the personality and individual traits of the performer at the expense of the music itself, but occasionally one encounters an artist of such commanding and persuasive gifts, that one must perforce, render tribute in fullest measure; such a one is Mr. Koussevitzky.

Is True Master

Not only has he brought his orchestra to an extraordinary state of excellence but he exhibits attributes, in the command of his forces, that bear the stamp of true mastery.

One cannot but be intrigued by his technique. Chief among his endowments are a vitality and rhythmic co-ordination that are simply magnificent. On the purely interpretative side he is more eloquent that subtle, his climaxes are electrifying; nuance and phrasing may sometimes go by the board in favor of broad draftsmanship.

He was curiously ineffective in Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; one wished for more fluidity, for a more sensitive evocation of the Pagan poesy that pervades this ineffable score. Unlike Ravel and the younger Frenchmen, Debussy drew melodic lines and arabesques that may be described as of the visceral type, quite different from the almost glossy rhythmic type in which "tempo-rubato" is strictly taboo.

In Ravel's superb Daphnis and Chloe the eloquence of orchestra and conductor achieved a brilliance that was well-nigh incandescent.

Shines in Tonal Beauty

For sheer tonal glitter we know of no score that surpasses this of the diminutive Frenchman.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked for acquainting us with the delightful "Classic Symphony" of Prokofieff, a work replete with charm, an evocation of Eighth Century grace; something more than a "tour de force" this work from the pen of one of the most gifted of contemporary Russians, it reveals a delicate sensibility for the formal graces of the pre-romantic period; appropriately scored for a small orchestra, it demands a fine virtuosity, and was tossed off by the Bostonians with true esprit.

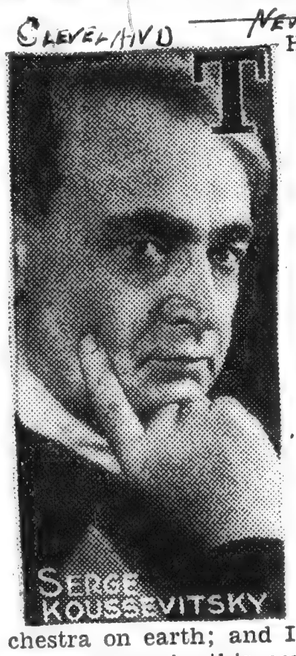
The second half of the program was given over to the Second Symphony of Brahms, a work made familiar to Cleveland audiences by our own orchestra. In this the aforementioned virtues of orchestra and conductor came to their fullest utterance; there was health, sanity, lyrical warmth and grandeur, constituting an eloquent conclusion to a memorable concert.

STARS and STARDUST From Theater and Concert Stage

by ARCHIE BELL

Symphony Orchestra, With Koussevitzky, Score Success

CLEVELAND NEWS NOV 1.



THERE'S truth as well as poetry in "music lends enchantment." It is possible for music to be so beautiful that an entire audience feels the spell and falls under the influence. It was demonstrated at Masonic hall Wednesday evening when the Boston Symphony orchestra returned to Cleveland after an absence of ten years and played a program under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Probably most of us have heard that the Boston orchestra has deteriorated since those ante-bellum days when Karl Muck held the baton. Well, we know now that any such statement is a malicious lie or an error in judgment. Under Koussevitzky, it remains the same marvelous ensemble. To me it is the best symphony orchestra on earth; and I say this, comparing it to most of the famous ones in this country and in Europe. It seems to be one wonderful instrument from which come tones such as no other orchestra seems to produce. Strings superb, but so are the woodwinds and brasses. A sublime aggregation of virtuosity. And when this huge instrument of 110 pieces sits around the platform on which stands a genius of a conductor, like Koussevitzky, the result may be imagined by all who were not present last evening. It was one of those musical events beside which one puts a mark to prompt the memory as the fog of time comes on.

I think I never have heard such an enthusiastic outburst of praise as followed the first and second part of this symphony concert. The lobby fairly echoed from the comments of approval.

And there was a large crowd to hear and to praise. I noticed a few vacant seats, but not many. The auditorium was filled with music lovers who knew that they were hearing music rendered as well as it can be by human powers.

* * *

ONE may agree or disagree with M. Koussevitzky's readings. Some of them seem to be a bit "individual." But one may not doubt that he accomplishes exactly the thing that he wants to accomplish with the instrumentalists.

For example, I though his "Afternoon of a Faune" was rather slow in tempo. I have seen it danced in Paris, heard it played by many conductors; and never so slow before. But the effect was gorgeous in color and very beautiful.

His Prokofieff "Classical" symphony was played here for the first time. A work that might be called pretty, and without any of the "modernisms" that we sometimes expect from this composer. It seemed not a notable composition; but a most comfortable piece to hear, almost like a Mozart symphony, so far as melodies go.

The orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" were wonderfully well presented. One rarely hears such a perfect melodic representation of a pagan dance—and of romantic love. Ravel rises in one's estimation, after hearing Koussevitzky reveal his work.

The second part of the program was devoted to Brahms' second symphony—one of the familiar works on its scale of modern musical literature. And with this, the conductor again was penetrating and revealing; both of himself and of Brahms. It was a masterpiece of conducting and of playing.

It is to be hoped that the Bostonians will put us back on the list of "cities visited each year" and keep us there.

* * *

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHARMS AUDIENCE

CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER NOV

Orchestra of 110 Swayed by Dynamic Baton of Koussevitzky.

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

A concert of many thrills and many artistic delights was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Masonic Auditorium. And Serge Koussevitzky, leader of this great company of players—great in more senses than one, for it numbers 110 performers—was the hero of one of the most exhilarating musical evenings that memory recalls.

To begin with, this is a magnificent orchestra, of outstanding excellence in all its sections. In balance and blend of tone, in splendor of volume, in swift and pliant response to the demands of their conductor, in a word, in all orchestral virtues, the Bostonians compel our unstinted admiration. We heard the Boston Orchestra redivivus, after a period of sackcloth and ashes. And that was not an unpleasant thing to think about, either.

Mr. Koussevitzky possesses a marvelous control over his musicians. An autocrat, maybe. But, I believe, a benevolent despot, winning his men by imparting to them his own enthusiasm, which is plainly apparent. A vivid personality. And this imbues his readings. Every piece he sets before his hearers pulses with ardent life. Each one seems newly created. He summons an astonishing dynamic range from his players.

Watches Delicate Phases.

In this the more delicate phases are far from coming off second best. This was exemplified in the opening item of the program, the "Classical" symphony of the Russian, Prokokieff. The quotation marks are the composer's own. I think he wrote them down with the tongue in the cheek, and a twinkle in the eye. New stuff, from the fearsome music workshops of Moscow.

And behold the Bolshevist decked out in the costume of olden days at Versailles, perruque, snuff box and all. Prokokieff has gone back to the French clavecinists, Rameau, Couperin and the rest, for his models. One cannot say that he has beaten them at their own game; but he has not lagged far behind them.

This is delicious music, sparkling with gayety and animation. It was played with an airiness and a crisp and light precision that made it quite enchanting. And at the close of the symphony—which is really a suite of four short pieces—the listeners were all smiling broadly. Which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough.

Lovely Rendition.

To the Prokokieff work succeeded Debussy's familiar "Afternoon of a Faun," which was accorded a lovely and expressive rendition. And after this there were some excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphne and Chloe." An exciting, breath-taking affair this performance was, too. Indeed, a tour de force of overwhelming brilliancy. A tempest of hand-clapping followed it.

The concert closed with the Brahms second symphony, with which, it strikes me, it would have been better to begin the program. However, it was beautifully played, and authoritatively played, too. Not exactly in the manner we are used too, now and then. Mr. Koussevitzky goes his own way. He gives us the composer plus a bit of Koussevitzky, greatly, to my notion, adding to the hearer's interest in the music under way.

The audience was only of moderate size, which, when we consider the attraction offered, was rather discouraging to the friends of music present. It is to be hoped that the extreme cordiality and the manifest pleasure of the listeners caused Mr. Koussevitzky to overlook the relative smallness of their numbers.

Incidents and Prospects

TRANS NOV

In these days of prattle and also experiment with conductorless orchestras, long memories recall that more than once Dr. Muck let the Boston Orchestra play its own way through the Scherzo of Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony."

COLUMBUS WEEKLY GUIDE FOR VISITORS NOV 1

MUSIC THIS WEEK

By ARTHUR L. ROBERTS,
Heaton's Music Store

Press notices received in Columbus last week, following the first concert of the season in Symphony Hall, give the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky a great acclamation of approval.

Koussevitzky, who began his fifth season with the Boston band, upon entering the stage, was greeted with a long ovation by a standing audience and orchestra, according to an account in one of the Boston newspapers.

This symphony orchestra and conductor will play the first concert of the Symphony Club's series in Memorial Hall, Thursday evening, November 1st.

Columbus is only one of six cities outside of Boston and New York which will itzky and iocasts of itted. In bestowed the Symparations ial Hall.

it in Co-list, who onserva-initiate is the en years

e talent itly ac-le they pertory
Haydn

alifornia Chevinne
l daring.
v selling and at ibus Kicity the known ds from annual children wo per-lren at ce at 8

* * *

MUSIC

Boston Symphony-Mosque.

PITTSBURGH POST GAZETTE NOV 3

By HARVEY GAUL.

A large, representatve and appreciative audience greeted Serge Koussevitzky and the admirable Boston Symphony last night at the Mosque, when they appeared to open our Pittsburgh season of visiting orchestras.

Appreciative did we say? After the Debussy composition there was a demonstration that amounted to an ovation. Indeed so vast was the applause that one is tempted to think that Schenley Farms is becoming modernized and really prefers post impressionism to so-called classicism.

The orchestra played better than it ever did before, there was a gorgeous sonority to the strings, and as for the French horns, we thought them superlative. The ensemble, whether it was pianissimo or a rushing forte, had glow and warmth, and speaking of fortissimo, one wonders whether there is any conductor coming here who has a larger range, a greater spread of crescendo than Mr. Koussevitzky?

In many respects it was a marvelous program and while one might have wished for a transposition of numbers, a Beethoven earlier in the evening and a joyous postlude, nevertheless it was an invigorating list. To many in the audience Stravinsky was a distinct disappointment.

It was Igor Fedorvitch forgetting the vow of chromatic celibacy and harking back to Cesar Cui and Borodin. Here was no Bad Boy from Moscow but a rather formal, stilted ballet composer. Whatever may be said for his "Apollon Musagete," at least it was a sec performance. It served as an ample opportunity for a fiddle solo, a set of unexciting episodes and much listless slow-tempoed writing.

If a first performance of this Stravinsky work was unimpressive a tenth-time hearing of the Debussy "Nocturnes" was a revelation. We have always known that Mr. Koussevitzky enjoyed Debussy, but last night he caught new timbres, he gave us new effects and some of us think it was the finest piece of Debussyian interpretation we have heard. There was a ravishing tinting of "Nuages" and a finely regulated pulsation in "Fetes." Shimmering strings, dissolving cadences and that was the first, jagged accents, stunningly suppressed and developed rhythms and that was the second. No wonder the house applauded it to a bravo.

Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude concluded the first half, and that, we think, was an architectonic mistake. It should have served as it often does and that is as an overture. It was brilliantly played, with the indomitable march theme grandly blared, with the lyric moments finely sung, and in all ways was it a commensurate reading, but one wishes it had opened the concert.

A great deal has been said of Beethoven's "Eroica," both by biographers and program annotators, and while we yield to no one in admiration of this colossal genius, nevertheless we wish some monumental editor, says Hans von Bulow, could have re-edited the work. We agree with Czerny, who remembered that some uncouth wight in the gallery yelled, "I'd give another kreuzer if they would stop." Always the tiresome rondo pattern, the boresome sonata form, the countless reiterations, the fatiguing coda. There are marvelous moments in the second movement, the sotto voce strings, the low-voiced fugatto opening to an impressive end, and perhaps it is this movement that gives color to the whole work. Personally we prefer the scherzo with its folk-theme motive and witty dialogue. No one could write a better scherzetto than Beethoven, and by the same token no one could sing a better cantilena, but having heard them both one wishes the work would end.

If last night's program was notable the one to be presented this afternoon at the Mosque is twice as appealing. First there is Serge Prokofieff, followed by Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" (which we heard last Sunday) and then comes Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, and the whole finishing with Brahms D major symphony. That is a program, and it is one that deserves the largest kind of audience.

20

BOSTON GROUP SCORES WITH RAVEL WORK

Brilliant Conducting and Excellent Playing Marks Daphnis and Chloe

CLEVELAND PRESS Nov 1

By ARTHUR SHEPHERD

The Press Music Critic

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be recorded as a memorable event.

This far-famed organization, well-night symbolic in its historic and artistic importance, has had its periods of ups and downs, but in its present estate it stands forth in resplendent glory, equalling in most respects the highest standards of its past and surpassing on some counts its previous virtues.

Its personnel may not contain such a uniquely brilliant coterie of artists as in former days numbered in its ranks Loeffler, Kneisel, Schroeder, Longy, Pourteau, and a long list of extraordinarily gifted players; but, individual talents aside, there is a tonal splendor, virtuosity and vitality in the orchestra, as at present constituted, that is nothing short of superb.

Show Solidity, Stability

Not a few of the members have the appearance of grizzle-haired veterans, and there are enough bald heads to add to the appearance of venerable stability; all of which has the effect of a satisfying mellowness and solidity in tonal ensemble.

There was eager curiosity on the part of many to witness the performance of the distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the impression of whose personality and talents have had such a rejuvenating effect on the orchestra.

In the concert field, there is often an irritating over-stressing of the personality and individual traits of the performer at the expense of the music itself, but occasionally one encounters an artist of such commanding and persuasive gifts, that one must perforce, render tribute in fullest measure; such a one is Mr. Koussevitzky.

Is True Master

Not only has he brought his orchestra to an extraordinary state of excellence but he exhibits attributes, in the command of his forces, that bear the stamp of true mastery.

One cannot but be intrigued by his technique. Chief among his endowments are a vitality and rhythmic co-ordination that are simply magnificent. On the purely interpretative side he is more eloquent that subtle, his climaxes are electrifying; nuance and phrasing may sometimes go by the board in favor of broad draftsmanship.

He was curiously ineffective in Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun"; one wished for more fluidity, for a more sensitive evocation of the Pagan poesy that pervades this ineffable score. Unlike Ravel and the younger Frenchmen, Debussy drew melodic lines and arabesques that may be described as of the visceral type, quite different from the almost glossy rhythmic type in which "tempo-rubato" is strictly taboo.

In Ravel's superb Daphnis and Chloe the eloquence of orchestra and conductor achieved a brilliance that was well-nigh incandescent.

Shines in Tonal Beauty

For sheer tonal glitter we know of no score that surpasses this of the diminutive Frenchman.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked for acquainting us with the delightful "Classic Symphony" of Prokofieff, a work replete with charm, an evocation of Eighth Century grace; something more than a "tour de force" this work from the pen of one of the most gifted of contemporary Russians, it reveals a delicate sensibility for the formal graces of the pre-romantic period; appropriately scored for a small orchestra, it demands a fine virtuosity, and was tossed off by the Bostonians with true esprit.

The second half of the program was given over to the Second Symphony of Brahms, a work made familiar to Cleveland audiences by our own orchestra. In this the aforementioned virtues of orchestra and conductor came to their fullest utterance; there was health, sanity, lyrical warmth and grandeur, constituting an eloquent conclusion to a memorable concert.

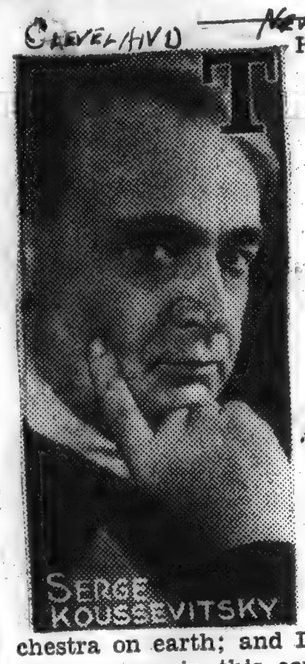
STARS and STARDUST

From Theater and Concert Stage

by ARCHIE BELL

Symphony Orchestra, With Koussevitzky, Score Success

CLEVELAND NEWS Nov 1.



HERE'S truth as well as poetry in "music len possible fo that an en and falls u demonstrat nesday ev Symphony Cleveland years and the direct Probably the Bosto since the Karl Muc know now is a malic ment. U mains th To me it chestra on earth; and I say this, famous ones in this country and one wonderful instrument from w other orchestra seems to produce. the woodwinds and brasses. A su osity. And when this huge instrum the platform on which stands a Koussevitzky, the result may be im present last evening. It was one o which one puts a mark to prompt time comes on.

le

ATS

Misses conservative,

ing in price,

rtunity.

epresenting furs, high ion of finish al.

I think I never have heard such an enthusiastic outburst of praise as followed the first and second part of this symphony concert. The lobby fairly echoed from the comments of approval.

And there was a large crowd to hear and to praise. I noticed a few vacant seats, but not many. The auditorium was filled with music lovers who knew that they were hearing music rendered as w powers.

ONE may agree or disagree with M. Koussevitzky's readings. Some of them seem to be a bit "individual." But one may not doubt that he accomplishes exactly the thing that he wants to accomplish with the instrumentalists.

For example, I though his "Afternoon of a Faune" was rather slow in tempo. I have seen it

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHARMS AUDIENCE

CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER Nov

Orchestra of 110 Swayed by Dynamic Baton of Koussevitzky.

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

A concert of many thrills and many artistic delights was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Masonic Auditorium. And Serge Koussevitzky, leader of this great company of players—great in more senses than one, for it numbers 110 performers—was the hero of one of the most exhilarating musical evenings that memory recalls.

To begin with, this is a magnificent orchestra, of outstanding excellence in all its sections. In balance and blend of tone, in splendor of volume, in swift and pliant response to the demands of their conductor, in a word, in all orchestral virtues, the Bostonians compel our tinstinted admiration. We heard the Boston Orchestra redivivus, after a period of sackcloth and ashes. And that was not an unpleasant thing to think about, either.

Mr. Koussevitzky possesses a marvelous control over his musicians. An autocrat, maybe. But, I believe, a benevolent despot, winning his men by imparting to them his own enthusiasm, which is plainly apparent. A vivid personality. And this imbues his readings. Every piece he sets before his hearers pulses with ardent life. Each one seems newly created. He summons an astonishing dynamic range from his players.

Watches Delicate Phases.

In this the more delicate phases are far from coming off second best. This was exemplified in the opening item of the program, the "Classical" symphony of the Russian, Prokokieff. The quotation marks are the composer's own. I think he wrote them down with the tongue in the cheek, and a twinkle in the eye. New stuff, from the fearsome music workshops of Moscow.

And behold the Bolshevist decked out in the costume of olden days at Versailles, perruque, snuff box and all. Prokokieff has gone back to the French clavecinists, Rameau, Couperin and the rest, for his models. One cannot say that he has beaten them at their own game; but he has not lagged far behind them.

This is delicious music, sparkling with gayety and animation. It was played with an airiness and a crisp and light precision that made it quite enchanting. And at the close of the symphony—which is really a suite of four short pieces—the listeners were all smiling broadly. Which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough.

Lovely Rendition.

To the Prokokieff work succeeded Debussy's familiar "Afternoon of a Faun," which was accorded a lovely and expressive rendition. And after this there were some excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphne and Chloe." An exciting, breath-taking affair this performance was, too. Indeed, a tour de force of overwhelming brilliancy. A tempest of hand-clapping followed it.

The concert closed with the Brahms second symphony, with which, it strikes me, it would have been better to begin the program. However, it was beautifully played, and authoritatively played, too. Not exactly in the manner we are used too, now and then. Mr. Koussevitzky goes his own way. He gives us the composer plus a bit of Koussevitzky, greatly, to my notion, adding to the hearer's interest in the music under way.

The audience was only of moderate size, which, when we consider the attraction offered, was rather discouraging to the friends of music present. It is to be hoped that the extreme cordiality and the manifest pleasure of the listeners caused Mr. Koussevitzky to overlook the relative smallness of their numbers.

Incidents and Prospects TRANS Nov

In these days of prattle and also experiment with conductorless orchestras, long memories recall that more than once Dr. Muck let the Boston Orchestra play its own way through the Scherzo of Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony."

COLUMBUS WEEKLY GUIDE FOR VISITORS Nov 1

MUSIC THIS WEEK

By ARTHUR L. ROBERTS,
Heaton's Music Store

Press notices received in Columbus last week, following the first concert of the season in Symphony Hall, give the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky a great acclamation of approval.

Koussevitzky, who began his fifth season with the Boston band, upon entering the stage, was greeted with a long ovation by a standing audience and orchestra, according to an account in one of the Boston newspapers.

This symphony orchestra and conductor will play the first concert of the Symphony Club's series in Memorial Hall, Thursday evening, November 1st.

Columbus is only one of six cities outside of Boston and New York which will be privileged to hear Koussevitzky and his orchestra this season. Radiocasts of home concerts will not be permitted. In accordance with the great honor bestowed upon central Ohio by this visit, the Symphony Club is making extra preparations and special efforts to fill Memorial Hall. This will be Koussevitzky's debut in Columbus.

Madame Gray-Lhevinne, violinist, who comes to Capital University Conservatory of Music October 30th to initiate Capital's concert-lecture series, is the mother of Laddie Gray, now seven years old.

Little Laddie has inherited the talent of his mother and quite frequently accompanies her at the piano while they play by the fireside. In his repertory are selections of Mozart, Bach, Haydn and Schumann. Here in her California home, with her family, Gray-Lhevinne builds her programs, original and daring.

Seats for this concert are now selling at the conservatory box office and at Heaton's.

On November 15th, the Columbus Kiwanis Club is bringing to this city the famous United States Army Band, known as Pershing's Own. The proceeds from this concert will be used for the annual children's Christmas party for children from institutions. There will be two performances, one for school children at 3:30, and the evening performance at 8

:-: MUSIC :-:

Boston Symphony-Mosque. PITTSBURGH POST GAZETTE

By HARVEY GAUL. Nov 3

A large, representatve and appreciative audience greeted Serge Koussevitzky and the admirable Boston Symphony last night at the Mosque, when they appeared to open our Pittsburgh season of visiting orchestras.

Appreciative did we say? After the Debussy composition there was a demonstration that amounted to an ovation. Indeed so vast was the applause that one is tempted to think that Schenley Farms is becoming modernized and really prefers post impressionism to so-called classicism.

The orchestra played better than it ever did before, there was a gorgeous sonority to the strings, and as for the French horns, we thought them superlative. The ensemble, whether it was pianissimo or a rushing forte, had glow and warmth, and speaking of fortissimo, one wonders whether there is any conductor coming here who has a larger range, a greater spread of crescendo than Mr. Koussevitzky?

In many respects it was a marvelous program and while one might have wished for a transposition of numbers, a Beethoven earlier in the evening and a joyous postlude, nevertheless it was an invigorating list. To many in the audience Stravinsky was a distinct disappointment.

It was Igor Fedorvitch forgetting the vow of chromatic celibacy and harking back to Cesar Cui and Borodin. Here was no Bad Boy from Moscow but a rather formal, stilted ballet composer. Whatever may be said for his "Apollon Musagete," at least it was a sec performance. It served as an ample opportunity for a fiddle solo, a set of unexciting episodes and much listless slow-tempoed writing.

If a first performance of this Stravinsky work was unimpressive a tenth-time hearing of the Debussy "Nocturnes" was a revelation. We have always known that Mr. Koussevitzky enjoyed Debussy, but last night he caught new timbres, he gave us new effects and some of us think it was the finest piece of Debussyian interpretation we have heard. There was a ravishing tinting of "Nuages" and a finely regulated pulsation in "Fetes." Shimmering strings, dissolving cadences and that was the first, jagged accents, stunningly suppressed and developed rhythms and that was the second. No wonder the house applauded it to a bravo.

Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude concluded the first half, and that, we think, was an architectonic mistake. It should have served as it often does and that is as an overture. It was brilliantly played, with the indomitable march theme grandly blared, with the lyric moments finely sung, and in all ways was it a commensurate reading, but one wishes it had opened the concert.

A great deal has been said of Beethoven's "Eroica," both by biographers and program annotators, and while we yield to no one in admiration of this colossal genius, nevertheless we wish some monumental editor, says Hans von Bulow, could have re-edited the work. We agree with Czerny, who remembered that some uncouth wight in the gallery yelled, "I'd give another kreuzer if they would stop." Always the tiresome rondo pattern, the boresome sonata form, the countless reiterations, the fatiguing coda. There are marvelous moments in the second movement, the sotto voce strings, the low-voiced fugatto opening to an impressive end, and perhaps it is this movement that gives color to the whole work. Personally we prefer the scherzo with its folk-theme motive and witty dialogue. No one could write a better scherzetto than Beethoven, and by the same token no one could sing a better cantilena, but having heard them both one wishes the work would end.

If last night's program was notable the one to be presented this afternoon at the Mosque is twice as appealing. First there is Serge Prokofieff, followed by Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" (which we heard last Sunday) and then comes Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, and the whole finishing with Brahms D major symphony. That is a program, and it is one that deserves the largest kind of audience.

Boston Symphony, in Master's Hands, Makes Musical Holiday That Will Live in Memories

BY KARL B. PAULY.

For the first time in 16 years Columbus Thursday night heard the Boston Symphony orchestra and thrilled to its performance under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who in those intervening years has come out of the east to drench the western world with his musical eloquence.

It was an event of the first magnitude in the city's musical history and Memorial Hall was virtually filled for the occasion. M. Koussevitzky's appearance was the signal for an ovation in which the audience rose and applauded for nearly a minute.

The great conductor, leader of orchestras in Moscow and Petrograd, first conductor of the Russian State orchestra under the soviet regime, and still annually conductor of orchestras in London and Paris, ruled the 110-piece symphony orchestra with vigor and yet with restraint.

Always he seemed to hold the power of the orchestra between the thumb and forefinger of his left hand as he drew from them with the baton in his right that great wealth of tonal color. The orchestra responded as one man to his least gesture.

Two of the numbers presented Thursday night never before had been played in Columbus. These were Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, and excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet.

The first of these seemed not the complicated thing of which the laity stands in awe but an understandable work of art built up, developed and embellished before one's eyes, so to speak. Indeed, in its playing Thursday night, the audience heard it presented under the direction of one of Prokofieff's particular champions, M. Koussevitzky.

Early in the allegro movement it was easy to see why some critics have said that "the composer's idea in this symphony was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." There were moments particularly reminiscent of the great composer.

The first violins, predominant in the allegro, recurred again in episodes in the larghetto movement, and were joined in the gavotta by the wood-winds and eventually the violincellos and double basses, working toward the splendid finale.

In this work, if not earlier, it was apparent how large a part of M. Koussevitzky's distinction as a virtuoso of the double bass plays in his handling of the great orchestra.

It is probable that nothing so tremendously magnificent has ever been heard in Columbus as the tumultuous close of "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet.

At the outset the Ravel number is exquisite and bizarre. Throughout it is coursed with pathos and fervence. It is idyllic at the point at which Daphnis fashions a flute and plays a melancholy tune, to which Chloe, appearing later, dances in imitation.

In the joyous tumult of the finale are massed the orchestra's full brass complement, together with kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, tambourines, harp and double basses with the low C. There is a veritable blizzard of strings, punctured with cymbalic crashes and the whipping of other strings.

The number was the most impassioned on Thursday evening's program, approached only by the last movement of the Brahms symphony.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra, returning from its western tour, will give the fifth regular pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week. The orchestra will play for the first time in Boston the Third Symphony of Jan Sibelius. Mr. Koussevitzky has added Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." A new composer at these concerts will be Frederick Jacobi, whose "Indian Dances" will be played—Buffalo Dance, Butterfly Dance, War Dance and Corn Dance.

The first concert of the Monday evening series will take place on Nov. 12 in Symphony hall, at 8:15. Mr. Koussevitzky will then present Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Stravinsky's Ballet, "Apollon Musagete"; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes"; and Schumann's Symphony, B flat major, No. 1.

NINTH SYMPHONY

One performance only of Beethoven's Choral Ninth Symphony will be given for the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall, on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 18. Mr. Koussevitzky will then conduct the combined forces of the Symphony orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, respectively. The soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Beer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

An Orchestra Without a Conductor

The American Symphonic Ensemble, a symphony orchestra without a conductor, announces a series of orchestral concerts in New York, of which the first was scheduled for last evening at Carnegie Hall. The program for last night's concert was all Beethoven, the "Eroica" Symphony, the violin concerto, with Max Rosen as soloist, and the "Egmont" overture.

This endeavor to dispense with a conductor has caused much comment. The only present day orchestra functioning without a baton-wielding leader is in Moscow, and named "Persimphans." The idea, however, is not new, but a reversion to what once was the universal custom.

In the 18th century composers like Handel sat at the harpsichord, or at the organ while the small orchestras of those days performed their works. Even choral works were given in the same fashion. The composer conducted the performance as he played his part. All he did was to ask the other performers to follow his lead about tempo and to obey the directions in their parts about dynamics. If necessary he nodded his head, or beat time with one hand for a while.

But it was assumed that a group of intelligent and competent musicians could cooperate in the performance without having set over them a drill master.

In works where there was no part for harpsichord or organ the leader of the first violins, still called in many orchestras the "concert master," often set the pace and took the lead.

Musical Autocracy

The London Philharmonic Orchestra found it advisable to employ a musician to sit at the piano and strike a few notes if anything went wrong, to supplement the efforts of the concert master. Not until 1820, when the composer Spohr came to London and appeared at the Philharmonic concerts did anyone undertake to lead that orchestra with a baton. Some of the directors of the Philharmonic Society protested against Spohr's revolutonary innovation, but the idea proved a success. Spohr was merely bringing to London a custom already for some years established in Germany. The virtuoso conductor of the type of Nikisch, Toscanini, Stokowski, and Koussevitzky is thus a 19th century development. The American Symphonic Ensemble, like its prototype in Moscow, is merely reverting to the 18th Century. Few "new" ideas are really new.

Mr Koussevitzky's conception of the conductor's job must be familiar to every discerning listener here. He tries to reveal in every piece the Boston Symphony plays something nobody else has found or could find there. He offers his audiences intensely and brilliantly personal readings. Any music that interests him he can make interesting to his hearers. Time at rehearsals is spent on familiarising the players in the Boston Symphony with Mr Koussevitzky's interpretations, not on the comparatively simple task of getting them to play together accurately the notes set down in their parts.

What the people come for is supposed to be not Beethoven, Schubert, Wagner, Stravinsky, but Koussevitzky. Everything is subordinated to Koussevitzky's temperament, personality, imagination. The players must do as he bids them. They are but parts of the superb instrument on which the master is playing.

It is natural that a group of orchestral players should seek to try the experiment of dispensing with a conductor, if only to free themselves from the control of such musical autocrats.

Skilled Players

The result will be of great musical interest, particularly if the American Symphonic Ensemble makes a careful endeavor to obey the implied as well as express directions of the composer, embodied in the printed music.

It has been often shown that our leading symphony orchestras do not when playing most standard orchestral works need to have a conductor beat time for them. The first time Dr Muck conducted the Boston Symphony, in 1907, he laid down his baton, and allowed the orchestra to play the scherzo of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony without guidance, by way of showing his faith in the skill of the orchestra, which his predecessor, Mr Gericke, had brought to a very high pitch.

Within the past few days both Mr Reiner in Cincinnati and Mr Stock in Chicago have had their orchestras play familiar music in public without them. Mr Koussevitzky could, and may, permit the Boston Symphony to show its skill in ensemble in a number or two by laying down his baton and leaving the stage, as his rivals have lately done.

But the interpretations given by the Chicago, Cincinnati and Boston Symphony orchestras now depend largely on the rehearsals by their respective conductors. It remains to be discovered what an orchestra of first rate players can do without the services of a conductor.

The American Symphonic Ensemble is said to include many of the men left unemployed by the consolidation of the New York Philharmonic and New York Symphony Society orchestras. Its membership overlaps with that of the new Beethoven Symphony, whose future is a bit dubious, owing to a large deficit which seems to have discouraged the financial backers, if New York musical gossip is to be trusted.

Such a group can undoubtedly play respectably without a conductor. But will the performances be more than mediocre? The reported artistic success of the Moscow Persimphans would indicate that they may be of very high grade.

Mr Koussevitzky has again chosen for this week's Symphony concerts a novelty not ultra modern in style, Frederick Jacobi's "Indian Dances." He is to repeat the remarkable interpretation of Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" that he gave at his Boston debut in 1924. Sibelius' Third Symphony, not hitherto heard here, is the other number.

Incidents and Prospects

At last all concerned have agreed upon the dates for the simultaneous performance in five different cities of Mr. Bloch's prize-winning symphonic rhapsody, "America." On Friday afternoon, Dec. 21, and Saturday evening, Dec. 22, it will be played by the Philharmonic Society in New York under Mr. Damrosch; the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky; the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Gabrilowitsch; the Chicago Orchestra under Mr. Stock; the San Francisco Orchestra under Mr. Hertz. (Mr. Bloch dwells and works in San Francisco.) At the close the Rhapsody joins a chorus to the orchestra. In Boston Dr. Davison's Cambridge choirs will provide it.

Today the Symphony Orchestra begins rehearsals of Sibelius's Third Symphony (in C major) and there is plentiful speculation about Mr. Koussevitzky's persistence in his announced intention to produce it. Dr. Muck, who thought well of the composer, read and re-read the score, each time put it by. Mr. Fiedler considered it, doubted, and restored it to the shelf. Mr. Monteux actually "tried it over" with the orchestra—and agreed with his predecessors. Yet in Scandinavia and in Finland, this Third Symphony had, and keeps, a considerable vogue.

ld of Music

ved by A. J. WARNER

ston Symphony Orchestra, coming Monday evening, Oct. and Lee Pattison, pianists, who open the Kilbourn Hall season Monday evening.

Boston Symphony, in Master's Hands, Makes Musical Holiday That Will Live in Memories

BY KARL B. PAULY.

For the first time in 16 years Columbus Thursday night heard the Boston Symphony orchestra and thrilled to its performance under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who in those intervening years has come out of the east to drench the western world with his musical eloquence.

It was an event of the first magnitude in the city's musical history and Memorial Hall was virtually filled for the occasion. M. Koussevitzky's appearance was the signal for an ovation in which the audience rose and applauded for nearly a minute.

The great conductor, leader of orchestras in Moscow and Petrograd, first conductor of the Russian State orchestra under the soviet regime, and still annually conductor of orchestras in London and Paris, ruled the 110-piece symphony orchestra with vigor and yet with restraint.

Always he seemed to hold the power of the orchestra between the thumb and forefinger of his left hand as he drew from them with the baton in his right that great wealth of tonal color. The orchestra responded as one man to his least gesture.

Two of the numbers presented Thursday night never before had been played in Columbus. These were Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, and excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet.

The first of these seemed not the complicated thing of which the laity stands in awe but an understandable work of art built up, developed and embellished before one's eyes, so to speak. Indeed, in its playing Thursday night, the audience heard it presented under the direction of one of Prokofieff's particular champions, M. Koussevitzky.

Early in the allegro movement it was easy to see why some critics have said that "the composer's idea in this symphony was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." There were moments particularly reminiscent of the great composer.

The first violins, predominant in the allegro, recurred again in episodes in the larghetto movement, and were joined in the gavotta by the wood-winds and eventually the violincellos and double basses, working toward the splendid finale.

In this work, if not earlier, it was apparent how large a part of M. Koussevitzky's distinction as a virtuoso of the double bass plays in his handling of the great orchestra.

It is probable that nothing so tremendously magnificent has ever been heard in Columbus as the tumultuous close of "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet.

At the outset the Ravel number is exquisite and bizarre. Throughout it is coursed with pathos and fervence. It is idyllic at the point at which Daphnis fashions a flute and plays a melancholy tune, to which Chloe, appearing later, dances in imitation.

In the joyous tumult of the finale are massed the orchestra's full brass complement, together with kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, tambourines, harp and double basses with the low C. There is a veritable blizzard of strings, punctured with cymbalic crashes and the whipping of other strings.

The number was the most impassioned on Thursday evening's program, approached only by the last movement of the Brahms symphony.

An Orchestra Without a Conductor

The American Symphonic Ensemble, a symphony orchestra without a conductor, announces a series of orchestral concerts in New York, of which the first was scheduled for last evening at Carnegie Hall. The program for last night's concert was all Beethoven, the "Eroica" Symphony, the violin concerto, with Max Rosen as soloist, and the "Egmont" overture.

This endeavor to dispense with a conductor has caused much comment. The only present day orchestra functioning without a baton-wielding leader is in Moscow, and named "Persimphans." The idea, however, is not new, but a reversion to what once was the universal custom.

In the 18th century composers like Handel sat at the harpsichord, or at the organ while the small orchestras of those days performed their works. Even choral works were given in the same fashion. The composer conducted the performance as he played his part. All he did was to ask the other performers to follow his lead about tempo and to obey the directions in their parts about dynamics. If necessary he nodded his head, or beat time with one hand for a while.

But it was assumed that a group of intelligent and competent musicians could cooperate in the performance without having set over them a drill master.

In works where there was no part for harpsichord or organ the leader of the first violins, still called in many orchestras the "concert master," often set the pace and took the lead.

Musical Autocracy

The London Philharmonic Orchestra found it advisable to employ a musician to sit at the piano and strike a few notes if anything went wrong, to supplement the efforts of the concert master. Not until 1820, when the composer Spohr came to London and appeared at the Philharmonic concerts did anyone undertake to lead that orchestra with a baton. Some of the directors of the Philharmonic Society protested against Spohr's revolutonary innovation, but the idea proved a success. Spohr was merely bringing to London a custom already for some years established in Germany. The virtuoso conductor of the type of Nikisch, Toscanini, Stokowski, and Koussevitzky is thus a 19th century development. The American Symphonic Ensemble, like its prototype in Moscow, is merely reverting to the 18th Century. Few "new" ideas are really new.

Mr Koussevitzky's conception of the conductor's job must be familiar to every discerning listener here. He tries to reveal in every piece the Boston Symphony plays something nobody else has found or could find there. He offers his audiences intensely and brilliantly personal readings. Any music that interests him he can make interesting to his hearers. Time at rehearsals is spent on familiarising the players in the Boston Symphony with Mr Koussevitzky's interpretations, not on the comparatively simple task of getting them to play together accurately the notes set down in their parts.

What the people come for is supposed to be not Beethoven, Schubert, Wagner, Stravinsky, but Koussevitzky. Everything is subordinated to Koussevitzky's temperament, personality, imagination. The players must do as he bids them. They are but parts of the superb instrument on which the master is playing.

It is natural that a group of orchestral players should seek to try the experiment of dispensing with a conductor, if only to free themselves from the control of such musical autocrats

Skilled Players

The result will be of great musical interest, particularly if the American Symphonic Ensemble makes a careful endeavor to obey the implied as well as express directions of the composer, embodied in the printed music.

It has been often shown that our leading symphony orchestras do not when playing most standard orchestral works need to have a conductor beat time for them. The first time Dr Muck conducted the Boston Symphony, in 1907, he laid down his baton, and allowed the orchestra to play the scherzo of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony without guidance, by way of showing his faith in the skill of the orchestra, which his predecessor, Mr Gericke, had brought to a very high pitch.

Within the past few days both Mr Reiner in Cincinnati and Mr Stock in Chicago have had their orchestras play familiar music in public without them. Mr Koussevitzky could, and may, permit the Boston Symphony to show its skill in ensemble in a number or two by laying down his baton and leaving the stage, as his rivals have lately done.

But the interpretations given by the Chicago, Cincinnati and Boston Symphony orchestras now depend largely on the rehearsals by their respective conductors. It remains to be discovered what an orchestra of first rate players can do without the services of a conductor.

The American Symphonic Ensemble is said to include many of the men left unemployed by the consolidation of the New York Philharmonic and New York Symphony Society orchestras. Its membership overlaps with that of the new Beethoven Symphony, whose future is a bit dubious, owing to a large deficit which seems to have discouraged the financial backers, if New York musical gossip is to be trusted.

Such a group can undoubtedly play respectably without a conductor. But will the performances be more than mediocre? The reported artistic success of the Moscow Persimphans would indicate that they may be of very high grade.

Mr Koussevitzky has again chosen for this week's Symphony concerts a novelty not ultra modern in style, Frederick Jacobi's "Indian Dances." He is to repeat the remarkable interpretation of Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" that he gave at his Boston debut in 1924. Sibelius' Third Symphony, not hitherto heard here, is the other number.

Mme Galli-C...

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra, returning from its western tour, will give the fifth regular pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week. The orchestra will play for the first time in Boston the Third Symphony of Jan Sibelius. Mr. Koussevitzky has added Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." A new composer at these concerts will be Frederick Jacobi, whose "Indian Dances" will be played—Buffalo Dance, Butterfly Dance, War Dance and Corn Dance.

The first concert of the Monday evening series will take place on Nov. 12 in Symphony hall, at 8:15. Mr. Koussevitzky will then present Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Stravinsky's Ballet, "Apollon Musagete"; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes"; and Schumann's Symphony, B flat major, No. 1.

HE NINTH SYMPHONY

One performance only of Beethoven's Choral Ninth Symphony will be given for the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall, on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 18. Mr. Koussevitzky will then conduct the combined forces of the Symphony orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, respectively. The soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

Incidents and Prospects

At last all concerned have agreed upon the dates for the simultaneous performance in five different cities of Mr. Bloch's prize-winning symphonic rhapsody, "America." On Friday afternoon, Dec. 21, and Saturday evening, Dec. 22, it will be played by the Philharmonic Society in New York under Mr. Damrosch; the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky; the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Gabrilowitsch; the Chicago Orchestra under Mr. Stock; the San Francisco Orchestra under Mr. Hertz. (Mr. Bloch dwells and works in San Francisco.) At the close the Rhapsody joins a chorus to the orchestra. In Boston Dr. Davison's Cambridge choirs will provide it.

Today the Symphony Orchestra begins rehearsals of Sibelius's Third Symphony (in C major) and there is plentiful speculation about Mr. Koussevitzky's persistence in his announced intention to produce it. Dr. Muck, who thought well of the composer, read and re-read the score, each time put it by. Mr. Fiedler considered it, doubted, and restored it to the shelf. Mr. Monteux actually "tried it over" with the orchestra—and agreed with his predecessors. Yet in Scandinavia and in Finland, this Third Symphony had, and keeps, a considerable vogue.

ld of Music

ved by A. J. WARNER

ston Symphony Orchestra, coming Monday evening, Oct. and Lee Pattison, pianists, who open the Kilbourn Hall season Monday evening.

From Finnish Symphony To Indian Dances

TRANS Nov 8

Mr. Koussevitzky Unearths Sibelius and Asks In a Young American

FROM ANTIPODES Mr. Koussevitzky draws his novelties for this week's Symphony Concerts: A symphony from Finland, being the third of Jan Sibelius, as yet only unfavorably heard in America; a set of Indian dances based on material gathered in New Mexico by the American, Frederick Jacobi, making his initial bow in Symphony Hall. . . . Sibelius's Third Symphony is by no means new. It was completed in 1907. The London Philharmonic Society agreed with the composer to produce it on May 2, 1907. Production was deferred but the agreement stood, and the symphony was finally launched on Feb. 27, 1908. In this country it was heard in the same year from the Russian Symphony Orchestra of New York under Modest Altschuler. Without exception press comment was condemnatory. The late Henry Krehbiel went so far as to predict that Sibelius would go down into history as a composer of a single significant work (the First Symphony)! Here is a sample of the reviews written at the time:

> It [the Third Symphony] is in three inconsequential movements, in none of which had the composer done more than to dally with certain short phrases chiefly in the way of incessant and wearisome repetition. Nor has he lent these movements the charm of rich and interesting orchestration.

The performance in London fared not much better. A writer in the Pall Mail Gazette delivered himself amusingly:

> It contains the elements which would characterize a young and inexperienced writer's work who has something to say without having advanced very far in the art of saying it with certainty. All three movements suffer from the same fault. They begin well, with well-defined subjects, but as soon as the development starts the thread of continuity is lost, and the music becomes very diffuse and even dull.

In Boston Dr. Muck carefully considered performance but finally refrained. His successor, Mr. Fiedler, was like-minded. In 1921 Mr. Monteux rehearsed the Symphony and the press even announced it for performance in March of that year, but eventually he also laid it aside. Meanwhile, it was accepted and successfully performed in capitals of music in Europe, particularly Eastern Europe. And now Mr. Koussevitzky has announced it for Boston. More: after the first rehearsal, is reported as liking it even better than he had expected. A first casual perusal of the score gives him reason. But there is also a reason for the severe criticism of the past.

Sibelius as a composer was German-trained. Although he made his first studies in composition under the Finnish nationalist, Wegelius, at Helsingfors, he continued them at Berlin and Vienna under Bargiel, Becker, Fuchs and Goldmark. It was inevitable that German methods should prevail in his earlier work. Though in it subjects from Finnish mythology and Finnish folk-lore are frequent, possibly even more frequent than in later years, the treatment follows German methods, even as the handling in many of Chaikovsky's pieces (though the themes and the moods reek of Russia) is essentially German. It is within belief that the rise of the Glinka school in Russia, the growing performance of "The Five," the inreasing esteem for Musorgsky, with the expressed or implied criticism of Chaikovsky as a Germanophile, gave Sibelius cause for thought, and reason to consider his own station as a "nationalist" composer. True, his reputation as such was established. He was an acclaimed leader. The Finnish Diet as early as 1897, voted him a pension ($600 annually for ten years) so that he would be able to devote himself entirely to composition. This pension, by the way, was renewed and increased from time to time; until in 1925, on the composer's sixtieth birthday, it was increased to 100,000 marks or approximately $20,000.

Though Sibelius's position was secure financially as well as musically, the fate of Chaikovsky and, possibly, of the Bohemian, Dvorák, trying vainly to be "American" via folk-song may plausibly have haunted him. In time, in spite of success, and the general acceptance of his First Symphony, he set himself the task of freeing his style from all that was German. There are traces of this process in the Second Symphony. The Third is the first major work in which he addresses himself consistently and inexorably to his new ideal. Not unjustified on every count, then, was the critic who saw in it nothing but inexperience. When he heard this symphony, though it was Opus 82, he was present at the birth of a new style in the career of Jan Sibelius. Not surprising is it, either, that the German-soaked ears of writers on two continents should be confused when they also listened.

The changes in Sibelius's style, the result, probably, of years of self-examination, were deeper than abandonment of German technique. The use of folk-material, or material resembling folk-music, must also have received careful thought. For hencefoward he was to delve deeply into his own soul and bring forth the nationalism that he found there, rather than to depend upon the externals of nationalism round about him.

One may go still farther. The abandonment of the German technique, the revision of the attitude toward folk-material are sufficient ground for the scorn of critics in 1908, perhaps for a rejection by Dr. Muck before the war. But they hardly explain Mr. Monteux's fears in 1921. An examination of the score may also give him reason. For the style which Sibelius here adopts uncompromisingly seems to the eye of 1928 prophetic of much that has become current routine in the last five or six years, but which in 1921 was of the unrevealed future. Here is an economy of means practically unknown before 1923 or 1924. Here is an absence of "development." (In 1907 they were still debating the worth of Rimsky-Korsakov because his music lacked that process.) Two or three lines, independent lines, of sound frequently carry the burden of the entire work. The strings are more conspicuous for their absence than for their presence. The violins are used even less than the lower strings; while almost never do they play in a high register. Occasionally the full string choir rears huge, granitic, immobile blocks of sound upon a single unchanging chord, as background for the play of the melodic winds. Again, the full strings sing sombre phrases in unison against a bleak and sketchy background in the winds; perchance alternate with them antiphonally; or weave a web of melodies along with them. Such procedures, and others of the same brood, even the Stravinskies were not pondering in 1921, let alone the conductors of the works of these Stravinskies.

Sibelius himself may have thought that he was overreaching. For not again did he choose the like gaunt, spare economies. One can hardly avoid the question, "Would Sibelius have gone farther along this line had the Third Symphony been more favorably received? Not all the reviewers, moreover, were unfavorable, even at the London performance. Listen to an unnamed writer in The International Music Journal:

> It is impossible to hear these untold harmonies, this immense breadth of musical outpouring, without realizing that a pioneer stronger and deeper than a Glinka or even a Smetana is here, that this is a twig of Ygdrasil whose roots go down to mid-earth, and that something titanically elemental is hereby forcing its way among sensuousness and decadence. Such movements are instinctive, and it looks as if Nature herself here revolted against what she was producing elsewhere. But such situations also have their drawbacks. Austerity makes slow friends, and extreme reaction may sail too dangerously near uncouthness. As to form, Sibelius is a composer of such power that he is in a position to say, "This is my form, follow me," and few could gainsay him!

This Third Symphony, in C major, is dedicated to Granville Bantock. One can dimly see the traces of sonata-form in the first movement, even though Sibelius never deigns to "develop." A motiv not more than a half-measure in length emerges from the depths of 'cellos and basses. It at once arrests the attention and challenges the listener in its abrupt rhythmic conciseness. After about eighteen measures high woodwinds sound a new motiv, not more than a measure and a half in length, this time, ornate, flowery, bright, dancing. The sharpest of contrasts these two furnish. Low violins answer in a rhythmic counter-theme. Soon the 'cellos sing a curiously sustained but also curiously syncopated song. And after a series of modulations to which one once more applies the adjective curious, the "closing theme" (really a recurrence of the above-mentioned countertheme in the violins) brings a slight heightening of rhythm and of sonority. The section which stands in the place of the "working-out" makes a highly tentative beginning—over a single bass, while one-half of the first violins alternate antiphonally a recitative-like phrase with snatches of the second motiv on a solo flute.

Thereafter the composer plays now with this, or that, or the other of his three motivs, sometimes displaying them singly against a remorseless single contrapuntally figurated line, sometimes combining them, at last gathering up a climax at the head of which the first motiv re-enters for the recapitulation. This recapitulation is much more richly orchestrated than the exposition. The song which is the second theme is sung by all the strings in unison, with the violins playing on their G-string. The closing theme is extended into a coda, and before the close is a vague anticipation of the melody that is to predominate in the second division. The whole movement thus presents a subtle combination of intense seriousness and of a gaiety essentially Finnish.

The second movement has the form and the character of a simple ballad. The theme is a folk-like song, cheerful and unsophisticated in mood, played at first by flutes in thirds. Its broken hesitating rhythmical nature give it individuality. The single theme forms the basis for the entire movement. The orchestral background is at least as interesting as the theme itself. Let an English commentator, Mr. F. Gilbert Webb, describe it:

> The peculiar weird, sombre tone-color of the orchestration in itself provides an atmosphere peculiarly suggestive of the stillness of snow-bound forests and the sunless days that prevail in the Northern provinces from November to January. The theme played . . . above the steadily progressing pizzicato notes of the basses, the peculiar effect secured by muted strings and by unmuting them gradually, combined with the ghost-like scale passages for the wood-wind, all conduce to a vivid picture of Nature's hushed moods. Whistler would have called it a Nocturne in Grey.

The last movement begins Moderato, soon increases to Allegro, and continues in a long line of increasing speed and sonority. At first there is a reminiscence of the song of the second movement. Then themes are scarcely distinguishable. Everything is in a state of flux. Eventually the strings are divided into many parts and each part played with a peculiar wave-like figure, at once imitated by its neighbor. But all this is only introduction. The body of the movement is a stirring war-like march, given first to the lower strings with the 'cellos carrying the melody. It grows softer and softer to the lowest pianissimo, but still with full march accentuation. Again there is a gradual ascent, through many instruments, to a fortissimo of woodwinds. One would expect here a full-voiced climax. Instead, at the crucial moment, the theme breaks off; prolonged tones sound the song which is the second theme of the first movement. There the movement—and the Symphony—unexpectedly end. Was there a hidden programmatic reason? Is such an ending peculiarly in keeping with something in the Finnish consciousness? Perhaps a thoroughly sympathetic performance by Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra will disclose the answer.

Frederick Jacobi, whose Indian Dances begin the impending program, was born in San Francisco in 1891. He studied composition with Rubin Goldmark, Paul Juon and Ernest Bloch; has been active in organizations for the promotion of the general musical good, and especially the cultivation of modern music. He lives at present at Northampton. He has written a symphony and other works for orchestra. A string quartet based on Indian themes was played here in Boston several years ago by the Flonzaley Quartet.

The Indian Dances are a Buffalo Dance, a Butterfly Dance, a War Dance, a Rain Dance and a Corn Dance. Mr. Jacobi furnishes information that the work is in no sense intended to be a "reconstruction" of Indian music, but that it sums up his impressions of the great spectacles still provided by the ritualistic dances of the Pueblos and Navajos of New Mexico and Arizona. He is much impressed by the individuality and the hypnotic charm of Indian music. He finds its moods grim and fervently desperate, or of a tender melancholy, or jubilant, or barbaric. The war-dances, he declares, are jubilant rather than barbaric. Barbarism is reserved for dances of thanksgiving. The dances are, almost all of them, part of religious ritual.

The composer writes: "The Buffalo Dance, danced by the young men, was no doubt originally a prayer for a successful chase. Naked to the waist, their long black hair falling wildly over their blackened faces, buffalo-horns on their heads they imitate the slow, ungainly motions of the grazing buffalo. It must be said though, that with the Indians every gesture is a conventionalization; Indian [illegible] is not realistic but symbolic. The Butterfly Dance is danced by the maidens when they reach maturity. The Rain Dance is the invocation of that, in those arid regions, most desired of natural blessings. The Indians believe in the potency of their prayer; and it is amazing how many of their rain-dances, starting on a scorched and cloudless day (and lasting, as do most of the Indian dances, all day) are overtaken by storms and end in a drenching and beneficent downpour. The Corn Dance is a dance of thanksgiving and rejoicing. All five dances were written during 1927-28. They are based on themes, or fragments of themes, heard by the composer during sojourns among the Indians in New Mexico. The treatment is completely free, for he has felt that the least photographic method would bring him closest to the essence, the spirit he was seeking. A sparing use has been made of Indian instruments of percussion: drums and rattles." A. H. M.

Looking the Race, If Not the Calling

Frederick Jacobi (Stahlberg)

American Composer Entering the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow

22

Concert-Chronicle

Jacobi on Trial TRANS NOV 9

THE general disposition in Sanders Theater last evening was to be amiable. Mr. Koussevitzky, for his share, contributed the genialities of Schumann's First Symphony, the whimsicalities of Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony," the glinting pleasures of Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun." The players answered with their most graceful responses. The audience, likewise, settled comfortably into their seats, contentedly received the lavish offerings of orchestral perfections and refinements. Prokofiev's re-gilded ancientry drew smiles and murmurs between its brief episodes. It has been heard in Cambridge before; like a returning acquaintance, it was remembered and liked again. For Debussy's Prelude, while it sounded, there was that stillness that bespeaks the receptive ear. Finally, Schumann's unashamed happiness awoke a glad response.

In the midst of these felicitations Jacobi stepped and was welcomed. Mr. Frederick Jacobi. Impressed by the dances of the Pueblo and Navajo Indians in New Mexico and Arizona, the composer has adopted some of their calls, ritualistic melodies and dance rhythms and freely molded and pointed them to his will in musical composition; dressed them in harsh and insistent harmonies of the modern orchestra; linked them in a set of five "Indian Dances." Last evening they were performed for the first time. The audience heard them with interest, finding the music both strange and amusing—odd, angular figures, skillfully shaped, artfully combined. The composer rose happily to receive the applause.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who has more than one way of pacing a piece, according to occasion, pursued a course more easy and congenial than usual with Prokofiev. In the opening measures he took care to define and sharpen the design. In the Larghetto, too, he produced the finest of silvery lines (or encouraged Mr. Burgin and his body of sheenful strings to produce them); drew each gentle curve ever so subtly; pointed each delicate thrust. Out of the Gavotte came unmistakable waggery—tongue in cheek, chuckles barely repressed. Only in the Finale did the musicians skip and zip, speeding their tempo for a brilliant and effervescent display at the close.

From Debussy's music of atmosphere and fleeting thought, the conductor drew as rarefied sounds, exquisitely combined, subtly shaded. The most minute refinements were never too minute for his needs. If the flute and the oboe could produce more wasp-waisted, butterfly-tinted notes than ever before, Mr. Koussevitzky was bound to have them; his musicians eager to elicit them. For a sweeter length of time than usual, we of the audience luxuriated in the half-shadow, half-light of this woodland tone. Mr. Koussevitzky fondly lingered in these fancies, and was loath to leave them. He and the musicians smiled their mutual gratification when the image had faded at last.

Mr. Jacobi's Indian Dances broke somewhat startlingly upon the after-impressions of Debussy's music. Again and again the weird, mournful call of the Buffalo dance spoke from woodwinds and strings, announced often from the violins, echoed faithfully from the violas. Dour and stately, both, the monotonous measures insisted upon a hearing. Undoubtedly, Mr. Jacobi has imprinted a faithful and characteristic impression. Symbolic, perhaps, but certainly most perverse in its pictorial effectiveness is the succeeding Butterfly Dance. Sharp, stringent harmonies, dissonances pinched together, jerky rhythms. More outspoken, more ambitious as a piece for modern orchestra, the War Dance slashes its complicated and contrasting rhythms one against the other. Horns and strings vie in distorted jubilation. Unquestionably the measured and yet shattering assault drives deep under the musical skin, builds up a legitimate and insistent effect—Indian to the core. Syncopated frenzy, ritualist potency Mr. Jacobi has found in the remaining episodes, the Rain Dance and the Corn Dance. All of them, hard and jagged though they sound, possesses an amazing combination of rhythmic and dynamic devices.

To Schumann Mr. Koussevitzky opened his arms. Beginning good-humoredly and without hurry, taking his leisurely time with the slow movement, he finally abandoned his baton and conducted with both hands free.

N. M. J.

Schubert Redivivus

To Mark a Centenary, He Will Have the Next Two Symphony Concerts All to Himself

THERE IS little and infrequent room for Schubert in the ordinary course of the Symphony Concerts. Only two of his Symphonies—"The Unfinished" and the "heavenly lengths" in C major survive into the current repertory. Add the overture and the ballet-music for the play of "Rosamond, Queen of Cyprus" and the routined list is complete. Now and then a conductor, as did Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux, each in his time, resurrects an earlier Symphony, or strays as far as the Overture to Schubert's opera, "Alphonso and Estrella." Not much more than a good conscience rewards his curiosity and his pains. The musical public, for the most part, expects, and receives, Schubert in the song-recital, the piano-recital, the chamber-concert.

Now, however, the hundredth anniversary of Schubert's death—in Vienna on Nov. 19, 1828—draws near. There is presumed to be public interest; the conductors bestir themselves—not least Mr. Koussevitzky. All to himself, Schubert will have the next pair of Symphony Concerts, on Nov. 16 and 17; while for each there will be a different program. On Friday afternoon conductor and orchestra will disinter "The Tragic Symphony" and repeat "The Unfinished"; for middle item, Mme. Lashanska will sing to piano-accompaniment a sufficient number of Schubert's songs. On Saturday evening, the Fifth Symphony will be the revival; the Symphony in C major the masterpiece; in the same or in other songs Mme. Lashanska will again be heard. Let no subscriber grieve because he must miss either "The Unfinished" or the Symphony in C major. Each will be repeated in the progress of the season.

Later on the same afternoon the Friends of Music, conducted by Mr. Bodanzky, offered in the Town Hall Malipiero's "La Cimarosiana" and Verdi's "Stabat Mater," "Laudi alla Vergine Maria" and "Te Deum." Lloyd Hayden, Max Altglass and Dudley Marwick were the soloists. The chorus of the society, assisted by an orchestra from the Metropolitan Opera House, sang the Verdi items with dramatic [illegible] though Mr. Bodanzky's dynamic contrasts seemed at times needlessly violent.

Koussevitzky Ventures Third Sibelius Symphony

The third Symphony of Jan Sibelius, op. 52, was first performed in 1907 at Helsingfors. It was produced in New York, Jan. 16, 1908, by the Russian Symphony Society, conducted by Modest Altschuler. Not even Mr. Philip Hale, the editor of the program notes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been able to find record of any other performance in the United States. This symphony was considered for performance, according to report, by Dr. Muck, by Mr. Fiedler, and finally by Mr. Monteux, and in 1921 it was even announced that Mr. Monteux would play it, but he did not. Greatly daring where his predecessors had quailed, Mr. Koussevitzky placed it on the fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Nov. 9 and 10, and actually directed its performance at the concert of yesterday afternoon. So far as any indications to the contrary were concerned, it seemed reasonable to expect that he would repeat the performance at the Saturday evening concert.

After hearing this work one must conclude that the former Boston conductors passed it by not because of any extraordinary difficulty involved in performance, nor because of any complexities which might baffle an audience, but rather because of an austerity which surpasses even that of the first, the fifth and the seventh symphonies. No one is more aware than Mr. Koussevitzky of the effectiveness to be found in a piece of music; but neither is there a conductor with more courage in putting forward music in which he believes, without regard to its chances of popular success. He nevertheless had his reward yesterday. The audience applauded until, on his second recall, he beckoned the players to their feet.

Certainly this applause was a tribute to the interpretation, as well as to the music and the musical capacity of the listeners. Beyond any other music of Sibelius known to us, this score is stripped, rugged, uncompromising. It lacks form in the sense that form is usually understood in symphonic music. Nevertheless one feels that the structure of sound conceived by the composer has been logically completed. Its rigor expresses neither poverty nor pose, but restraint. Disdaining both rules and popular appeal, Sibelius seems to have set down his musical thought with utter candor: take it or leave it.

The results of this attitude are apparent in the Andantino, which contains matter very similar to that of the famous, or notorious, "Valse Triste." But the curious thing is that in this instance there is none of the falseness that mars the earlier piece. Here is all the beauty of the material, with no theatricality in the presentation. The same quality of almost forbidding artistic integrity pervades the other movements. They contain a deal of persistent repetition, but this is never carried to the point of satiety; rather, emphasis is thus attained. It is possible no doubt to discover in this work that cold northern landscape which it is customary to find in Sibelius' compositions. One prefers to see in it an expression partly racial perhaps, but intensely individual.

Mr. Koussevitzky chose to close his program with another composition which had been played in America for the first time by the Russian Symphony Society in 1908. But there the resemblance between the works ends. If Mr. Koussevitzky planned to leap from one extreme to another he could have found nothing further removed from Sibelius' Third Symphony than Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." This synthetic piece of fustian, woven of the least admirable elements of Tchaikovsky and Liszt, may bombinate until the roof falls, but the ecstasy remains only Scriabin's. It did, however, serve to emphasize the glorious capacities of the orchestra, which, except for two or three moments when brass instruments crumpled under the strain, yielded to the conductor amazing tonal riches.

The concert opened with the Indian Dances of Frederick Jacobi, heard for the first time in Boston. The composer supplied notes which explained that the music was intended not as a reconstruction of Indian music, but as impressions of the ritualistic dances of the Indians of the American South-west—"spectacles magnificent and profoundly moving." It must be confessed that in spite of its respectable workmanship Mr. Jacobi's music failed to evoke anything that would justify those characterizations.

L. A. S.

Jacobi Draws A Background To His Dances

From Personal Contacts Came The Pieces Played at Symphony Hall

TRANS —NOV 10

THE transcontinental comes to a stop in the middle of the vast plateau which is western New Mexico. Under the hot sun of early autumn lies Gallup, with its Main street sprawling back from the railroad tracks. The street is alive, swarming with Indians from all parts of the Southwest. They come from far-off Taos, at the foot of the Colorado mountains, dignified in their white robes, their black braids hanging heavily over their shoulders; from the hot brown villages of the Rio Grande valley, from the Mesa villages, the fortified hilltowns of the Zunis and the Hopis. And the Navajos, eternal shepherds, eternal nomads, with raven locks and arrogant moustaches, their blouses hung with silver and turquoise, are riding in from their neighboring grazing lands, high on horse, followed by wives and children, like conquering hordes from the plateaux of Tibet. They have come to take part in the Inter-Tribal Festival. Already impatient groups are singing and dancing. The brass band is playing. It is a Wild West Show, really wild and West, with Madison square far away.

It is not possible to describe what takes place in Gallup for three days and three nights. A sun-dance by the Indians from Zia — the dancers' half-naked bodies gorgeously painted, some golden, some black, (the black ones, Night, with their long hair falling wildly over their faces) is a symbolic orgy—the clash between Night and Day—beside which the most exciting moments of the Russian Ballet seem pale. A Bow-and-Arrow dance by the Indians of Tesuque is of a rhythmic intensity and power unknown to us in our concert-halls. In the charming Basket-dance by the Indians from Santa Clara the men weave beautiful designs around the women, who, scarcely moving from one spot, supply a sort of static element by balancing with gentle rhythm from one foot to the other. The grotesque and lascivious antics of the Hopi Fun-Makers which vastly amuse the onlooking Indians, are a reminder of the joy which we eternally take in beholding the ape in man. There is a thrilling War-dance of the Comanches. There is the eerie and silent Fire-dance of the Navajos, which the men, completely stripped except for loincloths, dance at night, around a colossal bon-fire, seeming to scorch themselves on the flames. All this must be seen and heard if one would know what great artists are the Indians and what a potent thing their music.

The music of the Indians is in some ways simple and crude. Instruments of [illegible] them and they must express themselves completely in the fundamental elements of music, rhythm and melody, the rhythm of their instruments of percussion and the melody of their voices. The contrapuntal cathedrals of Palestrina have come and gone, Harmony has evolved from Monteverdi to Schoenberg. Indian music still stands where it was, in its primeval simplicity and strength.

The simplicity of their music, though is more apparent than real. Their rhythms are remarkably complex. They have an amazing way of swinging abruptly from one to another and then back again to their first—a momentary jolt, a discomfort which makes the comfort of the initial rhythm all the more pleasurable. Their phrases are rhythmically free and not, like ours, constrained by bar-lines and symetrically-shaped periods. In this way their music retains much that we no longer have. With an instinct for sustaining simultaneously two or more rhythms, far more subtle and genuine than ours, they constantly sing in rhythms of three against drum-beats of two, and vice-versa. And they do these things quite naturally, with ease and precision. At the moment of sunrise, in the Hopi Snake-dance, it is said that as many as seven distinct rhythms are kept going simultaneously—a frenzied delirium of rhythm.

Their melodic sense is less striking. Often charming in line, the melodies are expressive of a number of clearly defined moods, a gentle tenderness, a barbaric wildness and fury and a virile full-throated jubilance. They are almost invariably pentatonic, though it is not always the same five notes which are used. We find sometimes wild combinations of chromatics with very clear suggestions of quarter-tones—a gorgeous impurity of sound. The War-songs, strangely enough, are usually of a very open and major character.

Their instruments of percussion are many and varied. They beat on drums, tom-toms of various size and pitch, some more vibrant, more sonorous, some more tight, more incisive. They shake gourds, whose seeds, rattling in the hard shell, symbollically fructify the earth. We have seen men from Jemez with desperate energy beating sticks on bundles of hides, to supply a dull and distant throb for their dancing companions. The dancers themselves are hung with instruments of percussion so that their every move is at once a living sound. Around their necks and around their strong brown legs are strings of little shells, which tinkle softly. From their waists hang ropes of sleigh-bells, which jangle wildly, with a relentless and deafening insistence. The noise is hard and shrill—as brilliant as the painted bodies in the glaring sunlight. They rarely clap their hands as we do, but the sound of their bare feet beating against the hard earth is a very real intensification of the living rhythm.

Indian music is music of today. It is more of Stravinsky than of Brahms. It has a certain objectiveness. Not sentimental, not descriptive or anecdotal, it has clarity and strength of form. As in jazz, the rhythmic element predominates, but here the rhythm is a more integral part of the melody, of the phrase. There is also far more diversity of rhythm than in jazz.

The Indians do not care much for our music. With apparently no direct contact between theirs and ours, as there is between ours and the negroes', their music remains uninfluenced; and we, until now, have not been ready for Indian music. Today we feel kinship with primitive man and respond to it for the first time.

Crude and primitive this music may be, but, throbbing with intense energy, its wild insistent rhythms, its barbaric dynamics fascinate us. One is reverent before its spirit, for the Indians' music is most often a part of their ritualistic dances—Rain-dances, Corn-dances, War-dances—and acquires therefore a religious, or at least a symbolic significance. This is great and unconscious art, which finds its roots deep in the past, in æons of racial unity and race-tradition. In the early-morning atmosphere of the Far West one's senses are reborn. One marvels anew at sunset and sunrise and at those two eternal phenomena—melody and rhythm. And one sees in the simple strength of Indian music, wild, yet ordered, a complete expression of the soul of a great race.

FREDERICK JACOBI

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY

THEIR By PHILIP HALE NOV 10

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Jacobi, Indian Dances. Sibelius, Symphony No. 3. Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstacy." The symphony and the Indian Dances were performed for the first time in Boston. The first performance of the latter anywhere was by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge last Thursday night.

It has been asked why the third symphony of Sibelius did not attract the attention of successive conductors in Boston. The Finnish composer has long been a favorite here. Conductors in other American cities have passed this symphony by. The only performance we have been able to note in this country was by the Russian Symphony Society in New York early in 1908, the year after the symphony was composed. That performance, if the local critics at the time did not err, was wholly inadequate; wretched, as one wrote.

Hearing this noble work yesterday, one was the more surprised at the long delay. There are possibly two reasons, say, rather excuses. The symphony is technically difficult. A conductor, no matter how excellent he was in other respects, lacking imagination, not detecting the fine qualities of the music, might have thought that the labor of rehearsal was not worth while; that the audience would fail to appreciate the symphony, as he had failed, and applause, dear to conductors in every land, would not follow the final movement; that there would be a fourth movement viz: That of bored and disgusted hearers from the hall.

Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra is more euphonious and plastic, more a body of virtuoso musicians than ever before. Its conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, is richly endowed with imagination. He has the skill, the art of bringing his poetic conception of a work into vivid realization. He found in this symphony what others had failed to find or did not try to find. And what was the reward of his ability and courage? How was the orchestra repaid for its eloquent performance?

The great audience listened to the music as to a revelation of something strangely beautiful in its now sombre, now exciting moods; it recalled the conductor enthusiastically and compelled the players to acknowledge the tribute paid them. Those who in past years knew Silebius, the symphonist, only by his first two symphonies, hearing the third would hardly have recognized the composer: The plan and the carrying of it out are so different. The customary Andante or Adagio and Scherzo are here one movement with music of an elegaic nature; a repetition for the most part of insistent measures adroitly changed from time to time, but with the same idea. This constant repetition does not breed monotony, but holds the hearer fast, hypnotizes him even against his will; nor would he have Sibelius introduce contrasting episodes. This movement is not a mere tour de force: it is a constant impressive reiteration of a tragic mood, not starkly austere, never lachrymose, but heroic with an underlying tenderness.

The opening movement is a masterpiece of conciseness. There are no themes of sugary sensuousness, no themes that bid for immediate popularity, but from the very beginning the virility of the music with its arousing of expectation, with its exciting moments, its sudden changes of thought, all contributing to the sweep and at times the fury of the movement—the avoidance of tiresome overdevelopment and distracting ornamentation—these make this allegro remarkable. There is also now and then a wildness of expression as Nature herself is often wild, but even in these moments Sibelius is himself, as one "master of the spasm of the sky and of the shatter of the sea, master of nature and passion and death." Perhaps the finale does not attain an equal height, but it is a fitting ending for an uncommon work.

Mr. Jacobi, having sojourned with Indians in New Mexico, is greatly interested in their music. His string quartet in which Indian themes are employed has been played here by the Flonzaley and the Lenox quartets. Aubert said of Felicien David, who was influenced by oriental music, as shown in his symphonic ode "The Desert" and his opera "Lalla Roukh": "I wish he would get off his camel"; but Mr. Jacobi does not go so far as to insist that music to be genuinely "Amur-r-rican" must be based on Indian or negro themes. These orchestral dances as a whole have more of ethnological than universal musical interest. We are not told whether the themes are presented in their bald simplicity or have been shaped somewhat for sophisticated ears. Some of the themes in the Five Dances have a primitive charm, as in the Buffalo Dance and the Rain Dance. The orchestration of the Butterfly Dance is ingenious. There is appropriate savagery in the dance of warriors. The suite was warmly applauded. Mr. Jacobi was in the hall and bowed in return.

Mr. Koussevitzky was an intimate friend of Scriabin; they made musical tours together. It is natural that he, as other Russians who loved Scriabin as man, composer and mystic, should hold him in lively admiration and conduct his huge works with a peculiar gusto. Yesterday's performance of "The Poem of Ecstasy," the third conducted here by Mr. Koussevitzy, was extremely brilliant. The reception by the audience was enthusiastic.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the programs have been arranged with a view to the Schubert centenary: Friday afternoon Schubert's "Unfinished" and "Tragic" symphonies with songs to be sung by Hulda Lashanka; Saturday night the Symphony in B flat major, the great symphony in C major and a group of songs, different from those on Friday, to be sung by Mme. Lashanka.

In order that all subscribers may hear both the "Unfinished" and the C major symphonies, these works will be repeated later in the season.

23

Concert-Chronicle

Jacobi on Trial TRANS NOV 9

THE general disposition in Sanders Theater last evening was to be amiable. Mr. Koussevitzky, for his share, contributed the genialities of Schumann's First Symphony, the whimsicalities of Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony," the glinting pleasures of Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun." The players answered with their most graceful responses. The audience, likewise, settled comfortably into their seats, contentedly received the lavish offerings of orchestral perfections and refinements. Prokofiev's re-gilded ancientry drew smiles and murmurs between its brief episodes. It has been heard in Cambridge before; like a returning acquaintance, it was remembered and liked again. For Debussy's Prelude, while it sounded, there was that stillness that bespeaks the receptive ear. Finally, Schumann's unashamed happiness awoke a glad response.

In the midst of these felicitations stepped and was welcomed Mr. Frederick Jacobi. Impressed by the dances of the Pueblo and Navajo Indians in New Mexico and Arizona, the composer has adopted some of their calls, ritualistic melodies and dance rhythms and freely molded and pointed them to his will in musical composition; dressed them in harsh and insistent harmonies of the modern orchestra; linked them in a set of five "Indian Dances." Last evening they were performed for the first time. The audience heard them with interest, finding the music both strange and amusing—odd, angular figures, skillfully shaped, artfully combined. The composer rose happily to receive the applause.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who has more than one way of pacing a piece, according to occasion, pursued a course more easy and congenial than usual with Prokofiev. In the opening measures he took care to define and sharpen the design. In the Larghetto, too, he produced the finest of silvery lines (or encouraged Mr. Burgin and his body of sheenful strings to produce them); drew each gentle curve ever so subtly; pointed each delicate thrust. Out of the Gavotte came unmistakable waggery—tongue in cheek, chuckles barely repressed. Only in the Finale did the musicians skip and zip, speeding their tempo for a brilliant and effervescent display at the close.

From Debussy's music of atmosphere and fleeting thought, the conductor drew as rarefied sounds, exquisitely combined, subtly shaded. The most minute refinements were never too minute for his needs. If the flute and the oboe could produce more wasp-waisted, butterfly-tinted notes than ever before, Mr. Koussevitzky was bound to have them; his musicians eager to elicit them. For a sweeter length of time than usual, we of the audience luxuriated in the half-shadow, half-light of this woodland in tone. Mr. Koussevitzky fondly lingered in these fancies, and was loath to leave them. He and the musicians smiled their mutual gratification when the image had faded at last.

Mr. Jacobi's Indian Dances broke somewhat startlingly upon the after-impressions of Debussy's music. Again and again the weird, mournful call of the Buffalo dance spoke from woodwinds and strings, announced often from the violins, echoed faithfully from the violas. Dour and stately, both, the monotonous measures insisted upon a hearing. Undoubtedly, Mr. Jacobi has imprinted a faithful and characteristic impression. Symbolic, perhaps, but certainly most perverse in its pictorial effectiveness is the succeeding Butterfly Dance. Sharp, stringent harmonies, dissonances pinched together, jerky rhythms. More outspoken, more ambitious as a piece for modern orchestra, the War Dance slashes its complicated and contrasting rhythms one against the other. Horns and strings vie in distorted jubilation. Unquestionably the measured and yet shattering assault drives deep under the musical skin, builds up a legitimate and insistent effect—Indian to the core. Syncopated frenzy, ritualist potency Mr. Jacobi has found in the remaining episodes, the Rain Dance and the Corn Dance. All of them, hard and jagged though they sound, possesses an amazing combination of rhythmic and dynamic devices.

To Schumann Mr. Koussevitzky opened his arms. Beginning good-humoredly and without hurry, taking his leisurely time with the slow movement, he finally abandoned his baton and conducted with both hands free.

N. M. J.

Schubert Redivivus

To Mark a Centenary, He Will Have the Next Two Symphony Concerts All to Himself

THERE IS little and infrequent room for Schubert in the ordinary course of the Symphony Concerts. Only two of his Symphonies—"The Unfinished" and the "heavenly lengths" in C major survive into the current repertory. Add the overture and the ballet-music for the play of "Rosamond, Queen of Cyprus" and the routined list is complete. Now and then a conductor, as did Dr. Muck and Mr. Monteux, each in his time, resurrects an earlier Symphony, or strays as far as the Overture to Schubert's opera, "Alphonso and Estrella." Not much more than a good conscience rewards his curiosity and his pains. The musical public, for the most part, expects, and receives, Schubert in the song-recital, the piano-recital, the chamber-concert.

Now, however, the hundredth anniversary of Schubert's death—in Vienna on Nov. 19, 1828—draws near. There is presumed to be public interest; the conductors bestir themselves—not least Mr. Koussevitzky. All to himself, Schubert will have the next pair of Symphony Concerts, on Nov. 16 and 17; while for each there will be a different program. On Friday afternoon conductor and orchestra will disinter "The Tragic Symphony" and repeat "The Unfinished"; for middle item, Mme. Lashanska will sing to piano-accompaniment a sufficient number of Schubert's songs. On Saturday evening, the Fifth Symphony will be the revival; the Symphony in C major the masterpiece; in the same or in other songs Mme. Lashanska will again be heard. Let no subscriber grieve because he must miss either "The Unfinished" or the Symphony in C major. Each will be repeated in the progress of the season.

performance.

Later on the same afternoon the Friends of Music, conducted by Mr. Bodanzky, offered in the Town Hall Malipiero's "La Cimarosiana" and Verdi's "Stabat Mater," "Laudi alla Vergine Maria" and "Te Deum." Cloyl Hayden, Max Altglass and Dudley Marwick were the soloists. The chorus of the society, assisted by an orchestra from the Metropolitan Opera House, sang the Verdi items with dramatic [illegible] though Mr. Bodanzky's dynamic contrasts seemed at times needlessly violent.

Koussevitzky Ventures Third Sibelius Symphony

The third Symphony of Jan Sibelius, op. 52, was first performed in 1907 at Helsingfors. It was produced in New York, Jan. 16, 1908, by the Russian Symphony Society, conducted by Modest Altschuler. Not even Mr. Philip Hale, the editor of the program notes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been able to find record of any other performance in the United States. This symphony was considered for performance, according to report, by Dr. Muck, by Mr. Fiedler, and finally by Mr. Monteux, and in 1921 it was even announced that Mr. Monteux would play it, but he did not. Greatly daring where his predecessors had quailed, Mr. Koussevitzky placed it on the fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Nov. 9 and 10, and actually directed its performance at the concert of yesterday afternoon. So far as any indications to the contrary were concerned, it seemed reasonable to expect that he would repeat the performance at the Saturday evening concert.

After hearing this work one must conclude that the former Boston conductors passed it by not because of any extraordinary difficulty involved in performance, nor because of any complexities which might baffle an audience, but rather because of an austerity which surpasses even that of the first, the fifth and the seventh symphonies. No one is more aware than Mr. Koussevitzky of the effectiveness to be found in a piece of music; but neither is there a conductor with more courage in putting forward music in which he believes, without regard to its chances of popular success. He nevertheless had his reward yesterday. The audience applauded until, on his second recall, he beckoned the players to their feet.

Certainly this applause was a tribute to the interpretation, as well as to the music and the musical capacity of the listeners. Beyond any other music of Sibelius known to us, this score is stripped, rugged, uncompromising. It lacks form in the sense that form is usually understood in symphonic music. Nevertheless one feels that the structure of sound conceived by the composer has been logically completed. Its rigor expresses neither poverty nor pose, but restraint. Disdaining both rules and popular appeal, Sibelius seems to have set down his musical thought with utter candor: take it or leave it.

The results of this attitude are apparent in the Andantino, which contains matter very similar to that of the famous, or notorious, "Valse Triste." But the curious thing is that in this instance there is none of the falseness that mars the earlier piece. Here is all the beauty of the material, with no theatricality in the presentation. The same quality of almost forbidding artistic integrity pervades the other movements. They contain a deal of persistent repetition, but this is never carried to the point of satiety; rather, emphasis is thus attained. It is possible no doubt to discover in this work that cold northern landscape which it is customary to find in Sibelius' compositions. One prefers to see in it an expression partly racial perhaps, but intensely individual.

Mr. Koussevitzky chose to close his program with another composition which had been played in America for the first time by the Russian Symphony Society in 1908. But there the resemblance between the works ends. If Mr. Koussevitzky planned to leap from one extreme to another he could have found nothing further removed from Sibelius' Third Symphony than Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." This synthetic piece of fustian, woven of the least admirable elements of Tchaikovsky and Liszt, may bombinate until the roof falls, but the ecstasy remains only Scriabin's. It did, however, serve to emphasize the glorious capacities of the orchestra, which, except for two or three moments when brass instruments crumpled under the strain, yielded to the conductor amazing tonal riches.

The concert opened with the Indian Dances of Frederick Jacobi, heard for the first time in Boston. The composer supplied notes which explained that the music was intended not as a reconstruction of Indian music, but as impressions of the ritualistic dances of the Indians of the American Southwest—"spectacles magnificent and profoundly moving." It must be confessed that in spite of its respectable workmanship Mr. Jacobi's music failed to evoke anything that would justify those characterizations.

L. A. S.

Jacobi Draws A Background To His Dances

From Personal Contacts Came The Pieces Played at Symphony Hall

TRANS —NOV 10

THE transcontinental comes to a stop in the middle of the vast plateau which is western New Mexico. Under the hot sun of early autumn lies Gallup, with its Main street sprawling back from the railroad tracks. The street is alive, swarming with Indians from all parts of the Southwest. They come from far-off Taos, at the foot of the Colorado mountains, dignified in their white robes, their black braids hanging heavily over their shoulders; from the hot brown villages of the Rio Grande valley, from the Mesa villages, the fortified hilltowns of the Zunis and the Hopis. And the Navajos, eternal shepherds, eternal nomads, with raven locks and arrogant moustaches, their blouses hung with silver and turquoise, are riding in from their neighboring grazing lands, high on horse, followed by wives and children, like conquering hordes from the plateaux of Tibet. They have come to take part in the Inter-Tribal Festival. Already impatient groups are singing and dancing. The brass band is playing. It is a Wild West Show, really wild and West, with Madison square far away.

It is not possible to describe what takes place in Gallup for three days and three nights. A sun-dance by the Indians from Zia — the dancers' half-naked bodies gorgeously painted, some golden, some black, (the black ones, Night, with their long hair falling wildly over their faces) is a symbolic orgy—the clash between Night and Day—beside which the most exciting moments of the Russian Ballet seem pale. A Bow-and-Arrow dance by the Indians of Tesuque is of a rhythmic intensity and power unknown to us in our concert-halls. In the charming Basket-dance by the Indians from Santa Clara the men weave beautiful designs around the women, who, scarcely moving from one spot, supply a sort of static element by balancing with gentle rhythm from one foot to the other. The grotesque and lascivious antics of the Hopi Fun-Makers which vastly amuse the onlooking Indians, are a reminder of the joy which we eternally take in beholding the ape in man. There is a thrilling War-dance of the Comanches. There is the eerie and silent Fire-dance of the Navajos, which the men, completely stripped except for loincloths, dance at night, around a colossal bon-fire, seeming to scorch themselves on the flames. All this must be seen and heard if one would know what great artists are the Indians and what a potent thing their music.

The music of the Indians is in some ways simple and crude. Instruments of exact pitch are practically unknown to them and they must express themselves completely in the fundamental elements of music, rhythm and melody, the rhythm of their instruments of percussion and the melody of their voices. The contrapuntal cathedrals of Palestrina have come and gone, Harmony has evolved from Monteverdi to Schoenberg. Indian music still stands where it was, in its primeval simplicity and strength.

The simplicity of their music, though, is more apparent than real. Their rhythms are remarkably complex. They have an amazing way of swinging abruptly from one to another and then back again to their first—a momentary jolt, a discomfort which makes the comfort of the initial rhythm all the more pleasurable. Their phrases are rhythmically free and not, like ours, constrained by bar-lines and symetrically-shaped periods. In this way their music retains much that we no longer have. With an instinct for sustaining simultaneously two or more rhythms, far more subtle and genuine than ours, they constantly sing in rhythms of three against drum-beats of two, and vice-versa. And they do these things quite naturally, with ease and precision. At the moment of sunrise, in the Hopi Snake-dance, it is said that as many as seven distinct rhythms are kept going simultaneously —a frenzied delirium of rhythm.

Their melodic sense is less striking. Often charming in line, the melodies are expressive of a number of clearly defined moods, a gentle tenderness, a barbaric wildness and fury and a virile full-throated jubilance. They are almost invariably pentatonic, though it is not always the same five notes which are used. We find sometimes wild combinations of chromatics with very clear suggestions of quarter-tones—a gorgeous impurity of sound. The War-songs, strangely enough, are usually of a very open and major character.

Their instruments of percussion are many and varied. They beat on drums, tom-toms of various size and pitch, some more vibrant, more sonorous, some more tight, more incisive. They shake gourds, whose seeds, rattling in the hard shell, symbollically fructify the earth. We have seen men from Jemez with desperate energy beating sticks on bundles of hides, to supply a dull and distant throb for their dancing companions. The dancers themselves are hung with instruments of percussion so that their every move is at once a living sound. Around their necks and around their strong brown legs are strings of little shells, which tinkle softly. From their waists hang ropes of sleigh-bells, which jangle wildly, with a relentless and deafening insistence. The noise is hard and shrill—as brilliant as the painted bodies in the glaring sun-light. They rarely clap their hands as we do, but the sound of their bare feet beating against the hard earth is a very real intensification of the living rhythm.

Indian music is music of today. It is more of Stravinsky than of Brahms. It has a certain objectiveness. Not sentimental, not descriptive or anecdotal, it has clarity and strength of form. As in jazz, the rhythmic element predominates, but here the rhythm is a more integral part of the melody, of the phrase. There is also far more diversity of rhythm than in jazz.

The Indians do not care much for our music. With apparently no direct contact between theirs and ours, as there is between ours and the negroes', their music remains uninfluenced; and we, until now, have not been ready for Indian music. Today we feel kinship with primitive man and respond to it for the first time.

Crude and primitive this music may be, but, throbbing with intense energy, its wild insistent rhythms, its barbaric dynamics fascinate us. One is reverent before its spirit, for the Indians' music is most often, a part of their ritualistic dances—Rain-dances, Corn-dances, War-dances—and acquires therefore a religious, or at least a symbolic significance. This is great and unconscious art, which finds its roots deep in the past, in æons of racial unity and race-tradition. In the early-morning atmosphere of the Far West one's senses are reborn. One marvels anew at sunset and sunrise and at those two eternal phenomena—melody and rhythm. And one sees in the simple strength of Indian music, wild, yet ordered, a complete expression of the soul of a great race.

FREDERICK JACOBI

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY

HER By PHILIP HALE NOV 10

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Jacobi, Indian Dances. Sibelius, Symphony No. 3. Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstacy." The symphony and the Indian Dances were performed for the first time in Boston. The first performance of the latter anywhere was by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge last Thursday night.

It has been asked why the third symphony of Sibelius did not attract the attention of successive conductors in Boston. The Finnish composer has long been a favorite here. Conductors in other American cities have passed this symphony by. The only performance we have been able to note in this country was by the Russian Symphony Society in New York early in 1908, the year after the symphony was composed. That performance, if the local critics at the time did not err, was wholly inadequate; wretched, as one wrote.

Hearing this noble work yesterday, one was the more surprised at the long delay. There are possibly two reasons, say, rather excuses. The symphony is technically difficult. A conductor, no matter how excellent he was in other respects, lacking imagination, not detecting the fine qualities of the music, might have thought that the labor of rehearsal was not worth while; that the audience would fail to appreciate the symphony, as he had failed, and applause, dear to conductors in every land, would not follow the final movement; that there would be a fourth movement viz: That of bored and disgusted hearers from the hall.

Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra is more euphonious and plastic, more a body of virtuoso musicians than ever before. Its conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky, is richly endowed with imagination. He has the skill, the art of bringing his poetic conception of a work into vivid realization. He found in this symphony what others had failed to find or did not try to find. And what was the reward of his ability and courage? How was the orchestra repaid for its eloquent performance?

The great audience listened to the music as to a revelation of something strangely beautiful in its now sombre, now exciting moods; it recalled the conductor enthusiastically and compelled the players to acknowledge the tribute paid them. Those who in past years knew Silebius, the symphonist, only by his first two symphonies, hearing the third would hardly have recognized the composer: The plan and the carrying of it out are so different. The customary Andante or Adagio and Scherzo are here one movement with music of an elegaic nature; a repetition for the most part of insistent measures adroitly changed from time to time, but with the same idea. This constant repetition does not breed monotony, but holds the hearer fast, hypnotizes him even against his will; nor would he have Sibelius introduce contrasting episodes. This movement is not a mere tour de force: it is a constant impressive reiteration of a tragic mood, not starkly austere, never lachrymose, but heroic with an underlying tenderness.

The opening movement is a masterpiece of conciseness. There are no themes of sugary sensuousness, no themes that bid for immediate popularity, but from the very beginning the virility of the music with its arousing of expectation, with its exciting moments, its sudden changes of thought, all contributing to the sweep and at times the fury of the movement—the avoidance of tiresome overdevelopment and distracting ornamentation—these make this allegro remarkable. There is also now and then a wildness of expression as Nature herself is often wild; but even in these moments Sibelius himself, as one "master of the spasm of the sky and of the shatter of the sea, master of nature and passion and death." Perhaps the finale does not attain an equal height, but it is a fitting ending for an uncommon work.

Mr. Jacobi, having sojourned with Indians in New Mexico, is greatly interested in their music. His string quartet in which Indian themes are employed has been played here by the Flonzaley and the Lenox quartets. Aubert said of Felicien David, who was influenced by oriental music, as shown in his symphonic ode "The Desert" and his opera "Lalla Roukh": "I wish he would get off his camel"; but Mr. Jacobi does not go so far as to insist that music to be genuinely "Amur-r-ricar" must be based on Indian or negro themes. These orchestral dances as whole have more of ethnological than universal musical interest. We are not told whether the themes are presented in their bald simplicity or have been shaped somewhat for sophisticated ears. Some of the themes in the Five Dances have a primitive charm, as in the Buffalo Dance and the Rain Dance. The orchestration of the Butterfly Dance is ingenious. There is appropriate savagery in the dance of warriors. The suite was warmly applauded. Mr. Jacobi was in the hall and bowed in return.

Mr. Koussevitzky was an intimate friend of Scriabin; they made musical tours together. It is natural that he, as other Russians who loved Scriabin as man, composer and mystic, should hold him in lively admiration and conduct his huge works with a peculiar gusto. Yesterday's performance of "The Poem of Ecstasy," the third conducted here by Mr. Koussevitzy, was extremely brilliant. The reception by the audience was enthusiastic.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the programs have been arranged with a view to the Schubert centenary: Friday afternoon Schubert's "Unfinished" and "Tragic" symphonies with songs to be sung by Hulda Lashanka; Saturday night the Symphony in B flat major, the great symphony in C major and a group of songs, different from those on Friday, to be sung by Mme. Lashanka.

In order that all subscribers may hear both the "Unfinished" and the C major symphonies, these works will be repeated later in the season.

23

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

24

The Symphony

Conductor, Composers, Sensations

TRANS — Nov 10

Symphony Concert in Which, for Sibelius and Skriabin, Koussevitzky Excels

UNTIL the end of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, applause for Mr. Koussevitzky was tepid; whereas at every turn it should have beaten high. At the close of Mr. Jacobi's Indian Dances the composer, rather than the conductor, occupied the audience. Sibelius's Third Symphony baffled it. As the author hereabouts of its being, the conductor paid the penalty. Only upon the full-mouthed climax of Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" came the clapping thick and fast. After any such deluge of sound—the cynics, doubtless, said—any audience will drip with plaudits. The good cause is making progress—the few believers in tonal theosophy may have thought—as they listened to that same response. Here and there on the outskirts were those who hoped and believed that Mr. Koussevitzky was the target of these fervors. For in five seasons at Symphony Hall, seldom, in a single corncert, has he appeared to more advantage.

With the Indian Dances, there again was the conductor finding place for a music that smacked of the soil, signed by a composer still young, American to boot. So far as it asked the resources of the orchestra or the play of his own abilities, upon it he lavished both. He passed to Sibelius's Symphony in C major. Through a whole concert-going generation it has lain on the shelf, because successive conductors misunderstood or mistrusted it. Mr. Koussevitzky examined, admired, believed in it; with his usual faith and courage prepared the performance. In it he surpassed himself. His mind read the music clearly; his hand gained like lucidity from the orchestra. He felt the mood and the purport of the piece, infusing both into the playing. He was in no wise baffled by the singular style in which Sibelius has written. Grasping it himself, he enjoined it upon his forces. The stripped surfaces, rhythmic impetus, tense, terse brevity; the misted song, the naked interplay of separate voices or contrasted choirs, the sense of stillness become sound that haunts the music, were all within his divining and projecting powers. Withal he set to the Symphony the vitalizing fire that purges and concentrates it upon those who hear with imagination. A more discerning, revealing, communicating performance of a given piece were hard to conceive.

Finally, the conductor set to "The Poem of Ecstasy." Believe or disbelieve in the music itself, under his hand, the orchestra became the striding, seething, heaven-scaling mass for which Skriabin wrote. It gave to his passion of sound and senses an apocalyptic voice. Yet through this welter, as many unbelievers will call it, sounded the horns and trumpets that the composer heard from celestial ramparts; while across it, out of higher strings and lighter wood-winds, floated those tatters of vision that upon Skriabin's imagination were gold and purple. Again a performance that was vitalization and intensification not only of the staves but of the mind and heart behind them—a music set free and winged.

Nor was this all. Like most men and women, we Bostonians live in a self-centered community. The daily routine, the domestic, the local, interest press close upon us. Humanly enough, "we count our blessings while we may," tell them over, perhaps, quite as often as need be; tend to be self-content, even smug, as we contemplate them. For us, if we have any imagination at all, Mr. Koussevitzky is ever opening new doors. Yesterday we ranged musically from the Indian tribes of the Southwest and their American spokesman, to the self-searching soul that sits thoughtful by Finnish lakes or strides impetuously over Finnish forests to write measures like no others coming to our ears. Yet again, and we were at the feet of the neurotic, erotic, palpitating Russian, tearing in tones through the haze of his theosophic dreams. Within easy memory, Mr. Koussevitzky bade us listen to Schumann singing on his German hillsides: to Franck earthy-gay or celestially beatific and all from his organ-loft; to Stravinsky, after his fashion, companioning Apollo and the Muses; to Beethoven who would write music of all humanity, to Brahms searching a single heart; to Ibert—to leap to the other end of the scale—who is only one more dextrous and dilettante Parisian.

With his whole mind and heart, Mr. Koussevitzky practices a world-embracing art. With him he bids us roam the universe, traverse the centuries, find interest and pleasure in the good or the less good, wherever we may encounter it, even in our own time. His ambition and curiosity ever whip him forward. He is our apostle of change, our antidote to a narrow content, our monitor of the open and restless mind. By the art he practices, and beyond it, he is perpetual goad and stimulus to a full, far-reaching life that shall break over local bounds. He is not only illustrious conductor of music; he is force for our intellectual good and spiritual salvation. The temperament, as well as the talents, deserve our homage.

Within recollection, various Spaniards, young or middle-aged, said one to another: "Behold and hear, we will write music that shall sound truthfully of our race, land and living." Forthwith they wrote it, but few foreign hearers praised and fewer believed, because most such were accustomed to a prettyfied, a rhetorical, an otherwise conventionalized, Spanish music. (Compare, as the learned say, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" or the Introduction to the Fourth Act of Carmen.") In similar plight Mr. Jacobi may find himself with his Five Indian Dances. There is reason to believe that he has transfused into a symphonic music of the concert-hall both the tonal characteristics and the embodied moods of the aboriginal music that he heard in the Southwest. Here are abrupt rhythms, irregular phrases, changeful structure; harsh, plain-coated harmonies, monotony, rather than variety, of instrumental color; singleness of feeling, direct, terse, unshaded—for the most part qualities not exactly those with which preceding composers have impregnated their Indian pieces.

There is no questioning Mr. Jacobi's veracity. He heard Indian music at first hand, studiously, receptively. Then, through himself filtered it into the matter, manner and inner content of his present pages. The Indian backgrounds seeped into him. He agreed to the Indian absence of rhetoric, the Indian fixity of mood. He would not overdo, beyond Indian proportion, the choser musical means. Out of all five dances rises a suggestion of ritual—uncouth in the Buffalo Dance; urgent in the Rain Dance; impetuous in the Corn Dance; wearing a barbaric dignity and inflexibility in the War Dance; curiously tinged with melancholy in the Butterfly Dance of the ripened girls. Almost everywhere the voice, motion, color, fall strangely upon the ear. Here, plainly is the truth, plus a modest infusion of the composer, about Indian Dances; but the newness of it confuses the receiving faculties. Recovered from this embarrassment, they eagerly absorb Mr. Jacobi's music; but it is music to be replayed immediately, upon ears first clarified, then sympathetic. This evening, in such hearers as frequent both concerts, should upspring responsive mood.

By repetition, it is said, Theodore Thomas persuaded audiences in the eighteen-eighties to the customary excerpts, as they now seem, from Wagner's music-dramas. By similar process the devoted Koussevitzky is not persuading all the doubters to Skriabin's tone-poems; but he is disclosing to some skeptics qualities in that music undiscerned before. Insist that "The Poem of Ecstasy" is a huge, inchoate welter of Wagnerian procedures without Wagner's imagination and craft to conduct and proportion them. Insist again that not a little of the visioning and the aspiring are but emanations of a half-mystic, half-erotic temperament, neurotic and feverish always. Assert that much too often Skriabin's luxuriance of sound and frenzy no whit lessens the emptiness of his measures. And yet, and yet, there are moments when his horns and trumpets call across the skies; when his strings twine and coil in the play of a voluptuous imagination; when the heart of the composer and the pulse of the music almost cease to beat—as in those stilled measures near the end—before the ecstasy that has wrapt them. Our education in Skriabin should go forward—and, outside Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky is his one surviving apostle.

For some of us, to hear after years of waiting and doubting, Sibelius's Third Symphony, was to sit breathless and possessed before the revelation. It were difficult to imagine a more economical music or a music in which the means so completely and inevitably accomplish the ends. Con the score under the study-lamp, listen with every faculty in stretch and not a note seems unwarranted, much less wasted. Read and reread each measure, hear it spoken and intensified by conductor and orchestra, and in every one all seems said that the composer would say. Here first, in this Symphony in C major, Sibelius is attaining that goal of every conscious artist—the conveyance and the expression become as one body and one spirit with the idea or the mood. Listen to those pages in which the strings whirr like so many voices of the darkling air; while across them the woodwinds, the horns, or both, lead strangely spoken, strangely lighted, melodies, and a music sounds, new of voice and imagination. The impression is affirmed when the sombrer strings fall in successive chords upon the ear, as upon the eye, at a turn in the mountain pass, a line of cliffs marches toward infinity. It recurs again when the woodwinds wander faint and far—the voices of the forest—and the strings give them back the deeper calls of us men.

Consider, again, the matter and the manner of this music. There is room and to spare for such pondering. Did Igor the Great invent the rhythms that set the hands clenching and the blood tingling? They have beaten from 1907 in the first movement of this Third Symphony of Jan Sibelius, biding his time in remotest Helsingfors. The week has brought a new opera by Richard Strauss, rediscovered another of his prime. The old lion's paw still strikes out orchestral colors to stir the listening senses. Yet there is not one, even in the work of his noon, that more seizes the imagination than that blackish-grey which Sibelius conjures into tones from rock-bound lakes under leaden skies. Before him others have drawn from the simplicities of folk-song a beauty of sound which words may only cloud. In the slow movement of this Symphony in C major he gives that beauty a vaporous quality—muted strings gradually unmuted. Brightened, shadowed, by the wood-winds, the melody dissolves into silence. . . .

Of a sudden the musical ideas of the symphony are in turbid motion nowhither; of a sudden a Life Force—Mr. Shaw's phrase in another meaning—orders and rhythms them. Up they sweep, enlarging and ampler voiced; the urge relaxes; they snap, sigh deep and are gone, and Sibelius has written his Finale. A bare, rough music sounding upon too many smooth-soft ears; a dun-colored music woven across a garish time; an utterly individual music to irk those who would always run with the herd! Too often common report is the abomination before the Lord. Year in and year out it has declared Sibelius's Third Symphony a failure; whereas, at Mr. Kussevitzky's hands upon an enkindled orchestra, it sounds very like a masterpiece.

H. T. P.

"INDIAN DANCES" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Frederick Jacobi Hears His Music Played

Sibelius' Third Symphony Given Its First Boston Performance

GLOBE — Nov 10

Frederick Jacobi's "Indian Dances" were played for the first time here at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. The composer, now a resident of Northampton, Mass, was present to share the applause that greeted his music. Sibelius' Third Symphony, now more than 20 years old, was also played for the first time in Boston, as previous conductors had found it uninteresting. Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," music in which Mr Koussevitzky excels as an interpreter, closed the program.

Mr Jacobi explains in a program note that the five dances in his suite are "not intended to be in any sense a reconstruction of Indian music." They represent merely his impressions of the ritual dances which he has witnessed among the Pueblo and Navajo Indians, spectacles which he has found "magnificent and profoundly moving." The themes are borrowed from Indian music heard during a sojourn in New Mexico and Arizona, but the treatment of them is free. It is the spirit, not the letter, of savage music he has sought to convey in this suite. Mr Jacobi disclaims any desire to base American music on Indian music.

The themes in this set of dances are many of them strikingly individual in character. The bare statement of them evokes the atmosphere Mr Jacobi has found so impressive. His sober and rather timid use of this material is, however, a bit disappointing to a listener thinking what dazzling tone poems Prokofieff and Stravinsky in the days when that sort of thing was their forte might have made out of these salient fragments of primitive music. The audience, after it discovered the presence of the composer, applauded with its customary politeness.

Third Symphony Played

Sibelius' Third Symphony is said to have been considered for performance and rejected by Dr Muck, Mr Fiedler and Mr Monteux, each of whom conducted much of the composer's other work here. Mr Koussevitzky, however, succeeded in making the music so attractive that the audience welcomed it with hearty and prolonged applause.

There are only three movements in this symphony, an allegro moderato; an andantino con moto, quasi allegretto; and an allegro. Of these the second, with a chief theme of folk song character, is remarkably ingratiating. The themes in the other movements have the individuality that distinguishes all Sibelius' work. The treatment of them is curiously episodic, recalling Beethoven's way, in his last quartets, of stating his ideas without persistent development.

The first movement opens rather surprisingly with a theme given to double basses, then carried through the other strings. In the finale there is an impressive peroration on a theme of churchly character. Only a sympathetic and eloquent performance could make this Third Symphony appealing. This Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra provided.

One wished at times, however, that accuracy as well as eloquence had been among its musical virtues. There were, throughout yesterday's concert too many attacks that lacked precision and some false entrances that betokened either inexcusable carelessness or insufficient rehearsal. Why does not the present Boston Symphony invariably play with the superb and unerring precision in ensemble that distinguished the orchestra in the days of Dr Muck, and, if report speaks true, in those of Gericke?

Schubert Next Week

Each repeated hearing of Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" confirms one's impression that this work is a masterpiece.

Let the hearer forget the curious philosophical verses Skriabin wrote to explain the meaning of his music, verses that only annoy and baffle those of other philosophical faiths; let him listen merely to the music, and, played as it was yesterday, it can scarcely fail to stir his imagination. The style is perhaps excessively individual, the iterations of the chief theme threaten to become wearisome, the scoring for orchestra and organ is at times turgid; yet the intrinsic power of the music is overwhelming to anyone willing to surrender his imagination to it. Mr Koussevitzky by putting this work on the first Boston program he conducted showed his belief in it. He again roused the listener's admiration yesterday by his profound sympathy for Skriabin's style and mood.

Next week's concerts are devoted to the music of Schubert, in honor of the aproachong centenary of his death. Mr Koussevitzky has anrranged different programs for Friday and Saturday. At both concerts Mme Hulda Lashanska is to sing groups of Schubert's songs, and the orchestra is to be heard in two of his symphonies.

P. R.

SIBELIUS' THIRD BY SYMPHONY

POST — Nov 18

Music, Far in Advance of Its Time in 1907, Now Modern

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Rejected by three conductors of the Symphony Orchestra and ignored by a fourth, Sibelius' Symphony in C major, No. 3, came yesterday afternoon at the hands of Mr. Koussevitzky to its initial hearing in Boston.

In the performance the present conductor's faith in this remarkable composition was clearly proclaimed, and in the audience's enthusiastic reception of the piece that faith was accorded vindication and endorsement.

DATES FROM 1907

From 1907 dates this Third Symphony of the Finnish master, and so far in advance of its own day was this singular music that only now can its prophetic qualities be realized; while the composer himself, once the experiment had been tried, thereafter relapsed into somewhat more conventional ways.

Admittedly the chief trends of immediately contemporary music are toward an absence of unnecessary elaboration, a simplification and economy of means and of material, toward an emphasis on rhythm as an element in itself, toward a return to a virile diatonicism and toward an individualizing of the several choirs and single instrumental voices of the orchestra.

Forecasts the Moderns

Hear, then, Sibelius forecasting in this Third Symphony each and every one of these modern procedures, writing a music bare almost to nakedness, yet of an unescapable strength and vigor. Small wonder that the ears of the first and second decades of the present century heard this music for the most part hostilely or uncomprehendingly, or even that Mr. Monteux in the third should have put it in rehearsal only to pronounce it, upon such investigation, unworthy of performance.

The French temper is many leagues removed from the Finnish. Not too nicely on Parisian ears must fall this Northern rudeness, these stark, elemental simplicities.

Creates Favorable Impression

Yet with yesterday's marvellously sympathetic performance to plead its cause this music made upon an audience of 1928 an unmistakable impression. If, outside the brief and hauntingly lovely closing theme of the exposition, the first movement offers little that can be rolled under the musical tongue, the second has the appeal of homely folk-melody, of lilting rhythm and a strangely beautiful orchestration, while the propulsive force of the march-like tune that ends the otherwise unusual Finale might hardly be resisted. Twice returned to the stage at the end, Mr. Koussevitzky finally called upon the players to share in the applause.

For beginning came yesterday, for the first time in Boston, five Indian Dances by Frederick Jacobi, skillfully made, exhaling a subtle rather than an obvious savagery, and withal a trifle monotonous to hear in succession. The composer, who was present, was liberally applauded.

A glowing performance of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" brought the concert's close, and the rites of commendation that had followed the symphony were here repeated.

From Symphony Hall TRANS NOV. 18

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra will be heard for the first times this season in New York. Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," his Fifth Symphony; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and Ravel's "Mother Goose" fill the first program. The second traverses Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 10; Grünberg's tone-poem, "The Enchanted Isle"; Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony." Tamer programs than the conductor usually bears to the capital.

Glazunov, the eminent Russian of the old school, now on visit to the United States, will be guest of the Symphony Orchestra as composer and conductor at its concert in Cambridge on Jan. 16, at its concerts in Boston on Jan. 17 and 18.

At the end of Spohr's Nocturne, first number at the Symphony Concerts of last week, the wind and brass choir was so warmly applauded that Dr. Koussevitzky beckoned it to rise. Now and then after some displayful or exacting piece, the first flute or the first oboe receives such "recognition"; but it is rare fortune for horns, trombones and trumpets—to say nothing, in this instance, of players upon the bass-drum and the triangle.

Since the orchestral parts are lacking, Mr. Burgin, as deputy conductor, has dropped the Suite out of Hindemith's ballet, "The Demon," from the program of the Symphony Concerts next week. He substitutes for it the "Symphonic Dance in the Basque Style from the Opera (after Merimée) 'The Basque Venus,'" written by Hans Wetzler, now going the orchestral rounds in both Europe and America. Mr. Gilman heard it last week in New York from Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic Society and wrote in The Herald Tribune:

> Mr. Wetzler performs ingenious feats with his Fandangos and Zortzikos and Espatadantzas and Arin-Arins (with some assistance from various contemporaries—Strauss, Debussy, Wolf-Ferrari, for example), and the net result is imposing. If one concludes that the best thing in the piece is the gorgeous tune in 5-8 time that Mr. Wetzler borrowed from the Basques, that is really a tribute to his good taste; and he exploits it magnificently.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

TRANS. NOV. 13

A "Monday" Season, Auspiciously Begun

IT is a season of beginnings. Last evening brought the first of the concerts of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience that greeted Mr. Koussevitzky was an enthusiastic one, more like to the audience of Saturday evenings than to that of Friday afternoons. Many bows were required of the conductor before he was permitted to address himself to his work, the conducting of Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. As in the past, the programs of these concerts are made up of works already performed in the Friday and Saturday concerts. So Mr. Koussevitzky chose from the earliest of the season's programs for the fare of the evening. His selection included the overture of Beethoven just mentioned; Stravinsky's new ballet for strings, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses"; from Debussy's triptych "Nocturnes" the two most-played numbers, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B-flat, known generally as the "Spring" symphony.

It has long been a commonplace to remark that the "Leonore No. 3" is a perfect, self-contained drama in musical tones; that as well as words—possibly better—it tells the story of the faithful Leonore and Florestan, the imprisonment of the latter, and his final release through the efforts and the scheming of the former. Now it happens that Mr. Koussevitzky is nothing if not a master musician in music that characterizes, in the building up of dramatic situations. So last night this music took on in the highest degree the yearnings and the tensions and the interruptions and the glorifications with which this distfiliate of the plot of the opera is charged. It is easy to understand, after hearing such a performance, why Beethoven should have withdrawn this as the overture to his opera on the ground that its climax anticipated too thoroughly (and weakened therefore) the main climax of the opera itself.

Stravinsky's "Apollo" is new to the current season of symphony concerts. Indeed it is far less than a year old. It was written on commission for the Chamber Music Festival at the Library of Congress on April 27 of the present year, and there performed as a ballet. One could not truthfully say that the music is the greatest that Stravinsky has ever written; neither would it be fair to dismiss it casually. Somewhere between such extremes one places the "Leader of the Muses." The adaptable Igor has combined harmonies modal and pseudo-modal (perhaps a stickler for accuracy would coin neo-modal to fit the situation) and old French dance rhythms to produce the archaic flavor intended to suggest the distant mythological past, in terms of the steps of a ballet. Farther he does not go in a decsriptive way. The ballet might have been one to suggest any of a variety of subjects out of the musty past. It is grave for long stretches. Its rhythmic patterns suggest curious steps on the parts of the dancers. Its melodies flow along in their own beautiful, subdued manner. There is much of beauty in the ballet. One cannot easily forget the wonderfully rich and almost fathomless sonorities of the lowerstrings in many a portion. Nevertheless its many divisions make of it a work unduly long for the concert hall. To one hearer, at least, the content of the music does not justify such lengths unless joined to the steps and the gestures of the dancers. One could scarce imagine a better performance than that given by Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Burgin (in various solos which the ballet contains) and the string choir of the orchestra.

Debussy's chief purpose in much of his music is to produce illusion. To such music "Clouds" and "Festivals" belong. To produce illusion, then, was also Mr. Koussevitzky's aim last evening. It is impossible to describe such music, to character such performance. Let the imagination try to become conscious of the impressions received from dwelling on the beauties of clouds variously seen; let it then admit the memory of this music, its nebulous harmonies, the color of the tone of Mr. Speyer's English horn. The one will be perfect counterpart for the other. Equally with the brilliances and the show and the pomp of "Festivals."

Came last Schumann's symphony, "Spring." With it as with the drama of a Beethoven or the impressions of Debussy or the staid studies and researches of a Stravinsky Mr. Koussevitzky was entirely revealing. Much printer's ink has been spilled over the alleged turgidity and muddiness of Schumann's orchestration, over the presence of his "piano style" in his orchestral works. Undoubtedly many a listener, "educated" by such "wisdom," tries to hear these things. Does he ever really hear them? Would a proponent of these ideas, placed on the platform to demonstrate them, be able to raise a finger to point to the exact measure or passage in which the thought was obscured by the orchestration in such a performance as that of last evening? There are those, willing to use their ears rather than memories of what they have read, who have a strong suspicion that such wisdom would be confounded by such a test. As to the "piano idiom "of much of the music, one must confess that the orchestral dress of the music fits admirably the type of the music itself. True it is not written in the contrapuntal manner which was "one hundred per cent" in Schumann's time. But neither is a great deal of other music that has the courage of its convictions. And a music such as the "Spring" symphony sounds exceedingly well even to the jaded modern ear; more, it brings joy to the heart whenever it is heard. Can one reasonably ask for more?

A. H. M.

Schubert Memento for Symphony Men

Before beginning the rehearsal at Symphony Hall yesterday Serge Koussevitzky presented each member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a new Austrian Schubert centenary coin as a keepsake of the present season, which is the centennial of Schubert's death, and of the Schubert commemorative concerts which the orchestra is to give on this afternoon and Saturday evening. The coin bears the head of Schubert, who is the first artist to be used in the coinage of the Austrian realm. It is a silver "two schilling" piece.

The orchestra remained standing for a few moments in tribute to Schubert's memory, and then began the rehearsal with the Master's C major Symphony.

Nov 16. POST

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS HERE DEC. 4

PROV JOURNAL NOV. 18

Within three weeks the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season, the concerts this year coming later and fewer. The first one will be Tuesday night, Dec. 4, with only three to follow, one less in all than Providence has had in the past. The other dates are Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26. The Albee Theatre will again be the auditorium.

Season tickets which have not been re-engaged will be placed on sale at Steinert's a week from tomorrow. Between now and then applications should be addressed to Symphony Hall in Boston. Last year there were very few seats released from the subscription list and tardy subscribers found only the less desirable locations available.

The present season is the 48th of the orchestra and the fifth under Serge Koussevitsky whose leadership has been marked by extraordinary success both from the financial and artistic viewpoint. The season opened in Boston early in October—it was late October last year that it began its series in Providence. Several new scores of notable interest and musical importance have already been heard on its programs.

Last week, in observance of the Schubert centennial, two Schubert programs were given in Boston at which four of the master's symphonies and a number of his songs were performed. At the beginning of this month the organization made its annual western tour including concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh during which it repeated its success of past years. The opening New York concert is scheduled for next Thursday night.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give their sixth regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will lead this pair of concerts. The soloist will be Jacques Thibaud, eminent French violinist, who will appear with the orchestra in Saine-Saens' Concerto in B Minor. Mr. Burgin will introduce to Boston at these concerts Wetzler's "A Basque Venus," a symphonic dance based on the short story of Merimee. The program will open with a suite of three movements from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Coq d'Or," and will also include the Second Symphony of Borodin, in E flat.

TRAV. — NOV. 23

Incidents and Prospects

TRANS. Nov. 27

There is good reason to believe that Mr. Koussevitzky is contemplating the performance, at the Symphony Concerts during the present season, of Mahler's "Song of the Earth"—settings for orchestra, alto and tenor voice, of Chinese poems, both separated and bound together by symphonic interludes. The piece, which stands high among Mahler's work, has never been heard in Boston. Nor since Dr. Muck's time has there been room at Symphony Hall for any example of his maturer music.

FRANZ SCHUBERT TO BE HONORED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

THIS week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will commemorate 100th anniversary of the death of Franz Schubert, at the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Hulda Lashanska

Serge Koussevitzky announces two different programs for the two concerts. At the Friday concert he will perform the "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor, and the "Tragic" Symphony No. 4. Miss Hulda Lashanska will appear as soloist, singing a group of Schubert lieder.

At the Saturday evening concert Mr. Koussevitsky will perform the Fifth Symphony in B major, and the Seventh Symphony in C major. Miss Lashanska will sing a group of lieder at this concert, also.

In order that all of the subscribers may hear both the "Unfinished" Symphony and the great C major Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky will repeat each of these works at later concerts this season.

MIRER Nov 11

PENSION FUND CONCERT SUNDAY

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be performed at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, next Sunday afternoon.

The orchestro will appear with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The soloists will be Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, base.

MONDAY SYMPHONY SERIES OPENING

The Symphony Orchestra will open its series of five Monday evening concerts tomorrow night, in Symphony Hall.

Serge Koussevitzky will then present Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete," Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

SUNDAY—Symphony hall, 3:30 P. M. Tito Schipa, tenor. See special notice.
Ballroom of the Hotel Statler, 3 P. M. People's Symphony orchestra, Theophil Wendt, conductor. See special notice.
Boston Art Club, 3:30. Boston Flute Players' Club. Georges Laurent, director. See special notice.
Boston Garden (New North Station), 8:15 P. M. Alfonso D'Avino and his celebrated band, assisted by Tina Paggi, coloratura soprano, and Fernando Bertini, tenor. See special notice.
Lecture hall of the Boston Public Library, 8 P. M. Folk songs in costume. Bertha Hebert, contralto.
Ford hall, 7:30 P. M. Stella Marek Cushing, violinist; Dorothy Clement Evans, accompanist. Folk music from Czechoslovakia.

MONDAY—Jordan hall, 8:15 P. M. Martha Attwood, soprano; Stuart Ross, accompanist. Mozart, L'Amero saro costante from "Il Re Pastore"; Non so piu cosa son from "Le Nozze di Digaro." Kaun, Friendship. Korngold, Staendchen. Blech, Tintenheinz und Platscherlottchen. Mahler, Schneider und Meiden. Jarnach, Arpege. Hahn, Pholoe. Grovlez, Eh! Bonjour; Madame Tastine; Guitares et Mandolines. Grainger, The Sprig of Thyme. Two Kentucky mt. songs, arr. by Brockway—Nightingale and Frog went a-courting. Warren, My Lady Lo-Fu. Townley, Proposal (dedicated to Miss Attwood.

TUESDAY—Jordan hall, 8:15 P. M. Luella Melius, coloratura soprano. (Her first recital in Boston.) See special notice.

FRIDAY—Symphony hall, 2:30 P. M. Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Burgin, assistant conductor. See special notice.

SATURDAY—Hotel Statler, 2:30 P. M. Juliette Gaultier de la Verendryz.
Jordan hall, 3 P. M. Howard Goding, pianist. Beethoven, Sonata op. 10, No. 1; Brahms, Romanze op. 118, No. 5; Intermezzo, op. 118, No. 1. Schumann, Carnaval. Griffis, The White Peacock. Albeniz, Triana. Chopin, Nocturne, op. 72, No. 1. Rubinstein, Staccato Etude.
Symphony hall, 8:15 P. M. Boston Symphony orchestra. Repetition of Friday's concert.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Richard Burgin, as conductor of the next pair of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will introduce to Boston, Nicholas Miaskovsky, whose Eighth Symphony will be performed. Rudolph Ganz, pianist and former conductor of the St. Louis Symphony orchestra, will be the soloist, playing Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto No. 5, in E flat major.

SCHIPA TODAY

Tito Schipa, the celebrated Italian tenor of the Chicago opera company, will visit Boston to give a recital in Symphony hall, this afternoon at 3:30. He will be assisted by Frederick Longas in the following program:

O del mio amato ben.....Donaudy
Spirate, pur spirate.....Donaudy
Luisa Miller.....Verdi
Mr. Schipa
Alt Wien (Waltz).....Godowsky
Tango.....Albeniz
Mr. Longas
Prece (A Prayer).....Schipa
Die Mainacht.....Brahms
Mondnacht.....Schumann
My Jovely Celia.....Monro
A Pastoral.....Carey
Gipsy Song No. 5.....Dvorak
Mr. Schipa
Cordoba.....Albeniz
Mr. Longas
'A Vucchella.....Tosti-D'Annunzio
Sevillana.....Longas
Mignon (Ah! Non credevi tu).....Thomas
Mr. Schipa

LUELLA MELIUS

Luella Melius, coloratura soprano, will give her first recital in Boston next Tuesday evening in Jordan hall at 8:15 o'clock. She will be assisted by George Laurent, flute, and Jean Devergie, oboe. Roy Underwood will be the accompanist.

Et incarnatus est (Minor Mass).....Mozart
(With flute and oboe)
Mondnacht.....Schumann
Die Forelle.....Schubert
Der Juengling au der quelle.....Schubert
Er Ist's.....Wolf
Aria, L'Ombre Chanon, "Dinorah".....Meyerbeer
(With flute)
Mandolines et Guitarres.....Grovlez
Comment disaient-ils.....Hahn
Filles des Cadiz.....Delibes
Vesper Hymn.....Old English
Rain Drops.....Wolfarth-Grill
Symphony in Yellow.....Griffe
The Wren.....arr. by Benedic
(With flute)

Boston Symphony Honors Schubert

MONITOR — NOV. 23

By L. A. SLOPER

FRANZ SCHUBERT'S centenary was observed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Nov. 16 and 17 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Instead of offering the same program on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, as is customary, Mr. Koussevitzky had made up two programs, both composed entirely of works of Schubert. The first included the "Tragic" Symphony in C minor, No. 4, and the "Unfinished" in B minor; the other, the symphonies in B flat major, No. 5, and the Great Symphony in C major.

On the ground that Schubert's genius found its most characteristic expression in his songs, Mr. Koussevitzky made a place on each program for a group of them. They were sung by Hulda Lashanska, with Pierre Luboshutz as piano accompanist. Miss Lashanska was not perhaps the ideal priestess to officiate at the Schubertian lyrical altar. She designates herself a soprano, but her voice seems to be actually a mezzo. Her high notes are pinched and shrill, but her low tones are warm and vibrant. Thus she was more successful, for example, in "Der Tod und Das Mädchen" than in "Du Bist die Ruh'." She appeared to have a good intellectual conception of the lieder but hardly the style necessary for their realization.

It was well that we should hear the "Tragic" and the B flat major symphonies, if only to make us cease repining because only the "Unfinished" and the great C major are commonly performed. The earlier efforts, echoes of Haydn or Mozart, while tuneful and pleasing enough in parts, are redundant and, one regrets to say, often dull. Having heard the "Tragic" Symphony at the beginning of Friday's program, one later hailed the "Unfinished" with glee, and felt remorseful for ever having smiled indulgently at its charms.

The performance played its part in this revived interest. When Mr. Koussevitzky first revealed to us his version of this symphony, there was a storm of critical complaint over his tempi, and especially his dragging of the famous theme for cellos in the first movement. Since then the conductor has restored to this theme its fluent line, and to the whole work its due proportions. Thus it has become again a delight to hear.

The C major Symphony concluded the proceedings on Saturday evening. Conductor and orchestra conspired together to make their tribute tell at this climactic point. The result was a breathing, pulsating performance of this symphonic masterpiece. It is needless today to dwell upon the fertility, the inventiveness, the mastery, the inspiration revealed by this score; or upon the arid passages, the garrulous moments, the Teutonic ponderosity of some of its rhythms. The performance served to minimize its shortcomings and to relume its glories.

The following afternoon brought the orchestra's fifty-eighth concert in aid of its pension fund. For the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the orchestra was joined once more, as in the Beethoven Festival of last year, by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

Here was a performance that did not make the listener feel it were better to be content with the first three movements of this symphony, only. True, the orchestra played stirringly during those movements; but the chorus and the soloists seemed, more than on previous hearings, to justify the composer's recourse to the voice. So thoroughly had these young singers been trained, so mettlesome was their response to Mr. Koussevitzky's exhortations, that theories and arguments were forgotten before a work of art consummately realized. The quartet of soloists, individually and in ensemble, shared the vocal honors with the choirs.

Mr. Koussevitzky had opened the program with Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. This has been played so often by everybody, and in particular by this conductor, that it might be expected to lose its edge in performance and to become tedious to the listener. It would not be surprising if Mr. Koussevitzky, adding it bountifully to a program sufficiently taxing, should let it pursue routine course. But this is not his way. Into his every performance goes everything he has of musical and interpretive power. We cannot remember having heard before a rendition of this overture so vivid, so eloquent and so dramatic.

TRANS. NOV. 13

A "Monday" Season, Auspiciously Begun

IT is a season of beginnings. Last evening brought the first of the concerts of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The audience that greeted Mr. Koussevitzky was an enthusiastic one, more like to the audience of Saturday evenings than to that of Friday afternoons. Many bows were required of the conductor before he was permitted to address himself to his work, the conducting of Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. As in the past, the programs of these concerts are made up of works already performed in the Friday and Saturday concerts. So Mr. Koussevitzky chose from the earliest of the season's programs for the fare of the evening. His selection included the overture of Beethoven just mentioned; Stravinsky's new ballet for strings, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses"; from Debussy's triptych "Nocturnes" the two most-played numbers, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B-flat, known generally as the "Spring" symphony.

It has long been a commonplace to remark that the "Leonore No. 3" is a perfect, self-contained drama in musical tones; that as well as words—possibly better—it tells the story of the faithful Leonore and Florestan, the imprisonment of the latter, and his final release through the efforts and the scheming of the former. Now it happens that Mr. Koussevitzky is nothing if not a master musician in music that characterizes, in the building up of dramatic situations. So last night this music took on in the highest degree the yearnings and the tensions and the interruptions and the glorifications with which this distillate of the plot of the opera is charged. It is easy to understand, after hearing such a performance, why Beethoven should have withdrawn this as the overture to his opera on the ground that its climax anticipated too thoroughly (and weakened therefore) the main climax of the opera itself.

Stravinsky's "Apollo" is new to the current season of symphony concerts. Indeed it is far less than a year old. It was written on commission for the Chamber Music Festival at the Library of Congress on April 27 of the present year, and there performed as a ballet. One could not truthfully say that the music is the greatest that Stravinsky has ever written; neither would it be fair to dismiss it casually. Somewhere between such extremes one places the "Leader of the Muses." The adaptable Igor has combined harmonies modal and pseudo-modal (perhaps a stickler for accuracy would coin neo-modal to fit the situation) and old French dance rhythms to produce the archaic flavor intended to suggest the distant mythological past, in terms of the steps of a ballet. Farther he does not go in a decsriptive way. The ballet might have been one to suggest any of a variety of subjects out of the musty past. It is grave for long stretches. Its rhythmic patterns suggest curious steps on the parts of the dancers. Its melodies flow along in their own beautiful, subdued manner. There is much of beauty in the ballet. One cannot easily forget the wonderfully rich and almost fathomless sonorities of the lowerstrings in many a portion. Nevertheless its many divisions make of it a work unduly long for the concert hall. To one hearer, at least, the content of the music does not justify such lengths unless joined to the steps and the gestures of the dancers. One could scarce imagine a better performance than that given by Mr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Burgin (in various solos which the ballet contains) and the string choir of the orchestra.

Debussy's chief purpose in much of his music is to produce illusion. To such music "Clouds" and "Festivals" belong. To produce illusion, then, was also Mr. Koussevitzky's aim last evening. It is impossible to describe such music, to character such performance. Let the imagination try to become conscious of the impressions received from dwelling on the beauties of clouds variously seen; let it then admit the memory of this music, its nebulous harmonies, the color of the tone of Mr. Speyer's English horn. The one will be perfect counterpart for the other. Equally with the brilliances and the show and the pomp of "Festivals."

Came last Schumann's symphony, "Spring." With it as with the drama of a Beethoven or the impressions of Debussy or the staid studies and researches of a Stravinsky Mr. Koussevitzky was entirely revealing. Much printer's ink has been spilled over the alleged turgidity and muddiness of Schumann's orchestration, over the presence of his "piano style" in his orchestral works. Undoubtedly many a listener, "educated" by such "wisdom," tries to hear these things. Does he ever really hear them? Would a proponent of these ideas, placed on the platform to demonstrate them, be able to raise a finger to point to the exact measure or passage in which the thought was obscured by the orchestration in such a performance as that of last evening? There are those, willing to use their ears rather than memories of what they have read, who have a strong suspicion that such wisdom would be confounded by such a test. As to the "piano idiom "of much of the music, one must confess that the orchestral dress of the music fits admirably the type of the music itself. True it is not written in the contrapuntal manner which was "one hundred per cent" in Schumann's time. But neither is a great deal of other music that has the courage of its convictions. And a music such as the "Spring" symphony sounds exceedingly well even to the jaded modern ear; more, it brings joy to the heart whenever it is heard. Can one reasonably ask for more? A. H. M.

Schubert Memento for Symphony Men

Before beginning the rehearsal at Symphony Hall yesterday Serge Koussevitzky presented each member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a new Austrian Schubert centenary coin as a keepsake of the present season, which is the centennial of Schubert's death, and of the Schubert commemorative concerts which the orchestra is to give on this afternoon and Saturday evening. The coin bears the head of Schubert, who is the first artist to be used in the coinage of the Austrian realm. It is a silver "two schilling" piece.

The orchestra remained standing for a few moments in tribute to Schubert's memory, and then began the rehearsal with the Master's C major Symphony.

Nov 16. POST

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS HERE DEC. 4 PROV JOURNAL NOV. 18

Within three weeks the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season, the concerts this year coming later and fewer. The first one will be Tuesday night, Dec. 4, with only three to follow, one less in all than Providence has had in the past. The other dates are Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26. The Albee Theatre will again be the auditorium.

Season tickets which have not been re-engaged will be placed on sale at Steinert's a week from tomorrow. Between now and then applications should be addressed to Symphony Hall in Boston. Last year there were very few seats released from the subscription list and tardy subscribers found only the less desirable locations available.

The present season is the 48th of the orchestra and the fifth under Serge Koussevitsky whose leadership has been marked by extraordinary success both from the financial and artistic viewpoint. The season opened in Boston early in October—it was late October last year that it began its series in Providence. Several new scores of notable interest and musical importance have already been heard on its programs.

Last week, in observance of the Schubert centennial, two Schubert programs were given in Boston at which four of the master's symphonies and a number of his songs were performed. At the beginning of this month the organization made its annual western tour including concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh during which it repeated its success of past years. The opening New York concert is scheduled for next Thursday night.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give their sixth regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will lead this pair of concerts. The soloist will be Jacques Thibaud, eminent French violinist, who will appear with the orchestra in Saine-Saens' Concerto in B Minor. Mr. Burgin will introduce to Boston at these concerts Wetzler's "A Basque Venus," a symphonic dance based on the short story of Merimee. The program will open with a suite of three movements from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Coq d'Or," and will also include the Second Symphony of Borodin, in E flat.

TRAV. NOV. 23

Incidents and Prospects

TRANS. NOV. 27

There is good reason to believe that Mr. Koussevitzky is contemplating the performance, at the Symphony Concerts during the present season, of Mahler's "Song of the Earth"—settings for orchestra, alto and tenor voice, of Chinese poems, both separated and bound together by symphonic interludes. The piece, which stands high among Mahler's work, has never been heard in Boston. Nor since Dr. Muck's time has there been room at Symphony Hall for any example of his maturer music.

FRANZ SCHUBERT TO BE HONORED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

THIS week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will commemorate 100th anniversary of the death of Franz Schubert, at the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Hulda Lashanska

Serge Koussevitzky announces two different programs for the two concerts. At the Friday concert he will perform the "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor, and the "Tragic" Symphony No. 4. Miss Hulda Lashanska will appear as soloist, singing a group of Schubert lieder.

At the Saturday evening concert Mr. Koussevitsky will perform the Fifth Symphony in B major, and the Seventh Symphony in C major. Miss Lashanska will sing a group of lieder at this concert, also.

In order that all of the subscribers may hear both the "Unfinished" Symphony and the great C major Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky will repeat each of these works at later concerts this season. LEDGER NOV 11

PENSION FUND CONCERT SUNDAY

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will be performed at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, next Sunday afternoon.

The orchestro will appear with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The soloists will be Jeanette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, base.

MONDAY SYMPHONY SERIES OPENING

The Symphony Orchestra will open its series of five Monday evening concerts tomorrow night, in Symphony Hall.

Serge Koussevitzky will then present Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete," Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

SUNDAY—Symphony hall, 3:30 P. M. Tito Schipa, tenor. See special notice.

Ballroom of the Hotel Statler, 3 P. M. People's Symphony orchestra, Theophil Wendt, conductor. See special notice.

Boston Art Club, 3:30. Boston Flute Players' Club. Georges Laurent, director. See special notice.

Boston Garden (New North Station), 8:15 P. M. Alfonso D'Avino and his celebrated band, assisted by Tina Paggi, coloratura soprano, and Fernando Bertini, tenor. See special notice.

Lecture hall of the Boston Public Library, 8 P. M. Folk songs in costume. Bertha Hebert, contralto.

Ford hall, 7:30 P. M. Stella Marck Cushing, violinist; Dorothy Clement Evans, accompanist. Folk music from Czecho-slovakia.

MONDAY—Jordan hall, 8:15 P. M. Martha Attwood, soprano; Stuart Ross, accompanist. Mozart, L'Amero saro constante from "Il Re Pastore"; Non so piu cosa son from "Le Nozze di Digaro." Kaun, Friendship. Korngold, Staendchen. Blech, Tintenheinz und Platscherlottchen. Mahler, Schneider und Meiden. Jarnach, Arpege. Hahn, Pholoe. Grovlez, Eh! Bonjour; Madame Tartine; Guitares et Mandolines. Grainger, The Sprig of Thyme. Two Kentucky mt. songs, arr. by Brockway—Nightingale and Frog went a-courting. Warren, My Lady Lo-Fu. Townley, Proposal (dedicated to Miss Attwood.

TUESDAY—Jordan hall, 8:15 P. M. Luella Melius, coloratura soprano. (Her first recital in Boston.) See special notice.

FRIDAY—Symphony hall, 2:30 P. M. Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Burgin, assistant conductor. See special notice.

SATURDAY—Hotel Statler, 2:30 P. M. Juliette Gaultier de la Verendryz.

Jordan hall, 3 P. M. Howard Goding, pianist. Beethoven, Sonata op. 10, No. 1; Brahms, Romanze op. 118, No. 5; Intermezzo, op. 118, No. 1. Schumann, Carnaval. Griffis, The White Peacock. Albeniz, Triana. Chopin, Nocturne, op. 72, No. 1. Rubinstein, Staccato Etude.

Symphony hall, 8:15 P. M. Boston Symphony orchestra. Repetition of Friday's concert.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Richard Burgin, as conductor of the next pair of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will introduce to Boston, Nicholas Miaskovsky, whose Eighth Symphony will be performed. Rudolph Ganz, pianist and former conductor of the St. Louis Symphony orchestra, will be the soloist, playing Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto No. 5, in E flat major.

SCHIPA TODAY

Tito Schipa, the celebrated Italian tenor of the Chicago opera company, will visit Boston to give a recital in Symphony hall, this afternoon at 3:30. He will be assisted by Frederick Longas in the following program:

O del mio amato ben.....Donaudy
Spirate, pur spirate.....Donaudy
Luisa Miller.....Verdi
Mr. Schipa
Alt Wien (Waltz).....Godowsky
Tango.....Albeniz
Mr. Longas
Prece (A Prayer).....Schipa
Die Mainacht.....Brahms
Mondnacht.....Schumann
My lovely Celia.....Munro
A Pastoral.....Carey
Gipsy Song No. 5.....Dvorak
Mr. Schipa
Cordoba.....Albeniz
Mr. Longas
'A Vucchella.....Tosti-D'Annunzio
Sevillana.....Longas
Mignon (Ah! Non credevi tu).....Thomas
Mr. Schipa

LUELLA MELIUS

Luella Melius, coloratura soprano, will give her first recital in Boston next Tuesday evening in Jordan hall at 8:15 o'clock. She will be assisted by George Laurent, flute, and Jean Devergie, oboe. Roy Underwood will be the accompanist.

Et incarnatus est (Minor Mass).....Mozart
(With flute and oboe)
Mondnacht.....Schumann
Die Forelle.....Schubert
Der Juengling au der quelle.....Schubert
Er Ist's.....Wolf
Aria, L'Ombre Chanon, "Dinorah".....Meyerbeer
(With flute)
Mandolines et Guitarres.....Grovlez
Comment disaient-ils.....Hahn
Filles des Cadiz.....Delibes
Vesper Hymn.....Old English
Rain Drops.....Wolfarth-Grille
Symphony in Yellow.....Griffe
The Wren.....arr. by Benedic
(With flute)

Boston Symphony Honors Schubert

MONITOR — NOV. 23

By L. A. SLOPER

FRANZ SCHUBERT'S centenary was observed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Nov. 16 and 17 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Instead of offering the same program on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, as is customary, Mr. Koussevitzky had made up two programs, both composed entirely of works of Schubert. The first included the "Tragic" Symphony in C minor, No. 4, and the "Unfinished" in B minor; the other, the symphonies in B flat major, No. 5, and the Great Symphony in C major.

On the ground that Schubert's genius found its most characteristic expression in his songs, Mr. Koussevitzky made a place on each program for a group of them. They were sung by Hulda Lashanska, with Pierre Luboshutz as piano accompanist. Miss Lashanska was not perhaps the ideal priestess to officiate at the Schubertian lyrical altar. She designates herself a soprano, but her voice seems to be actually a mezzo. Her high notes are pinched and shrill, but her low tones are warm and vibrant. Thus she was more successful, for example, in "Der Tod und Das Mädchen" than in "Du Bist die Ruh'." She appeared to have a good intellectual conception of the lieder but hardly the style necessary for their realization.

It was well that we should hear the "Tragic" and the B flat major symphonies, if only to make us cease repining because only the "Unfinished" and the great C major are commonly performed. The earlier efforts, echoes of Haydn or Mozart, while tuneful and pleasing enough in parts, are redundant and, one regrets to say, often dull. Having heard the "Tragic" Symphony at the beginning of Friday's program, one later hailed the "Unfinished" with glee, and felt remorseful for ever having smiled indulgently at its charms.

The performance played its part in this revived interest. When Mr. Koussevitzky first revealed to us his version of this symphony, there was a storm of critical complaint over his tempi, and especially his dragging of the famous theme for cellos in the first movement. Since then the conductor has restored to this theme its fluent line, and to the whole work its due proportions. Thus it has become again a delight to hear.

The C major Symphony concluded the proceedings on Saturday evening. Conductor and orchestra conspired together to make their tribute tell at this climactic point. The result was a breathing, pulsating performance of this symphonic masterpiece. It is needless today to dwell upon the fertility, the inventiveness, the mastery, the inspiration revealed by this score; or upon the arid passages, the garrulous moments, the Teutonic ponderosity of some of its rhythms. The performance served to minimize its shortcomings and to relume its glories.

The following afternoon brought the orchestra's fifty-eighth concert in aid of its pension fund. For the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the orchestra was joined once more, as in the Beethoven Festival of last year, by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada van der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass.

Here was a performance that did not make the listener feel it were better to be content with the first three movements of this symphony, only. True, the orchestra played stirringly during those movements; but the chorus and the soloists seemed, more than on previous hearings, to justify the composer's recourse to the voice. So thoroughly had these young singers been trained, so mettlesome was their response to Mr. Koussevitzky's exhortations, that theories and arguments were forgotten before a work of art consummately realized. The quartet of soloists, individually and in ensemble, shared the vocal honors with the choirs.

Mr. Koussevitzky had opened the program with Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. This has been played so often by everybody, and in particular by this conductor, that it might be expected to lose its edge in performance and to become tedious to the listener. It would not be surprising if Mr. Koussevitzky, adding it bountifully to a program sufficiently taxing, should let it pursue routine course. But this is not his way. Into his every performance goes everything he has of musical and interpretive power. We cannot remember having heard before a rendition of this overture so vivid, so eloquent and so dramatic.

25

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

...ge Street --- Miaskovsky's Symphony

No Light Adventurer

Nikola Miaskovsky (Universal-Edition)

An Eminent Russian Composer Comes at Last to the Symphony Concerts

A New Russian, To Be Praised Or Thrust Away

Continued from Preceding Page

first; for Rimsky also nurtured the great Igor, the brilliant Prokofiev—and others. Mr. Belaiev says point blank that Miaskovsky has his roots in Musorgsky. It is generally admitted that both Glazunov and Skriabin have affected his style, Glazunov his formal and orchestral schemes, Skriabin his harmonic idiom.

But one does not "get very far" with discussing Miaskovsky from a purely technical point of view. The key to him is to be found in the something which lies beneath technic, which goes beyond the ordinary "influences" of older or contemporary musicians, and absolutely dictates style. If "style is the man" it is evident that one must know the man in order to explain his style, and conversely, that by knowing well his style one can make a fair picture of the man. And "style" in this sense is something very different from a technical analysis of its component parts.

Miaskovsky has both admirers and detractors among the Russians, who admittedly know him best. Both agree, however, that he is a perfect musical counterpart to Dostoievsky, the novelist. Beneath much of the comment, be it favorable or otherwise, can be read also a corresponding appreciation or depreciation of Dostoievsky. The gloom, the darkness, the pessimism which traverses all the shades and degrees of a neurasthenic morbidity in the great Russian authors are also to be found in this latest Russian composer. Thus it is that Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony is the programmatic musical parent of the work of Miaskovsky. Thus his choice of the morbid Edgar Allan Poe's "Silence" as the subject of his first symphonic poem takes on new significance. Thus one understands why it is that through his work runs "a left-motif of death."

Belaiev probably explains best Miaskovsky's preoccupation with these gloomy subjects:

> His music expresses a constant striving after an inaccessible state of disembodied, spiritual existence. This ideal reveals itself in a great variety of ways, but its fundamental otherwordliness remains unchanged. In trying to reconcile his ideal with the meanness of the surrounding world and the instability of human nature, Miaskovsky is forced to study life in all its aspects and his own relations to it, and thus his work reflects infinite breadth of understanding and sympathy, infinite love of nature, and an all-embracing comprehension of the aspirations of the human soul. His work leads the hearer to the greatest problem of human existence—the problem of death, symbolized by the medieval theme of the "Dies Irae," which plays a considerable part in his works as a recurrent motto. From the individuality to the world, and from the world to the riddle of its ultimate fate—this is the line of Miaskovsky's creative thought, freshly explored in every new work he writes.

Belaiev may thus be taken as representative of those who fully believe in the greatness of Miaskovsky. They idolize him in phrases such as "the standard-bearer of the Russian symphony," "the Musorgsky of the symphony." Mr. Lenoid Sabaneyev, in his book on modern Russian composers, represents a point of view somewhat less sympathtic, that attempts greater critical detachment. It is evident that the Dostoievsky-Miaskovsky pessimism or morbidity does not strike a responsive chord in Sabaneyev. Listen to him debating with himself on the subject: "Occasionally it is as though Miaskovsky deliberately wished to strike us with extreme melancholy, with an oppressive poverty of thought, in order that we might feel the more glaringly the void caused by its absence. It be is a great artist then it cannot be otherwise. The composer's sincerity is not subject to doubt." Mr. Sabaneyev, in the course of his article, also questions (although tentatively) the value of many of Miaskovsky's musical ideas, his skill as an orchestral colorist, even at one point his constructive ability. This hostile point of view is also summed up in a phrase, "an inflated Glazunov."

Turning to the Miaskovsky of the impending Eighth symphony, one cannot but find him a constructive musician of high order. Whatever may have been the case in earlier works, in these four movements Miaskovsky has reared four magnificent structures. The ideas are musical, without any of the conscious striving after originality characteristic of much present music. The workmanship is masterful. The harmonic combinations run the gamut of emotion—pleasant and ingratiating, acrid, sinister, gloomy. The harshness of polytonality Miaskovsky assumes and discards at will, slipping into and out of it exactly as if it were any other idiom. The rhythms are now strong, now mellifluously insinuating; the swing of some is akin to that of the waltz.

Miaskovsky belongs to those composers of whom one can speak more readily in negatives than in positives. He is not a great innovator, nor an exponent of new and pregnant theories. He makes no pretense of "advancing" musical progress, he is not a brilliant colorist, nor is he a genius of such electric force as to be able to compel general acceptance of his work. Sabaneyev goes even farther. "No special distinguishing marks," writes he! But even so, Miaskovsky is, in good company. Many, if not most of these negatives can be applied also to Chaikovsky, and to go farther afield, to Brahms. These have won their place by the sheer truth and power of their ideas, by the beauty and force of the proclamation. There is room for newcomers in these ranks. Meanwhile, opponents as well as advocates admit that in Russia, where alone Miaskovsky has been heard enough to be known, his music holds the attention and keeps the admiration of the multitude. In sum, Miaskovsky belongs to those composers whom their contemporaries judge with difficulty: composers who are eclectics, rather than pioneers, but who have a strong individual message. History alone will decide their worth. And it will decide it according to the worth and the permanency of the message.

A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Continued from Preceding Page

of this motif and of the second half of the first theme, abrupt and broken rhythms. This development leads climactically to an expanded statement of the introductory phrase (now five measures) after which there are four consecutive repetitions of the first theme and more development of its second half. Then comes the third theme, "A doppio piu lento (Allegretto commodo e semplice"). The rhythm alternates measures of three plus four with measures of four plus three. The theme is given to violins, a phrase tenderly ingratiating. There is much development, and a slight contrast-section.

Then comes the first suggestion that the symphony is programmatic. So far everything has proceeded along normal formal lines. But here enters a passage in which measures marked "Quieto" alternate several times with measures marked "Allegro tenebroso." (Note the adjective). The whole is transitional and episodical in character, based on the third theme and the second half of the first theme. A slight development leads to another statement of the introductory phrase treated now with powerful surgings and breath-taking diminuendos. Five measures of the second theme, used transitionally, lead to a four-fold statement of the first theme, followed by a development of the second theme. This in turn leads to another five measures of the Introduction followed by four more repetitions of the first theme and a short climax upon its second half for a close.

Oasis

The third movement "Adagio," 4-4, in B minor, is cast in the same form, but with far less complex treatment. The first theme is a sustained English horn solo over lower strings and harp harmonics. The second is sung by strings, followed by flutes, in an ornate, florid line that variously suggests Rimsky-Korsakov. The first theme follows, two measures of muted trumpet introducing the English horn. The third theme begins as an expressive oboe solo, much ornamented by flutes and clarinets. This rises to an impassioned climax at the top of which the first theme is again heard, followed according to regulation by the second theme, first in the oboe then in other winds; again by the English horn over low strings as at first. Then ensues a Coda with weird sonorities—cellos in high harmonics, playing on the bridge, while clarinets quietly repeat the third theme and the fluid second is heard successively from a violin solo, a viola solo, a flute, a muted trumpet, a clarinet. The close is very quiet. Here again, in the very sonorities, is suggestion of some hidden program.

"A-B-A-C-A-D-A-C-A-B-A"

The fourth movement "Allegro deciso" 2-4, A major, is the most complex of all. It is again a rondo, even larger than the rondo used in the second movement. Musicians will recognize the formula A-B-A-C-A-D-A-C-A-B-A. Each letter of course represents a distinct theme. As the movement nears its close there are in addition to the above, parenthetical references to themes from earlier movements, and near the extreme end, to the "D" theme of the fourth movement itself. At the beginning, the six horns, playing in unison, burst forth a vigorously accented passage of five measures (the first four repeat the same motif) which is a variant of the beginning of the introduction to the first movement. The main theme of the movement ("A") "Tempo giusto" is equally vigorous and closely related to it. "B" is a melodious canon for first and second violins. "C" is an ingratiating melody in waltz-rhythm. (One cannot avoid the thought that the Chaikovsky of various waltzes is more a model for the Miaskovsky of this symphony than the Chaikovsky of the gloomy "Pathetic.") "D" is a stately choral-like motif, "molto cantando." There is much interchange of moods. The "A" after the "D" is marked "tenebroso" and is scored for low clarinets and bassoons. The next "A" is scored brilliantly for full orchestra. For ending there are two tremendous crescendos and a curious passage mixing the chorads of C-sharp minor and B-flat major, all over a bass "A" in the final chord. Surely more food for those who would discover a program.

Beauty in Variety

Last evening at Jordan Hall Madame Luella Melius, coloratura soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, sang songs and arias to an audience that filled comfortably the floor and overflowed well into the balcony. The program included florid airs—the "Shadow Song" from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah," and an ornate trifle, "The Wren"; an excerpt, also singularly befrilled, from Mozart's Mass in C Minor; German lieder by Schubert, Schumann and Wolf; French songs of lighter matter by Grovlez, Hahn and Delibes; songs in English.

To the modern ear there is an inherent incongruity in finding the words of such a text as the "Et Incarnatus" set to suave Italian melody liberally interspersed with vocalises, even though a Mozart set his name to it. Last evening, to emphasize the more fully the interplay of those melodies, Madame Melius called in from Symphony Hall Messrs. Laurent and Devergie. Flute and oboe and soprano voice—to say nothing of piano, which occasionally rose above mere accompaniental import—provided a most excellent ensemble, with an effect in some passages as if an entire instrumental ensemble were playing. Though Madame Melius assumed a most solemn manner, one did not find himself transported into a religious mood. As music, absolute music if you will, one heard these measures—pleasant, full of charm and beauty.

Madame Melius, in her lieder, differentiated clearly the different moods. "Mondnacht" was most suave and almost atmospheric. "Die Forelle" fairly bubbled over in its glinting activity. One wondered if it did not bubble a trifle too much. And Wolf's "Er ist's" was sung with great ardor and dramatic effect. It is, of course, a pleasure to hear a singer who thus gives individuality to each song. It is a question, however, whether even the individualizing process cannot be carried too far. Madame Melius approached such a danger line, even though she did not actually cross it.

Came next the test of "coloratura" skill, the "Shadow Song"—mistakenly rendered into awkward French in the print of the program to "L'Ombre Chanson." Madame Melius disclosed, here as throughout the evening, a voice of rare smoothness and purity. Beauty of tone seems inherent in it. And as a singer of florid devices, Madame Melius proved herself far more adept than one might have expected from the very smooth singing that had preceded in some of the lieder. A high degree of flexibility she possesses, all under remarkable controls. Of course Mr. Laurent had been retained to give proper support and contrast with his flute.—In common with nine out of ten "coloraturas" (perhaps one might say ninety-nine out of a hundred, if that many could be found the world over) this voice occasionally sings appreciably on the under side of the true pitch.

To the French songs Madame Melius brought a dramatically characterizing melodic line. The urge of strong rhythm is at her command as well as other devices of the singer's art. Thus one found energetic and well-accented singing; one found the propulsion of the measures of the dance enticingly brought forth in the song of the "Girls of Cadiz," according to Delibes. Nor must one neglect to mention the subtlety of her various nuances in Griffes's "Symphony in Yellow."

A. H. M.

Unusual Christmas Gift

FOR SALE—By owner, genuine large Tiger Claw Pin with Earrings, three separate pieces; gold settings, first class condition. Brought from China by Cape Cod sea captain in the days of clipper ships. Address W.G.R., Transcript, Boston.

(b)BT (W) n 24

Films of the Week

Continued from Preceding Page

...r whose chief mission in life is to be shocked.

E. F. M.

Midshipmen—and Maidens

The Navy has the best of it—as might well be expected in a picture with the title of "Annapolis." But it does not have quite the whole show. As a matter of fact, before the first of the midshipmen pokes his head over the celluloid horizon, fully fifteen minutes and only the over-lords of the cinema know how many expensive feet of film are given to a chipper crew of shrill-voiced damsels in "whites," the likes of which were never seen within the eminently proper walls of the Naval Academy. Quite ob-

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM Brklyn Life & Literature of N.Y. Society
N.Y.
NOV 17 1928

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, November 23rd, at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then perform two works of Beethoven with which he also opened his Boston season—his fifth in this country.

The program will open with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3, and close with the same master's Third Symphony in E-flat major, "Eroica." French music will be represented by Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," inspired by the

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its first Brooklyn concert of the season on November 23rd

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
NOV 1 - 1928

Boston Symphony Attracts Society

ONE of the outstanding social events of this season is the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra Wednesday evening at Masonic auditorium. Serge Koussevitzky is the conductor.

Reservations have been made by Mr. and Mrs. Horace Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. Chester C. Bolton, Mr. and Mrs. Robert J. Bulkley, Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln G. Dickey, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dittmar, Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus S. Eaton, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Feather, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Forbes, Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Halle, Mrs. Leonard C. Hanna, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Hiss, Mr. David P. Hyman, Mr. George Clark Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Harry D. Norvell, Mr. and Mrs. Sterling Smith, Dr. and Mrs. J. F. Stephan, Mrs. J. J. Tracy, Mr. and Mrs. S. D. Weil, Mrs. Prentiss Hughes and Mr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

MUSICAL LEADER

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO.

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO MICHIGAN AVE

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Boston Symphony Makes Records with New Electric Process

Of extraordinary interest is the announcement that during the week of Nov. 12 the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, made its first records with the new electric process of making records, under the latest conditions which the marvels of science have rendered possible. In its own Symphony Hall, under perfect acoustic surroundings, this band of musicians recorded some of its best known interpretations, thereby fulfilling the first conditions of a long term contract with the Victor Talking Machine Company.

Among the recordings were the Stravinsky Ballet Suite, "Petrushka," and the string movement from "Apollo Musagète" and the Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé." Other works under consideration at the time were some of the Strauss Waltzes and Sibelius' "Valse Triste."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Talking Machine World
& Radio Weekly
NOV 21 1928

...erses of Mallarmé, the impressionist poet, ...ed Russian music by the "Classical" ...ymphony of Serge Prokofieff, which ...oussevitzky has played here previously ...d is reviving this season. Prokofieff, ...e living Russian composer, wrote this ...tle work in fanciful imitation of the 18th ...entury forms. Its four movements oc...py but a few minutes.

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECORDINGS FOR VICTOR COMPANY

Boston, Mass., Monday.

Performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to date heard only in a limited number of cities in the United States, will be made available to all the world in the near future through recordings by the Victor Talking Machine Co., which began several days ago in Symphony Hall. Experts from the Victor plant in Camden, N. J., have installed recording instruments in the auditorium and during the past three days have recorded the performances of several master musical works played by the complete orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The intricate recording apparatus which has been installed in Symphony Hall is identical with that used in the most modern Victor laboratory. By bringing it to Boston the Victor company was able to record not only performances of the famous orchestra but to reproduce them under actual conditions, even to capturing the far-famed acoustical qualities of the auditorium itself.

The recording work in Boston was supervised by L. Howell Davis of the Victor company's Artist and Repertoire ...ardt

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL, MASS.
Citizen
NOV 21 1928

Boston Programs.

Again this week the Boston Symphony orchestra is on tour and will reach New York for concerts on Friday and Saturday. The following week at the regular pair of concerts in Boston, Rudolph Ganz, pianist, will be the assisting artist. Last week Mr. Koussevitzky devoted his programs to the music of Schubert, to the delight of the conservative among the orchestra's clientele. These rites over, the conductor will once again have a free hand to make his programs as he chooses.

For the pension fund concert last Sunday Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the Choral Symphony of Beethoven in spirited fashion, according to the reviewers, awakening a similar response on the part of the orchestra, the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe and the solo singers. Rarely indeed does the present conductor of the symphony orchestra lapse into routine. The fresh young voices of the chorus were good to hear, says the Transcript's reviewer, and the solo artists, notably Miss Vreeland and Mr. Althouse, both of whom have filled engagements here, sang boldly and bravely.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
NOV 21 1928

Boston Programs.

Again this week the Boston Symphony orchestra is on tour and will reach New York for concerts on Friday and Saturday. The following week at the regular pair of concerts in Boston, Rudolph Ganz, pianist, will be the assisting artist. Last week Mr. Koussevitzky devoted his programs to the music of Schubert, to the delight of the conservative among the orchestra's clientele. These rites over, the conductor will once again have a free hand to make his programs as he chooses.

Incidents and Prospects

Again the program for the Symphony Concerts of next week—deputy conductor, Richard Burgin—has been revised. It now stands:

Suite from the Opera, "The Golden Cockerel" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony, No. 2, in E-flat major ..... Borodin
Concerto, No. 3, in B minor for Violin and Orchestra ..... Saint-Saëns
(Violinist, Mr. Thibaud)
Symphonic Dance from the Opera, "The Basque Venus" ..... Wetzler
(New; First Time)

Trans Nov 21

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

MUSICAL LEADER

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO.

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO MICHIGAN AVE

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

* * *

Ovation at First Boston Symphony Concert

When Serge Koussevitzky stepped upon the stage at Carnegie Hall last Thursday evening to conduct the first Boston Symphony concert of the season, he received a great ovation. His program was one to excite the interest of those concert-goers who are entertained by works of Stravinsky and Scriabin, as it included numbers by both, in addition to the First Symphony of Schumann. The Stravinsky number, however, was not one of the ear-splitting type, but is in truth "ultra-modern" and belonged to his latest period. When "Apollo Musagètes" had its world première at the Chamber Music Festival in Washington, D. C. last April, it was in the form of a ballet. Repeated on Thursday evening it was minus the choreography, thus giving one an opportunity to hear the music apart from the stage action, and proved interesting less from a musical standpoint than from the psychological. It makes one wonder why Stravinsky with his tremendous technic of dissonance suddenly changed his mind! "Apollo Musagètes" is an experiment, rather than an achievement. Although possessing a certain charm and individuality, at the same time, it leaves a feeling of indefiniteness and questioning. The string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a very beautiful performance.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Schumann Symphony was fresh and delightful, and made one realize why this seldom-heard work was called the "Spring" Symphony. The Scriabin "Poeme de l' Extase" was played with dramatic intensity and with a brilliancy of climax that made it an outstanding performance of one of the important contributions to the early twentieth century orchestral repertoire.

The Saturday afternoon concert offered many delightful contrasts and gave Koussevitzky opportunity to conduct in varying styles and moods. The program opened with Prokofieff's "Classic" Symphony written, when the composer was very young, in a style imitating the classical symphony period. Prokofieff was one of the first to go back to the classic style, and whether he did it deliberately as an attempt to "reform" music or was simply practising the form as a young student, we do not know. The work, however, has charm and was played with fascinating simplicity and a sense of humor by Prokofieff's protagonist. Debussy's "L'après-midi d'un faune," Stravinsky's "Petroushka" and Brahms' Second Symphony completed the program.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NOV 17 1928

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, November 23rd, at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then perform two works of Beethoven with which he also opened his Boston season—his fifth in this country.

The program will open with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3, and close with the same master's Third Symphony in E-flat major, "Eroica." French music will be represented by Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," inspired by the

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its first Brooklyn concert of the season on November 23rd

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO MICHIGAN AVE

CHICAGO.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Boston Symphony Makes Records with New Electric Process

Of extraordinary interest is the announcement that during the week of Nov. 12 the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, made its first records with the new electric process of making records, under the latest conditions which the marvels of science have rendered possible. In its own Symphony Hall, under perfect acoustic surroundings, this band of musicians recorded some of its best known interpretations, thereby fulfilling the first conditions of a long term contract with the Victor Talking Machine Company.

Among the recordings were the Stravinsky Ballet Suite, "Petrushka," and the string movement from "Apollo Musagète" and the Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé." Other works under consideration at the time were some of the Strauss Waltzes and Sibelius' "Valse Triste."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
Talking Machine World

NOV 21 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECORDINGS FOR VICTOR COMPANY

Boston, Mass., Monday.

Performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to date heard only in a limited number of cities in the United States, will be made available to all the world in the near future through recordings by the Victor Talking Machine Co., which began several days ago in Symphony Hall. Experts from the Victor plant in Camden, N. J., have installed recording instruments in the auditorium and during the past three days have recorded the performances of several master musical works played by the complete orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The intricate recording apparatus which has been installed in Symphony Hall is identical with that used in the most modern Victor laboratory. By bringing it to Boston the Victor company was able to record not only performances of the famous orchestra but to reproduce them under actual conditions, even to capturing the far-famed acoustical qualities of the auditorium itself.

The recording work in Boston was supervised by L. Howell Davis of the Victor company's Artist and Repertoire

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 21 1928

Boston Programs.

Again this week the Boston Symphony orchestra is on tour and will reach New York for concerts on Friday and Saturday. The following week at the regular pair of concerts in Boston, Rudolph Ganz, pianist, will be the assisting artist. Last week Mr. Koussevitzky devoted his programs to the music of Schubert, to the delight of the conservative among the orchestra's clientele. These rites over, the conductor will once again have a free hand to make his programs as he chooses.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

NOV

Boston Symphony Attracts Society

ONE of the outstanding social events of this season is the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra Wednesday evening at Masonic auditorium. Serge Koussevitzky is the conductor.

Reservations have been made by Mr. and Mrs. Horace Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. Chester C. Bolton, Mr. and Mrs. Robert J. Bulkley, Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln G. Dickey, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dittmar, Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus S. Eaton, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Feather, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Forbes, Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Halle, Mrs. Leonard C. Hanna, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Hiss, Mr. David P. Hyman, Mr. George Clark Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Harry D. Norvell, Mr. and Mrs. Sterling Smith, Dr. and Mrs. J. F. Stephan, Mrs. J. J. Tracy, Mr. and Mrs. S. D. Weil, Mrs. Prentiss Hughes and Mr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

verses of Mallarmé, the impressionist poet, and Russian music by the "Classical" Symphony of Serge Prokofieff, which Koussevitzky has played here previously and is reviving this season. Prokofieff, the living Russian composer, wrote this little work in fanciful imitation of the 18th century forms. Its four movements occupy but a few minutes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL, MASS.
Citizen

NOV 21 1928

Boston Programs.

Again this week the Boston Symphony orchestra is on tour and will reach New York for concerts on Friday and Saturday. The following week at the regular pair of concerts in Boston, Rudolph Ganz, pianist, will be the assisting artist. Last week Mr. Koussevitzky devoted his programs to the music of Schubert, to the delight of the conservative among the orchestra's clientele. These rites over, the conductor will once again have a free hand to make his programs as he chooses.

For the pension fund concert last Sunday Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the Choral Symphony of Beethoven in spirited fashion, according to the reviewers, awakening a similar response on the part of the orchestra, the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe and the solo singers. Rarely indeed does the present conductor of the symphony orchestra lapse into routine. The fresh young voices of the chorus were good to hear, says the Transcript's reviewer, and the solo artists, notably Miss Vreeland and Mr. Althouse, both of whom have filled engagements here, sang boldly and bravely.

Incidents and Prospects

Again the program for the Symphony Concerts of next week—deputy conductor, Richard Burgin—has been revised. It now stands:

Suite from the Opera, "The Golden Cockerel" ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony, No. 2, in E-flat major ..... Borodin
Concerto, No. 3, in B minor for Violin and Orchestra ..... Saint-Saëns
(Violinist, Mr. Thibaud)
Symphonic Dance from the Opera, "The Basque Venus" ..... Wetzler
(New: First Times)

Trans Nov 21

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO MICHIGAN AVE

CHICAGO.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

* * *

Ovation at First Boston Symphony Concert

When Serge Koussevitzky stepped upon the stage at Carnegie Hall last Thursday evening to conduct the first Boston Symphony concert of the season, he received a great ovation. His program was one to excite the interest of those concert-goers who are entertained by works of Stravinsky and Scriabin, as it included numbers by both, in addition to the First Symphony of Schumann. The Stravinsky number, however, was not one of the ear-splitting type, but is in truth "ultra-modern" and belonged to his latest period. When "Apollo Musagètes" had its world première at the Chamber Music Festival in Washington, D. C. last April, it was in the form of a ballet. Repeated on Thursday evening it was minus the choreography, thus giving one an opportunity to hear the music apart from the stage action, and proved interesting less from a musical standpoint than from the psychological. It makes one wonder why Stravinsky with his tremendous technic of dissonance suddenly changed his mind! "Apollo Musagètes" is an experiment, rather than an achievement. Although possessing a certain charm and individuality, at the same time, it leaves a feeling of indefiniteness and questioning. The string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a very beautiful performance.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Schumann Symphony was fresh and delightful, and made one realize why this seldom-heard work was called the "Spring" Symphony. The Scriabin "Poeme de l' Extase" was played with dramatic intensity and with a brilliancy of climax that made it an outstanding performance of one of the important contributions to the early twentieth century orchestral repertoire.

The Saturday afternoon concert offered many delightful contrasts and gave Koussevitzky opportunity to conduct in varying styles and moods. The program opened with Prokofieff's "Classic" Symphony written, when the composer was very young, in a style imitating the classical symphony period. Prokofieff was one of the first to go back to the classic style, and whether he did it deliberately as an attempt to "reform" music or was simply practising the form as a young student, we do not know. The work, however, has charm and was played with fascinating simplicity and a sense of humor by Prokofieff's protagonist. Debussy's "L'après-midi d'un faune," Stravinsky's "Petroushka" and Brahms' Second Symphony completed the program.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM Daily Life & Literature of B'klyn Society
N.Y.
NOV 17 1928

27

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will open its Brooklyn season in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, November 23rd, at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then perform two works of Beethoven with which he also opened his Boston season—his fifth in this country.

The program will open with Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3, and close with the same master's Third Symphony in E-flat major, "Eroica." French music will be represented by Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," inspired by the

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give its first Brooklyn concert of the season on November 23rd verses of Mallarmé, the impressionist poet, and Russian music by the "Classical" Symphony of Serge Prokofieff, which Koussevitzky has played here previously and is reviving this season. Prokofieff, the living Russian composer, wrote this little work in fanciful imitation of the 18th Century forms. Its four movements occupy but a few minutes.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
NOV 1 - 1928

Boston Symphony Attracts Society

ONE of the outstanding social events of this season is the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra Wednesday evening at Masonic auditorium. Serge Koussevitzky is the conductor.

Reservations have been made by Mr. and Mrs. Horace Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. Chester C. Bolton, Mr. and Mrs. Robert J. Bulkley, Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln G. Dickey, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dittmar, Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus S. Eaton, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Feather, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Forbes, Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Halle, Mrs. Leonard C. Hanna, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Hiss, Mr. David P. Hyman, Mr. George Clark Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Harry D. Norvell, Mr. and Mrs. Sterling Smith, Dr. and Mrs. J. F. Stephan, Mrs. J. J. Tracy, Mr. and Mrs. S. D. Weil, Mrs. Prentiss Hughes and Mr. Nikolai Sokoloff.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO MICHIGAN AVE

CHICAGO.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

Boston Symphony Makes Records with New Electric Process

Of extraordinary interest is the announcement that during the week of Nov. 12 the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, made its first records with the new electric process of making records, under the latest conditions which the marvels of science have rendered possible. In its own Symphony Hall, under perfect acoustic surroundings, this band of musicians recorded some of its best known interpretations, thereby fulfilling the first conditions of a long term contract with the Victor Talking Machine Company.

Among the recordings were the Stravinsky Ballet Suite, "Petrushka," and the string movement from "Apollo Musagète" and the Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé." Other works under consideration at the time were some of the Strauss Waltzes and Sibelius' "Valse Triste."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE LOWELL, MASS.
Citizen
NOV 21 1928

...ston Programs.

...gain this week the Boston Sym... orchestra is on tour and will ... New York for concerts on Fri... and Saturday. The following ... at the regular pair of concerts ...ston, Rudolph Ganz, pianist, will be the assisting artist. Last week Mr. Koussevitzky devoted his programs to the music of Schubert, to the delight of the conservative among the orchestra's clientele. These rites over, the conductor will once again have a free hand to make his programs as he chooses.

For the pension fund concert last Sunday Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the Choral Symphony of Beethoven in spirited fashion, according to the reviewers, awakening a similar response on the part of the orchestra, the combined choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe and the solo singers. Rarely indeed does the present conductor of the symphony orchestra lapse into routine. The fresh young voices of the chorus were good to hear, says the Transcript's reviewer, and the solo artists, notably Miss Vreeland and Mr. Althouse, both of whom have filled engagements here, sang boldly and bravely.

...instruments in the auditorium and during the past three days have recorded the performances of several master musical works played by the complete orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The intricate recording apparatus which has been installed in Symphony Hall is identical with that used in the most modern Victor laboratory. By bringing it to Boston the Victor company was able to record not only performances of the famous orchestra but to reproduce them under actual conditions, even to capturing the far-famed acoustical qualities of the auditorium itself.

The recording work in Boston was supervised by L. Howell Davis of the Victor company's Artist and Repertoire Department and Edward E. Eckhardt of the Recording Department.

...COLUMBIA ...

...to the delight of the conservative among the orchestra's clientele. These rites over, the conductor will once again have a free hand to make his programs as he chooses.

Incidents and Prospects

Again the program for the Symphony Concerts of next week—deputy conductor, Richard Burgin—has been revised. It now stands:

Suite from the Opera, "The Golden Cockerel" ... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Symphony, No. 2, in E-flat major ... Borodin
Concerto, No. 3, in B minor for Violin and Orchestra ... Saint-Saens
(Violinist, Mr. Thibaud)
Symphonic Dance from the Opera, "The Basque Venus" ... Wetzler
(New, First Times)

Trans Nov 21

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO MICHIGAN AVE

CHICAGO.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

* * *

Ovation at First Boston Symphony Concert

When Serge Koussevitzky stepped upon the stage at Carnegie Hall last Thursday evening to conduct the first Boston Symphony concert of the season, he received a great ovation. His program was one to excite the interest of those concert-goers who are entertained by works of Stravinsky and Scriabin, as it included numbers by both, in addition to the First Symphony of Schumann. The Stravinsky number, however, was not one of the ear-splitting type, but is in truth "ultra-modern" and belonged to his latest period. When "Apollo Musagètes" had its world première at the Chamber Music Festival in Washington, D. C. last April, it was in the form of a ballet. Repeated on Thursday evening it was minus the choreography, thus giving one an opportunity to hear the music apart from the stage action, and proved interesting less from a musical standpoint than from the psychological. It makes one wonder why Stravinsky with his tremendous technic of dissonance suddenly changed his mind! "Apollo Musagètes" is an experiment, rather than an achievement. Although possessing a certain charm and individuality, at the same time, it leaves a feeling of indefiniteness and questioning. The string section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a very beautiful performance.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Schumann Symphony was fresh and delightful, and made one realize why this seldom-heard work was called the "Spring" Symphony. The Scriabin "Poeme de l' Extase" was played with dramatic intensity and with a brilliancy of climax that made it an outstanding performance of one of the important contributions to the early twentieth century orchestral repertoire.

The Saturday afternoon concert offered many delightful contrasts and gave Koussevitzky opportunity to conduct in varying styles and moods. The program opened with Prokofieff's "Classic" Symphony written, when the composer was very young, in a style imitating the classical symphony period. Prokofieff was one of the first to go back to the classic style, and whether he did it deliberately as an attempt to "reform" music or was simply practising the form as a young student, we do not know. The work, however, has charm and was played with fascinating simplicity and a sense of humor by Prokofieff's protagonist. Debussy's "L'après-midi d'un faune," Stravinsky's "Petroushka" and Brahms' Second Symphony completed the program.

* * *

28

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS
BELOIT, WIS.
NOV 22 1928

Boston Symphony And Conductor Win Much Praise

MATINEE AND EVENING PERFORMANCES WILL BE GIVEN HERE TOMORROW

From the length and breadth of the land comes praises for the outstanding musicianship of the Boston Women's Symphony orchestra and its famous conductor, Ethel Leginska, who will give matinee and evening concerts in Beloit tomorrow under auspices of the Civic Music association.

While the matinee is planned primarily for children, who will be supervised by teachers and other adults to prevent confusion, persons unable to attend the evening concert will be admitted in the afternoon at a special adult price. Civic Music season tickets will not be honored at the matinee, however, since much confusion would result if this were done.

Press Comments

The Boston Symphony is not without honor in its own city. The Boston Post says of it, "History, musically speaking, was made at Symphony hall last evening when Ethel Leginska led the orchestra through its twenty-first and final concert of the season. It was a triumph for the band itself and for its conductor."

From the New York World is the following speaking of Leginska: "The gifts she brought to last night's performance were a technic of conducting which was vivid and picturesque and a storm of energy which kept her tempi animated. Her readings has feeling and dramatic interest."

Crossing the continent we have this from the Los Angeles Examiner: "An artist who can attract 30,000 people! That's Ethel Leginska! A greater tribute still was the fact that her performance held the crowd until the very end of the concert." And from across the Atlantic, "Her profound and individual musicianship made the evening one of the most inspiring events of the season" (this from the Deutche Allegemeine Beitung, Berlin), and "Leginska is a musical thoroughbred who surpasses many of her masculine colleagues", (from the Munich Zeitung.)

For Matinee

The matinee will open with the overture to "Oberon," Wever, in which one may hear the call of Oberon's horn, the stir of woodland leaves and the merriment of fairy dancers. Saint-Saens' "Carnival of the Animals" will follow, this being a two-piano number in which Miriam Bohunek and Ruth Kauffman, gifted pianists still under the 'teen age, will be accompanied by the orchestra. "Dance of Birds" and "Dance of the Clowns," from "The Snow Maiden," Rimsky-Korakoff, and the Rienzi overture, Wagner, will conclude the program.

Of these numbers, "Dance of the Clowns," and the Rienzi overture will be included in the evening program, which will be as follows:

Program

Overture (Russian and Ludmilla) ..... Glinka
Symphony No. 5, opus 67....Beethoven
a. Allegro con brio
b. Andante con moto
c. Allegro (Scherzo)
d. Allegro Maestoso, Presto.
INTERMISSION
Concerto for piano and orchestra—
E flat major .....Liszt
Dance of the Clowns (The Snow Maiden) .....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture (Rienzi) .....Wagner

Sorella Club rummage sale at 432 E. Grand, near Hilton Hotel, Saturday. Nov. 21-22-23.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE

CHICAGO.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 22.—Earlier, by one week, than most American organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra observed the Schubert Centenary, Nov. 16-17, when Serge Koussevitzky adopted the almost unprecedented expedient of presenting a different program at the two subscription concerts, the one on Friday afternoon comprising the Symphony in C minor, followed by "Des Mädchens Klage," "Du Bist die Ruh'," "Heiden Röslein," "Der Tod und Das Mädchen," and "Hark, Hark the Lark," with Mme. Hulda Lashanska as soloist, and the Symphony in B minor. For the Saturday evening concert the Fifth Symphony, a group of songs, including "Litaney," "Der Neugierige," "Ungeduld," "An die Musik," and "Die Böse Farbe," and the Symphony in C major were presented.

Koussevitzky feels that Shubert's position in music is largely governed by his songs, and he was glad therefore to find in Mme. Lashanska a vocalist thoroughly familiar with interpretative tradition and possessed of a deep understanding of the poetic significance of the glorious melodies. It would indeed (as a noted critic remarked) require a baritone and contralto, as well as a soprano, to sing a representative list of the composers most famous lieder.

It was very interesting to hear the more unfamiliar Symphonies, for under the communicative baton of Koussevitzky they seem to have aged but little; though the C minor is at odds with the name "Tragic," for its melodic outline is exquisitely lyrical. As for those who have contemplated completion of the "Unfinished" Symphony, let them listen again to the well-spring of melody, the perfection of the orchestration, and then let them dare to finish it.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON { 5408
CABLE ADDRESS: MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE

CHICAGO.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

The Boston Band

Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston boys gave their first Saturday concert in Gotham, Nov. 24, and a nice one it was. The band sounds so mellow this year! It is getting back to the good old days, when we said Boston Symphony with Philadelphia band vocal nuance. We were delighted with the Prokofieff of Mozartian spirit. Montague Glass, the creator of Potash and Perlmutter and other immortals, thought it was satirical, but we could get nothing of satire from it. When we discussed this with Henry Hadley (see below) he agreed with us. It was just an attempt to recapture a Mozartian atmosphere modernly. Above and beyond the Mozartian vein it was well grounded Prokofieff, and we are beginning to have as good an opinion of him as he is reputed to have of himself. (That, confidentially, is very high!) Debussy's "Prélude a l' Après Midi d'un Faune," the "Petrouchka" Ballet Music, and the glorious Second Symphony of Brahms made, all told, a pretty nice diet

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
NOV 24 192[illegible]

Boston Symphony Subscription Sale Begins Monday

The Boston Symphony concert subscription sale begins next Monday morning at Steinert's. A few desirable seats were released at the time of the subscription renewals last spring, but for these there have been numerous applications.

Serge Ko[illegible]itzky will open the Providence season Tuesday, Dec. 4, in the Albee theatre. The other dates are Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26.

In the two months now past of the orchestra's 48th season there have been a succession of brilliant performances which promise that this, the fifth season of Koussevitzky in America, will be the finest of them all. The Boston Symphony orchestra has a very limited travelling schedule, since most of its time is taken in rehearsal and since the concerts in Boston have been increased by public demand to 67. The only series outside of greater Boston are in New York, Brooklyn and Providence. In New York all seats are re-engaged and there is a long waiting list from season to season.

EAGLES TO OB[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 24 1928

SYMPHONY TICKETS ON SALE MONDAY

Few Seats Left for First Concert. Koussevitzky Is Magnet.

Serge Koussevitzky's appearance here at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 4, in the [illegible] will be anticipated Monday morning when the subscription sale begins at M. Steinert & Sons Co., 495 Westminster street.

It is believed that season subscriptions will absorb practically all of the seats, but if there are any left three days before the first concert, Rhode Island music lovers will be given an opportunity to purchase seats for that alone. The same holds true with regard to the other dates: Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 24 1928

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND.

KOUSSEVITSKY VISITS

The Boston Symphony Society, which started its local season on Thursday evening, came to Brooklyn last night for its first concert of the year in this borough. Although Manhattan was given a new work, Brooklyn was offered a program with which the veriest novice should be familiar.

The old practise of no program notes was continued and it appeared that with this disadvantage there were at least some in the audience who were uncertain as to the time at which to applaud. Although other orchestras provide such notes and although the Bostonians have a very eminent annotator, Brooklyn is never considered in the distribution of such information.

Mr. Koussevitsky, having concluded a limited engagement, as a bull fiddle soloist, returned to the podium and selected the third "Leonora" overture of Beethoven's, Debussy's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" and the familiar "Eroica" for his program.

The "Leonora," which opened the program, was read a bit differently than New Yorkers have been accustomed to hear it. For a comparison I can only recall Mr. Bodansky's rendition at the Metropolitan. Mr. Koussevitsky very carefully brought out each individual theme and set it forth as though he were giving a quasi-lecture recital. The result was an episodic offering rather than a unified overture.

In the Debussy opus we had a faun who very evidently was a willing victim of Morpheus rather than a disciple of Terpsichore. There was little sportiveness, little of the sensuousness which the composer has written into the work and rather a traumilich presentation. And dream music when offered so long as it was last night, it is very conducive to producing such a condition on the part of auditors.

In the Prokieff, which, if memory serves aright, was offered last year, the conductor went as romantic as the composer would permit him to do. This is a shallow work, colorful it is true, but saccharine to the core. And although dissonance as such is more to be condemned than condoned on the other hand a continuance of sugar also becomes sickening.

Came then the "Eroica," the "hero" symphony of Beethoven concerning which so much has been written in an effort to provide a "program." Mr. Koussevitsky is one conductor who believes "con brio" means something. The allegro movement observed this to the full. But the funeral march was uneven as choir after choir tried to observe the baton which was not always sure in its rhythm. The scherzo was better by far, clear cut and light and gay. And in the finale the conductor built up a towering climax of tone which was sheer brilliance.

The Bostons of last night were not in as good form as when the season was opened here last year. Unquestionably the orchestra has the best tone of any band which this reviewer has heard this season. But there are several things yet to be polished off.

Mr. Koussevitsky last season was unhampered by the presence of a Stokowski and seemed to be bringing about a renaissance of the days of Muck. But with the Philadelphian back at the helm, it would appear as though the Russian were reverting to his former practise as though fearful of usurping the crown.

28

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS
BELOIT, WIS.
NOV 22 1928

Boston Symphony And Conductor Win Much Praise

MATINEE AND EVENING PERFORMANCES WILL BE GIVEN HERE TOMORROW

From the length and breadth of the land comes praises for the outstanding musicianship of the Boston Women's Symphony orchestra and its famous conductor, Ethel Leginska, who will give matinee and evening concerts in Beloit tomorrow under auspices of the Civic Music association.

While the matinee is planned primarily for children, who will be supervised by teachers and other adults to prevent confusion, persons unable to attend the evening concert will be admitted in the afternoon at a special adult price. Civic Music season tickets will not be honored at the matinee, however, since much confusion would result if this were done.

Press Comments

The Boston Symphony is not without honor in its own city. The Boston Post says of it, "History, musically speaking, was made at Symphony hall last evening when Ethel Leginska led the orchestra through its twenty-first and final concert of the season. It was a triumph for the band itself and for its conductor."

From the New York World is the following speaking of Leginska: "The gifts she brought to last night's performance were a technic of conducting which was vivid and picturesque and a storm of energy which kept her tempi animated. Her readings has feeling and dramatic interest."

Crossing the continent we have this from the Los Angeles Examiner: "An artist who can attract 30,000 people! That's Ethel Leginska! A greater tribute still was the fact that her performance held the crowd until the very end of the concert." And from across the Atlantic, "Her profound and individual musicianship made the evening one of the most inspiring events of the season" (this from the Deutche Allegemeine Beitung, Berlin), and "Leginska is a musical thoroughbred who surpasses many of her masculine colleagues", (from the Munich Zeitung.)

For Matinee

The matinee will open with the overture to "Oberon," Wever, in which one may hear the call of Oberon's horn, the stir of woodland leaves and the merriment of fairy dancers. Saint-Saens' "Carnival of the Animals" will follow, this being a two-piano number in which Miriam Bohunek and Ruth Kauffman, gifted pianists still under the 'teen age, will be accompanied by the orchestra. "Dance of Birds" and "Dance of the Clowns," from "The Snow Maiden," Rimsky-Korakoff, and the Rienzi overture, Wagner, will conclude the program.

Of these numbers, "Dance of the Clowns," and the Rienzi overture will be included in the evening program, which will be as follows:

Program

Overture (Russian and Ludmilla) ..... Glinka
Symphony No. 5, opus 67....Beethoven
a. Allegro con brio
b. Andante con moto
c. Allegro (Scherzo)
d. Allegro Maestoso, Presto.
INTERMISSION
Concerto for piano and orchestra—
E flat major .....Liszt
Dance of the Clowns (The Snow Maiden) .....Rimsky-Korsakoff
Overture (Rienzi) .....Wagner

Sorella Club rummage sale at 432 E. Grand, near Hilton Hotel, Saturday. Nov. 21-22-23.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON 5408
CABLE ADDRESS MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO MICHIGAN AVE

CHICAGO.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 22.—Earlier, by one week, than most American organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra observed the Schubert Centenary, Nov. 16-17, when Serge Koussevitzky adopted the almost unprecedented expedient of presenting a different program at the two subscription concerts, the one on Friday afternoon comprising the Symphony in C minor, followed by "Des Mädchens Klage," "Du Bist die Ruh'," "Heiden Röslein," "Der Tod und Das Mädchen," and "Hark, Hark the Lark," with Mme. Hulda Lashanska as soloist, and the Symphony in B minor. For the Saturday evening concert the Fifth Symphony, a group of songs, including "Litaney," "Der Neugierige," "Ungeduld," "An die Musik," and "Die Böse Farbe," and the Symphony in C major were presented.

Koussevitzky feels that Shubert's position in music is largely governed by his songs, and he was glad therefore to find in Mme. Lashanska a vocalist thoroughly familiar with interpretative tradition and possessed of a deep understanding of the poetic significance of the glorious melodies. It would indeed (as a noted critic remarked) require a baritone and contralto, as well as a soprano, to sing a representative list of the composers most famous lieder.

It was very interesting to hear the more unfamiliar Symphonies, for under the communicative baton of Koussevitzky they seem to have aged but little; though the C minor is at odds with the name "Tragic," for its melodic outline is exquisitely lyrical. As for those who have contemplated completion of the "Unfinished" Symphony, let them listen again to the well-spring of melody, the perfection of the orchestration, and then let them dare to finish it.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

FLORENCE FRENCH
EDITOR AND PUBLISHER

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

TELEPHONE { 4839 HARRISON 5408
CABLE ADDRESS MUSICLEAD CHICAGO

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

SUBSCRIPTION $3.00 FOR YEAR
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YEAR
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEAR

501 McCORMICK BUILDING
332 SO MICHIGAN AVE

CHICAGO.

YOUR ATTENTION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST THURSDAY'S ISSUE OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

The Boston Band

Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston boys gave their first Saturday concert in Gotham, Nov. 21, and a nice one it was. The band sounds so mellow this year! It is getting back to the good old days, when we said Boston Symphony with Philadelphia band vocal nuance. We were delighted with the Prokofieff of Mozartian spirit. Montague Glass, the creator of Potash and Perlmutter and other immortals, thought it was satirical, but we could get nothing of satire from it. When we discussed this with Henry Hadley (see below) he agreed with us. It was just an attempt to recapture a Mozartian atmosphere modernly. Above and beyond the Mozartian vein it was well grounded Prokofieff, and we are beginning to have as good an opinion of him as he is reputed to have of himself. (That, confidentially, is very high!) Debussy's "Prélude a l' Après Midi d'un Faune," the "Petrouchka" Ballet Music, and the glorious Second Symphony of Brahms made, all told, a pretty nice die-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
NOV 24 19

Boston Symphony Subscription Sale Begins Monday

The Boston Symphony concert subscription sale begins next Monday morning at Steinert's. A few desirable seats were released at the time of the subscription renewals last spring, but for these there have been numerous applications.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season Tuesday, Dec. 4, in the Albee theatre. The other dates are Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26.

In the two months now past of the orchestra's 48th season there have been a succession of brilliant performances which promise that this, the fifth season of Koussevitzky in America, will be the finest of them all. The Boston Symphony orchestra has a very limited travelling schedule, since most of its time is taken in rehearsal and since the concerts in Boston have been increased by public demand to 67. The only series outside of greater Boston are in New York, Brooklyn and Providence. In New York all seats are re-engaged and there is a long waiting list from season to season.

EAGLES TO ORGANIZE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 24 1928

SYMPHONY TICKETS ON SALE MONDAY

Few Seats Left for First Concert. Koussevitzky Is Magnet.

Serge Koussevitzky's appearance here at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 4, in the [redacted] will be anticipated Monday morning when the subscription sale begins at M. Steinert & Sons Co., 495 Westminster street.

It is believed that season subscriptions will absorb practically all of the seats, but if there are any left three days before the first concert, Rhode Island music lovers will be given an opportunity to purchase seats for that alone. The same holds true with regard to the other dates: Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 24 192

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND.

KOUSSEVITSKY VISITS

The Boston Symphony Society, which started its local season on Thursday evening, came to Brooklyn last night for its first concert of the year in this borough. Although Manhattan was given a new work, Brooklyn was offered a program with which the veriest novice should be familiar.

The old practise of no program notes was continued and it appeared that with this disadvantage there were at least some in the audience who were uncertain as to the time at which to applaud. Although other orchestras provide such notes and although the Bostonians have a very eminent annotator, Brooklyn is never considered in the distribution of such information.

Mr. Koussevitsky, having concluded a limited engagement, as a bull fiddle soloist, returned to the podium and selected the third "Leonora" overture of Beethoven's, Debussy's poem, "The Afternoon of a Faun," Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" and the familiar "Eroica" for his program.

The "Leonora," which opened the program, was read a bit differently than New Yorkers have been accustomed to hear it. For a comparison I can only recall Mr. Bodansky's rendition at the Metropolitan. Mr. Koussevitsky very carefully brought out each individual theme and set it forth as though he were giving a quasi-lecture recital. The result was an episodic offering rather than a unified overture.

In the Debussy opus we had a faun who very evidently was a willing victim of Morpheus rather than a disciple of Terpsichore. There was little sportiveness, little of the sensuousness which the composer has written into the work and rather a traumlich presentation. And dream-music when offered so long as it was last night, it is very conducive to producing such a condition on the part of auditors.

In the Prokieff, which, if memory serves aright, was offered last year, the conductor went as romantic as the composer would permit him to do. This is a shallow work, colorful it is true, but saccharine to the core. And although dissonance as such is more to be condemned than condoned on the other hand a continuance of sugar also becomes sickening.

Came then the "Eroica," the "hero" symphony of Beethoven concerning which so much has been written in an effort to provide a "program." Mr. Koussevitsky is one conductor who believes "con brio" means something. The allegro movement observed this to the full. But the funeral march was uneven a choir after choir tried to observe the baton which was not always sure of its rhythm. The scherzo was better by far, clear cut and light and gay. And in the finale the conductor built up a towering climax of tone which was sheer brilliance.

The Bostons of last night were not in as good form as when the season was opened here last year. Unquestionably the orchestra has the best tone of any band which this reviewer has heard this season. But there are several things yet to be polished off.

Mr. Koussevitsky last season was unhampered by the presence of a Stokowski and seemed to be bringing about a renaissance of the days of Muck. But with the Philadelphian back at the helm, it would appear as though the Russian were reverting to his former practise as though fearful of ursurping the crown.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN EAGLE
NOV 24 1928

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky Conducts Beethoven, Debussy and Prokofiew at the Academy of Music.

WHEN, on Feb. 3, 1927, Mr. Koussowitsky first introduced Prokofiew's Classical Symphony (Op. 25) to New York, it was overshadowed by the greater importance of another novelty appearing on the same program—Aaron Copland's famous jazz Piano Concerto. The critics omitted it in their scholia, which were devoted to Mr. Copland, who happened to be a native New Yorker and therefore News. Since then, the Concerto has not been revived (though many of us would like to hear it again), and the Classical Symphony was, until last evening, likewise neglected. Mr. Koussewitsky, visiting Brooklyn for the first time this season, with the Boston Symphonic Orchestra, brought it once more to light and played it, between Debussy and Beethoven, to an audience at the Academy of Music.

* * *

Prokofiew, who lives now in Bavaria, was born in Russia in 1891, and, so belongs, no doubt, among the "younger" Russian composers. He studied at the St. Petersburg Conservatory under such able masters as Rimsky-Korsakow, Liadow and Tcherepnnin and became a brilliant pianist as well as a talented composer. Perhaps as a composer he is more than talented. His music improves upon acquaintance; it wears well; and so much one cannot say for the work of many men of Prokofiew's generation. Such excerpts as we have heard from his opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," which the Chicago company produced in 1921, show charm and wit and color hardly inferior to that which may be found in Rimsky's music for the stage. The ballet "Chout" is not uninteresting, and the Classical Symphony, as one listens to it at a Boston Symphony concert, has undeniable freshness and originality. Parody it is, but the best sort of parody, sympathetic, not heartless, clever, but not cruel. And Prokofiew, who is not incapable of writing in long and complex forms, knows the value of brevity to wit. He does not pad an epigram, and the Classical Symphony is quickly played, for all of its conventional four movements.

* * *

Mr. Koussowitsky and the Bostonians play Prokofiew with verve and brilliance, with lightness of touch and clarity of balance and emphasis—Mr. Koussowitsky likes this music, and though once we deplored such partiality, we are willing now to retract, and to ask that he play more of it—and more often. The "Scythian Suite," for instance—that cataclasmic evocation of the barbaric nations who overwhelmed the civilization of Rome in remote centuries. [illegible] Debussy more modeling, shade and hue. It was this part of last evening's program that came off best—the Debussy and the Prokofiew. As a classicist, we find Mr. Koussewitsky less stimulating. His "Leonora" overture is a string, well co-ordinated performance, but his "Eroica" is too great and unsubstantiated a challenge to classical traditions to be good. It is overdramatic, weighty, slow and in the end, tedious.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN STANDARD UNION
NOV 24 1928

Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its forty-first series of annual concerts in Brooklyn, under Institute auspices, at the Academy of Music last night. Mr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The programme was:

"Leonore" No. 3, Overture (Beethoven), "The Afternoon of a Faun" (Debussy), "Classical" Symphony (Prokofieff), "Eroica" Symphony (Beethoven).

The audience was near capacity. A notable addition to the orchestra's personnel this season is Georg Boettcher, illustrious French horn virtuoso of Berlin.

In the Debussy prelude the orchestra attained a tonal coloring that can only approximately be described as ethereal, azural and mystical. Here indeed are heavenly lengths that are only too short, and one might truly wish that Debussy, master magician of instrumentation, had spun out to even greater lengths this delicate net of cobwebby witchery. The playing of the orchestra at times bordered on the unreal and spiritual, so delicate and feathery were many of the tonal balancings and shadings.

Also in the Prokofieff symphony, fashioned after the Mozart manner and style, the orchestra uncovered a brand of virtuosity that has seldom been attained in these concerts.

Mr. Koussevitzky makes a showpiece out of the first movement of the "Eroica," and showmanship in this solid classic seems decidedly out of place and unwarranted. The scherzo lends itself in better grace to this sort of thing. We think it safe to say that not many musicians will agree with the larger portion of such a reading. There is a large measure of distortion of the music and contortion on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky. His reading of this symphony can in no wise be compared either in the scaling of heights or plumbing of depths to the "Eroica" interpretations given by Toscanini, Mengelberg or Damrosch. The orchestra gave everything that was expected of it by Mr. Koussevitzky, but it was not the great and incomparable Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEWS
HAMILTON, O.
NOV 24 1928

Symphony's Playing Is Captured in Wax

Boston Orchestra Is Making New Records Under Full Concert Conditions

Music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hitherto heard only in Boston and a limited number of other cities in the United States, will be made available soon to listeners everywhere through phonographic recordings which are being made this week in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's home.

Recording instruments have been installed in the famous auditorium by experts from the Victor Talking Machine Company, and will reproduce in wax the performances of several master musical works played by the complete orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The recording apparatus is expected to make possible not only performances of the orchestra under concert conditions but also the capturing of the exceptional acoustic qualities of the auditorium.

The Boston Symphony was the first prominent American orchestra to be recorded, and that was some years ago, under an acoustical system by which only an incomplete musical organization could be used and then only in the laboratory at the talking machine plant.

With the use of the orthophonic method of recording, the entire orchestra can be utilized, playing exactly as it would at a public concert. The sensitive microphone catches every note of every instrument and transmits it to wax disks from which the familiar black records are made.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Symphony's Playing Is Captured in Wax

Boston Orchestra Is Making New Records Under Full Concert Conditions

Music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hitherto heard only in Boston and a limited number of other cities in the United States, will be made available soon to listeners everywhere through phonographic recordings which are being made this week in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's home.

Recording instruments have been installed in the famous auditorium by experts from the Victor Talking Machine Company, and will reproduce in wax the performances of several master musical works played by the complete orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The recording apparatus is expected to make possible not only performances of the orchestra under concert conditions but also the capturing of the exceptional acoustic qualities of the auditorium.

The Boston Symphony was the first prominent American orchestra to be recorded, and that was some years ago, under an acoustical system by which only an incomplete musical organization could be used and then only in the laboratory at the talking machine plant.

With the use of the orthophonic method of recording, the entire orchestra can be utilized, playing exactly as it would at a public concert. The sensitive microphone catches every note of every instrument and transmits it to wax disks from which the familiar black records are made.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PATRIOT—LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
NOV 24 1928

Smiling Music

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough." This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess? It was the close of symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little. As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
NOV 25 1928

SYMPHONY GIVES UNIQUE CONCERT AT CARNEGIE HALL

Boston Players Intermingle Modern and Classic Spirits in Pleasing Concert.

Are all the modernists gone classic? And is Mr. Koussevitzky determined to prove the point?

Yesterday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall played Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Two days before it played Stravinsky's "Apollo."

On this occasion, the blonde composer of many works which have been declared to be so modernistic that they have returned to the savages, went Mozartian.

He is quoted as saying that he wrote as "Mozart would if he were living today." As I remember it, Mr. Atterburg of Sweden tried the same thing in connection with Schubert but collected $10,750 therefore.

Numbers Melodious.

However, whether Mozart would have written as Prokofieff thinks, we can say that the Russian certainly has done the loveliest piece of composition we have heard of in his extensive library of creations.

This classical Symphony was as light as gossamer. It has more melody than five hundred Atterburg Symphonies. It has, moreover, melodies which are more Schubertian than Mozartian. It has, still further, such butterfly-like flutterings of rhythmic delights and graceful singing lines that I now cast my vote for it to become a standard number in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now if this is truly Prokofieff and he has been masquerading in his other work, let him remain himself; or if this is the masque, please tell him to put it on again.

The interpretation of Koussevitzky, of course, contributed to the lightness and delicacy of the performance. In the hands of another it might fare badly.

Plays Fantasy.

Did I ask if all the moderns had turned classic? Well, to prove to us that they have not Koussevitzky played the fantastic and humorous Stravinsky "Petrouchka" Suite. And there is nobody but Koussevitzky who could have done it with such justice.

The rendition of the Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Fawn" was a fine and clear presentation, much more mystical adn ephemeral, caught with the fairyland tale than ninety-nine out of a hundred performances. But the music of Mr. Monteux is too fresh in the memory for any other to appraise the vision of Debussy's Fawn.

The second half of the program was devoted to a reading of the Brahm's Second Symphony (in D major) in which Mr. Koussevitzky proved his devotion to the German and the orchestra proved anew its all-star personnel. —C. D. I.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 25 1928

◈ ◈ ◈

STUDENT TICKETS FOR SYMPHONIES

The Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, Miss Virginia Boyd Anderson, President, announces that the student cards for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are now ready for distribution. Following are the rules governing the use of the tickets:

The holder of the card must be studying at the present time and be vouched for by his or her music teacher. The student using a Federation student card must not have reached his or her 25th birthday before applying to the committee. These cards are redeemable for seats on the day of each concert at the office of Caesar Misch, Inc., 400 Westminster street, from 9 a. m. to 5:30 p. m. The cards may be had by applying to the student seat committee, Miss Evangeline Larry, 17 Conrad building, and Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke, 40 Everett avenue.

This privilege is extended to the students of music in Rhode Island by the courtesy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, through whose co-operation it has been made possible for several seasons.

◈ ◈ ◈

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
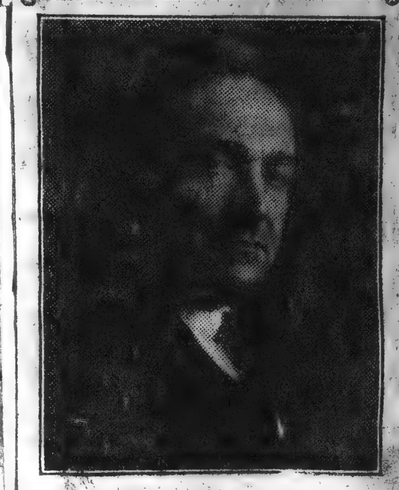
COURANT
NOV 25 1928

Boston Symphony Here in February



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun its forty-eighth season with successes which augur one of the most brilliant years in the orchestra's history. The season's concerts will include an appearance in Hartford, on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

The orchestra opened its New York concerts on Thursday and Saturday, November 22 and 24. Koussevitzky is introducing to New York Stravinsky's latest score, "Apollo, leader of the Muses," which he gave its first concert performance in Boston in October.

The orchestra's first journey of the season took place in the last week of October, when the following cities were visited: Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. Packed audiences and tumultuous applause, as well as eulogies in the press, were the rule at each one of these concerts.

The ticket sale for the Hartford concert is now in progress, and mail orders are being filled. Frank A. Sedgwick announces that reservations also can be made and tickets will be held until Jan. 15, thereby giving an opportunity to patrons of securing choice locations of seats. Phone 2-2251 or call at McCoy's Inc., 89 Asylum Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 25 1928

Other Important Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 3 P. M. Program:

"Classical" Symphony, Opus 25 ..... Prokofieff
Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune ..... Debussy
Orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka" ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major..... Brahms

A contrast between old suavities and new distortions was drawn rather sharply yesterday afternoon in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall. A few in the audience not hopelessly committed to the modern urge seemed to think Brahms had won the argument with his D Major Symphony.

"L'Apres Midi" was an oasis in the desert of disonnance constituting the first half of the program. Rarely has Debussy's orchestral prelude received such wise and tender treatment. As for "Petrouchka" and the Prokofieff symphony, both have been done before ad infinitum, and both have been subjected to the most minute dissection. Intermission and Brahms came as a great relief. The first allegro of the work gave an impression of unpaste. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky at the phrase "non troppo" not be taken seriously.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 25 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM ANNOUNCED

Beethoven, Debussy and Prokofieff will occupy the first part and a Brahms symphony the last part of the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will offer for its [illegible] program here this season on Dec. 4. The order is announced as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72, Beethoven; "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun), eclogue by S. Mallarme, Debussy; "Classical," Symphony, opus 25, Prokofieff, Allegro, Larghetto, Gavotte, Finale; Symphony No. 2 in D-major, opus 73, Brahms, Allegro non troppo, Adagio non troppo, Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino, Alegro con spirito.

◈ ◈ ◈

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN EAGLE
NOV 24 1928

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky Conducts Beethoven, Debussy and Prokofiew at the Academy of Music.

WHEN, on Feb. 3, 1927, Mr. Koussowitsky first introduced Prokofiew's Classical Symphony (Op. 25) to New York, it was overshadowed by the greater importance of another novelty appearing on the same program—Aaron Copland's famous jazz Piano Concerto. The critics omitted it in their scholia, which were devoted to Mr. Copland, who happened to be a native New Yorker and therefore News. Since then, the Concerto has not been revived (though many of us would like to hear it again), and the Classical Symphony was, until last evening, likewise neglected. Mr. Koussewitsky, visiting Brooklyn for the first time this season, with the Boston Symphonic Orchestra, brought it once more to light and played it, between Debussy and Beethoven, to an audience at the Academy of Music.

* * *

Prokofiew, who lives now in Bavaria, was born in Russia in 1891, and, so belongs, no doubt, among the "younger" Russian composers. He studied at the St. Petersburg Conservatory under such able masters as Rimsky-Korsakow, Liadow and Tcherepnnin and became a brilliant pianist as well as a talented composer. Perhaps as a composer he is more than talented. His music improves upon acquaintance; it wears well; and so much one cannot say for the work of many men of Prokofiew's generation. Such excerpts as we have heard from his opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," which the Chicago company produced in 1921, show charm and wit and color hardly inferior to that which may be found in Rimsky's music for the stage. The ballet "Chout" is not uninteresting, and the Classical Symphony, as one listens to it at a Boston Symphony concert, has undeniable freshness and originality. Parody it is, but the best sort of parody, sympathetic, not heartless, clever, but not cruel. And Prokofiew, who is not incapable of writing in long and complex forms, knows the value of brevity to wit. He does not pad an epigram, and the Classical Symphony is quickly played, for all of its conventional four movements.

* * *

Mr. Koussowitsky and the Bostonians play Prokofiew with verve and brilliance, with lightness of touch and clarity of balance and emphasis—Mr. Koussowitsky likes this music, and though once we deplored such partiality, we are willing now to retract, and to ask that he play more of it—and more often. The "Scythian Suite," for instance—that cataclasmic evocation of the barbaric nations who overwhelmed the civilization of Rome in remote centuries.

[illegible] play Debussy more modeling, shade and hue. It was this part of last evening's program that came off best—the Debussy and the Prokofiew. As a classicist, we find Mr. Koussewitsky less stimulating. His "Leonora" overture is a string, well co-ordinated performance, but his "Eroica" is too great and unsubstantiated a challenge to classical traditions to be good. It is overdramatic, weighty, slow and in the end, tedious.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEWS
HAMILTON, O.
NOV 24 1928

Symphony's Playing Is Captured in Wax

Boston Orchestra Is Making New Records Under Full Concert Conditions

Music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hitherto heard only in Boston and a limited number of other cities in the United States, will be made available soon to listeners everywhere through phonographic recordings which are being made this week in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's home.

Recording instruments have been installed in the famous auditorium by experts from the Victor Talking Machine Company, and will reproduce in wax the performances of several master musical works played by the complete orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The recording apparatus is expected to make possible not only performances of the orchestra under concert conditions but also the capturing of the exceptional acoustic qualities of the auditorium.

The Boston Symphony was the first prominent American orchestra to be recorded, and that was some years ago, under an acoustical system by which only an incomplete musical organization could be used and then only in the laboratory at the talking machine plant.

With the use of the orthophonic method of recording, the entire orchestra can be utilized, playing exactly as it would at a public concert. The sensitive microphone catches every note of every instrument and transmits it to wax disks from which the familiar black records are made.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN STANDARD UNION
NOV 24 1928

Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its forty-first series of annual concerts in Brooklyn, under Institute auspices, at the Academy of Music last night. Mr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The programme was:

"Leonore" No. 3, Overture (Beethoven), "The Afternoon of a Faun" (Debussy), "Classical" Symphony (Prokofieff), "Eroica" Symphony (Beethoven).

The audience was near capacity.

A notable addition to the orchestra's personnel this season is Georg Boettcher, illustrious French horn virtuoso of Berlin.

In the Debussy prelude the orchestra attained a tonal coloring that can only approximately be described as ethereal, azural and mystical. Here indeed are heavenly lengths that are only too short, and one might truly wish that Debussy, master magician of instrumentation, had spun out to even greater lengths this delicate net of cobwebby witchery. The playing of the orchestra at times bordered the unreal and spiritual, so delicate and feathery were many of the tonal balancings and shadings.

Also in the Prokofieff symphony, fashioned after the Mozart manner and style, the orchestra uncovered a brand of virtuosity that has seldom been attained in these concerts.

Mr. Koussevitzky makes a showpiece out of the first movement of the "Eroica," and showmanship in this solid classic seems decidedly out of place and unwarranted. The scherzo lends itself in better grace to this sort of thing. We think it safe to say that not many musicians will agree with the larger portion of such a reading. There is a large measure of distortion of the music and contortion on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky. His reading of this symphony can in no wise be compared either in the scaling of heights or plumbing of depths to the "Eroica" interpretations given by Toscanini, Mengelberg or Damrosch. The orchestra gave everything that was expected of it by Mr. Koussevitzky, but it was not the great and incomparable Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Symphony's Playing Is Captured in Wax

Boston Orchestra Is Making New Records Under Full Concert Conditions

Music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hitherto heard only in Boston and a limited number of other cities in the United States, will be made available soon to listeners everywhere through phonographic recordings which are being made this week in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's home.

Recording instruments have been installed in the famous auditorium by experts from the Victor Talking Machine Company, and will reproduce in wax the performances of several master musical works played by the complete orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The recording apparatus is expected to make possible not only performances of the orchestra under concert conditions but also the capturing of the exceptional acoustic qualities of the auditorium.

The Boston Symphony was the first prominent American orchestra to be recorded, and that was some years ago, under an acoustical system by which only an incomplete musical organization could be used and then only in the laboratory at the talking machine plant.

With the use of the orthophonic method of recording, the entire orchestra can be utilized, playing exactly as it would at a public concert. The sensitive microphone catches every note of every instrument and transmits it to wax disks from which the familiar black records are made.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PATRIOT—LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
NOV 24 1928

(3)

Smiling Music

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough." This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess? It was the close of symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little. As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
NOV 25 1928

SYMPHONY GIVES UNIQUE CONCERT AT CARNEGIE HALL

Boston Players Intermingle Modern and Classic Spirits in Pleasing Concert.

Are all the modernists gone classic? And is Mr. Koussevitzky determined to prove the point?

Yesterday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall played Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Two days before it played Stravinsky's "Apollo."

On this occasion, the blonde composer of many works which have been declared to be so modernistic that they have returned to the savages, went Mozartian.

He is quoted as saying that he wrote as "Mozart would if he were living today." As I remember it, Mr. Atterburg of Sweden tried the same thing in connection with Schubert but collected $10,750 therefore.

Numbers Melodious.

However, whether Mozart would have written as Prokofieff thinks, we can say that the Russian certainly has done the loveliest piece of composition we have heard of in his extensive library of creations.

This classical Symphony was as light as gossamer. It has more melody than five hundred Atterburg Symphonies. It has, moreover, melodies which are more Schubertian than Mozartian. It has, still further, such butterfly-like flutterings of rhythmic delights and graceful singing lines that I now cast my vote for it to become a standard number in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now if this is truly Prokofieff and he has been masquerading in his other work, let him remain himself; or if this is the masque, please tell him to put it on again.

The interpretation of Koussevitzky, of course, contributed to the lightness and delicacy of the performance. In the hands of another it might fare badly.

Plays Fantasy.

Did I ask if all the moderns had turned classic? Well, to prove to us that they have not Koussevitzky played the fantastic and humorous Stravinsky "Petrouchka" Suite. And there is nobody but Koussevitzky who could have done it with such justice.

The rendition of the Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Fawn" was a fine and clear presentation, much more mystical adn ephemeral, caught with the fairyland tale than ninety-nine out of a hundred performances. But the music of Mr. Monteux is too fresh in the memory for any other to appraise the vision of Debussy's Fawn.

The second half of the program was devoted to a reading of the Brahm's Second Symphony (in D major) in which Mr. Koussevitzky proved his devotion to the German and the orchestra proved anew its all-star personnel. —C. D. I.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 5 1928

◈ ◈ ◈

STUDENT TICKETS
FOR SYMPHONIES

The Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, Miss Virginia Boyd Anderson, President, announces that the student cards for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are now ready for distribution. Following are the rules governing the use of the tickets:

The holder of the card must be studying at the present time and be vouched for by his or her music teacher. The student using a Federation student card must not have reached his or her 25th birthday before applying to the committee. These cards are redeemable for seats on the day of each concert at the office of Caesar Misch, Inc., 400 Westminster street, from 9 a. m. to 5:30 p. m. The cards may be had by applying to the student seat committee, Miss Evangeline Larry, 17 Conrad building, and Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke, 40 Everett avenue.

This privilege is extended to the students of music in Rhode Island by the courtesy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, through whose co-operation it has been made possible for several seasons.

◈ ◈ ◈

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 25 1928

Boston Symphony Here in February

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun its forty-eighth season with successes which augur one of the most brilliant years in the orchestra's history. The season's concerts will include an appearance in Hartford, on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

The orchestra opened its New York concerts on Thursday and Saturday, November 22 and 24. Koussevitzky is introducing to New York Stravinsky's latest score, "Apollo, leader of the Muses," which he gave its first concert performance in Boston in October.

The orchestra's first journey of the season took place in the last week of October, when the following cities were visited: Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. Packed audiences and tumultuous applause, as well as eulogies in the press, were the rule at each one of these concerts.

The ticket sale for the Hartford concert is now in progress, and mail orders are being filled. Frank A. Sedgwick announces that reservations also can be made and tickets will be held until Jan. 15, thereby giving an opportunity to patrons of securing choice locations of seate. Phone 2-2251 or call at McCoy's Inc., 89 Asylum Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 25 [illegible]

Other Important Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 3 P. M. Program:
"Classical" Symphony, Opus 25 ..... Prokofieff
Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune ..... Debussy
Orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka" ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major..... Brahms

A contrast between old suavities and new distortions was drawn rather sharply yesterday afternoon in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall. A few in the audience not hopelessly committed to the modern urge seemed to think Brahms had won the argument with his D Major Symphony.

"L'Apres Midi" was an oasis in the desert of disonnance constituting the first half of the program. Rarely has Debussy's orchestral prelude received such wise and tender treatment. As for "Petrouchka" and the Prokofieff symphony, both have been done before ad infinitum, and both have been subjected to the most minute dissection. Intermission and Brahms came as a great relief. The first allegro of the work gave an impression of unaste. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky it the phrase "non troppo" not be taken seriously.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY
PROGRAM ANNOUNCED

Beethoven, Debussy and Prokofieff will occupy the first part and a Brahms symphony the last part of the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will offer for its [illegible] program here this season on Dec. 4. The order is announced as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72, Beethoven; "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun), eclogue by S. Mallarme, Debussy; "Classical," Symphony, opus 25, Prokofieff, Allegro, Larghetto, Gavotte, Finale; Symphony No. 2 in D-major, opus 73, Brahms, Allegro non troppo, Adagio non troppo, Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino, Alegro con spirito.

◈ ◈ ◈

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN EAGLE
NOV 24 1928

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky Conducts Beethoven, Debussy and Prokofiew at the Academy of Music.

WHEN, on Feb. 3, 1927, Mr. Koussowitsky first introduced Prokofiew's Classical Symphony (Op. 25) to New York, it was overshadowed by the greater importance of another novelty appearing on the same program—Aaron Copland's famous jazz Piano Concerto. The critics omitted it in their scholia, which were devoted to Mr. Copland, who happened to be a native New Yorker and therefore News. Since then, the Concerto has not been revived (though many of us would like to hear it again), and the Classical Symphony was, until last evening, likewise neglected. Mr. Koussewitsky, visiting Brooklyn for the first time this season, with the Boston Symphonic Orchestra, brought it once more to light and played it, between Debussy and Beethoven, to an audience at the Academy of Music.

* * *

Prokofiew, who lives now in Bavaria, was born in Russia in 1891, and, so belongs, no doubt, among the "younger" Russian composers. He studied at the St. Petersburg Conservatory under such able masters as Rimsky-Korsakow, Liadow and Tcherepnnin and became a brilliant pianist as well as a talented composer. Perhaps as a composer he is more than talented. His music improves upon acquaintance; it wears well; and so much one cannot say for the work of many men of Prokofiew's generation. Such excerpts as we have heard from his opera, "The Love of Three Oranges," which the Chicago company produced in 1921, show charm and wit and color hardly inferior to that which may be found in Rimsky's music for the stage. The ballet "Chout" is not uninteresting, and the Classical Symphony, as one listens to it at a Boston Symphony concert, has undeniable freshness and originality. Parody it is, but the best sort of parody, sympathetic, not heartless, clever, but not cruel. And Prokofiew, who is not incapable of writing in long and complex forms, knows the value of brevity to wit. He does not pad an epigram, and the Classical Symphony is quickly played, for all of its conventional four movements.

* * *

Mr. Koussowitsky and the Bostonians play Prokofiew with verve and brilliance, with lightness of touch and clarity of balance and emphasis—Mr. Koussowitsky likes this music, and though once we deplored such partiality, we are willing now to retract, and to ask that he play more of it—and more often. The "Scythian Suite," for instance—that cataclasmic evocation of the barbaric nations who overwhelmed the civilization of Rome in remote centuries.

And he might play Debussy more frequently, for there is no conductor who achieves performances of "L'apres-midi d'un faune" or of the Nocturnes which equal those given by the Bostonians under Mr. Koussewitsky's direction for subtle perfection of modeling, shade and hue. It was this part of last evening's program that came off best—the Debussy and the Prokofiew. As a classicist, we find Mr. Koussewitsky less stimulating. His "Leonora" overture is a string, well co-ordinated performance, but his "Eroica" is too great and unsubstantiated a challenge to classical traditions to be good. It is overdramatic, weighty, slow and in the end, tedious.

* *

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN STANDARD UNION
NOV 24 1928

Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its forty-first series of annual concerts in Brooklyn, under Institute auspices, at the Academy of Music last night. Mr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The programme was:

"Leonore" No. 3, Overture (Beethoven), "The Afternoon of a Faun" (Debussy), "Classical" Symphony (Prokofieff), "Eroica" Symphony (Beethoven).

The audience was near capacity. A notable addition to the orchestra's personnel this season is Georg Boettcher, illustrious French horn virtuoso of Berlin.

In the Debussy prelude the orchestra attained a tonal coloring that can only approximately be described as ethereal, azural and mystical. Here indeed are heavenly lengths that are only too short, and one might truly wish that Debussy, master magician of instrumentation, had spun out to even greater lengths this delicate net of cobwebby witchery. The playing of the orchestra at times bordered the unreal and spiritual, so delicate and feathery were many of the tonal balancings and shadings.

Also in the Prokofieff symphony, fashioned after the Mozart manner and style, the orchestra uncovered a brand of virtuosity that has seldom been attained in these concerts.

Mr. Koussevitzky makes a showpiece out of the first movement of the "Eroica," and showmanship in this solid classic seems decidedly out of place and unwarranted. The scherzo lends itself in better grace to this sort of thing. We think it safe to say that not many musicians will agree with the larger portion of such a reading. There is a large measure of distortion of the music and contortion on the part of Mr. Koussevitzky. His reading of this symphony can in no wise be compared either in the scaling of heights or plumbing of depths to the "Eroica" interpretations given by Toscanini, Mengelberg or Damrosch. The orchestra gave everything that was expected of it by Mr. Koussevitzky, but it was not the great and incomparable Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Symphony's Playing Is Captured in Wax

Boston Orchestra Is Making New Records Under Full Concert Conditions

Music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hitherto heard only in Boston and a limited number of other cities in the United States, will be made available soon to listeners everywhere through phonographic recordings which are being made this week in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's home.

Recording instruments have been installed in the famous auditorium by experts from the Victor Talking Machine Company, and will reproduce in wax the performances of several master musical works played by the complete orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The recording apparatus is expected to make possible not only performances of the orchestra under concert conditions but also the capturing of the exceptional acoustic qualities of the auditorium.

The Boston Symphony was the first prominent American orchestra to be recorded, and that was some years ago, under an acoustical system by which only an incomplete musical organization could be used and then only in the laboratory at the talking machine plant.

With the use of the orthophonic method of recording, the entire orchestra can be utilized, playing exactly as it would at a public concert. The sensitive microphone catches every note of every instrument and transmits it to wax disks from which the familiar black records are made.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PATRIOT—LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
NOV 24 1928

(3)

Smiling Music

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough." This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess? It was the close of symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little. As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
NOV 25 1928

SYMPHONY GIVES UNIQUE CONCERT AT CARNEGIE HALL

Boston Players Intermingle Modern and Classic Spirits in Pleasing Concert.

Are all the modernists gone classic? And is Mr. Koussevitzky determined to prove the point?

Yesterday afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall played Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Two days before it played Stravinsky's "Apollo."

On this occasion, the blonde composer of many works which have been declared to be so modernistic that they have returned to the savages, went Mozartian.

He is quoted as saying that he wrote as "Mozart would if he were living today." As I remember it, Mr. Atterburg of Sweden tried the same thing in connection with Schubert but collected $10,750 therefore.

Numbers Melodious.

However, whether Mozart would have written as Prokofieff thinks, we can say that the Russian certainly has done the loveliest piece of composition we have heard of in his extensive library of creations.

This classical Symphony was as light as gossamer. It has more melody than five hundred Atterburg Symphonies. It has, moreover, melodies which are more Schubertian than Mozartian. It has, still further, such butterfly-like flutterings of rhythmic delights and graceful singing lines that I now cast my vote for it to become a standard number in the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Now if this is truly Prokofieff and he has been masquerading in his other work, let him remain himself; or if this is the masque, please tell him to put it on again.

The interpretation of Koussevitzky, of course, contributed to the lightness and delicacy of the performance. In the hands of another it might fare badly.

Plays Fantasy.

Did I ask if all the moderns had turned classic? Well, to prove to us that they have not Koussevitzky played the fantastic and humorous Stravinsky "Petrouchka" Suite. And there is nobody but Koussevitzky who could have done it with such justice.

The rendition of the Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Fawn" was a fine and clear presentation, much more mystical adn ephemeral, caught with the fairyland tale than ninety-nine out of a hundred performances. But the music of Mr. Monteux is too fresh in the memory for any other to appraise the vision of Debussy's Fawn.

The second half of the program was devoted to a reading of the Brahm's Second Symphony (in D major) in which Mr. Koussevitzky proved his devotion to the German and the orchestra proved anew its all-star personnel. —C. D. I.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 25 1928

◈ ◈ ◈

STUDENT TICKETS
FOR SYMPHONIES

The Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, Miss Virginia Boyd Anderson, President, announces that the student cards for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are now ready for distribution. Following are the rules governing the use of the tickets:

The holder of the card must be studying at the present time and be vouched for by his or her music teacher. The student using a Federation student card must not have reached his or her 25th birthday before applying to the committee. These cards are redeemable for seats on the day of each concert at the office of Caesar Misch, Inc., 400 Westminster street, from 9 a. m. to 5:30 p. m. The cards may be had by applying to the student seat committee, Miss Evangeline Larry, 17 Conrad building, and Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke, 40 Everett avenue.

This privilege is extended to the students of music in Rhode Island by the courtesy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, through whose co-operation it has been made possible for several seasons.

◈ ◈ ◈

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 25 1928

Boston Symphony Here in February

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun its forty-eighth season with successes which augur one of the most brilliant years in the orchestra's history. The season's concerts will include an appearance in Hartford, on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

The orchestra opened its New York concerts on Thursday and Saturday, November 22 and 24. Koussevitzky is introducing to New York Stravinsky's latest score, "Apollo, leader of the Muses," which he gave its first concert performance in Boston in October.

The orchestra's first journey of the season took place in the last week of October, when the following cities were visited: Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. Packed audiences and tumultuous applause, as well as eulogies in the press, were the rule at each one of these concerts.

The ticket sale for the Hartford concert is now in progress, and mail orders are being filled. Frank A. Sedgwick announces that reservations also can be made and tickets will be held until Jan. 15, thereby giving an opportunity to patrons of securing choice locations of seate. Phone 2-2251 or call at McCoy's Inc., 89 Asylum Street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 25 1928

Other Important Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, 3 P. M. The program:

"Classical" Symphony, Opus 25 ..... Prokofieff
Prelude a l'Apres Midi d'un Faune ..... Debussy
Orchestral suite from the ballet "Petrouchka" ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 2 in D major ..... Brahms

A contrast between old suavities and new distortions was drawn rather sharply yesterday afternoon in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall. A few in the audience not hopelessly committed to the modern urge seemed to think Brahms had won the argument with his D Major Symphony.

"L'Apres Midi" was an oasis in the desert of disonnance constituting the first half of the program. Rarely has Debussy's orchestral prelude received such wise and tender treatment. As for "Petrouchka" and the Prokofieff symphony, both have been done before ad infinitum, and both have been subjected to the most minute dissection. Intermission and Brahms came as a great relief. The first allegro of the work gave an impression of unpaste. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky at the phrase "non troppo" not be taken seriously.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 25 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY
PROGRAM ANNOUNCED

Beethoven, Debussy and Prokofieff will occupy the first part and a Brahms symphony the last part of the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will offer for its initial program here this season on Dec. 4. The order is announced as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72, Beethoven; "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun), eclogue by S. Mallarme, Debussy; "Classical," Symphony, opus 25, Prokofieff, Allegro, Larghetto, Gavotte, Finale; Symphony No. 2 in D-major, opus 73, Brahms, Allegro non troppo, Adagio non troppo, Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino, Alegro con spirito.

◈ ◈ ◈

Boston ...
New Records Under Full Concert Conditions

Music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hitherto heard only in Boston and a limited number of other cities in the United States, will be made available soon to listeners everywhere through phonographic recordings which are being made this week in Symphony Hall, the orchestra's home.

Recording instruments have been installed in the famous auditorium by experts from the Victor Talking Machine Company, and will reproduce in wax the performances of several master musical works played by the complete orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The recording apparatus is expected to make possible not only performances of the orchestra under concert conditions but also the capturing of the exceptional acoustic qualities of the auditorium.

The Boston Symphony was the first prominent American orchestra to be recorded, and that was some years ago, under an acoustical system by which only an incomplete musical organization could be used and then only in the laboratory at the talking machine plant.

With the use of the orthophonic method of recording, the entire orchestra can be utilized, playing exactly as it would at a public concert. The sensitive microphone catches every note of every instrument and transmits it to wax disks from which the familiar black records are made.

230

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
NOV 25 1928

A CONDUCTOR'S MUSICIANSHIP

Baseless Rumors Concerning Koussevitzky's Lack of Technical Knowledge Shown Absurd by Quality of His Performance

By OLIN DOWNES.

STORIES have been industriously circulated, and have persisted ever since Serge Koussevitzky came to America in the Fall of 1924 as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the effect that this noted and experienced orchestra leader is unable to read a score. When Lincoln was informed that General Ulysses S. Grant was a drunkard, he replied that he wished more of his generals drank Grant's whisky. This writer would say, as regards Mr. Koussevitzky, that if he is unable to decipher and understand an orchestral partition, it is only a pity that there are not more conductors possessed of a similar abysmal ignorance. Mr. Koussevitzky, "unable to read a score," has performed more new music to the square inch in the four seasons he has spent in America than the leaders of any other great symphonic orchestra of the country, and he has brought the Boston orchestra back to its old-time splendor.

It would be interesting to know the methods of a conductor who performs so much new music so frequently, when he is possessed of Mr. Koussevitzky's disabilities. Does he simply watch the players, during the concert, move the stick in a way to synchronize with the rhythms of the players and make the occasional gesture that deceives the gullible audience? Is it sheer quickness and instinct and bluff with him? Sitting in the audience you would really think that you were listening to a man who knew his business.

***

As those supposed to have access to much confidential and accurate information, we have been favored with the true explanation of Mr. Koussevitzky's methods and success with the new scores that he produces with so much apparent confidence and aplomb. Long before the rehearsals of the new works begin, according to our informant, he has two bright young men come to his study and play the music for him, over and over again, four hands, on the piano. These young men are very clever. The conductor searched far and wide to secure them, and maintains their services and their discretion at a prodigious cost to himself. They can read scores if Mr. Koussevitzky cannot. It does not matter if he is performing a new work from manuscript. These young phenomenons simply place the manuscript on the piano rack, dividing the burden of the impromptu transcription in such a way as to equalize the parts between the player who plays upper parts and the player who plays the bass. They do this at sight, meanwhile explaining to the attentive and perspicacious conductor, as they go along, the details that he must look out for when he confronts the orchestra. Then, when Koussevitzky is letter-perfect in his knowledge, and not before, he puts the new work into rehearsal. Even then strange and disconcerting things happen. It is known by those close to Mr. Koussevitzky that although he has been for years an internationally famous virtuoso of the double-bass, and although his intonation has never been criticized, he really has no ear. If a false note is sounded, even, say, by such a prominent instrument as a solo horn, he is unaware of it unless some member of the orchestra calls it to his attention. Thereupon, much confused and very humble, Mr. Koussevitzky begs the orchestra to start once more at letter "P" and assures them that he will be more vigilant in the future.

These, then, are the methods by which he keeps up a front and continues to mislead the public and the critics, who wouldn't know an orchestral score from the side of a barn door if they saw one. Those two young men of Mr. Koussevitzky's, as can be seen, work very hard, since they have to do the score-reading that the conductor should be able to do for himself from pages in the composer's scrambled or illegible handwriting, or from the orchestral partitions of new publications, which are very seldom issued simultaneously in orchestral and piano arrangement.

***

Even so, it is evident that without a faculty of the most amazing and instantaneous assimilation Mr. Koussevitzky could not keep his important position. Of course, he learns very rapidly as he goes on with the rehearsals. Once his assistants have tactfully acquainted him with the thematic material of his score and pounded the tempi into his head, the orchestra can be relied upon to do most of the real work that remains of preparation. The results secured are amazing. When the concert takes place, lo and behold! the orchestra plays with a sureness, a balance of the choirs, a precision of accent and nicety of shading, a proportion of the inner parts, a variety of color and elasticity of pace that to secure in any like measure most conductors would have to understand every note of the score. But that is Koussevitzky, strange mixture of virtuosity, magnetism and ignorance, whose orchestra performs with such apparent brilliancy and precision and whose concerts are sold out long in advance of his appearance.

It may not be believed that such charges and explanations as those recorded would be made by supposedly serious and intelligent people—people, moreover, who are in many cases acquainted with the outline of Mr. Koussevitzky's career and reputation. But these things have been said time and again by those who should know better, in the writer's hearing. It is not necessary to defend Mr. Koussevitzky by refuting them. They are mentioned rather as an interesting example of the manner in which whispering campaigns may be persistently pursued and statements without logic or fact to sustain them be given circulation. Such rumors and gossip gain ready credence with large numbers of people, wherever human beings congregate, but they are especially rife, and seem to fall upon particularly susceptible ears, in circles that busy themselves with the musical art and its manifestations. The same people who were ready for reasons of their own to pass on amusing and obviously inaccurate misinformation were in most cases fully aware that before he became a conductor Koussevitzky was the greatest of living double-bass players, and one who, in addition to his sensational appearances as a soloist, had himself played for years in orchestras. They knew that in a modest way he was a composer, liable to possess the knowledge of the elements of an orchestral score which is part of the composer's accumulation. They could also have ascertained, if they did not already know, that in his boyhood Mr. Koussevitzky had taken full courses, which included theory and score-reading, and in which he graduated with honors from the Ecole Philharmonique of Moscow, before he had entered his twenties. Every fact of his life, and, to the reasonable and unprejudiced person, every characteristic of his programs and his conducting would contradict the monumentally absurd supposition that in his particularly chosen field the conductor had less knowledge of his business than a musical trifler or dilettante on vacation.

But so it is, in this vale of tears. We can console ourselves with the facts of Mr. Koussevitzky's accomplishment, and the orchestra which now, under his guidance, plays so magnificently. Saying this, and reiterating the absurdity of certain rumors, it is not necessary to agree unqualifiedly with Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations. This writer finds him a leader of extraordinary temperament, orchestral control and imagination, if also, at times, of unconventional and unpredictable ideas of musical exposition. But Mr. Koussevitzky has a right, and a better right than most, to his conclusions about his interpretations, and the proof of his power is found in the vividness, force and color of his performances with the superb band that he has made the sensitive and almost infallible vehicle of his inspiration.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 25 1928

Boston Orchestra Program Scintillant Under Koussevitsky

Prokofieff Symphony Played With Charm and Verve in Matinee at Carnegie

The matinee performance yesterday at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky offered no novelties, but the program were at least three of the works which the distinguished conductor from New England plays superlatively well. The first of these, Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, has a unique, ingratiating and scintilant charm which Koussevitzky captures adroitly upon his baton with sympathetic genius. The Debussy Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" followed, played with balance and exceptional tonal beauty, somewhat over sentimentalized and drawn out in tempo. The "Petrouschka" Suite was also brilliantly presented, with wit and masterly assemblage of color and light.

The program concluded with the Second Symphony of Brahms, a less impressive reading, lacking not in sincerity, but in complete understanding and translation.

At Town Hall in the afternoon a young pianist, Ralph Wolfe, Juilliard graduate and lately returned from professional activity abroad, gave his debut recital with works of Haydn, Beethoven (the Appassionata), Brahms, and Chopin. Mr. Wolfe is primarily a poet. His fingers are as sensitive as his mind, and sometimes he permits his feeling to push tradition from the keyboard. Such mannerisms as he has acquired come obviously from complete absorption in his work, and many of the liberties he takes with tempo and phrasing are logical and beautiful in themselves.

Another concert for children by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch drew a houseful of little people to Carnegie Hall yesterday morning, to hear about the trumpet, the flute and the clarinet in particular and to listen with tremendous enthusiasm to the Rienzi Overture by Wagner, the Dance of the Toy Flutes from Tschaikowsky's Nutcracker Suite, Gluck's Dance of the Blessed from "Orpheus" and Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody. As usual the children manifested their pleasure at the conclusion by a snow-storm of programs and paper in the air.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
NOV 25 1928

Miaskovsky's eighth symphony, not yet heard here, will be played by the Boston Symphony on its Boston programs of next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, with Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, conducting. The other numbers are Glinka's "Russian" overture and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
NOV 26 192

Other Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's first visit of the season closed Saturday afternoon with a remarkably fine performance in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the first half of this program to the moderns but sent his audience home with the beauties of Brahms ringing in their heads and hearts. This was the masterpiece of the afternoon, although those who love Debussy were, for once, fully satisfied with the shimmering sunshine, the opalescent coloring, the veiled half-lights and the exquisite wistfulness of the Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."

In the first number on the program, the young Russian, Prokofieff, set out to play with Mozart in what he called his "Classical" Symphony, but in the end one feels that he failed to capture the "simple" melodies of that great singer of haunting tunes.

Stravinsky was represented by an orchestral suite from the ever popular ballet, "Petrouchka." It was played with the fine attention to detail and The great art of Mr. Koussevitzky and his men, but one kept picturing the dancing figures of this ballet, as the music does not seem quite adequate in itself. The Brahms Second Symphony was unmistakably the "hero" of the afternoon. Surely, the color and eloquence of this score, which has strangely been called "gray," was never more beautifully displayed. Its performance, under the baton of this member of our great triumvirate of conductors, was one long to be remembered for its noble simplicity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
NOV 25 1928

Boston Orchestra Plays in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by the dynamic Serge Koussevit, gave its opening concert in Brooklyn for the season at the Academy of Music Friday night. The excellent body of musicians comprising the orchestra was under remarkable control by their brilliant conductor and the program was rendered with perfect musical unison.

The beautiful melody flowed with facility from the players, while the conductor seemed to contain within him the force that unloosed the music upon the air.

The program contained Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" Op. 25; and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major."

The audience greeted the conductor and the audience with warm enthusiasm from the beginning of the evening and after the completion of the performance, they remained to applaud again and again the excellent recital.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL
NOV 26 1928

Farrar, Heyner and Koussevitzky in Concerts

Geraldine Farrar, in a gown of silver-lace sufficiently waist-lined and long enough to make her look like a charming gray lady of the turn of the century, gave a song recital yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The house was packed with the Gerryflappers of another generation, many of them now as gray as the idol herself.

From Miss Farrar's programme, no one could have guessed that she was ever a star of the opera. She sang songs of Schubert and Schumann, Scarlatti and Mozart and a miscellany of other matters, all in her new manner. This implies a new care and a new skill in the handling of her voice, and actually a new placement of the voice itself.

The result, as at her re-emergence last season, was a gentle and winning art in the singing of songs. This year her voice seemed to have gained a little in power and resonance in certain parts of the mezzo range, but her present method precludes much articulation and more often than not therefore, it was difficult to understand the words of her songs. Nor did her interpretative abilities get very far beneath their surface.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday presented half a programme of modern music and the other half of Brahms—the Second Symphony. The first half consisted of Serge Prokofieff's "classical" symphony, a self-conscious exercise in older forms, well played by the conductor; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," baldly distorted, and Igor Stravinsky's "Petroushka," also over-dramatized.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
NOV 25 1928

Boston Symphony Sale Opens To-morrow

In all liklihood, all seats for the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence will be subscribed by the season, when the subscription sale begins to-morrow morning at Steinert's. A few desirable seats were released at the time of the subscription renewals last spring, but for these there have been numerous applications.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season a week from next Tuesday, Dec. 4, in the Albee Theatre. The remaining dates are Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26.

In the two months now past of the orchestra's 48th season, there have been a succession of brilliant performances which promise that this ,the fifth season of Koussevitzky in America, will be the finest of them all. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a very limited travelling schedule, since most of its time is taken in rehearsal and since the concerts in Boston have been increased by public demand to 67. In fact the only series outside of Greater Boston are those in New York, Brooklyn and Providence. In New York, all seats are re-engaged and there is a long waiting list from season to season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD
NOV 26 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

In the decade since it was first heard here, Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" was found to have lost none of its cameo-like charm when performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The Mozartean spirit of the work was admirably captured, and there could hardly have been an improvement in rhythmic infectousness, spontaniety or precision.

A sluggardly rendition of Debussy's "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" was peculiarly lacking in atmosphere and quite primly Bostonian. If Mr. Koussevitzky's handling of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" paled beside Toscanini's memorable interpretation, it was none the less filled with many graphically vivid and picturesque details. The "Nurses' Dance" was especially delectable for its clever treatment of rich sonorities and happily chosen tempo. And the section named after the hero is seldom so brilliantly given, due in large measure to the exceptionally fine playing of the orchestra's pianist. The second symphony of Brahms completed the program.

N. S.

230

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIMES

NOV 25 1928

A CONDUCTOR'S MUSICIANSHIP

Baseless Rumors Concerning Koussevitzky's Lack of Technical Knowledge Shown Absurd by Quality of His Performance

By OLIN DOWNES.

STORIES have been industriously circulated, and have persisted ever since Serge Koussevitzky came to America in the Fall of 1924 as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to the effect that this noted and experienced orchestra leader is unable to read a score. When Lincoln was informed that General Ulysses S. Grant was a drunkard, he replied that he wished more of his generals drank Grant's whisky. This writer would say, as regards Mr. Koussevitzky, that if he is unable to decipher and understand an orchestral partition, it is only a pity that there are not more conductors possessed of a similar abysmal ignorance. Mr. Koussevitzky, "unable to read a score," has performed more new music to the square inch in the four seasons he has spent in America than the leaders of any other great symphonic orchestra of the country, and he has brought the Boston orchestra back to its old-time splendor.

It would be interesting to know the methods of a conductor who performs so much new music so frequently, when he is possessed of Mr. Koussevitzky's disabilities. Does he simply watch the players, during the concert, move the stick in a way to synchronize with the rhythms of the players and make the occasional gesture that deceives the gullible audience? Is it sheer quickness and instinct and bluff with him? Sitting in the audience you would really think that you were listening to a man who knew his business.

***

As those supposed to have access to much confidential and accurate information, we have been favored with the true explanation of Mr. Koussevitzky's methods and success with the new scores that he produces with so much apparent confidence and aplomb. Long before the rehearsals of the new works begin, according to our informant, he has two bright young men come to his study and play the music for him, over and over again, four hands, on the piano. These young men are very clever. The conductor searched far and wide to secure them, and maintains their services and their discretion at a prodigious cost to himself. They can read scores if Mr. Koussevitzky cannot. It does not matter if he is performing a new work from manuscript. These young phenomenons simply place the manuscript on the piano rack, dividing the burden of the impromptu transcription in such a way as to equalize the parts between the player who plays upper parts and the player who plays the bass. They do this at sight, meanwhile explaining to the attentive and perspicacious conductor, as they go along, the details that he must look out for when he confronts the orchestra. Then, when Koussevitzky is letter-perfect in his knowledge, and not before, he puts the new work into rehearsal. Even then strange and disconcerting things happen. It is known by those close to Mr. Koussevitzky that although he has been for years an internationally famous virtuoso of the double-bass, and although his intonation has never been criticized, he really has no ear. If a false note is sounded, even, say, by such a prominent instrument as a solo horn, he is unaware of it unless some member of the orchestra calls it to his attention. Thereupon, much confused and very humble, Mr. Koussevitzky begs the orchestra to start once more at letter "P" and assures them that he will be more vigilant in the future.

These, then, are the methods by which he keeps up a front and continues to mislead the public and the critics, who wouldn't know an orchestral score from the side of a barn door if they saw one. Those two young men of Mr. Koussevitzky's, as can be seen, work very hard, since they have to do the score-reading that the conductor should be able to do for himself from pages in the composer's scrambled or illegible handwriting, or from the orchestral partitions of new publications, which are very seldom issued simultaneously in orchestral and piano arrangement.

***

Even so, it is evident that without a faculty of the most amazing and instantaneous assimilation Mr. Koussevitzky could not keep his important position. Of course, he learns very rapidly as he goes on with the rehearsals. Once his assistants have tactfully acquainted him with the thematic material of his score and pounded the tempi into his head, the orchestra can be relied upon to do most of the real work that remains of preparation. The results secured are amazing. When the concert takes place, lo and behold! the orchestra plays with a sureness, a balance of the choirs, a precision of accent and nicety of shading, a proportion of the inner parts, a variety of color and elasticity of pace that to secure in any like measure most conductors would have to understand every note of the score. But that is Koussevitzky, strange mixture of virtuosity, magnetism and ignorance, whose orchestra performs with such apparent brilliancy and precision and whose concerts are sold out long in advance of his appearance.

It may not be believed that such charges and explanations as those recorded would be made by supposedly serious and intelligent people—people, moreover, who are in many cases acquainted with the outline of Mr. Koussevitzky's career and reputation. But these things have been said time and again by those who should know better, in the writer's hearing. It is not necessary to defend Mr. Koussevitzky by refuting them. They are mentioned rather as an interesting example of the manner in which whispering campaigns may be persistently pursued and statements without logic or fact to sustain them be given circulation. Such rumors and gossip gain ready credence with large numbers of people, wherever human beings congregate, but they are especially rife, and seem to fall upon particularly susceptible ears, in circles that busy themselves with the musical art and its manifestations. The same people who were ready for reasons of their own to pass on amusing and obviously inaccurate misinformation were in most cases fully aware that before he became a conductor Koussevitzky was the greatest of living double-bass players, and one who, in addition to his sensational appearances as a soloist, had himself played for years in orchestras. They knew that in a modest way he was a composer, liable to possess the knowledge of the elements of an orchestral score which is part of the composer's accumulation. They could also have ascertained, if they did not already know, that in his boyhood Mr. Koussevitzky had taken full courses, which included theory and score-reading, and in which he graduated with honors from the Ecole Philharmonique of Moscow, before he had entered his twenties. Every fact of his life, and, to the reasonable and unprejudiced person, every characteristic of his programs and his conducting would contradict the monumentally absurd supposition that in his particularly chosen field the conductor had less knowledge of his business than a musical trifler or dilettante on vacation.

But so it is, in this vale of tears. We can console ourselves with the facts of Mr. Koussevitzky's accomplishment, and the orchestra which now, under his guidance, plays so magnificently. Saying this, and reiterating the absurdity of certain rumors, it is not necessary to agree unqualifiedly with Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations. This writer finds him a leader of extraordinary temperament, orchestral control and imagination, if also, at times, of unconventional and unpredictable ideas of musical exposition. But Mr. Koussevitzky has a right, and a better right than most, to his conclusions about his interpretations, and the proof of his power is found in the vividness, force and color of his performances with the superb band that he has made the sensitive and almost infallible vehicle of his inspiration.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 25 1928

Boston Orchestra Program Scintillant Under Koussevitsky

Prokofieff Symphony Played With Charm and Verve in Matinee at Carnegie

The matinee performance yesterday at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky offered no novelties, but the program were at least three of the works which the distinguished conductor from New England plays superlatively well. The first of these, Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony has a unique, ingratiating and scintilant charm which Koussevitzky captures adroitly upon his baton with sympathetic genius. The Debussy Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" followed, played with balance and exceptional tonal beauty, somewhat over sentimentalized and drawn out in tempo. The "Petrouschka" Suite was also brilliantly presented, with wit and masterly assemblage of color and light.

The program concluded with the Second Symphony of Brahms, a less impressive reading, lacking not in sincerity, but in complete understanding and translation.

At Town Hall in the afternoon a young pianist, Ralph Wolfe, Juilliard graduate and lately returned from professional activity abroad, gave his debut recital with works of Haydn, Beethoven (the Appassionata), Brahms, and Chopin. Mr. Wolfe is primarily a poet. His fingers are as sensitive as his mind, and sometimes he permits his feeling to push tradition from the keyboard. Such mannerisms as he has acquired come obviously from complete absorption in his work, and many of the liberties he takes with tempo and phrasing are logical and beautiful in themselves.

Another concert for children by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch drew a houseful of little people to Carnegie Hall yesterday morning, to hear about the trumpet, the flute and the clarinet in particular and to listen with tremendous enthusiasm to the Rienzi Overture by Wagner, the Dance of the Toy Flutes from Tschaikowsky's Nutcracker Suite, Gluck's Dance of the Blessed from "Orpheus" and Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody. As usual the children manifested their pleasure at the conclusion by a snow-storm of programs and paper in the air.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CITIZEN
BROOKLYN

NOV 25 1928

Boston Orchestra Plays in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by the dynamic Serge Koussevit, gave its opening concert in Brooklyn for the season at the Academy of Music Friday night. The excellent body of musicians comprising the orchestra was under remarkable control by their brilliant conductor and the program was rendered with perfect musical unison.

The beautiful melody flowed with facility from the players, while the conductor seemed to contain within him the force that unloosed the music upon the air.

The program contained Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" Op. 25; and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major."

The audience greeted the conductor and the audience with warm enthusiasm from the beginning of the evening and after the completion of the performance, they remained to applaud again and again the excellent recital.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

NOV 25 1928

Boston Symphony Sale Opens To-morrow

In all liklihood, all seats for the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence will be subscribed by the season, when the subscription sale begins to-morrow morning at Steinert's. A few desirable seats were released at the time of the subscription renewals last spring, but for these there have been numerous applications.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Providence season a week from next Tuesday, Dec. 4, in the Albee Theatre. The remaining dates are Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26.

In the two months now past of the orchestra's 48th season, there have been a succession of brilliant performances which promise that this ,the fifth season of Koussevitzky in America, will be the finest of them all. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a very limited travelling schedule, since most of its time is taken in rehearsal and since the concerts in Boston have been increased by public demand to 67. In fact the only series outside of Greater Boston are those in New York, Brooklyn and Providence. In New York, all seats are re-engaged and there is a long waiting list from season to season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 25 1928

Miaskovsky's eighth symphony, not yet heard here, will be played by the Boston Symphony on its Boston programs of next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, with Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, conducting. The other numbers are Glinka's "Russian" overture and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, with Rudolph Ganz as soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL

NOV 25 1928

Farrar, Heyner and Koussevitzky in Concerts

Geraldine Farrar, in a gown of silver-lace sufficiently waist-lined and long enough to make her look like a charming gray lady of the turn of the century, gave a song recital yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The house was packed with the Garryflappers of another generation, many of them now as gray as the idol herself.

From Miss Farrar's programme, no one could have guessed that she was ever a star of the opera. She sang songs of Schubert and Schumann, Scarlatti and Mozart and a miscellany of other matters, all in her new manner. This implies a new care and a new skill in the handling of her voice, and actually a new placement of the voice itself.

The result, as at her re-emergence last season, was a gentle and winning art in the singing of songs. This year her voice seemed to have gained a little in power and resonance in certain parts of the mezzo range, but her present method precludes much articulation and more often than not, therefore, it was difficult to understand the words of her songs. Nor did her interpretative abilities get very far beneath their surface.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday presented half a programme of modern music and the other half of Brahms—the Second Symphony. The first half consisted of Serge Prokofieff's "classical" symphony, a self-conscious exercise in older forms, well played by the conductor; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," baldly distorted, and Igor Stravinsky's "Petroushka," also over-dramatized.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST

NOV 26 192

Other Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's first visit of the season closed Saturday afternoon with a remarkably fine performance in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the first half of this program to the moderns but sent his audience home with the beauties of Brahms ringing in their heads and hearts. This was the masterpiece of the afternoon, although those who love Debussy were, for once, fully satisfied with the shimmering sunshine, the opalescent coloring, the veiled half-lights and the exquisite wistfulness of the Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."

In the first number on the program, the young Russian, Prokofieff, set out to play with Mozart in what he called his "Classical" Symphony, but in the end one feels that he failed to capture the "simple" melodies of that great singer of haunting tunes.

Stravinsky was represented by an orchestral suite from the ever popular ballet, "Petrouchka." It was played with the fine attention to detail and The great art of Mr. Koussevitzky and his men, but one kept picturing the dancing figures of this ballet, as the music does not seem quite adequate in itself. The Brahms Second Symphony was unmistakably the "hero" of the afternoon. Surely, the color and eloquence of this score, which has strangely been called "gray," was never more beautifully displayed. Its performance, under the baton of this member of our great triumvirate of conductors, was one long to be remembered for its noble simplicity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD

NOV 26 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

In the decade since it was first heard here, Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" was found to have lost none of its cameo-like charm when performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The Mozartean spirit of the work was admirably captured, and there could hardly have been an improvement in rhythmic infectousness, spontaniety or precision.

A sluggardly rendition of Debussy's "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" was peculiarly lacking in atmosphere and quite primly Bostonian. If Mr. Koussevitzky's handling of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" paled beside Toscanini's memorable interpretation, it was none the less filled with many graphically vivid and picturesque details. The "Nurses' Dance" was especially delectable for its clever treatment of rich sonorities and happily chosen tempo. And the section named after the hero is seldom so brilliantly given, due in large measure to the exceptionally fine playing of the orchestra's pianist. The second symphony of Brahms completed the program.

N. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN
NOV 26 192[illegible]

Boston Symphony Gives Matinee Concert

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, took place on Saturday at Carnegie Hall. The program, divided between modern and classic music, contained Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Debussey's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka" and Brahms's symphony No. 2, D major. There was no work listed which called for comment.

Mr. Koussevitzky is always an ardent enthusiast in his readings of his compatriots, Prokofieff and Stravinsky, and his performance Saturday of their two works—the symphony attemptingg "to catch the spirit of Mozart," and the pathetic tragic music of the puppet "Petrouchka," was altogether masterful for grace, clarity and accentuation, and again for rhythms with gorgeous coloring. The Bostonians played likewise Debussey's langurous and sensuous "Faun" prelude in matchless fashion, and soared to heights of tonal opulence and forceful treatment in Brahms's second. Mr. Koussevitzky shared the flattering plaudits of a crowded house with his orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 2 [illegible]

The First Movement of the Symphony

Koussevitzky Comes Down from Boston Next Tuesday With Some Familiar Scores and a Novelty to Open the Providence Series

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

PART ONE

Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72.
Debussy—"Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune."
Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Prokofieff—"Classical," Symphony, Op. 25.
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte
IV. Finale

PART TWO

Brahms—Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

A substantial program, for the most part familiar, will be offered at the first Providence concert if the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, taking place at the E. F. Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

There is little need to speak at length about Beethoven's great overture, as it is perfectly familiar to all who have formed the symphony orchestra habit. Written for the performance of "Fidelio" in 1806, it seemed somehow to have created an impression of top-heaviness, and so got itself placed between the first and the second act, where it "became at once a remembrance and a prophecy."

Just why Beethoven wrote three overtures to his one and only opera he alone can tell. Critics have advanced various reasons, one as bad as another; but since we know that the music is good, we should not mind the ravings of the sophists.

Of No. 2, someone in Beethoven's day wrote: "The most grotesque modulations, in truly ghastly harmony, follow one another throughout the piece; and the few trivial ideas that there are—which, however, are carefully guarded from anything like nobility, as, for instance, a post horn solo, doubtless referring to the arrival of the governor—complete the disagreeable and deafening impression."

The most censorious of present day scribes would hardly express himself so harshly, and, if he did, no music lover would pay any attention to him.

The Faun Recollects.

Extravagant things have been said of Debussy; he has been called "the prophet of a new dispensation," we are told that "he weaves a hesitant mysticism into designs of impalpable and iridescent beauty . . . at once luminous and esoteric, importunate and profound." No doubt in the case of "The Afternoon of a Faun" Mallarme's poem stimulates the "sublimal consciousness" to some advantage. This prelude is based on that poet's "eclogue," and is rhapsodical in form and elusive in content.

Of it Edmund Gosse has written: "A faun—a simple, sensuous, passionate being—wakens in the forest at daybreak and tries to recall his experience of the previous afternoon. Was he the fortunate recipient of an actual visit from nymphs, white and golden goddesses, divinely tender and indulgent? Or is the memory he seems to retain nothing but the shadow of a vision, no more substantial than the 'arid rain' of notes from his own flute? He cannot tell.

"Yet surely there was, surely there is, an animal whiteness among the brown reeds of the lake that shines out yonder. Were they, are they swans? No. But Naiads plunging? Perhaps! Vague and vaguer grows the impression of this delicious experience. He would resign his woodland godship to retain it. A garden of lilies, golden-headed, white-stalked, behind the trellis of red roses? Ah! the effect is too great for his poor brain. Perhaps if he selects one lily from the garth of lilies, one benign and beneficent yielder of her cup to thirsty lips, the memory, the ever receding memory may be forced back. So, when he has glutted upon a bunch of grapes he is wont to toss the empty skins into the air and blow them out in a visionary greediness.

"But, no; the delicious hour grows vaguer; experience or dream, he will never known which it was. The sun is warm, the grass is yielding; and he curls himself up again, after worshiping the efficacious star of wine, that he may pursue the dubious ecstacy into the more hopeful boskages of sleep."

The Fearful Russian

Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony is new to Providence, although she is acquainted with both the man and his music, having heard him play his own piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and later that orchestra play his diabolical Ballet Suite, "Chout" Opus 21, a wonderful and fearful thing, signifying—what it signifies.

"The chief feature of his music, especially up to Opus 20 or so, is that it asserts a firm will; no passion, but a uniform terseness, continuos and almost mechanical. No shadows, no vagueness, but definite lines, sharp contours, clearly defined plans. The rhythms are always well marked. Prokofieff invents no new rhythmic formulae, but proceeds by constant repetition of a figure. The themes are usually short, but pregnant and plastic. The harmonies are crude and at times brutal; he uses polytonality systematically. His form is clear and logical. In many respects his musical temperament comes near to that of the classics—especially of Scarlatti. Of late his style has become more mellow, his melodies are more abundant and broader."

Brahms' Symphony in D Major, Opus 73, was last played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 15, 1927. The composer has run the gauntlet of both praise and blame so often that now both the offence and defence are weary enough to desist and let the listener form and enjoy his own opinion, which is incidentally more often favorable than otherwise.

A general favorite with conductors, the Second Symphony is a graceful, lyric composition as contrasted with the heroics of the First, which it followed in rapid order. The fanciful nature of the Second made it not immediately successful with its audiences, and the gravity of the second movement brought particular boredom.

Launching immediately into its theme, the first movement is forwarded suavely, although moments are vigorous enough. The concluding passage, however, has been thought by some critics one of the most magical Brahms left for us.

The adagio is occasionally found dull, for its beauty—and beauty it is—is unsmiling and dignified. The third movement, its chief theme almost a folk song, is an allegretto in Brahms's most popular manner, substituted for the traditional scherzo. A triumphant finale, rich in robust power, is developed from a calm beginning in the strings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS
NOV 2 3 192[illegible]

each, and [illegible]

BOSTONIAN'S NIGHT OFF

Philip Hale has been dramatic and music critic of the Boston Herald for many years. He had not been in New York for 15 years until a few days ago. As he was spending only one night in Gotham, picking his single entertainment proved a nice problem.

He chose the Boston symphony concert at Carnegie Hall.—Variety.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
NOV 2 6 192[illegible]

SYMPHONY CARDS FOR STUDENTS READY

The R. I. Federation of Music Clubs, Miss Virginia Boyd Anderson, president, announces that the student cards for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are now ready for distribution. Following are the rules governing the use of the tickets:

The holder of the card must be studying at the present time and be vouched for by his or her music teacher. The student using a Federation student card must not have reached his or her 25th birthday before applying to the committee. These cards are redeemable for seats on the day of each concert at the office of Caesar Misch, Inc., 400 Westminster street from 9 a. m. to 5:30 p. m.

The cards may be had by applying to the Student seat committee—Miss Evangeline Larry, 17 Conrad building, and Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke, 40 Everett avenue. This privilege is extended to the st[illegible] of music in Rh[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 2 8 192[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY

begun its forty-eighth season with begun ites forty-eighth season with successes which indicate one of the most brilliant years in the orchestra's history. The season's concerts include an appearance in Hartford on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

The orchestra opened its New York concerts Thursday and Saturday last week. Serge Koussevitsky is introducing with these appearances Stravinsky's latest score, "Appolo, Leader of the Muses," which he gave its first concert performance in Boston in October.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

The ticket sale for the Hartford concert is now in progress, and mail orders are being filled. Frank A. Sedgwick announces that reservations also can be made, and the tickets will be held until January 15, thereby giving an opportunity to patrons of securing choice locations of seats. Reservations may be made by telephoning 2-2251 or calling at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDAN, CONN.
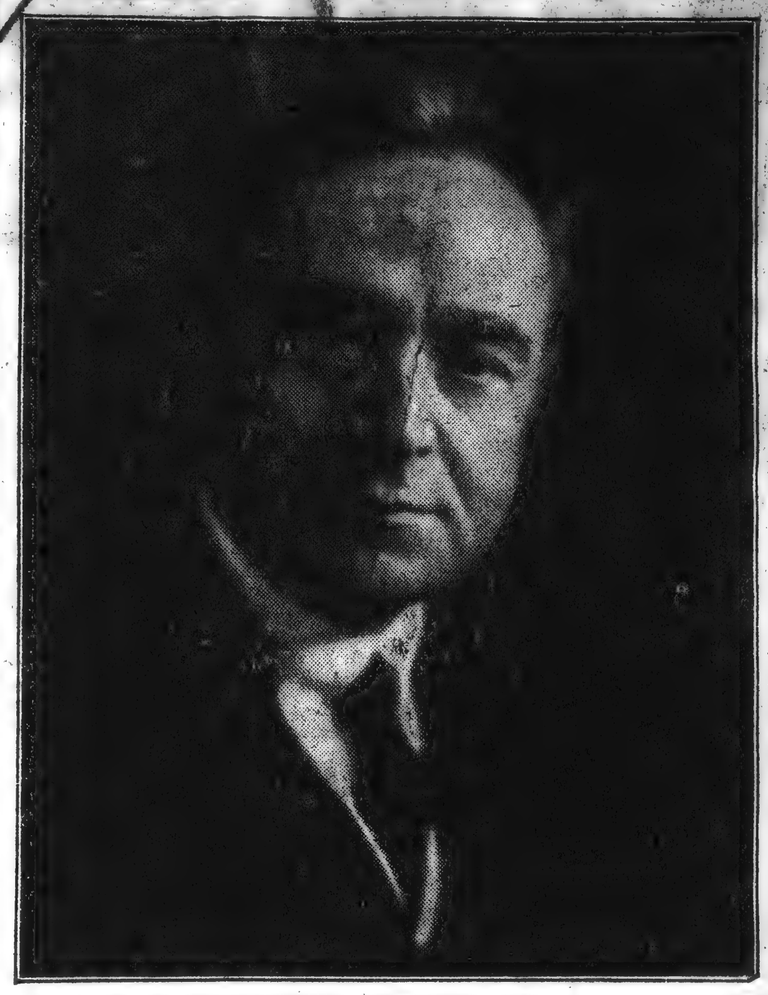
RECORD
NOV 29 1928

31



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Coming To Hartford

The Boston Symphony orchestra begins its forty-eight season with successes which indicate one of the most brilliant years in the orchestra's history. The season's concerts include an appearance in Hartford on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

The orchestra opened its New York concerts Thursday and Saturday last week. Serge Koussevitzky is introducing with these appearances Stravinsky's latest score, "Appolo, Leader of the Muses," which he gave its first concert performance in Boston in October.

The ticket sale for the Hartford concert is now in progress, and mail orders are being filled. Frank A. Sedgwick announces that reservations also can be made, and the tickets will be held until January 15, thereby giving an opportunity to patrons of securing choice locations of seats. Reservations may be made by telephoning 2-2251 or calling at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
NOV 3 0 192[illegible]

Student Cards Ready For Music Clubs Federation

The Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, Miss Virginia Boyd Anderson, president, announces that the student cards for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are now ready for distribution. Following are the rules which govern the use of the cards: The holder must be studying at the present time and be vouched for by his or her music teacher. The student using a Federation card must not have reached his or her 25th birthday before applying to the committee.

These cards are redeemable on for seats on the day of each concert at the offices of the Caesar Misch, Inc., 400 Westminster st., from 9 a.m. to 5.30 p.m. The cards may be had by applying to the Student Seat Committee—Miss Evangeline Larry, 17 Conrad building, and Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke, 40 Everett avenue.

This privilege is extended to the students of music through the courtesy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs through whose cooperation it has been made possible for several seasons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN

NOV 26 1928

Boston Symphony Gives Matinee Concert

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, took place on Saturday at Carnegie Hall. The program, divided between modern and classic music, contained Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Debussey's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrouchka" and Brahms's symphony No. 2, D major. There was no work listed which called for comment.

Mr. Koussevitzky is always an ardent enthusiast in his readings of his compatriots, Prokofieff and Stravinsky, and his performance Saturday of their two works—the symphony attemptingg "to catch the spirit of Mozart," and the pathetic tragic music of the puppet "Petrouchka," was altogether masterful for grace, clarity and accentuation, and again for rhythms with gorgeous coloring. The Bostonians played likewise Debussey's langurous and sensuous "Faun" prelude in matchless fashion, and soared to heights of tonal opulence and forceful treatment in Brahms's second. Mr. Koussevitzky shared the flattering plaudits of a crowded house with his orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 2

The First Movement of the Symphony

Koussevitzky Comes Down from Boston Next Tuesday With Some Familiar Scores and a Novelty to Open the Providence Series

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

PART ONE

Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72.
Debussy—"Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune."
Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Prokofieff—"Classical," Symphony, Op. 25.
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte
IV. Finale

PART TWO

Brahms—Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
111. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

A substantial program, for the most part familiar, will be offered at the first Providence concert if the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, taking place at the E. F. Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

There is little need to speak at length about Beethoven's great overture, as it is perfectly familiar to all who have formed the symphony orchestra habit. Written for the performance of "Fidelio" in 1806, it seemed somehow to have created an impression of topheaviness, and so got itself placed between the first and the second act, where it "became at once a remembrance and a prophecy."

Just why Beethoven wrote three overtures to his one and only opera he alone can tell. Critics have advanced various reasons, one as bad as another; but since we know that the music is good, we should not mind the ravings of the sophists.

Of No. 2, someone in Beethoven's day wrote: "The most grotesque modulations, in truly ghastly harmony, follow one another throughout the piece; and the few trivial ideas that there are —which, however, are carefully guarded from anything like nobility, as, for instance, a post horn solo, doubtless referring to the arrival of the governor—complete the disagreeable and deafening impression."

The most censorious of present day scribes would hardly express himself so harshly, and, if he did, no music lover would pay any attention to him.

The Faun Recollects.

Extravagant things have been said of Debussy; he has been called "the prophet of a new dispensation," we are told that "he weaves a hesitant mysticism into designs of impalpable and iridescent beauty . . . at once luminous and esoteric, importunate and profound." No doubt in the case of "The Afternoon of a Faun" Mallarme's poem stimulates the "sublimal consciousness" to some advantage. This prelude is based on that poet's "eclogue," and is rhapsodical in form and elusive in content.

Of it Edmund Gosse has written: "A faun—a simple, sensuous, passionate being—wakens in the forest at daybreak and tries to recall his experience of the previous afternoon. Was he the fortunate recipient of an actual visit from nymphs, white and golden goddesses, divinely tender and indulgent? Or is the memory he seems to retain nothing but the shadow of a vision, no more substantial than the 'arid rain' of notes from his own flute? He cannot tell.

"Yet surely there was, surely there is, an animal whiteness among the brown reeds of the lake that shines out yonder. Were they, are they swans? No. But Naiads plunging? Perhaps! Vague and vaguer grows the impression of this delicious experience. He would resign his woodland godship to retain it. A garden of lilies, golden-headed, white-stalked, behind the trellis of red roses? Ah! the effect is too great for his poor brain. Perhaps if he selects one lily from the garth of lilies, one benign and beneficent yielder of her cup to thirsty lips, the memory, the ever receding memory may be forced back. So, when he has glutted upon a bunch of grapes he is wont to toss the empty skins into the air and blow them out in a visionary freediness.

"But, no; the delicious hour grows vaguer; experience or dream, he will never known which it was. The sun is warm, the grass is yielding; and he curls himself up again, after worshiping the efficacious star of wine, that he may pursue the dubious ecstacy into the more hopeful boskages of sleep."

The Fearful Russian

Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony is new to Providence, although she is acquainted with both the man and his music, having heard him play his own piano concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and later that orchestra play his diabolical Ballet Suite, "Chout" Opus 21, a wonderful and fearful thing, signifying—what it signifies.

"The chief feature of his music, especially up to Opus 20 or so, is that it asserts a firm will; no passion, but a uniform terseness, continuos and almost mechanical. No shadows, no vagueness, but definite lines, sharp contours, clearly defined plans. The rhythms are always well marked. Prokofieff invents no new rhythmic formulae, but proceeds by constant repetition of a figure. The themes are usually short, but pregnant and plastic. The harmonies are crude and at times brutal; he uses polytonality systematically. His form is clear and logical. In many respects his musical temperament comes near to that of the classics—especially of Scarlatti. Of late his style has become more mellow, his melodies are more abundant and broader."

Brahms' Symphony in D Major, Opus 73, was last played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 15, 1927. The composer has run the gauntlet of both praise and blame so often that now both the offence and defence are weary enough to desist and let the listener form and enjoy his own opinion, which is incidentally more often favorable than otherwise.

A general favorite with conductors, the Second Symphony is a graceful, lyric composition as contrasted with the heroics of the First, which it followed in rapid order. The fanciful nature of the Second made it not immediately successful with its audiences, and the gravity of the second movement brought particular boredom.

Launching immediately into its theme, the first movement is forwarded suavely, although moments are vigorous enough. The concluding passage, however, has been thought by some critics one of the most magical Brahms left for us.

The adagio is occasionally found dull, for its beauty—and beauty it is—is unsmiling and dignified. The third movement, its chief theme almost a folk song, is an allegretto in Brahms's most popular manner, substituted for the traditional scherzo. A triumphant finale, rich in robust power, is developed from a calm beginning in the strings.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS

NOV 3 1928

each, and ...

BOSTONIAN'S NIGHT OFF

Philip Hale has been dramatic and music critic of the Boston Herald for many years. He had not been in New York for 15 years until a few days ago. As he was spending only one night in Gotham, picking his single entertainment proved a nice problem.

He chose the Boston symphony concert at Carnegie Hall.—Variety.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

NOV

SYMPHONY CARDS FOR STUDENTS READY

The R. I. Federation of Music Clubs, Miss Virginia Boyd Anderson, president, announces that the student cards for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are now ready for distribution. Following are the rules governing the use of the tickets:

The holder of the card must be studying at the present time and be vouched for by his or her music teacher. The student using a Federation student card must not have reached his or her 25th birthday before applying to the committee. These cards are redeemable for seats on the day of each concert at the office of Caesar Misch, Inc., 400 Westminster street from 9 a. m. to 5:30 p. m.

The cards may be had by applying to the Student seat committee—Miss Evangeline Larry, 17 Conrad building, and Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke, 40 Everett avenue. This privilege is extended to the students of music in Rhode Island by the courtesy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the R. I. Federation of Music Clubs through whose co-operation it has been made possible for several seasons.

Inc Drug

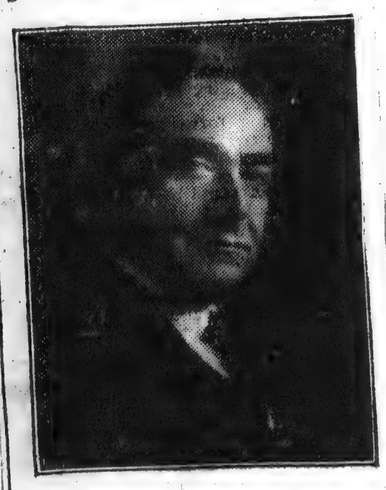
The orchestra ... concerts Thursday and Saturday last week. Serge Koussevitsky is introducing with these appearances Stravinsky's latest score, "Appolo, Leader of the Muses," which he gave its first concert performance in Boston in October.

The ticket sale for the Hartford concert is now in progress, and mail orders are being filled. Frank A. Sedgwick announces that reservations also can be made, and the tickets will be held until January 15, thereby giving an opportunity to patrons of securing choice locations of seats. Reservations may be made by telephoning 2-2251, or calling at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street.



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MERIDAN, CONN.
RECORD

NOV 29 1928

31

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Coming To Hartford

The Boston Symphony orchestra begins its forty-eight season with successes which indicate one of the most brilliant years in the orchestra's history. The season's concerts include an appearance in Hartford on Sunday afternoon, February 3.

The orchestra opened its New York concerts Thursday and Saturday last week. Serge Koussevitzky is introducing with these appearances Stravinsky's latest score, "Appolo, Leader of the Muses," which he gave its first concert performance in Boston in October.

The ticket sale for the Hartford concert is now in progress, and mail orders are being filled. Frank A. Sedgwick announces that reservations also can be made, and the tickets will be held until January 15, thereby giving an opportunity to patrons of securing choice locations of seats. Reservations may be made by telephoning 2-2251 or calling at McCoy's music store, No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

NOV 3 0

Student Cards Ready For Music Clubs Federation

The Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs, Miss Virginia Boyd Anderson, president, announces that the student cards for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are now ready for distribution. Following are the rules which govern the use of the cards: The holder must be studying at the present time and be vouched for by his or her music teacher. The student using a Federation card must not have reached his or her 25th birthday before applying to the committee.

These cards are redeemable on for seats on the day of each concert at the offices of the Caesar Misch, Inc., 400 Westminster st., from 9 a.m. to 5.30 p.m. The cards may be had by applying to the Student Seat Committee — Miss Evangeline Larry, 17 Conrad building, and Mrs. Agnes Coutanche Burke, 40 Everett avenue.

This privilege is extended to the students of music through the courtesy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Rhode Island Federation of Music Clubs through whose cooperation it has been made possible for several seasons.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

32

S. DECEMBER 1, ny

New Symphony, Fresh Classics, And Mr. Burgin

TRANSCRIPT.

Concert Without Koussevitzky, Safeties, Sanities and Russian Intruder

EASTWARD the course of dullness takes its way. Time was when Germany was the birthplace of symphonies of large dimensions, thick texture, clouded contours, involved, semi-articulate speech. In homesick moments even Dr. Muck proffered them; they are to be found among Mr. Fiedler's "novelties"; may be detected in the earlier records of the Symphony Concerts. Nowadays the younger Germans have sloughed away such accumulations of adipose tonal tissue. Hindemith, Toch, Jarnach, write as stripped and lean music as the most convinced modernist could desire. Their elders have learned lucidity from Strauss, obviousness from Puccini. Thick-woven as are Schrecker's scores, more than a little "comes through." To Russia has passed the vanished German practice, and in Moscow or Leningrad middle-aged composers still fatten symphonies. Glazunov set them the fashion, taught and encouraged it. Rakhmaninov, with many a German predilection, is not guiltless. Skriabin, though of different mettle from the other two, wrote no stripped scores. While we foreigners admired the bald Musorgsky, the next composing generation in Russia had no mind to walk in his ways. For it the bare Balakirev and the luminous Rimsky are no better than old masters in the history-books. Only Chaikovsky is tolerable—less for substance or procedure than for morbid, dolorous mood.

Instead, there is, for one, Miaskovsky, whose Eighth Symphony and whose only Symphony known to Boston, was played yesterday at the Symphony Concert. It is longish, filling three-quarters of an hour, putting aside nothing in the four movements of convention. It is scored abundantly—woodwinds in threes, six horns, complementary brass and percussion, proportionate strings. Miaskovsky is prolific in the invention and the division of themes. The listener may even fancy that a catalogue, from this Eighth Symphony, would be nearly as long as the list of motivs in "Die Walküre." Miaskovsky develops his "subjects" tirelessly; knows every device of the schools; cultivates procedures of his own; smothers at birth the rejecting or the self-critical impulse. His harmonic web runs in thick strands; he prefers grouped instruments to single, sharpened voices. He clouds sonorities; chokes moods or else obscures them in a perpetual restlessness. Through the thick wood it is hard to discover the thematic tree, much less to watch it sprouting; while upon the leafage blows hardly a wind of imagination or even fancy. As the hearer receives it in the concert-hall, he can hardly recall so eventless a Symphony, save here and there at the beginning or the end of a movement. It is as monotonous—to compare it with something equally close-woven—as the under side of a Brussels carpet.

A reason is not far to seek. Miaskovsky, the books say, is studious, solitary, self-absorbed. His is the composing temperament that writes paper-music. Scrutinize the score at leisure of this Eighth Symphony, and there is reason to praise it. The principal themes are significant and of musical worth. Miaskovsky develops, contrasts, interlaces them with no little fertility, in significant detail, by happy strokes. The dullest score-reader perceives the architectural faculty that rears large and intricate tonal structures, convolution upon convolution. He descries as well a composer who has thoroughly assimilated the orchestral medium. There are hints of bleak mood, occasional vistas down dimly lighted corridors of imagination.

In the instant commerce of the concert-hall these merits are nearly undiscoverable. The mind sits confused before such intricate patterns as those of the second and fourth movements; while the ear struggles in vain to pierce through these thick, tight surfaces to what may be the living heart of the music. The listener is baffled, bewildered, repulsed; soon wearies of the effort to understand; waits for the moment that may enlighten or stir; almost never finds it; rejects Miaskovsky of the Eighth as dull and of none effect, ponderous, plodding, obscure. By the evidence of the score, he has written a significant and individual music; but the imparting faculty is not in him. The absence of it denies his music revelation, character, event, life. He is not complacently platitudinous like the later Glazunov; he is not content with reverberation after the manner of Rakhmaninov. To music-paper he sets his thoughts and moods; and on paper they remain, notes and signs in black and white like the print of a book. The fault, the misfortune, is inaudibility, multiply, thicken, assort them as he may. There are adepts who say that most symphonies are better read than heard. Ten volumes of Miaskovsky await them.

It is easy to say that a more expert conductor than the substituting Burgin would have pulled apart and pointed up Miaskovsky's score, clarifying and intensifying it, as did Mr. Koussevitzky, the other day, with Sibelius's Third Symphony. Possibly, even probably, so far as sympathy with the Russian's half-veiled, half-articulate moods may go. Usually, however, Mr. Burgin's conducting suffers from no lack of understanding. He studies scores; penetrates them; is ready to transmit all that he finds within; while a willing orchestra awaits his bidding and a sympathetic audience lends him ear. He was as clear as the day with the intricate, changeful Dance of Salome out of Strauss's opera, missing no significant mood, overlooking no essential accent. He balanced adroitly the orchestral voices in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto; gave Mr. Ganz's piano-part just place and proportion; kept well the character of the whole as a full-wrought, free-spoken, ardent music.

Rather, Mr. Burgin's shortcoming is lack of energy in transmission. His beat misses tension and zest. To the orchestra it is polite invitation rather than urgent command. Mr. Burgin grasps the music before him, but fails to stimulate the men who are to be its voices. He sets it forth admirably; but he neither enlarges, enriches nor intensifies it upon the hearing ear and imagination. When he has such a masterful composer to aid as Beethoven or Strauss of yesterday, he succeeds well enough. When [illegible] or pull together the smears of Schrecker of last year, the task is beyond his powers.

Thus it was that the second part of the concert saved the day. After Miaskovsky, the first measures of Beethoven's Concerto sounded like an imperious call. The tense rhythms, the vigorous progress, the firm, candid matter beat home. Here were largeness and scope, freedom, plenty and power. Mr. Ganz's tone was not too dry. Clearly and boldly he struck out Beethoven's patterns; caught his improvising warmths; to the variations set a lighter, gentler hand. Orchestra and pianist wove their arabesques about the full-voiced melody of the slow movement; persuaded it from largeness to loftiness, from fervor to exaltation. At the transition into the Finale Mr. Ganz achieved a stirring instant of suspense; then caught and held the improvising vein through all the turns, twists and returns of the motivs. It is possible, even frequent, to play this "Emperor Concerto" as a grave and graven classic. Mr. Burgin and Mr. Ganz agreed to a rhapsodic and improvising voice. Beethoven gives them warrant.

In the Dance of Salome, there are erotic, even lascivious, measures. The whole is a conjuring of languorous or pulsing flesh, of wild or seductive motion, of carnal enticements and excitements, into the flashing and bejewelled tones, the whipping rhythms, the penetrating song of the modern orchestra in the hands of a master at prime. In any concert-hall of this broad land Salome's Dance may be heard and not a voice will demur. Rather the austerest livers, the sternest moralists, will clap the hands of pleasure. Like "Till Eulenspiegel," "Don Juan" or "Heldenleben," it is one of the Straussian classics, perdurable and hallowed. But set the Dance upon the stage as a part of the performance of the whole opera; entrust it to a dancer whose presence and movements wreck nearly every illusion of the music—and loud is the outcry. Then is Salome and the Dance of Salome the unspeakable, the forbidden thing. Some day, someone, with a smile about his lips and a twinkle in his eye, will catalogue our dear paradoxes of prohibitions. Why upon the French only should the good God have bestowed logical minds?

H. T. P.

Return of Mahler

Mr. Koussevitzky to Restore a Neglected Composer to the Symphony Concerts

AS report goes, Mr. Koussevitzky would restore both Mahler and Bruckner to the active repertory of the Symphony Concerts. Neither the one nor the other composer has been heard here since Dr. Muck's time because of the seated notion that though their Symphonies interest and impress half Europe, they make no appeal to American ears. Mr. Koussevitzky chooses to believe the contrary and to risk the test.

For beginning, a full hour of the Symphony Concerts next week will fall to "The Song of the Earth," symphony, as Mahler chose to call it, placed high among his work. Actually it is a setting for tenor, contralto and full orchestra of six songs from "The Chinese Flute," book of poems by the German Bethges. Three fall to each of the two voices. A symphonic prelude introduces them; symphonic interludes continue and join them; a symphonic postlude ends them. They diffuse an introspective, melancholy view of life, yet do not lack a biting humor. By common consent and many tests of performance the music is written with fine perception, keen sensibility, Latin lightness of hand. Mr. Meader of the Metropolitan Opera House and Mrs. Charles Cahier, both long practised in the piece, will be the singers.

BURGIN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe

Rudolph Ganz Soloist in Beethoven Concerto

Dec. 1

Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony Played for First Time Here

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony, conducted yesterday's Symphony concert. Mr Koussevitzky is taking a week's holiday to recuperate from the strain of the recent Pension Fund concert and the making of phonograph records, added to the schedule of concerts here and in New York. Rudolph Ganz was heard as soloist in Beethoven's Concerto in E flat for pianoforte. The Eighth Symphony of a prominent living composer, Nicolas Miaskovsky, was played for the first time in Boston. The familiar dance from Richard Strauss' "Salome" rounded out a curiously assorted program. There was very cordial applause for Mr Burgin and Mr Ganz.

Miaskovsky has been known here only by name. In Russia he is regarded as a composer of genius. His music has been played occasionally in recent seasons at orchestral concerts the world over. His Eighth Symphony, written in 1924, is a long and elaborate composition. If Tchaikovsky were living today, and a man of talent rather than of genius, he would probably write much as Miaskovsky has here done. There is a great deal of restless reiteration of themes not in themselves salient or stirring, and very little development of musical ideas.

The music sounds as though written to tell a story, paint a picture, or point a moral, not as though Miaskovsky's imagination had conceived far-flung, mounting musical patterns.

It is said that he has had a program in mind for each of his 10 symphonies, but that he has resolutely refused to tell anyone what.

The most interesting passages in each of the rapid movements occur by way of coda at the end. The third movement, an adagio, uses a pseudo-Oriental theme which does not recall Rimsky Korsakoff but sounds monotonous enough to be genuinely primitive. This for a time is appealing.

The performance was painstaking and not devoid of eloquence. Mr Burgin has now become a conductor with authority and experience to supplement a not inconsiderable musical gift. Yet he failed to make Miaskovsky's music attractive or significant. It recalled such Russian composers as Medtner and Glazunoff rather than Stravinsky or Prokofieff.

Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, to give it the common nickname he never authorized, sounded after Miaskovsky's long and dreary symphony like an even greater masterpiece than it is. Mr Burgin made the rhythms of the orchestral accompaniment more strong than subtle. Mr Ganz erred in the opposite direction in the first two movements, putting more sentiment, more glamor, into his interpretation than Beethoven probably intended. The finale was not very clearly played. It became at times a jumble of flying notes that the listening ear could scarce disentangle. Mr Ganz, an excellent pianist and a good musician, has been heard here to greater advantage on other occasions. Yet despite all drawbacks of performance the genius of the composer triumphed. The music seemed superb, triumphant.

Salome's dance has long been a favorite operatic excerpt on the programs of orchestral concerts. It is brilliantly scored, with languorous rhythms and melody, full of color and of a somewhat artificial intensity. Mr Burgin and the orchestra gave a good routine performance.

One wondered just what the verdict of posterity on the music of Richard Strauss is likely to be. His recent works, as for instance the opera "Helen in Egypt" and the "Alpine Symphony," seem destined to a prompt oblivion. But some of the early tone poems, such as "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel," have what appears to be enduring vitality. So have a few of his many songs. So, perhaps, have the operas, "Salome" and "Rosenkavalier." In these works his creative power has not yet been paralyzed by his overwhelming musical craftsmanship and erudition. But even in Salome's dance the manner, the style in which it is written is more notable than its musical substance.

Next week Mr Koussevitzky will conduct the first Boston performance of Mahler's monumental "Lied von der Erde," to be preceded by a Handel concerto grosso.

P. R.

A GRUEN

Dainty and Serviceable
$50
Others from $25
REAGAN, KIPP Co.
162 TREMONT ST.

TRANS. DEC. 1 -

Widening the Field

New Arrangements for the Young People's Concerts of The Symphony Orchestra

THE program-book of yesterday and today at the Symphony Concerts contained this "Special Notice":

The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have modified the plan of distribution of tickets for these concerts by reserving three hundred desirable seats on the floor, which will be sold directly to individuals for their children.

These special reserved tickets are available to Symphony subscribers at the Symphony Hall box-office at $1 each. No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children.

The balance of the seats will, as before, be offered through the schools of Greater Boston at thirty-five cents each.

At the concerts on Dec. 18 and 19 at 4 P. M., Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin will conduct. Short explanatory remarks will be made by Mr. A. H. Meyer, and a few of the instruments and composers will be illustrated by stereopticon slides.

The program for those concerts traverses: Two movements—Andante and Finale—from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony; the Slow Movement from Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin with Mr. Burgin as violinist; sharp-rhythmed numbers from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrushka"; the Slow Movement from a Concerto for Horn by Mozart with Mr. Boettcher to play the solo-part; Dance of Sylphs and Hungarian March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

Mr. Burgin Takes the Baton

MONITOR DEC. 1

By L. A. SLOPER

AFTER the first New York trip of the season, which is reported to have been very successful, Serge Koussevitzky withdrew for a week from the dictatorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, turning the baton over to Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor. For the ferial feast of Nov. 30 and Dec. 1, the regent was not content to proffer merely warmed-over fare. Instead, greatly daring, he ventured to introduce to the audiences of these concerts the Russian composer Nicolas Miaskovsky, using his Eighth Symphony for the purpose.

Since Miaskovsky has divided musical Russia into two camps, it should not be surprising if his acceptance abroad is not immediately unanimous. After listening for the first time to symphonic music from his pen, it seems clear that he is in the German-Russian line of descent from Tchaikovsky, and that he learned very little, while a student in the Petrograd Conservatory, from Rimsky-Korsakoff. It is difficult to agree with his supporters, who contend that there is originality in his use of the classic symphonic structure. There is the old lyricism—though the melodic ideas are not strikingly beautiful—and the familiar Russian melancholy, but the only new thing seems to be a moderate use of dissonant harmonies. It all strikes us as merely Tchaikovsky gone Red.

Without doubt it takes a Russian to appreciate this form of highly personal self-expression. The difficulty is to discover just what the composer is so unhappy about. Is his mental state the result of living in Soviet Russia? For he seems more gloomy even than Tchaikovsky himself, who in the midst of his self-pity could pause to sing a pretty dance tune. Miaskovsky's desolation appears to be continuous, and not particularly interesting.

This Eighth Symphony recalls many works of Russian literature, and especially Tchekhov's play, "The Three Sisters." There, it will be recalled, the persistent theme is the longing of the sisters to go to Moscow. Now there was no reason whatever why they should not have gone to Moscow at any time. They had the necessary means, and nothing to hold them where they were, especially after the garrison had departed. But they seemed unable to overcome their inertia. This kind of sorrow is very difficult for the Western mentality to comprehend. What would be thought of three young women in Leavenworth, Kan., whose ambition it was to go to New York to live, whom there was nothing to detain in Leavenworth, but who merely sat about on their front porch bewailing that they were not in New York? Yet we must believe that that is the way people behave in Russia, because all their artists tell us so. This Miaskovsky undoubtedly is the brother of those Tchekhovian sisters.

Mr. Burgin, as concertmaster, as solo violinist and as leader of the Burgin String Quartet, is a shining figure in Boston's musical life. As conductor he has grown much in the last few years. He satisfied us yesterday that he had brought to light all that there was to be seen in this symphony. Whether the music appeals to us or not, Mr. Burgin is to be thanked for giving us the opportunity to hear it. For closing number, he offered Salome's Dance, from Strauss' opera. This difficult score he conducted with precision and energy, but could not quite bring it to the boiling point.

It was a keen pleasure to listen again to the playing of Mr. Rudolph Ganz, whose performance of the Fifth Beethoven Piano Concerto filled the middle portion of the program. A scholar who never becomes dull nor pedantic, a virtuoso who does not attempt to dazzle his hearers, an artist who employs power, delicacy and taste for purely musical ends, Mr. Ganz is always welcome.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

I.0

I.1

I.25

I.4

I.6

I.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Boston Herald Dec 1

1928

MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

Symphony Concert

Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony was played yesterday for the first time in Boston; probably for the first time in this country. Rudolph Ganz played with the orchestra Beethoven's fifth piano concerto. The program also included Salome's dance from Richard Strauss's opera. Mr. Burgin, the concertmaster, conducted in the absence of Mr. Koussevitzky.

The Russian Miaskovsky, a man of ten symphonies, is now professor of composition at the Moscow Conservatory. Born in 1881, having been educated for a military career, he turned musician. He served in the world war; was kept in the army until 1920. He seemed at first as a composer to be of a romantic nature—witness his symphonic poems "Silence" (after Poe) and "Alastor" (after Shelley; yet his first symphony and his second were composed before these pieces. Even in the eighth, which as a whole cannot be called poetically imaginative, there are traces of romanticism, detected in his thematic material rather than in symphonic treatment of it. The themes more suave, especially the second of the first movement and that of the trio in the scherzo, are of Russian folk-song nature; and the livelier and more sturdy motives may have the same origin. The theme of the adagio is, as we are told, a Turkestan melody. It is very beautiful. The measures before its announcement have a singular charm and provoke anticipation of what is to come. Sir Richard F. Barton said that Englishmen have the finest women in the world but do not know what to do with them. Here is Miaskovsky fortunate in having found this song from Turkestan, but how does he use it?

He gives it a rocking, cradle-like accompaniment which by its persistence becomes monotonous and finally annoys. That which is exotic in music quickly becomes tiresome unless the composer has the comprehension and the ability to be concisely exotic in his turn. Here is where Rubinstein had the advantage by putting his oriental themes, or imitations of them, into his Persian songs. Yet this adagio is the most interesting movement of the symphony. The others are for the most part of a scholastic nature, dry from lack of harmonic and orchestral color, and sharply defined contrasting moods. There is spirit; it does not seem spontaneous, but as if the music were flogged into animation. Nor is there any truly dramatic, tragic, or even idyllic mood; nothing imposing, emotional, noble; nothing of arresting beauty except the Turkestan theme and the first measures of its distribution among the instruments. In its naked form for the English horn it was poetically played by Mr. Speyer. It has been said that there is a "program" for each one of Miaskovsky's symphonies, though he is unwilling to divulge them. It would be interesting to know what was in his mind, when he wrote the eighth; probably the purpose to write a symphony.

Mr. Ganz, who has hitherto been known to the audiences of the Boston symphony orchestra as a brilliant player of concertos by Liszt and Saint-Saens, gave an admirable performance of Beethoven's music, technically and aesthetically. He was content with Beethoven as he is, not as some think he should be. He did not allow the first movement to be wearisome; nor did he, as some pianists, emphasize the kangaroo jumps of the chief motive in the finale.

Strauss's gorgeous music for the head-hunting Salome, disporting herself voluptuously, brought a sensuous end to preceding musical sobriety.

Mr. Burgin's task, introducing the new symphony—it was produced at Moscow in 1926—was not an easy one, but he gave the audience a satisfactory idea of the merits and feelings of the work, though Mr. Victor Belaiev of Moscow makes bold to say that Miaskovsky as yet has no interpreter of his symphonies who can show "all the depths of their contents." Is this the fault of the now prominent conductors or of the composer thinking too deeply?

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 4 for strings; also Mahler's "Song of the Earth," a symphony in six parts for tenor (George Maeder) and contralto (Mrs. Charles Cahier). The text is taken from Hans Bethges's translation of verses by old Chinese poets. This symphony will be performed in Boston for the first time.

Post Dec 1

BURGIN AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Miaskovsky's Eighth Fails to Impress Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three things served to distinguish the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. First, not Mr. Koussevitzky, but Mr. Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the orchestra, was at the helm; second, there was a soloist in the person of the pianist, Rudolph Ganz, and third, Boston heard for the first time a composition, the Symphony in A major, No. 8, by Nicolas Miaskovsky, outstanding figure among the composers of Soviet Russia.

SOVIET MUSIC DREARY

Like another Mahler, but without Mahler's gifts, Miaskovsky seems possessed by a sort of musical megalomania. He must fill large canvases and many of them. While others approach the composition of a symphony with some hesitation, Miaskovsky in his 48th year has written no less than ten, to say nothing of other orchestral pieces, piano sonatas, a 'cello sonata and string quartets. A very passion for setting notes on paper besets him. And if the Symphony of yesterday may be accepted as a criterion, the man has more urge toward expression than he has matter to express.

Setting aside the chief theme of the first movement, a melody of the Oriental flavor, to which Russian composers have long accustomed us, the rhythmic ingenuity of the Scherzo in 7—4 time, the effective if eventually monotonous employment in the slow movement of a haunting melody from Turkestan and the rhythmic and dynamic excitements of the closing pages, this Eighth Symphony is little more than a dreary waste. Nowhere is there visible sign of a significant personality.

Little Color in Welter

The musical idiom is distinctly eclectic, more reminiscent of older ways than typical of new or prophetic of ways to come. A vast orchestra is used, but little that is striking in the matter of color effects emerges from the tonal welter. And while the composer's powers of construction may not be denied, the wisdom of fashioning so imposing an edifice of mere lath and plaster may well be questioned.

Devotedly and with as much enthusiasm as might be, Mr. Burgin read this ponderous score. The performance was an admirable one, and the audience, no doubt in recognition of this fact, applauded until the players had been brought to their feet.

The chosen piece of Mr. Ganz at this seventh pair of concerts is the Fifth Concerto of Beethoven. Between them he and Mr. Burgin yesterday took the first movement, except for an episode or two, at a pace unprecedentedly fast, and while there was a gain in spiritedness, there was a corresponding loss in breadth and dignity, in the majesty that has brought to the piece the title of "Emperor." By pianist and conductor the Adagio was interpreted with taste, with a fine musical sense, but with no great show of feeling.

Ganz Loudly Applauded

Only in the last movement, which was played by all concerned with extraordinary verve, did the performance attain true distinction. Mr. Ganz is an admirable pianist, but there are other pieces in which one would prefer to hear him. He was warmly applauded.

A brilliant performance of the Dance of Salome, from the opera of Richard Strauss, brought the concert's end.

SYMPHONY IS CONDUCTED BY BURGIN

By MOSES SMITH

There is apparently little danger that audiences at the symphony concerts will fall into an attitude of complacence, of stand-patism. For here is Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting as substitute conductor for his chief, Mr. Koussevitsky; and for the opening half of his program he has a new work hitherto unheard in Boston, the eigth symphony of Miaskovsky, present-day Russian composer.

The times do move. Miaskovsky has already written 10 symphonies, but he is a newcomer to the symphony concerts for all that. Perhaps it is just as well. He is highly touted by certain musicians, yet unless our ears are unreliable, the eighth symphony offers no justification for a great reputation. What beautiful themes there are seem to be taken from folk-lore. The development of these themes, as well as of the original ones, is labored and ineffective.

The symphony reverts, on the purely formal side, to classical models. But as is true of so many of his contemporaries, Miaskovsky can enliven his score with interesting rhythmic patterns. Also he can turn his hand neatly at an orchestrial trick. The most impressive part of the symphony is the opening of the slow movement, when a lovely Turkestan melody is sung with peculiarly beautiful orchestration. After that is vain striving, empty measures of boredom or bombast.

Mr. Burgin seemed to be doing a splendid job in conducting this unfamiliar work. There was no doubt that he made the closing number, Salome's Dance by Strauss, sound for all it was worth. The performance was not only well-rounded it was exciting and inspired. The conductor handled his orchestral forces with the skill of a veteran.

Rudolph Ganz, the first soloist of the year, played the piano part of Beethoven's fifth concerto in E-flat. Our impression was that Mr. Ganz was doing his best to play faster than the orchestra under Mr. Burgin. We may be doing him an injustice, but the orchestra was apparently doing its share well. At any rate the performance was not a great one.

DEC 1- EVE. AMER

RDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1928

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATU

SYMPHONY IN 7TH CONCERT

Orchestra Led by Richard Burgin, Assistant Conductor

Yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Richard Burgin, regular assistant conductor, gave the following program: Symphony No. 8, Op. 26, Miaskovsky; Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 73, Beethoven; Salome's Dance from the opera "Salome," Strauss.

In Miaskovsky's Symphony is found a definite flavor of the new Russian school of composition. Woven through its fabric are the national tunes of Russia and the East, deftly, beautifully done. There are moments of brilliant color, riotous abandon, desolation. There are broad dissonances which at last resolve themselves into the exquisite poignancy of a deathless song. Mr. Burgin's reading was warm and sincere. It pleased the large audience immensely.

Of this Beethoven Concerto for Pianoforte, it is difficult to speak moderately, for the reading that was given it by Mr. Burgin and Rudolph Ganz, soloist, lifted the hearers to the clouds. Beethoven achieved nothing finer in this medium than the E-flat concerto. It is striking in phrasing and style, magnificent in effect. Some have criticised the unusual length of the piece and have complained that it suffered in effect as a result. Yet it stands today a peer among pianoforte concertos. Rudolph Ganz gave an interpretation that was little less than perfect.

A virile, colorful pianist, his pianissimo was a whisper, his fortissimo like thunder of the gods. One marveled most at his restraint when restraint was demanded. He was received heartily, and recalled repeatedly. Apart from his great talent as a pianist, Mr. Ganz is a composer of merit, and was at one time conductor of the St. Louis Symphony orchestra.

So vividly, so beautifully did Mr. Burgin and his orchestra present Salome's Dance, that it almost seemed one could visualize the dark, cruel beauty as she moved through the measures; one could almost see the langorous throb of chiffon as her veils floated about her—the quick, white feet, the sinuous body.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

At the eighth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Serge Koussevitzky will produce for the first time in Boston Gustav Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" ("The Song of the Earth"), a symphony with tenor and contralto voices, in which a series of Chinese poems by Hans Bethges is introduced. The soloists will be George Meader, tenor, and Mme. Charles Cahier, contralto. The movements are listed: 1. Drinking Song of Earth's Sorrow; 2. Loneliness in Autumn; 3. Of Youth; 4. Of Beauty; 5. Drunkenness of Spring; 6. Departure, Handel's Concerto Grosso No, 12 will begin the program.

The second concert of the orchestra's Monday evening series will be given Dec. 10. Koussevitzky will then conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica," Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Strauss's "Dance of Salome."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

At two Young People's Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, Dec. 18 and 19, Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will both conduct. There will be brief explanatory remarks by Mr. Alfred H. Meyer, illustrated by stereopticon slides.

A block of seats will be placed on public sale at Symphony Hall prior to the distribution of the remainder through the schools of greater Boston.

The program will include movements from Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, the slow movement from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with Richard Burgin as soloist, Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite, the Larghetto from Mozart's Horn Concerto with Georg Boettcher as soloist, and the Ballet of the Sylphs and Rakoczy March from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust."

HERALD DEC. 2

TRANS. DEC 3.

Programs to Hand

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, Dec. 10:

Classical Symphony ..... Prokofiev
Prelude to Mallarmé's Ecologue, "The Afternon of A Faun" ..... Debussy
Salome's Dance from the Music-Drama, "Salome" ..... Strauss
Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"). Beethoven

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening, Dec. 13:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, No. 12, in B minor ..... Handel
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in E minor ..... Chopin
(Pianist: Leon Vartanian)
Symphony in D minor ..... Franck

From Mme. Susan Metcalfe Casals for her concert of old airs and songs in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon next

O del mio dolce ardor.....
Le violette ..... Scarlatti
Come raggio di sol..... Caldara
In questa tomba oscura..... Beethoven
Non so pui cosa son (From "Figaro's Wedding") ..... Mozart
An die Musik — Die junge Nonne — Abschied—Gott im Frühling—Nacht und Träume—Gretchen am Spinnrad.... Schubert
El Mirar de la Maja—Mananica—La Maja dolorosa—El Majo discretio. E. Granados
Soir—Clair de lune—Neil..... Fauré
Erinnerung—Botschaft ..... Brahms

...softer virtues. N. M. J.

DEC 5 TRANS

From Symphony Hall

It is time for a first warning to the good ladies and the brave gentlemen who frequent the Symphony Concerts. This week, on both Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, there will be no intermission. The concerts will begin with a Concerto Grosso of Handel. When it is ended, there will be a pause to let in late comers. The doors will then be closed through the remainder of the concerts that Mahler's "Song of The Earth" may be sung, played and heard without break. And that Symphony is an hour and more long.

For the first time in nearly two years Mr. Copland has handed Mr. Koussevitzky a new manuscript—Three Pieces for String Orchestra, to be played at the Symphony Concerts of next week. There is good reason for curiosity and expectation.

The English Singers, returning to Symphony Hall for a "Christmas ...cert" on Sunday evening, Dec. 23, set for it this program:

Boar's Head Carol

Motets:
Hosanna to the Son of David..... Gibbons
Justorum Animae ..... di Lasso
This Glad Day ..... Byrd
Madrigals and Ballet:
To shorten winter's sadness..... Weelkes
Dainty fine bird ..... Gibbons
Stay, Corydon ..... Wilbye
Carols:
I saw a fair maiden..... Warlock
On Christmas night.... Arranged by Williams
Corpus Christi..... Arranged by Warlock
Folk-Songs:
There was a tree..... Arranged by Holst
The springtime of the year
Arranged by Williams
Wassail-Song..... Arranged by Williams
Carols:
The Holly and the Ivy.. Arranged by Boughton
Midwinter ..... Holst
Patapan ..... Arranged by Shaw
Noël ..... Arranged by Davies

Boston Herald Dec 1

1928

MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

Symphony Concert

Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony was played yesterday for the first time in Boston; probably for the first time in this country. Rudolph Ganz played with the orchestra Beethoven's fifth piano concerto. The program also included Salome's dance from Richard Strauss's opera. Mr. Burgin, the concertmaster, conducted in the absence of Mr. Koussevitzky.

The Russian Miaskovsky, a man of ten symphonies, is now professor of composition at the Moscow Conservatory. Born in 1881, having been educated for a military career, he turned musician. He served in the world war; was kept in the army until 1920. He seemed at first as a composer to be of a romantic nature—witness his symphonic poems "Silence" (after Poe) and "Alastor" (after Shelley; yet his first symphony and his second were composed before these pieces. Even in the eighth, which as a whole cannot be called poetically imaginative, there are traces of romanticism, detected in his thematic material rather than in symphonic treatment of it. The themes more suave, especially the second of the first movement and that of the trio in the scherzo, are of Russian folk-song nature; and the livelier and more sturdy motives may have the same origin. The theme of the adagio is, as we are told, a Turkestan melody. It is very beautiful. The measures before its announcement have a singular charm and provoke anticipation of what is to come. Sir Richard F. Barton said that Englishmen have the finest women in the world but do not know what to do with them. Here is Miaskovsky fortunate in having found this song from Turkestan, but how does he use it?

He gives it a rocking, cradle-like accompaniment which by its persistence becomes monotonous and finally annoys. That which is exotic in music quickly becomes tiresome unless the composer has the comprehension and the ability to be concisely exotic in his turn. Here is where Rubinstein had the advantage by putting his oriental themes, or imitations of them, into his Persian songs. Yet this adagio is the most interesting movement of the symphony. The others are for the most part of a scholastic nature, dry from lack of harmonic and orchestral color, and sharply defined contrasting moods. There is spirit; it does not seem spontaneous, but as if the music were flogged into animation. Nor is there any truly dramatic, tragic, or even idyllic mood; nothing imposing, emotional, noble; nothing of arresting beauty except the Turkestan theme and the first measures of its distribution among the instruments. In its naked form for the English horn it was poetically played by Mr. Speyer. It has been said that there is a "program" for each one of Miaskovsky's symphonies, though he is unwilling to divulge them. It would be interesting to know what was in his mind, when he wrote the eighth: probably the purpose to write a symphony.

Mr. Ganz, who has hitherto been known to the audiences of the Boston symphony orchestra as a brilliant player of concertos by Liszt and Saint-Saens, gave an admirable performance of Beethoven's music, technically and aesthetically. He was content with Beethoven as he is, not as some think he should be. He did not allow the first movement to be wearisome; nor did he, as some pianists, emphasize the kangaroo jumps of the chief motive in the finale.

Strauss's gorgeous music for the head-hunting Salome, disporting herself voluptuously, brought a sensuous end to preceding musical sobriety.

Mr. Burgin's task, introducing the new symphony—it was produced at Moscow in 1926—was not an easy one, but he gave the audience a satisfactory idea of the merits and feelings of the work, though Mr. Victor Belaiev of Moscow makes bold to say that Miaskovsky as yet has no interpreter of his symphonies who can show "all the depths of their contents." Is this the fault of the now prominent conductors or of the composer thinking too deeply?

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 4 for strings; also Mahler's "Song of the Earth," a symphony in six parts for tenor (George Maeder) and contralto (Mrs. Charles Cahier). The text is taken from Hans Bethges's translation of verses by old Chinese poets. This symphony will be performed in Boston for the first time.

Post Dec 1

BURGIN AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Miaskovsky's Eighth Fails to Impress Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three things served to distinguish the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. First, not Mr. Koussevitzky, but Mr. Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the orchestra, was at the helm; second, there was a soloist in the person of the pianist, Rudolph Ganz, and third, Boston heard for the first time a composition, the Symphony in A major, No. 8, by Nicolas Miaskovsky, outstanding figure among the composers of Soviet Russia.

SOVIET MUSIC DREARY

Like another Mahler, but without Mahler's gifts, Miaskovsky seems possessed by a sort of musical megalomania. He must fill large canvases and many of them. While others approach the composition of a symphony with some hesitation, Miaskovsky in his 48th year has written no less than ten, to say nothing of other orchestral pieces, piano sonatas, a 'cello sonata and string quartets. A very passion for setting notes on paper besets him. And if the Symphony of yesterday may be accepted as a criterion, the man has more urge toward expression than he has matter to express.

Setting aside the chief theme of the first movement, a melody of the Oriental flavor, to which Russian composers have long accustomed us, the rhythmic ingenuity of the Scherzo in 7—4 time, the effective if eventually monotonous employment in the slow movement of a haunting melody from Turkestan and the rhythmic and dynamic excitements of the closing pages, this Eighth Symphony is little more than a dreary waste. Nowhere is there visible sign of a significant personality.

Little Color in Welter

The musical idiom is distinctly eclectic, more reminiscent of older ways than typical of new or prophetic of ways to come. A vast orchestra is used, but little that is striking in the matter of color effects emerges from the tonal welter. And while the composer's powers of construction may not be denied, the wisdom of fashioning so imposing an edifice of mere lath and plaster may well be questioned.

Devotedly and with as much enthusiasm as might be, Mr. Burgin read this ponderous score. The performance was an admirable one, and the audience, no doubt in recognition of this fact, applauded until the players had been brought to their feet.

The chosen piece of Mr. Ganz at this seventh pair of concerts is the Fifth Concerto of Beethoven. Between them he and Mr. Burgin yesterday took the first movement, except for an episode or two, at a pace unprecedentedly fast, and while there was a gain in spiritedness, there was a corresponding loss in breadth and dignity, in the majesty that has brought to the piece the title of "Emperor." By pianist and conductor the Adagio was interpreted with taste, with a fine musical sense, but with no great show of feeling.

Ganz Loudly Applauded

Only in the last movement, which was played by all concerned with extraordinary verve, did the performance attain true distinction. Mr. Ganz is an admirable pianist, but there are other pieces in which one would prefer to hear him. He was warmly applauded.

A brilliant performance of the Dance of Salome, from the opera of Richard Strauss, brought the concert's end.

SYMPHONY IS CONDUCTED BY BURGIN

By MOSES SMITH

There is apparently little danger that audiences at the symphony concerts will fall into an attitude of complacence, of stand-patism. For here is Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, acting as substitute conductor for his chief, Mr. Koussevitsky; and for the opening half of his program he has a new work hitherto unheard in Boston, the eigth symphony of Miaskovsky, present-day Russian composer.

The times do move. Miaskovsky has already written 10 symphonies, but he is a newcomer to the symphony concerts for all that. Perhaps it is just as well. He is highly touted by certain musicians, yet unless our ears are unreliable, the eighth symphony offers no justification for a great reputation. What beautiful themes there are seem to be taken from folk-lore. The development of these themes, as well as of the original ones, is labored and ineffective.

The symphony reverts, on the purely formal side,, to classical models. But as is true of so many of his contemporaries, Miaskovsky can enliven his score with interesting rhythmic patterns. Also he can turn his hand neatly at an orchestrial trick. The most impressive part of the symphony is the opening of the slow movement, when a lovely Turkestan melody is sung with peculiarly beautiful orchestration. After that is vain striving, empty measures of boredom or bombast.

Mr. Burgin seemed to be doing a splendid job in conducting this unfamiliar work. There was no doubt that he made the closing number, Salome's Dance by Strauss, sound for all it was worth. The performance was not only well-rounded it was exciting and inspired. The conductor handled his orchestral forces with the skill of a veteran.

Rudolph Ganz, the first soloist of the year, played the piano part of Beethoven's fifth concerto in E-flat. Our impression was that Mr. Ganz was doing his best to play faster than the orchestra under Mr. Burgin. We may be doing him an injustice, but the orchestra was apparently doing its share well. At any rate the performance was not a great one.

DEC 1- EVE. AMER

'33

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

At the eighth regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Serge Koussevitzky will produce for the first time in Boston Gustav Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" ("The Song of the Earth"), a symphony with tenor and contralto voices, in which a series of Chinese poems by Hans Bethges is introduced. The soloists will be George Meader, tenor, and Mme. Charles Cahier, contralto. The movements are listed: 1. Drinking Song of Earth's Sorrow; 2. Loneliness in Autumn; 3. Of Youth; 4. Of Beauty; 5. Drunkenness of Spring; 6. Departure, Handel's Concerto Grosso No, 12 will begin the program.

The second concert of the orchestra's Monday evening series will be given Dec. 10. Koussevitzky will then conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 "Eroica," Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Strauss's "Dance of Salome."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

At two Young People's Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, Dec. 18 and 19, Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will both conduct. There will be brief explanatory remarks by Mr. Alfred H. Meyer, illustrated by stereopticon slides.

A block of seats will be placed on public sale at Symphony Hall prior to the distribution of the remainder through the schools of greater Boston.

The program will include movements from Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, the slow movement from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with Richard Burgin as soloist, Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite, the Larghetto from Mozart's Horn Concerto with Georg Boettcher as soloist, and the Ballet of the Sylphs and Rakoczy March from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust."

HERALD DEC. 2

TRANS. DEC 3.

Programs to Hand

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, Dec. 10:

Classical Symphony ..... Prokofiev
Prelude to Mallarmé's Ecologue, "The Afternon of A Faun" ..... Debussy
Salome's Dance from the Music-Drama, "Salome" ..... Strauss
Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"). Beethoven

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening, Dec. 13:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, No. 12, in B minor ..... Handel
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 1, in E minor ..... Chopin
(Pianist: Leon Vartanian)
Symphony in D minor ..... Franck

From Mme. Susan Metcalfe Casals for her concert of old airs and songs in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon next:

O del mio dolce ardor.... [illegible]
Le violette ..... [illegible]atti
Come raggio di sol..... Caldara
In questa tomba oscura ..... Beethoven
Non so pui cosa son (From "Figaro's Wedding") ..... Mozart
An die Musik — Die junge Nonne — Abschied—Gott im Frühling—Nacht und Träume—Gretchen am Spinnrad.... Schubert
El Mirar de la Maja—Mananica—La Maja dolorosa—El Majo discretio. E. Granados
Soir—Clair de lune—Nell..... Fauré
Erinnerung—Botschaft ..... Brahms

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATU[illegible]

RDAY, DE[illegible]EMBER 1, 1928

SYMPHONY IN 7TH CONCERT

Orchestra Led by Richard Burgin, Assistant Conductor

Yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Richard Burgin, regular assistant conductor, gave the following program: Symphony No. 8, Op. 26, Miaskovsky; Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 73, Beethoven; Salome's Dance from the opera "Salome," Strauss.

In Miaskovsky's Symphony is found a definite flavor of the new Russian school of composition. Woven through its fabric are the national tunes of Russia and the East, deftly, beautifully done. There are moments of brilliant color, riotous abandon, desolation. There are broad dissonances which at last resolve themselves into the exquisite poignancy of a deathless song. Mr. Burgin's reading was warm and sincere. It pleased the large audience immensely.

Of this Beethoven Concerto for Pianoforte, it is difficult to speak moderately, for the reading that was given it by Mr. Burgin and Rudolph Ganz, soloist, lifted the hearers to the clouds. Beethoven achieved nothing finer in this medium than the E-flat concerto. It is striking in phrasing and style, magnificent in effect. Some have criticised the unusual length of the piece and have complained that it suffered in effect as a result. Yet it stands today a peer among pianoforte concertos. Rudolph Ganz gave an interpretation that was little less than perfect.

A virile, colorful pianist, his pianissimo was a whisper, his fortissimo like thunder of the gods. One marveled most at his restraint when restraint was demanded. He was received heartily, and recalled repeatedly. Apart from his great talent as a pianist, Mr. Ganz is a composer of merit, and was at one time conductor of the St. Louis Symphony orchestra.

So vividly, so beautifully did Mr. Burgin and his orchestra present Salome's Dance, that it almost seemed one could visualize the dark, cruel beauty as she moved through the measures; one could almost see the langorous throb of chiffon as her veils floated about her—the quick, white feet, the sinuous body.

[illegible] softer virtues. N. M. J.

DEC 5 TRANS

From Symphony Hall

It is time for a first warning to the good ladies and the brave gentlemen who frequent the Symphony Concerts. This week, on both Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, there will be no intermission. The concerts will begin with a Concerto Grosso of Handel. When it is ended, there will be a pause to let in late comers. The doors will then be closed through the remainder of the concerts that Mahler's "Song of The Earth" may be sung, played and heard without break. And that Symphony is an hour and more long.

For the first time in nearly two years Mr. Copland has handed Mr. Koussevitzky a new manuscript—Three Pieces for String Orchestra, to be played at the Symphony Concerts of next week. There is good reason for curiosity and expectation.

The English Singers, returning to Symphony Hall for a "Christmas Concert" on Sunday evening, Dec. 23, set for it this program:

Boar's Head Carol

Motets:
Hosanna to the Son of David..... Gibbons
Justorum Animae ..... di Lasso
This Glad Day ..... Byrd
Madrigals and Ballet:
To shorten winter's sadness..... Weelkes
Dainty fine bird ..... Gibbons
Stay, Corydon ..... Wilbye
Carols:
I saw a fair maiden..... Warlock
On Christmas night.... Arranged by Williams
Corpus Christi..... Arranged by Warlock
Folk-Songs:
There was a tree..... Arranged by Holst
The springtime of the year Arranged by Williams
Wassail-Song..... Arranged by Williams
Carols:
The Holly and the Ivy.. Arranged by Boughton
Midwinter ..... Holst
Patapan ..... Arranged by Shaw
Noël ..... Arranged by Davies

Music Notes

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky, Opens Providence Season Tuesday Night. University Glee Club and Symphony Society Announcements

Within these seven days the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Providence Symphony Society and the University Glee Club open their Providence seasons, events which even in a busier musical year than this has been would make the week seem fairly crowded. The Boston players come Tuesday night to the E. F. Albee Theatre; Providence's own symphony group plays next Sunday afternoon in Elks Auditorium, and the University singers are to be heard next Friday night in Memorial Hall. And with these, a festival of grand opera opens, the details of which are noted in another department.

◈ ◈ ◈

Walter Williams's program for this morning at St. Stephen's Church at 10:40 o'clock is as follows: Kyrie Eleison ("Cathedral Windows," opus 106, No. 1), Sigfrid Karg-Elert; chorale-prelude, "Adorn Thyself, Dear Soul," opus 122, No. 5, Johannes Brahms; chorale-prelude, "Through Adam's Fall, Debased" (Little Organ Book, No. 37), J. S. Bach; Intermezzo (Sonata in A-minor), Josef Rheinberger. In the morning service the choir will sing a Kyrie from the Mass in A-major, by Josef Rheinberger (arranged by Walter Williams), numbers from the Mass in D, by Dr. Edward C. Bairstow, choirmaster of York Minster, England, and an unaccompanied "Ave Maria," by Nicolas Gombert, a Canon of Cambrai Cathedral about 1440. In the afternoon at 5 o'clock a Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis with fauxbourdons by Fr. Vicente Ripolles will be sung for the first time in this country together with the "Cherubim Song" of Rachmaninoff. Fr. Ripolles is Canon of the Cathedral at Valencia in Spain and Professor of Gregorian Music at the Royal College of Corpus Christi in the same city.

◈ ◈ ◈

Three selections for piano and organ will comprise the musical program at the Beneficent Congregational Church this morning at 10:45 o'clock with Herbert Chandler Thrasher at the organ and Mrs. Flora R. Arnold at the piano. Their selections are the "Intermezzo" from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," Massenet's "Meditation," from "Thais," and Handel's "Largo."

◈ ◈ ◈

At the vesper service in the Central Congregational Church this afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, excerpts from Handel's "The Messiah" will be rendered by the quartet and chorus. The quartet consists of Marguerite W. Shaftoe, Julia S. Gould, George Tinker and Harry A.

Janet R. Armour

Coloratura Soprano Sings With Providence Symphony Society Next Sunday Afternoon in Elks Auditorium.

Kathryne Ross

Soprano is Soloist at University Glee Club Concert Friday Night in Memorial Hall.

"Noel," Gounod, Bertil O. Larson. Organ, "Where Dusk Gathers Deep," Stebbins; Gavotte, from "Mignon," Thomas; Prelude to "La Traviata," Verdi-Biggs; introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," Wagner. Soprano, "O Divine Redeemer," Gounod, Edith Woodhead Marshall. Organ and piano, Nocturne, Ernest [illegible] Kroeger; "Grand Aria," Dearest, Marion L. Arnold at the piano.

◈ ◈ ◈

With very few seats unsubscribed at this writing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is practically assured of a full house when it begins its season here next Tuesday night at the E. F. Albee Theatre. In other cities besides Providence where the orchestra has played so far, there has been a similar evidence of the Symphony's great popularity and that of its famous conductor. In Boston its series was sold out far in advance of the beginning of the season.

The program through which Serge Koussevitzky will lead his men was announced in this department last week. It contains numbers familiar to concertgoers and is of a spacious order. The first part will be devoted to Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony. Brahms's Second Symphony in D-major will take up the second half.

◈ ◈ ◈

[illegible]ular meeting of the MacDowell Club will be held at the home of the President, Mrs. Edward L. Singsen, 100 Greenwood avenue, Rumford, tomorrow night at 8 o'clock.

Two Symphonies on Program of Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky

[illegible]ductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Opens Providence Series of Concerts Tuesday Night in E. F. Albee Theatre.

BY WALTER STOREY SMITH

That two symphonies stand on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, might seem to indicate that the concert will be more than usually formidable. In this instance, however, appearances are deceptive. Of these symphonies only that in the latter half of the program, Brahm's Symphony in D-major, No. 2, is likely to tax the attention of any listener in Tuesday evening's audience. The other, the so-called "Classical" Symphony, by Serge Prokofieff, is indeed a symphony in so far as its formal outlines are concerned, but its musical content is so far from weighty that at times only the composer's cleverly concealed scholarship saves his work from the reproach of obviousness.

Those who know Prokofieff through the music that is genuinely characteristic of his own tendencies and tonal faiths would never suspect him as the author of these measures—measures in which, as Felix Borowski has suggested, his intention was to "catch the spirit of Mozart and put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." An ingenious fancy, if one does not inquire too closely into its accuracy. But it seems altogether probable that if Mozart was, in 1790, a child of his time, he would have been equally a child of his time in 1917 and would thus have written in an idiom at least superficially related to Prokofieff's own.

Be that as it may, it was an amusing caprice that prompted the composer of the Scythian Suite to forget his dissonances and his glaring orchestral colors and to write for the moment simply, artlessly, tunefully, seeking suavity of melody, limpidity of part-writing, harmonic blandness and orchestral euphonies. And thanks to his exuberant imagination and his easy command of all the resources of composition he could carry off successfully an undertaking which, if assumed by a lesser man, might easily have yielded only academic inanities.

The usual four movements suffice for Prokofieff in his adventure into classicism, but unconventionally he substitutes for the Minuet or Scherzo a Gavotte, a procédure for which there is no symphonic precedent. Otherwise his music will be found by those sentient in such matters to be orthodox in pattern, and by all and sundry it will be found music engagingly melodious, enticingly rhythmed and deftly scored for orchestra.

After many performances of this symphony at home and afield the Boston Orchestra now makes of it an exhilarating exercise in virtuosity, especially in the last movement where Mr. Koussevitsky is wont to push speed to the very limits of clarity.

Not before has Providence heard this music, which has been performed in Boston three times within two seasons. The remainder of the program, on the other hand, is familiar enough. For those interested in such details it may be recalled that Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3 was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence under Mr. Monteux in November, 1920; that Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" was heard from this organization in Infantry Hall in November, 1925; and that Brahms's Second Symphony was conducted in Providence by Mr. Koussevitsky no longer ago than season-before-last, in February, 1927. Yet inasmuch as every piece is new to some member of every audience, a few words concerning these other works, each a masterpiece of its kind, will not be amiss.

In all, Beethoven wrote four overtures to his one and only opera, first called "Leonore" and finally known as "Fidelio." Of these the one numbered three was actually the second in order of composition, and it was discarded by its composer in favor of a simpler, more straightforward, less difficult introduction for operatic performances. But Number Three is the one that is heard as a concert-piece.

Sir George Grove called it the greatest single piece in the domain of instrumental music, and it was made the subject of a rhapsodical essay by Wagner who saw in it a vindication of his own theory that the overture to an opera should be a sort of musical synthesis of the drama to come.

In his Prelude to Mallarme's poem of the faun whose muddled brain cannot distinguish between dream and experience Debussy turned one of the pages in the book of art. With the first performance of this Prelude, at Paris, on Dec. 23, 1894, there was born, to change the metaphor, what has been called musical impressionism, an influence from which no modern composer has completely escaped, however strongly the present tendencies in composition may run counter to those of Debussy and his school.

Finally the Symphony of Brahms, although not in any sense an epoch-making work, is among the choicest flowerings of the tonal art. Less epic than the First Symphony of its composer, less moving than the Third, less profound than the Fourth, it has a peculiar charm, an especial appeal of its own. Only in the brooding, introspective, deeply-felt Adagio does this Symphony sound a sombre or a solemn note. The rest is serenity, lyric charm, innocent gaiety, and an exuberance that eloquently voices the deep joy of living.

Dex. 6805
CHIMNEY BUILDERS
DRAFT EXPERTS
Bowen Construction Co.
Dex. 8905

MISS CREED
MATERNITY DRESSES and CORSELETTES
Room 308 Woolworth Bldg.
Phone: Dex. 1965

200 Watches 200
Hamilton, Waltham, Elgin, Mauran Watches and Seth Thomas Clocks
Must be sold at once. We are five floors above high rents which means low prices to you. All Watches and Clocks guaranteed. Your old watches & jewelry taken in exchange. A small deposit will reserve for Christmas. Let us do your repairing.
35 YEARS' EXPERIENCE
J. J. McMANUS
212 Union Street—5th Floor

Providence College of Music
Wassili Leps, Director
Announces a CONCERT Given at The PROVIDENCE PLANTATION'S CLUB
ABBOTT PARK PLACE
By the Members of
The Last Year's GRADUATING CLASS of the NORMAL COURSE
Annette Aubin, Claudia Croisetiere, Berthe Forcier, Lorette Gagnon, Lillias Migliori, Carmen Staehly and Maurice Murphy — assisted by Junio Russillo and George Beaudet, Pianists, and Miss Germaine Barre, Contralto. Edward Caffier, Violinist.
For tickets and particulars apply at the office of the College.
Steinert Building Gaspee 131

Willson's

FILMED AS BOUND

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 1928-29

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Purdy's Boston

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA is here pictured for the first time by individual portraits of each player in his proper position as he appears at the symphony concerts this season. It will be seen at a glance how Conductor Koussevitzky masses all the violins at his left, the violas and 'cellos at his right, the wood-wind players directly before him, and the brass behind them at the rear right of the stage. It was 48 years ago that Henry Lee Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its supreme qualities these many years past may be traced to his wisdom and munificence in engaging the foremost musicians of Europe, and a succession of the greatest conductors living to drill them into the most perfect organization of its kind in the world. Serge Koussevitzky, in his five years of leadership, has inspired the orchestra to new heights of brilliance, of beauty in tone and ensemble, and has given a new aspect to its fame. As one result of this, each series here and in New York is solidly subscribed, with waiting lists from season to season. Greater Boston has five series of 67 concerts.

(Purdy)

FILMED AS BOUND

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, 1928-29

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA is here pictured for the first time by individual portraits of each player in his proper position as he appears at the symphony concerts this season. It will be seen at a glance how Conductor Koussevitzky masses all the violins at his left, the violas and 'cellos at his right, the wood-wind players directly before him, and the brass behind them at the rear right of the stage. It was 48 years ago that Henry Lee Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its supreme qualities these many years past may be traced to his wisdom and munificence in engaging the foremost musicians of Europe, and a succession of the greatest conductors living to drill them into the most perfect organization of its kind in the world. Serge Koussevitzky, in his five years of leadership, has inspired the orchestra to new heights of brilliance, of beauty in tone and ensemble, and has given a new aspect to its fame. As one result of this, each series here and in New York is solidly subscribed, with waiting lists from season to season. Greater Boston has five series of 67 concerts.

(Furgy)

FILMED AS BOUND

character. TRANS.

Incidents and Prospects DEC. 7

Two of the younger brood of composers that Mr. Koussevitzky is ever ready to foster have place in the Symphony Concerts of next week—Mr. Copland with Two Pieces for Orchestra: Mr. Martinu with music called "La Symphonie." Miss Luboschutz, a protegée of Josef Hofmann, will play the solo-part in Prokofiev's Concerto for Violin, unheard in Boston since Mr. Burgin introduced it four years ago. As antidote to these three, the concert—says the communiqué sweetly—will close with Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony."

Mr. Horovitz, returning to Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 23, to take leave of Boston for the season, proffers this program:

Prelude and Fugue (for organ) in D major—Bach
Chorale in G minor.....Bach
(Transcribed by Busoni)
Sonata in B-flat minor.....Chopin
Serenade for The Doll.....Debussy
Jeux d' Eaux.....Ravel
Funerailles—Valse Oubliée—"Paganini-Study" in E-flat—Sonnet of Petrarch—Mephisto Waltz.....Liszt

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct through half the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people on Tuesday and Wednesday, Dec. 18 and 19. His numbers are two movements of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony; the Andante from Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin (Mr. Burgin, violinist); the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrushka."

TRAV. DEC. 8

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its second program of the Monday series in Symphony hall, next Monday evening; its ninth regular program on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening; and a pair of young people's concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday, Dec. 18 and 19, at 4 o'clock.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts he will produce a new piece of Martinu, the Czech composer, entitled "La Symphonie," and two pieces for orchestra by Aaron Copland. Miss Lea Luboshutz, as soloist, will appear with the orchestra in Prokofieff's violin concerto, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony will be the closing number.

There will be inovations in the pair of Young People's concerts, since Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the first three numbers, and Richard Burgin the last two. Introductory remarks will be made before each number by Alfred Dyer, with stereopticon slides.

HAYES HERBERT

MAHLER NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Das Lied von der Erde" in First Boston Performance

Globe Dec 8

Mme Charles Cahier and George Meader Heard in Vocal Solo Parts

At last, after an interval of a decade, the Boston Symphony audience yesterday was given an opportunity to hear music by Gustav Mahler, a composer who is regarded by some as one of the greatest of the past 50 years and by others as a voluminous writer with no genius. Mr Koussevitzky devoted almost the whole of yesterday's Symphony concert to Mahler's posthumous "Das Lied von der Erde," written in 1908 and first performed at Munich in 1911.

The exacting vocal solos were sung yesterday by Mme Charles Cahier, contralto, and George Meader, tenor. The concert began with Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, unheard here since 1905, in which the strings in the orchestra regained the tonal beauty and suavity which was once their constant glory. Owing to the unusual arrangement of the program, the customary intermission was omitted.

Mahler's work, never before given in Boston, is unique in structure. It is a curious experiment at combining the song cycle and the symphony. There are six parts, each with a vocal solo by either tenor or contralto interwoven with an elaborate orchestral background. Only in the last part is there a lengthy orchestral interlude. The texts are German adaptations of Chinese lyrics.

Mahler is said to have revised the translations he chose from a collection made by Hans Bethge so as to stress the underlying idea of his work, that youth, beauty and love are fleeting and illusory, yet perennial. "Das Lied von der Erde" is the valedictory of a man to whom life had not been kind. It comes from Mahler's inmost soul.

Those whose vague memories of Mahler's Second and Fifth Symphonies heard here under Dr Muck, led them to expect that "Das Lied von der Erde" would be ponderous, intricate, baffling music, were agreeably disappointed.

This score is not really simple, but it sounds so. There is a constant flow of beautiful melody and ingratiating rythm, always with a half mocking note, always with an undercurrent of hopeless melancholy, which wells up and overflows poignantly in the end of the final part.

Despair has never been more movingly expressed in music than here. The hysterics and histrionics of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" are not to be compared with it. Future historians are likely to note that the romantic movement in the arts ended in 1914. "Das Lied von der Erde" belongs to the era of Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung" and Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht." Its imaginative affinities are with Brahms and Wagner, not with Stravinsky or Hindemith, from whose work it is far removed as is a Schubert song from a Mozart air.

Mahler, judged by this work, was certainly a genius, but not a faultless one. His craftsmanship is that of a master, but he shares the worst fault of Wagner, needless prolixity. He might have said what he wanted to say in half the space with 10 times the effect on the average listener.

The performance was a sympathetic and eloquent one. Mr Koussevitzky may not always have respected the letter of Mahler's music, but he caught and rendered its spirit. Restraint, not usually one of Koussevitzky's qualities, here heightened the eloquence of an unusually satisfying reading.

Mme Cahier, who sasg at the original performance in Munich in 1911, brought to her solos the experience and authority without which it is impossible to convey the meaning of such music. Her singing was not flawless technically, but its imaginative insight was profound. She had memorized her part, in itself no mean feat of skill.

Mr Meader's singing, though technically good, lacked the insight and authority that distinguished Mme Cahier's admirable performance.

The Handel concerto, a particularly lovely one, was exceptionally well played. Mr Koussevitzky here also refrained from allowing his temperament to run away with him.

Next week's program is to include new works by Martinu and Aaron Copland, Prokofieff's violin concerto, in which the soloist will be Lea Luboshutz, and Beethoven's Sixth Symphony.

P. R.

MAHLER WORK NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

Enter Gustav Mahler at the symphony concerts of this week—Gustav Mahler, composer, much-maligned early in the century, until the ultra-modern revolt of the French and Russian schools made people forget him entirely. This man, whose sojourn in New York as conductor is said to have killed him, is represented on this week's program by "Das Lied von der Erde" (Song of the Earth), a huge symphony in six parts, with tenor and contralto solos voices singing alternately German translations of six Chinese lyrics.

Only a half-dozen times previously has Mahler been played at concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, mostly by the grace of Karl Muck. The ultra-moderns jeer at him as "old-hat," writing for a swollen orchestra instead of employing what they call economy of means. Well, there is more music in this one symphony, which was played here for the first time, than in nine-tenths of the modernists' output. Too often economy of means becomes synonymous with paucity of ideas.

Mahler's music goes to the very heart of the poems, which are pessimistic, sometimes in the manner of "Omar Khayam." The orchestra is a large one, but there is no abuse of the instruments. Two instruments are not used where one could suffice. At times the ensmble is treated like a chamber orchestra. At other times there are great orchestral climaxes. There is remarkable use of tone color; the individual instruments are admirably selected to serve the required purpose.

Madame Charles Cahier sang the contralto solo part beautifully. Once in a while her high tones seemed thin, but otherwise her voice was luscious, her interpretative skill exceptional. The tenor solo was for the most part inaudible. Whether this was due to the soloist, George Meader, to the composer, or to Mr. Koussevitsky in overdriving the orchestra we cannot say. Very likely a composer could write such beautiful music and be so adept at orchestration was not at fault in writing for the voice.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise: Martinu's "La Symphonie"; Copland's Two Pieces for orchestra; Prokofieff's Violin concerto (Lea Luboshutz violinist) and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

1928 Herald

MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

"Song of the Earth" Dec 8

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings and Gustav Mahler's "Song of the Earth," which was performed for the first time, with Madame Charles Cahier, contralto, and George Maeder, tenor.

Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," composed in 1908, was produced at Munich in November, 1911. He had died in May of that year. Madame Cahier, who first came to Boston as Mrs. Morris Black, sang the contralto music at Munich. The first performance in the United Stjaes was at Philadelphia in 1916.

The work is a symphony in six parts for tenor and contralto (alternating), and orchestra. The text is taken from Hans Bethge's "The Chinese Flute," a collection of verses said to be written by Chinese poets of the 8th and 9th centuries. Whether Bethge's translations into German are not really paraphrases; whether he dealt with these poets as Fitzgerald treated Omar Khayyam is not known to us. It is said that Mahler changed the Chinese poems somewhat "to express one predominating idea, withdrawal from the world." As a young man he studied diligently German philosophical works, and in his later years of trials and disappointments, his philosophy was that of the pessimist. The sixth poem of the symphony is considered as the farewell to his artistic career, authough he wrote two symphonic works after "The Song of the Earth." He is alone; he awaits death, yet the earth will still bloom, the sky will still be blue, when he has at last found rest.

Those who without undue prejudice judge Mahler, the composer, admitting his faults, discussing them at length, dwelling on undeniably fine qualities, regard "The Song of the Earth" as his most complete, his highest achievement, though they assert that his artistic life was greater than his own musical works, which greatly planned, did not attain fulfilment and were often imitative. The sincerity of the composer was never doubted; the failure to secure that for which he strove, is therefore the more pathetic.

He was of an intensely nervous nature. His life as a conductor—and he was a great conductor— the feverish atmosphere of the opera house—his going from city to city until his ability was recognized in Vienna and later at the Metropolitan, the death of a dearly loved child, the fact that he was a Jew who had turned Catholic—these with musical intrigues and controversies from which he suffered, gave him no mental or aesthetic poise. It was his ambition to continue the work of men he revered, Beethoven and Wagner. In spite of his indisputable talent he was not the man to do this. In the nearer approaches to the ideal that was in his mind he was simply an imitator; not a convincing, not even a plausible one.

Boston has heard Mahler's second and fifth symphonies—huge "machines." What was found in them was found yesterday in "The Song of the Earth." Restlessness that at times became hysterical; reminders of Wagner, Berlioz, Strauss; melodies in folk-song vein, often naive, at times beautiful, but introduced as at random and quickly thrown aside; an over-employment of the wood-wind, used too often as solo instruments; passages for the brass which recall the fact that as a child Mahler delighted in military bands. Sudden changes from screaming outbursts to thin and inconsequential instrumentation; trivial moments when the hearer anticipated the movement of a country dance; diffuseness, prolixity that became boresome; an unwillingness to bring speech to an end; seldom genuine power or eloquence; yet here and there measures that linger in the memory. There is appropriate lightness and fantastic instrumentation in the sections "Of Youth" and "The Drunkard in Spring-time." The mood of the final section, gray and sad, would be impressive if it were not sustained beyond endurance. It was of this Finale that Adolf Weissman, who puts a high value on "The Song of the Earth," wrote: "It is an unforgettable experience to hear that 'Ewig' rendered by such a singer as Mme. Cahier in that mysterious, almost supernatural landscape . . . the farewell of a lonely spirit to a world in which it has dwelt as an alien."

What Weissman wrote of Mme. Cahier in Germany, may be said of her singing yesterday in Symphony Hall. It is seldom one hears in Boston a true contralto of so rich a voice, of so musical a nature, so alive to the spirit and significance of text and music. Mahler was more gracious in this work to the contralto than to the tenor; respecting more her voice in the orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Maeder, when Mahler allowed him, sang intelligently. Too often the part was not a grateful one. Mr. Koussevitzky spared no pains in the performance; gave the music its due importance, when it was important; the individual solos and the various orchestral ensembles great or only in sections of the orchestra would have pleased Mahler himself, who as a conductor was not easily satisfied.

After it is all over what is now in the memory: the concerto of Handel with that nobly serene and beautiful slow movement that only the superb Handel could have written; the singing of Mme. Cahier, with or without one's thought of Mahler; and the orchestra led by Mr. Koussevitzky.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise: Martinu's "La Symphonie"; Copland's Two Pieces for orchestra; Prokofieff's Violin concerto (Lea Luboshutz violinist) and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

37

"Song of the Earth" in Boston

MONITOR DEC. 8

By L. A. SLOPER

A CERTAIN dejection seems to have dominated of late in the music offered to its subscribers by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Within a few weeks we have heard the Third Symphony of Sibelius, the Eighth of Miaskovsky and the "Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin. ("Ecstasy," the noun, perhaps does not connote depression. But Miaskovsky at his gloomiest is a more cheerful fellow than the ecstatic Scriabin.) And on the eighth program, given this week, Serge Koussevitzky set Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde."

Mahler, the composer, is not without honor save outside his own country. Mahler, the conductor, was generally praised from Vienna to New York; but when he set down notes on ruled paper, the results divided the world into two sections, one of which was Central Europe. And even there, Germany is said to be far more restrained than Austria in its enthusiasm over Mahler's compositions. Until this week, Boston had known little of these works beyond the Second and the Fifth Symphonies, and some songs. Mr. Koussevitzky, back from his week's respite, proffered the first Boston performance of "The Song of the Earth," enlisting the services of Mme. Charles Cahier, the original singer of the contralto part, and Mr. George Meader, tenor.

A Wise Choice

Mr. Koussevitzky was well advised to select this work in preference to one of the earlier and more copious symphonies. He could not expect to impress Boston with the "Symphony of the Thousand." For was not Boston, half a century ago, the scene of a performance which employed 1000 instruments and 10,000 voices? Clearly the conductor was acting wisely when he chose this less exuberant work.

Clearly, too, Mahler's melancholy gained in effect by being set in succession to an example of the Russian variety. How could a Viennese —though an adopted one—take anything, even his own sorrow, too seriously? Tchaikovsky, Scriabin, Miaskovsky—they must lie on their backs, like naughty children, and scream their displeasure. Let us not blame them; it is their nature. But neither can we sympathize with them. Their grief lacks dignity. Their ululations end by boring us.

But the Mahler of this symphony for two voices and orchestra commands our respect, as a musician and as a man. For as a musician, although he has perhaps added nothing to the symphonic art, and even owes a rather patent debt to some of his predecessors, in particular Wagner, he nevertheless displays a vigorous melodic gift, a superior craftsmanship, a keen harmonic sense, a mastery of orchestral means. Here is an enormous orchestra, used for the most part as if for chamber music. Reliance is placed not on turgidity but on expressiveness. The musical material, like the emotion, is controlled. The man is revealed by his score. He suffers, but with fortitude; he grieves, but he is not too sorry for himself.

A Good Performance

The performance in most respects did justice to the music. It appeared in the first movement that either the composer or the conductor did not like tenors; perhaps it was that Mahler wrote for a German tenor. For every time that Mr. Meader started to sing, Mr. Koussevitzky gave his players a signal, and they scraped and blew as hard as they could. As Mr. Meader's voice, to begin with, was hardly adequate to the occasion, this successful exercise of superior force obliterated it, and we had the effect of a singer in the motion pictures in the days before the sound film was bestowed upon us. In his two other contributions Mr. Meader was more audible, but he left us wondering whether he understood the meaning of the words he was singing.

With Mme. Cahier it was quite another story. She sang without the aid of notes or lines, which is bound to add to the effectiveness of any interpretation. More than that, she sang with superb artistry and with rare musical intelligence. But even her singing could not make us overlook the exquisite beauty of the orchestral background, with its endlessly varied instrumentation. Of the instrumentalists, Mr. Laurent, the solo flute, deserves a special word for the charm of his playing in the last movement.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12. It was a performance distinguished by its sonority and balance. There was some sensitive solo work by Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz, violinists, and Bedetti, cellist. Nevertheless there is still room for betterment in the string ensemble. We should like not to be able to hear the concertmaster enter ahead of his colleagues. And we have a notion that if the conductor's beat were a little more definite this improvement would be achieved.

Dec. 8

ON POST, SATURD

MAHLER'S WORK BY SYMPHONY

"Song of the Earth" Given With Voices, First Time Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Already deeply in Mr. Koussevitzky's debt, the public of the Symphony Concerts has now been placed under further obligation to him for the performance yesterday afternoon and this evening of Gustav Mahler's "Song of the Earth," a masterpiece of modern music written 10 years ago but until yesterday unheard in Boston.

SIX CHINESE POEMS

Composed between the gigantic Eighth and the uncompleted Ninth symphonies, this "Song of the Earth" is itself styled a symphony for tenor, contralto and orchestra, and may therefore be considered the ninth of the monumental series of which Boston had thus far heard only the First, the Second and Fifth.

Although Mahler lived three years after composing this setting of six Chinese poems of the eighth and ninth centuries, he was fated never to hear the work that is now generally held to be the crown of his career. Not until six months after his death, in November of 1911, was this "Lied von der Erde" brought to performance. Alternately the six sections of the piece are assigned to the tenor and the contralto, and these voices in the current performances at Symphony Hall fall to George Meader and Mme. Charles Cahier respectively. No mere accompaniment, the orchestral portion, truly symphonic in caracter and scored with an imaginative ingenuity altogether remarkable, is for much of the time sufficient unto itself. There are lengthy preludes, interludes and postludes, and often the voice-part, as in the Wagnerian music-drama, is important only for its delivery of the text.

Marvelously Beautiful Finale

Like many another work of acknowledged greatness, this "Song of the Earth" is not throughout its length of even worth and interest. There are passages wherein Mahler seems to have written a music intellectually calculated, and passages in which the musical thought is so reticent and so restrained as to be almost inarticulate. But at its best, as in the ineffably sad yet marvellously beautiful final section, the "Farewell of a Friend," it calls to mind certain of the supreme things in music—the last quartets of Beethoven, the third act of Wagner's "Tristan." But little below this nobly sorrowful page is the second song, "Autumn Solitude," music of rare poignancy and haunting loveliness.

And oddly enough for Mahler, who had just finished his Symphony of the Thousand, this beauty is often evoked by the simplest musical and orchestral means. Despite the literal sentiments of the poem, the fifth son, the "Drunkard in Springtime" rises here and there to heights of beauty, as though the text were a sort of symbolism. And if the third song, "Of Youth" and the fourth "Of Beauty," seem by comparison rather light and superficial, they are fashioned exquisitely, and they bring the needed element of contrast into a work predominantly sombre in tone.

Mme. Cahier a Singer

The effect of the first song, the "Drinking Song of Earthy Woe," might have been better realized yesterday had a tenor of ampler voice than Mr. Meader been pitted against the sonorities of Mahler and the zeal of Mr. Koussevitzky. Elsewhere Mr. Meader could be better understood, while for Mme. Cahier there can be nothing but unqualified praise. As though transfigured by the music she, and conductor and orchestra with her, attained in the final movement to a memorable and moving eloquence.

Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, in B minor, began a concert in which, exceptionally, there was no intermission. The audience may be said to have received the Symphony of Mahler with warmth. After each movement Mr. Koussevitzky was forced to restrain by an admonishing hand the applause that broke forth, and at the end it found full vent.

character. TRANS. DEC. 7

Incidents and Prospects

Two of the younger brood of composers that Mr. Koussevitzky is ever ready to foster have place in the Symphony concerts of next week—Mr. Copland with Two Pieces for Orchestra: Mr. Martinu with music called "La Symphonie." Miss Luboschutz, a protegée of Josef Hofmann, will play the solo-part in Prokofiev's Concerto for Violin, unheard in Boston since Mr. Burgin introduced it four years ago. As antidote to these three, the concert—says the communiqué sweetly—will close with Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony."

Mr. Horovitz, returning to Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 23, to take leave of Boston for the season, proffers this program:

Prelude and Fugue (for organ) in D major—Chorale in G minor.....Bach
(Transcribed by Busoni)
Sonata in B-flat minor.....Chopin
Serenade for The Doll.....Debussy
Jeux d' Eaux.....Ravel
Funeralilles—Valse Oubliée—"Paganini-Study" in E-flat—Sonnet of Petrarch—Mephisto Waltz.....Liszt

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct through half the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people on Tuesday and Wednesday, Dec. 18 and 19. His numbers are two movements of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony; the Andante from Mendelssohn's Concerto for Violin (Mr. Burgin, violinist); the suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrushka."

TRAV. DEC. 8

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its second program of the Monday series in Symphony hall, next Monday evening; its ninth regular program on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening; and a pair of young people's concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday, Dec. 18 and 19, at 4 o'clock.

At the Friday and Saturday concerts he will produce a new piece of Martinu, the Czech composer, entitled "La Symphonie," and two pieces for orchestra by Aaron Copland. Miss Lea Luboshutz, as soloist, will appear with the orchestra in Prokofieff's violin concerto, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony will be the closing number.

There will be inovations in the pair of Young People's concerts, since Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the first three numbers, and Richard Burgin the last two. Introductory remarks will be made before each number by Alfred Dwyer, with stereopticon slides.

HAYES WEBBER

MAHLER NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Das Lied von der Erde" in First Boston Performance

Mme Charles Cahier and George Meader Heard in Vocal Solo Parts

At last, after an interval of a decade, the Boston Symphony audience yesterday was given an opportunity to hear music by Gustav Mahler, a composer who is regarded by some as one of the greatest of the past 50 years and by others as a voluminous writer with no genius. Mr Koussevitzky devoted almost the whole of yesterday's Symphony concert to Mahler's posthumous "Das Lied von der Erde," written in 1908 and first performed at Munich in 1911.

The exacting vocal solos were sung yesterday by Mme Charles Cahier, contralto, and George Meader, tenor. The concert began with Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, unheard here since 1905, in which the strings in the orchestra regained the tonal beauty and suavity which was once their constant glory. Owing to the unusual arrangement of the program, the customary intermission was omitted.

Mahler's work, never before given in Boston, is unique in structure. It is a curious experiment at combining the song cycle and the symphony. There are six parts, each with a vocal solo by either tenor or contralto interwoven with an elaborate orchestral background. Only in the last part is there a lengthy orchestral interlude. The texts are German adaptations of Chinese lyrics.

Mahler is said to have revised the translations he chose from a collection made by Hans Bethge so as to stress the underlying idea of his work, that youth, beauty and love are fleeting and illusory, yet perennial. "Das Lied von der Erde" is the valedictory of a man to whom life had not been kind. It comes from Mahler's inmost soul.

Those whose vague memories of Mahler's Second and Fifth Symphonies heard here under Dr Muck, led them to expect that "Das Lied von der Erde" would be ponderous, intricate, baffling music, were agreeably disappointed.

This score is not really simple, but it sounds so. There is a constant flow of beautiful melody and ingratiating rythm, always with a half mocking note, always with an undercurrent of hopeless melancholy, which wells up and overflows poignantly in the end of the final part.

Despair has never been more movingly expressed in music than here. The hysterics and histrionics of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" are not to be compared with it. Future historians are likely to note that the romantic movement in the arts ended in 1914. "Das Lied von der Erde" belongs to the era of Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung" and Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht." Its imaginative affinities are with Brahms and Wagner, not with Stravinsky or Hindemith, from whose work it is far removed as is a Schubert song from a Mozart air.

Mahler, judged by this work, was certainly a genius, but not a faultless one. His craftsmanship is that of a master, but he shares the worst fault of Wagner, needless prolixity. He might have said what he wanted to say in half the space with 10 times the effect on the average listener.

The performance was a sympathetic and eloquent one. Mr Koussevitzky may not always have respected the letter of Mahler's music, but he caught and rendered its spirit. Restraint, not usually one of Koussevitzky's qualities, here heightened the eloquence of an unusually satisfying reading.

Mme Cahier, who sasg at the original performance in Munich in 1911, brought to her solos the experience and authority without which it is impossible to convey the meaning of such music. Her singing was not flawless technically, but its imaginative insight was profound. She had memorized her part, in itself no mean feat of skill.

Mr Meader's singing, though technically good, lacked the insight and authority that distinguished Mme Cahier's admirable performance.

The Handel concerto, a particularly lovely one, was exceptionally well played. Mr Koussevitzky here also refrained from allowing his temperament to run away with him.

Next week's program is to include new works by Martinu and Aaron Copland, Prokofieff's violin concerto, in which the soloist will be Lea Luboshutz, and Beethoven's Sixth Symphony.

P. R.

MAHLER WORK NOVELTY AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

Enter Gustav Mahler at the symphony concerts of this week—Gustav Mahler, composer, much-maligned early in the century, until the ultra-modern revolt of the French and Russian schools made people forget him entirely. This man, whose sojourn in New York as conductor is said to have killed him, is represented on this week's program by "Das Lied von der Erde" (Song of the Earth), a huge symphony in six parts, with tenor and contralto solos voices singing alternately German translations of six Chinese lyrics.

Only a half-dozen times previously has Mahler been played at concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, mostly by the grace of Karl Muck. The ultra-moderns jeer at him as "old-hat," writing for a swollen orchestra instead of employing what they call economy of means. Well, there is more music in this one symphony, which was played here for the first time, than in nine-tenths of the modernists' output. Too often economy of means becomes synonymous with paucity of ideas.

Mahler's music goes to the very heart of the poems, which are pessimistic, sometimes in the manner of "Omar Khayam." The orchestra is a large one, but there is no abuse of the instruments. Two instruments are not used where one could suffice. At times the ensmble is treated like a chamber orchestra. At other times there are great orchestral climaxes. There is remarkable use of tone color; the individual instruments are admirably selected to serve the required purpose.

Madame Charles Cahier sang the contralto solo part beautifully. Once in a while her high tones seemed thin, but otherwise her voice was luscious, her interpretative skill exceptional. The tenor solo was for the most part inaudible. Whether this was due to the soloist, George Meader, to the composer, or to Mr. Koussevitsky in overdriving the orchestra we cannot say. Very likely a composer could write such beautiful music and be so adept at orchestration was not at fault in writing for the voice.

1928 Herald

MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

"Song of the Earth"

Dec 7

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings and Gustav Mahler's "Song of the Earth," which was performed for the first time, with Madame Charles Cahier, contralto, and George Maeder, tenor.

Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," composed in 1908, was produced at Munich in November, 1911. He had died in May of that year. Madame Cahier, who first came to Boston as Mrs. Morris Black, sang the contralto music at Munich. The first performance in the United Sttaes was at Philadelphia in 1916.

The work is a symphony in six parts for tenor and contralto (alternating), and orchestra. The text is taken from Hans Bethge's "The Chinese Flute," a collection of verses said to be written by Chinese poets of the 8th and 9th centuries. Whether Bethge's translations into German are not really paraphrases; whether he dealt with these poets as Fitzgerald treated Omar Khayyam is not known to us. It is said that Mahler changed the Chinese poems somewhat "to express one predominating idea, withdrawal from the world." As a young man he studied diligently German philosophical works, and in his later years of trials and disappointments, his philosophy was that of the pessimist. The sixth poem of the symphony is considered as the farewell to his artistic career, authough he wrote two symphonic works after "The Song of the Earth." He is alone; he awaits death, yet the earth will still bloom, the sky will still be blue, when he has at last found rest.

Those who without undue prejudice judge Mahler, the composer, admitting his faults, discussing them at length, dwelling on undeniably fine qualities, regard "The Song of the Earth" as his most complete, his highest achievement, though they assert that his artistic life was greater than his own musical works, which greatly planned, did not attain fulfilment and were often imitative. The sincerity of the composer was never doubted; the failure to secure that for which he strove, is therefore the more pathetic.

He was of an intensely nervous nature. His life as a conductor—and he was a great conductor— the feverish atmosphere of the opera house—his going from city to city until his ability was recognized in Vienna and later at the Metropolitan, the death of a dearly loved child, the fact that he was a Jew who had turned Catholic—these with musical intrigues and controversies from which he suffered, gave him no mental or aesthetic poise. It was his ambition to continue the work of men he revered, Beethoven and Wagner. In spite of his indisputable talent he was not the man to do this. In the nearer approaches to the ideal that was in his mind he was simply an imitator; not a convincing, not even a plausible one.

Boston has heard Mahler's second and fifth symphonies—huge "machines." What was found in them was found yesterday in "The Song of the Earth." Restlessness that at times became hysterical; reminders of Wagner, Berlioz, Strauss; melodies in folk-song vein, often naive, at times beautiful, but introduced as at random and quickly thrown aside; an over-employment of the wood-wind, used too often as solo instruments; passages for the brass which recall the fact that as a child Mahler delighted in military bands. Sudden changes from screaming outbursts to thin and inconsequential instrumentation; trivial moments when the hearer anticipated the movement of a country dance; diffuseness, prolixity that became boresome; an unwillingness to bring speech to an end; seldom genuine power or eloquence; yet here and there measures that linger in the memory. There is appropriate lightness and fantastic instrumentation in the sections "Of Youth" and "The Drunkard in Spring-time." The mood of the final section, gray and sad, would be impressive if it were not sustained beyond endurance. It was of this Finale that Adolf Weissman, who puts a high value on "The Song of the Earth," wrote: "It is an unforgettable experience to hear that 'Ewig' rendered by such a singer as Mme. Cahier in that mysterious, almost supernatural landscape . . . the farewell of a lonely spirit to a world in which it has dwelt as an alien."

What Weissman wrote of Mme. Cahier in Germany, may be said of her singing yesterday in Symphony Hall. It is seldom one hears in Boston a true contralto of so rich a voice, of so musical a nature, so alive to the spirit and significance of text and music. Mahler was more gracious in this work to the contralto than to the tenor; respecting more her voice in the orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Maeder, when Mahler allowed him, sang intelligently. Too often the part was not a grateful one. Mr. Koussevitzky spared no pains in the performance; gave the music its due importance, when it was important; the individual solos and the various orchestral ensembles great or only in sections of the orchestra would have pleased Mahler himself, who as a conductor was not easily satisfied.

After it is all over what is now in the memory: the concerto of Handel with that nobly serene and beautiful slow movement that only the superb Handel could have written; the singing of Mme. Cahier, with or without one's thought of Mahler; and the orchestra, led by Mr. Koussevitzky.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will comprise: Martinu's "La Symphonie"; Copland's Two Pieces for orchestra; Prokofieff's Violin concerto (Lea Luboshutz, violinist) and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

"Song of the Earth" in Boston

MONITOR DEC. 8

By L. A. SLOPER

A CERTAIN dejection seems to have dominated of late in the music offered to its subscribers by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Within a few weeks we have heard the Third Symphony of Sibelius, the Eighth of Miaskovsky and the "Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin. ("Ecstasy," the noun, perhaps does not connote depression. But Miaskovsky at his gloomiest is a more cheerful fellow than the ecstatic Scriabin.) And on the eighth program, given this week, Serge Koussevitzky set Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde."

Mahler, the composer, is not without honor save outside his own country. Mahler, the conductor, was generally praised from Vienna to New York; but when he set down notes on ruled paper, the results divided the world into two sections, one of which was Central Europe. And even there. Germany is said to be far more restrained than Austria in its enthusiasm over Mahler's compositions. Until this week, Boston had known little of these works beyond the Second and the Fifth Symphonies, and some songs. Mr. Koussevitzky, back from his week's respite, proffered the first Boston performance of "The Song of the Earth," enlisting the services of Mme. Charles Cahier, the original singer of the contralto part, and Mr. George Meader, tenor.

A Wise Choice

Mr. Koussevitzky was well advised to select this work in preference to one of the earlier and more copious symphonies. He could not expect to impress Boston with the "Symphony of the Thousand." For was not Boston, half a century ago, the scene of a performance which employed 1000 instruments and 10,000 voices? Clearly the conductor was acting wisely when he chose this less exuberant work.

Clearly, too, Mahler's melancholy gained in effect by being set in succession to an example of the Russian variety. How could a Viennese —though an adopted one—take anything, even his own sorrow, too seriously? Tchaikovsky, Scriabin, Miaskovsky—they must lie on their backs, like naughty children, and scream their displeasure. Let us not blame them; it is their nature. But neither can we sympathize with them. Their grief lacks dignity. Their ululations end by boring us.

But the Mahler of this symphony for two voices and orchestra commands our respect, as a musician and as a man. For as a musician, although he has perhaps added nothing to the symphonic art, and even owes a rather patent debt to some of his predecessors, in particular Wagner, he nevertheless displays a vigorous melodic gift, a superior craftsmanship, a keen harmonic sense, a mastery of orchestral means. Here is an enormous orchestra, used for the most part as if for chamber music. Reliance is placed not on turgidity but on expressiveness. The musical material, like the emotion, is controlled. The man is revealed by his score. He suffers, but with fortitude; he grieves, but he is not too sorry for himself.

A Good Performance

The performance in most respects did justice to the music. It appeared in the first movement that either the composer or the conductor did not like tenors; perhaps it was that Mahler wrote for a German tenor. For every time that Mr. Meader started to sing, Mr. Koussevitzky gave his players a signal, and they scraped and blew as hard as they could. As Mr. Meader's voice, to begin with, was hardly adequate to the occasion, this successful exercise of superior force obliterated it, and we had the effect of a singer in the motion pictures in the days before the sound film was bestowed upon us. In his two other contributions Mr. Meader was more audible, but he left us wondering whether he understood the meaning of the words he was singing.

With Mme. Cahier it was quite another story. She sang without the aid of notes or lines, which is bound to add to the effectiveness of any interpretation. More than that, she sang with superb artistry and with rare musical intelligence. But even her singing could not make us overlook the exquisite beauty of the orchestral background, with its endlessly varied instrumentation. Of the instrumentalists, Mr. Laurent, the solo flute, deserves a special word for the charm of his playing in the last movement.

Mr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12. It was a performance distinguished by its sonority and balance. There was some sensitive solo work by Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz, violinists, and Bedetti, cellist. Nevertheless there is still room for betterment in the string ensemble. We should like not to be able to hear the concertmaster enter ahead of his colleagues. And we have a notion that if the conductor's beat were a little more definite this improvement would be achieved.

Dec. 8

ON POST, SATURD

MAHLER'S WORK BY SYMPHONY

"Song of the Earth" Given With Voices, First Time Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Already deeply in Mr. Koussevitzky's debt, the public of the Symphony Concerts has now been placed under further obligation to him for the performance yesterday afternoon and this evening of Gustav Mahler's "Song of the Earth," a masterpiece of modern music written 10 years ago but until yesterday unheard in Boston.

SIX CHINESE POEMS

Composed between the gigantic Eighth and the uncompleted Ninth symphonies, this "Song of the Earth" is itself styled a symphony for tenor, contralto and orchestra, and may therefore be considered the ninth of the monumental series of which Boston had thus far heard only the First, the Second and Fifth.

Although Mahler lived three years after composing this setting of six Chinese poems of the eighth and ninth centuries, he was fated never to hear the work that is now generally held to be the crown of his career. Not until six months after his death, in November of 1911, was this "Lied von der Erde" brought to performance. Alternately the six sections of the piece are assigned to the tenor and the contralto, and these voices in the current performances at Symphony Hall fall to George Meader and Mme. Charles Cahier respectively. No mere accompaniment, the orchestral portion, truly symphonic in caracter and scored with an imaginative ingenuity altogether remarkable, is for much of the time sufficient unto itself. There are lengthy preludes, interludes and postludes, and often the voice-part, as in the Wagnerian music-drama, is important only for its delivery of the text.

Marvelously Beautiful Finale

Like many another work of acknowledged greatness, this "Song of the Earth" is not throughout its length of even worth and interest. There are passages wherein Mahler seems to have written a music intellectually calculated, and passages in which the musical thought is so reticent and so restrained as to be almost inarticulate. But at its best, as in the ineffably sad yet marvellously beautiful final section, the "Farewell of a Friend," it calls to mind certain of the supreme things in music—the last quartets of Beethoven, the third act of Wagner's "Tristan." But little below this nobly sorrowful page is the second song, "Autumn Solitude," music of rare poignancy and haunting loveliness.

And oddly enough for Mahler, who had just finished his Symphony of the Thousand, this beauty is often evoked by the simplest musical and orchestral means. Despite the literal sentiments of the poem, the fifth son, the "Drunkard in Springtime" rises here and there to heights of beauty, as though the text were a sort of symbolism. And if the third song, "Of Youth" and the fourth "Of Beauty," seem by comparison rather light and superficial, they are fashioned exquisitely, and they bring the needed element of contrast into a work predominantly sombre in tone.

Mme. Cahier a Singer

The effect of the first song, the "Drinking Song of Earthy Woe," might have been better realized yesterday had a tenor of ampler voice than Mr. Meader been pitted against the sonorities of Mahler and the zeal of Mr. Koussevitzky. Elsewhere Mr. Meader could be better understood, while for Mme. Cahier there can be nothing but unqualified praise. As though transfigured by the music she, and conductor and orchestra with her, attained in the final movement to a memorable and moving eloquence.

Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12, in B minor, began a concert in which, exceptionally, there was no intermission. The audience may be said to have received the Symphony of Mahler with warmth. After each movement Mr. Koussevitzky was forced to restrain by an admonishing hand the applause that broke forth, and at the end it found full vent.

38

Symphony

Rare Music, Rarely Sung, And Played

DEC 8 — TRANS.

In "The Song of The Earth" Mahler Returns Signally To Symphony Hall

BETWEEN three and four o'clock yesterday afternoon, the return of Mahler to the Symphony Concerts was successfully accomplished. He had been absent for eleven years, since Mr. Monteux's resurrection of his First Symphony was little more than disinterment of uncharacteristic work. In our changeful concert-halls few memories bridge such an interval with any surety; while those that vaguely recalled the performance of Mahler's Second Symphony and the repetitions of his Fifth under Dr. Muck were scantily prepared for Mr. Koussevitzky's choice, "The Song of the Earth." The Second is a huge machine for orchestra, chorus, solo-singers. The Fifth taxes the resources of a full modern orchestra; whereas the Ninth, as some choose to number the piece of Friday, is written for two singing voices and an orchestra, as the conductor chose to constitute it, of no unusual dimensions.

In one respect, all three are kin: for an hour and upward they ask an attentive ear. There is, indeed, no pause in "The Song of The Earth," though one might reasonably be made after the music of the springtime spree, before the tone-poem—for it is nothing less—with which Mahler continues to climax and close. Mr. Koussevitzky preferred no halt and through an hour and ten minutes kept the audience intent. Nor above the usual were the disturbances of Friday afternoon. Those who seemingly seek a concert only for the pleasure of leaving it, slipped out after this or that song; one incomer forced herself through doors ostensibly barred; in spite of the conductor's vigorous signalling, two women in the upper balcony clapped loud and often solitary at the end of each division. All this, however, is relative peace at a symphonic matinée, by which sign Mahler may still hold an audience.

No doubt the voices of Mme. Cahier and Mr. Meader, though now and again the orchestra overclouded him, helped to lay this spell. Not often in this Koussevitzkian day do the Symphony Concerts proffer an hour of alternate song, single-voiced. Mme. Cahier's alto-tones are still firm, warm, vibrant, many-hued. The Mahlerian intricacies and exactions nothing daunt her. To her share of "The Song of the Earth," especially through the obbligato to the final symphonic poem, she has long brought understanding and sympathy. With voice, mind and heart she sings it, deepening. Mr. Meader was more detachedly intelligent, more obviously studious with the tenor numbers. His tones were also dryer.

Though the apostles call "The Song of The Earth" a symphony, it is in fact a cycle of six songs for tenor or alto voice with orchestra, the last of which expands into nearly half the whole as self-contained tone-poem twenty-five minutes long. The analogue is none of Mahler's symphonies, but the "Songs of a Wandering Journeyman," possibly by a few remembered likewise from Dr. Muck's time. Because "The Song of The Earth" happened to be the last music that Mahler wrote—in declining health and toil-weary spirit; because the last of the songs happens to bear title, "Farewell of a Friend," taking leave of the active world as well as of his companion, one and another commentator expatiates at length upon it and upon the other five, as embodiment of the composer's state of mind in his final years toward all men and things. They quote him as implying as much in occasional words to friends about the new piece. The speculation is interesting, when it does not run to superfluous length and conjecture; but the quality of the music and the verses depends little upon it. That music is diversified in form, substance and style; it escapes many of the shortcomings familiarly attributed to Mahler's symphonies; it illustrates variously his command of his medium. Often it touches beauty; occasionally a mournful, brooding, power; seldom does it lack interest or stimulus; while the quasi-exotic verse that it bears and clothes yields its own suggestion.

The first song—"The Drinking Song of Earthly Woe"—is appreciably Omaresque without the Persian poet's relieving irony of mood. Lament, thrice repeated, haunts it—"Darksome is life and death as darksome"—lament over the woe and waste, the tawdriness and the paltriness of human desires and human attainment. Between, the poet bids to wine and song and pleasure. Even so, gruesome images haunt him and apes sit ghostly and mocking on the tombs of men. The second piece—"Autumn Solitude"—broods upon the mists and frosts and winds corroding the dead earth; the weariness and melancholy as sleep and chill upon [illegible] human spirit.

Then swift change of mood and intent. "Of Youth" is the third poem in which the poet pictures the companions of many a willow-patterned plate at play with love, verses and friendly pastime, in their bridged summer-house, while beneath, the tranquil waters reflect the sheen of the colors that clothe them or the face of a crescent moon. The fourth poem, "Of Beauty," is picturing again—of maidens watchfully dawdling by the edge of the stream that they may look upon the young cavaliers in martial play across it, the careering horses, the racing masterful men. As they gaze love quickens their hearts, speaks from their eyes. The fifth poem continues this sportive and pictorial intent, but now a touch of humor broadens it. The verse celebrates "The Springtime Spree." Sun shines, birds sing, earth blossoms; the joy of living stirs: yet cups are cups, and maybe the best means to vernal rejoicing. From morn to eve the toper spares them not. . . . The sixth and final poem—"Farewell"—returns to the weary disillusion of the spent spirit in a barren world, expands and intensifies it. Nightfall, stillness and solitude descend upon an empty place. There stands friend waiting friend in mournfully expectant revery. The companion comes, but for wistful, dolorous, mystical leave-taking. . . .

Symphony, it may have pleased Mahler to call these songs of the earth, while some esoteric design may have given his acute and imaginative mind reason for the designation; but in the music there is no hint of symphonic structure. Tonally each of the six songs is a self-contained entity with no motivs or allusions to motivs to bind it to those that have preceded or will follow. The unity of design, such as it is, is a unity of matter, style and mood rather than of form and symbol. All the verses are verses of Chinese poets; often in the music, especially in the lighter middle pieces, the modulations and progressions, the instrumental and harmonic color, bear Chinese suggestion or what passes for it in the West. The first of the songs mourns the burden and the disillusion of living and doing; the vanity and the hollowness of terrestrial things; bids man turn to pleasure as solace for himself and bane of the ghosts that haunt him. The second song refines upon this weary and wo-ful brooding. The third and fourth refine upon the pleasures that may for the time dispel it; the fifth turns them in another and homelier face. The sixth concentrates and consummates the woe of weariness, the disenchantment of striving, the longing for rest and parting from a world of the unfulfilled, yesterday, today, forever, time without end.

Ever-present in words and music is the age-old earth. In the first and the final songs it renews itself in bloom and strength while man wastes and passes. Or it is chill; empty and silent as in the second and, again, the last, of the soliloquies. Through the middle numbers it is seat of youth and sensuous desires, zestful, joyous, light-bathed. In such quality and course, within as well as without, not in any ordered symphonic structure, lies the unified design and the unified impression of this song-book—Mahler's. Ecclesiastes or the Preacher in tones: "One generation passeth away and another generation cometh; but the earth abideth forever."

Contrary to Mahler's usual predilection for long-breathed, far-flung themes, the several songs spring from short motivs—one, two or three to each piece; in the final number many times repeated in more and more fragmentary iteration. These motivs are developed, transformed, interwoven, colored and harmonically enriched by the orchestra, while the tenor or the alto voice—in alternation through the six pieces—unfolds the verses in unsparing declamation. Sometimes Mahler uses a full orchestra in the modern sense of the word but never heavily or obscuringly. From four-score instruments and more, he can draw surprisingly light and glittering tone. Again, he prefers a fragment of his forces as when, more than once, he confides mournful melodies to violas, oboes, clarinets, horns, as though he would give them a single piercing voice. Seldom has he been more resourceful and versatile of hand, lighter of stroke and fancy, more sensitive and imaginative with harmonic and instrumental means than in the Chinese coloring that fills the songs of youth and beauty.

Often the music is intricate no less to eye than to ear; yet complex as are the means, it eventuates, page after page, in rare simplicity and directness of impression. Only with the setting of the final song—a veritable symphonic poem to which the alto voice is intermittent obbligato—comes suggestion of music overworked until it is stripped bare and dry. Even there, intensity of mood, the unescapable personal note, save the day. Mahler is emptying his spirit of the stuff that haunted and harried it, stirring his hearers to sympathy and relief. He is writing his tone-poem of the unfulfilled for testament and memory. He has earned his lengths. Forgive him his repetitions.

Nowhere has Mahler written with more lightness than in the Song of Youth, a willow-pattern in Chinese tones, piquant with rhythm, bright with color, plastic of motion, delicate of suggestion, simple always—the silken sheen of exotic music. Beside it goes the Song of Beauty when it pictures the maidens plucking the lotus flowers by the stream, eyes raised and shining toward the swains at their sport beyond the bank. They afford the contrasting passage—of the racing steeds—in which Mahler churns the orchestra into fiery motion flinging off as fiery colors. In the song of the springtime spree he summons the homeliness of voice that often sings out of the journeyman's songs; for like many a Viennese composer from Beethoven to Bruckner and beyond, Mahler knows peasant humor.

In this song of the toper, moreover, when the bird sings down to him, when from sky to earth the world blooms around him, Mahler paints in his brightest tonal colors. At the other end of his palette are the tints that blend into an illusory tone-picture of the chill and dead autumnal earth in the second song and of the empty and toil-worn earth wrapped in the solace of the sleep that is forgetting. Perhaps the final measures of this song of farewell are the last that Mahler set to paper—drooping horns, wistful oboe, mourning strings, the sighing and visioning voice. If they are so, then at the end he gained for an instant his goal of a music that into beauty should open dreams and secrets. . . . Such a piece was bound to kindle Mr. Koussevitzky. To Mahler's orchestral mastery he joined his own. The exotic touches his fancy and quickens his hand—and here through the middle pieces ran a Chinoiserie. And what Russian has thought more darkly of the world and the soul, stretched himself upon a sharper rack of disillusion than this Bohemian-Austrian Jew; out of such obsession vanished into ghostly shadows. The conductor, re-creating, matched the temperament that had created—and better shunned excess.

H. T. P.

BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1928

Mr. Koussevitzky will bring out on Dec. 21 Ernest Bloch's rhapsody "America" which won the $3000 prize sponsored by Musical America. The rhapsody will be performed simultaneously by Boston Symphony orchestra, the N. Y. Philharmonic Society of New York, and the Philadelphia, Chicago, San Francisco Symphony orchestras (Mascagni's opera "Le Maschere" was performed simultaneously in seven Italian theatres on the evening of Jan. 1901).

The title page of the rhapsody bears as a motto Walt Whitman's "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you" and there is this dedication: "This symphony has been written in love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith in its future, it is dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision upheld its inspiration."

The rhapsody is in three movements. I. 1620—the soil, the Indians, England, the Mayflower, the landing of the Pilgrims. II. An old southern song opens the movement. There are old reels, hornpipes, Stephen Foster's melodies—a tragic end; Whitman's "Captain." III. "Jazz, materialism, rush and nervous desperation are the keynotes of the beginning of the finale. There follow more idealistic and prophetic strains, and at last the anthem proclaiming with all the power of the orchestra: 'America! America!'"

Mr. Bloch hopes that "this anthem will become known and beloved, that the audience will rise to sing it, becoming thus an active and enthusiastic part of the work and its message of faith and hope."

The huge orchestra will include besides various drums, a gong, wood box, two anvils (one higher than the other, struck with a hammer), one steel plate (deep, struck with a heavy hammer), and one automobile horn (ad lib.). "Ad lib"! Let us surely have this horn.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE Dec 9

Mr Koussevitzky has chosen for the regular concerts this week an attractive program with Beethoven's Sixth Symphony and novelties by the young American composer, Copland, and the Czech Martinu. Copland seems to the Globe reviewer the most notable talent yet discovered among Americans under 40. The last work of his heard here was a jazz concerto which roused much discussion. Martinu has been but once before represented on Boston programs, by a tone poem, "The Tumult," which did not strike the Globe reviewer as interesting or important. Both novelties are likely to be in the modernist style so obnoxious to musical conservatives.

There will be innovations in the pair of Young People's concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoon, Dec 18 and 19, at 4 o'clock. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the first three numbers, and Richard Burgin the last two. Introductory remarks will be made before each number by Alfred Meyer, with stereopticon slides. The program will include the slow movement and finale of Haydn's "Surprise" symphony; the Andante from Mendelssohn's violin concerto, with Richard Burgin as soloist; Stravinsky's suite from the Ballet, "Petrouchka"; Larghetto from Mozart's horn concerto, with Georg Boettcher as soloist, and Dance of the Sylphs, and Rakoczy March by Berlioz.

A block of seats is on sale at Symphony Hall, and the remainder will be distributed through the schools of Greater Boston, in the usual fashion.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Two numbers by contemporary composers of importance will have their first public performances at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. They will be the latest score of Martinu, the Czech composer, entitled "La Symphonie," and two pieces for orchestra, by Aaron Copland. Serge Koussevitzky will also conduct Prokofieff's violin concerto, with Miss Lea Luboshutz, as soloist. The program will close with Beethoven's "Pastorale" symphony.

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Tomorrow evening in Symphony hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky, will give the second concert of the regular Monday evening series. The program will include: Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; Strauss's dance of Salome, from the opera, "Salome"; Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

There will be innovations in the pair of Young People's concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Symphony hall, on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, Dec. 18 and 19, at 4 o'clock. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the first three numbers, Mr. Burgin the last two. Introductory remarks will be made before each number by Alfred Meyer, with stereopticon slides. The program will include the slow movement and finale of Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, the Andante from Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Mr. Burgin, soloist; Stravinsky's Suite from "Petrouchka"; Larghetto from Mozart's horn concerto, Mr. Boettcher, soloist, and Dance of the Sylphs, and Rakoczy march by Berlioz.

A block of seats is on sale at Symphony hall. The remainder will be distributed through the schools of greater Boston, in the usual fashion.

Incidents and Prospects

Possibly the annual obsession over Christmas is not such a peril to concerts as is customary to believe. Possibly not a few continue to take their pleasures where they usually find them; while possibly, yet again, it all depends upon the concert. Anyhow, on the Sunday before Christmas, Dec. 23, Mr. Horowitz will play the piano at Symphony Hall and were it mid-October, the inquiry for tickets could not be brisker. On the same evening the English Singers will re-appear at Symphony Hall—by every sign to the largest audience they have yet won in Boston.

Three concerts in a single day are nothing strange in Boston; but three of notable quality in the same afternoon are unusual. They are announced for Saturd[illegible] Miss Hess in Jordan Hall; Mme. Frijsh [illegible] Hotel Statler; the Prague Teachers' Ch[illegible] of men in Symphony Hall for its first appearance in America.

To the credit of Mr. Koussevitzky and the management of the Symphony Orchestra, they declined promptly the symphony of Atterberg that won the Schubert Centenary Prize only to become the laughing-stock of Europe and America. Most of the better orchestras on this side of the Atlantic were like-minded. Thus far, only Mr. Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Society in New York have ventured it.

H. T. P.

[illegible] with a bubbli[illegible]

Indefinite Term

Mr. Koussevitzky's New Arrangement with the Symphony Orchestra

COMOEDIA, the Parisian journal of music and the theater, learns from its correspondent in New York that Mr. Koussevitzky's term as conductor of the Boston Orchestra has been extended indefinitely, to the satisfaction of all concerned. His preceding contract with the trustees expired at the end of the current season. The new arrangement, which replaces it, sets no limit to his stay, leaving it, virtually, to his own pleasure as the years may run. According to the correspondent Mr. Koussevitzky's salary "exceeds all expectations." That, however, is a matter with which only he himself and the trustees have to do.

TRANS. 8

38 ymphony

Rare Music, Rarely Sung, And Played

DEC 8 — TRANS.

In "The Song of The Earth" Mahler Returns Signally To Symphony Hall

BETWEEN three and four o'clock yesterday afternoon, the return of Mahler to the Symphony Concerts was successfully accomplished. He had been absent for eleven years, since Mr. Monteux's resurrection of his First Symphony was little more than disinterment of uncharacteristic work. In our changeful concert-halls few memories bridge such an interval with any surety; while those that vaguely recalled the performance of Mahler's Second Symphony and the repetitions of his Fifth under Dr. Muck were scantily prepared for Mr. Koussevitzky's choice, "The Song of the Earth." The Second is a huge machine for orchestra, chorus, solo-singers. The Fifth taxes the resources of a full modern orchestra; whereas the Ninth, as some choose to number the piece of Friday, is written for two singing voices and an orchestra, as the conductor chose to constitute it, of no unusual dimensions.

In one respect, all three are kin: for an hour and upward they ask an attentive ear. There is, indeed, no pause in "The Song of The Earth," though one might reasonably be made after the music of the springtime spree, before the tone-poem—for it is nothing less—with which Mahler continues to climax and close. Mr. Koussevitzky preferred no halt and through an hour and ten minutes kept the audience intent. Nor above the usual were the disturbances of Friday afternoon. Those who seemingly seek a concert only for the pleasure of leaving it, slipped out after this or that song; one incomer forced herself through doors ostensibly barred; in spite of the conductor's vigorous signalling, two women in the upper balcony clapped loud and often solitary at the end of each division. All this, however, is relative peace at a symphonic matinée, by which sign Mahler may still hold an audience.

No doubt the voices of Mme. Cahier and Mr. Meader, though now and again the orchestra overclouded him, helped to lay this spell. Not often in this Koussevitzkian day do the Symphony Concerts proffer an hour of alternate song, single-voiced. Mme. Cahier's alto-tones are still firm, warm, vibrant, many-hued. The Mahlerian intricacies and exactions nothing daunt her. To her share of "The Song of the Earth," especially through the obbligato to the final symphonic poem, she has long brought understanding and sympathy. With voice, mind and heart she sings it, deepening. Mr. Meader was more detachedly intelligent, more obviously studious with the tenor numbers. His tones were also dryer.

Though the apostles call "The Song of The Earth" a symphony, it is in fact a cycle of six songs for tenor or alto voice with orchestra, the last of which expands into nearly half the whole as self-contained tone-poem twenty-five minutes long. The analogue is none of Mahler's symphonies, but the "Songs of a Wandering Journeyman," possibly by a few remembered likewise from Dr. Muck's time. Because "The Song of The Earth" happened to be the last music that Mahler wrote—in declining health and toil-weary spirit; because the last of the songs happens to bear title, "Farewell of a Friend," taking leave of the active world as well as of his companion, one and another commentator expatiates at length upon it and upon the other five, as embodiment of the composer's state of mind in his final years toward all men and things. They quote him as implying as much in occasional words to friends about the new piece. The speculation is interesting, when it does not run to superfluous length and conjecture; but the quality of the music and the verses depends little upon it. That music is diversified in form, substance and style; it escapes many of the shortcomings familiarly attributed to Mahler's symphonies; it illustrates variously his command of his medium. Often it touches beauty; occasionally a mournful, brooding, power; seldom does it lack interest or stimulus; while the quasi-exotic verse that it bears and clothes yields its own suggestion.

The first song—"The Drinking Song of Earthly Woe"—is appreciably Omaresque without the Persian poet's relieving irony of mood. Lament, thrice repeated, haunts it—"Darksome is life and death as darksome"—lament over the woe and waste, the tawdriness and the paltriness of human desires and human attainment. Between, the poet bids to wine and song and pleasure. Even so, gruesome images haunt him and apes sit ghostly and mocking on the tombs of men. The second piece—"Autumn Solitude"—broods upon the mists and frosts and winds corroding the dead earth; the weariness and melancholy as deep and chill upon spent human spirit.

Then swift change of mood and intent. "Of Youth" is the third poem in which the poet pictures the companions of many a willow-patterned plate at play with love, verses and friendly pastime, in their bridged summer-house, while beneath, the tranquil waters reflect the sheen of the colors that clothe them or the face of a crescent moon. The fourth poem, "Of Beauty," is picturing again—of maidens watchfully dawdling by the edge of the stream that they may look upon the young cavaliers in martial play across it, the careering horses, the racing masterful men. As they gaze love quickens their hearts, speaks from their eyes. The fifth poem continues this sportive and pictorial intent, but now a touch of humor broadens it. The verse celebrates "The Springtime Spree." Sun shines, birds sing, earth blossoms; the joy of living stirs; yet cups are cups, and maybe the best means to vernal rejoicing. From morn to eve the toper spares them not. . . . The sixth and final poem—"Farewell"—returns to the weary disillusion of the spent spirit in a barren world, expands and intensifies it. Nightfall, stillness and solitude descend upon an empty place. There stands friend waiting friend in mournfully expectant revery. The companion comes, but for wistful, dolorous, mystical leave-taking. . . .

Symphony, it may have pleased Mahler to call these songs of the earth, while some esoteric design may have given his acute and imaginative mind reason for the designation; but in the music there is no hint of symphonic structure. Tonally each of the six songs is a self-contained entity with no motivs or allusions to motivs to bind it to those that have preceded or will follow. The unity of design, such as it is, is a unity of matter, style and mood rather than of form and symbol. All the verses are verses of Chinese poets; often in the music, especially in the lighter middle pieces, the modulations and progressions, the instrumental and harmonic color, bear Chinese suggestion or what passes for it in the West. The first of the songs mourns the burden and the disillusion of living and doing; the vanity and the hollowness of terrestrial things; bids man turn to pleasure as solace for himself and bane to the ghosts that haunt him. The second song refines upon this weary and woful brooding. The third and fourth refine upon the pleasures that may for the time dispel it; the fifth turns them in another and homelier face. The sixth concentrates and consummates the woe of weariness, the disenchantment of striving, the longing for rest and parting from a world of the unfulfilled, yesterday, today, forever, time without end.

Ever-present in words and music is the age-old earth. In the first and the final songs it renews itself in bloom and strength while man wastes and passes. Or it is chill; empty and silent as in the second and, again, the last, of the soliloquies. Through the middle numbers it is seat of youth and sensuous desires, zestful, joyous, light-bathed. In such quality and course, within as well as without, not in any ordered symphonic structure, lies the unified design and the unified impression of this song-book—Mahler's Ecclesiastes or the Preacher in tones: "One generation passeth away and another generation cometh; but the earth abideth forever."

Contrary to Mahler's usual predilection for long-breathed, far-flung themes, the several songs spring from short motivs—one, two or three to each piece; in the final number many times repeated in more and more fragmentary iteration. These motivs are developed, transformed, interwoven, colored and harmonically enriched by the orchestra, while the tenor or the alto voice—in alternation through the six pieces—unfolds the verses in unsparing declamation. Sometimes Mahler uses a full orchestra in the modern sense of the word but never heavily or obscuringly. From four-score instruments and more, he can draw surprisingly light and glittering tone. Again, he prefers a fragment of his forces as when, more than once, he confides mournful melodies to violas, oboes, clarinets, horns, as though he would give them a single piercing voice. Seldom has he been more resourceful and versatile of hand, lighter of stroke and fancy, more sensitive and imaginative with harmonic and instrumental means than in the Chinese coloring that fills the songs of youth and beauty.

Often the music is intricate no less to eye than to ear; yet complex as are the means, it eventuates, page after page, in rare simplicity and directness of impression. Only with the setting of the final song—a veritable symphonic poem to which the alto voice is intermittent obbligato—comes suggestion of music overworked until it is stripped bare and dry. Even there, intensity of mood, the unescapable personal note, save the day. Mahler is emptying his spirit of the stuff that haunted and harried it, stirring his hearers to sympathy and relief. He is writing his tone-poem of the unfulfilled for testament and memory. He has earned his lengths. Forgive him his repetitions.

Nowhere has Mahler written with more lightness than in the Song of Youth, a willow-pattern in Chinese tones, piquant with rhythm, bright with color, plastic of motion, delicate of suggestion, simple always—the silken sheen of exotic music. Beside it goes the Song of Beauty when it pictures the maidens plucking the lotus flowers by the stream, eyes raised and shining toward the swains at their sport beyond the bank. They afford the contrasting passage—of the racing steeds—in which Mahler churns the orchestra into fiery motion flinging off as fiery colors. In the song of the springtime spree he summons the homeliness of voice that often sings out of the journeyman's songs; for like many a Viennese composer from Beethoven to Bruckner and beyond, Mahler knows peasant humor.

In this song of the toper, moreover, when the bird sings down to him, when from sky to earth the world blooms around him, Mahler paints in his brightest tonal colors. At the other end of his palette are the tints that blend into as illusory tone-picture of the chill and dead autumnal earth in the second song and of the empty and toil-worn earth wrapped in the solace of the sleep that is forgetting. Perhaps the final measures of this song of farewell are the last that Mahler set to paper—drooping horns, wistful oboe, mourning strings, the sighing and visioning voice. If they are so, then at the end he gained for an instant his goal of a music that into beauty should open dreams and secrets. . . . Such a piece was bound to kindle Mr. Koussevitzky. To Mahler's orchestral mastery he joined his own. The exotic touches his fancy and quickens his hand—and here through the middle pieces ran a Chinoiserie. And what Russian has thought more darkly of the world and the soul, stretched himself upon a sharper rack of disillusion than this Bohemian-Austrian Jew; out of such obsession vanished into ghostly shadows. The conductor, re-creating, matched the temperament that had created—and better shunned excess.

H. T. P.

Mr. Koussevitzky will bring out on Dec. 21 Ernest Bloch's rhapsody "America" which won the $3000 prize sponsored by Musical America. The rhapsody will be performed simultaneously by Boston Symphony orchestra, the N. Y. Philharmonic Society of New York, and the Philadelphia, Chicago, San Francisco Symphony orchestras (Mascagni's opera "Le Maschere" was performed simultaneously in seven Italian theatres on the evening of Jan. 1, 1901).

The title page of the rhapsody bears as a motto Walt Whitman's "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you" and there is this dedication: "This symphony has been written in love for this country. In reverence to its past, in faith in its future, it is dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision upheld its inspiration."

The rhapsody is in three movements. I. 1620—the soil, the Indians, England, the Mayflower, the landing of the Pilgrims. II. An old southern song opens the movement. There are old reels, hornpipes, Stephen Foster's melodies—a tragic end; Whitman's "Captain." III. "Jazz, materialism, rush and nervous desperation are the keynotes of the beginning of the finale. There follow more idealistic and prophetic strains, and at last the anthem proclaiming with all the power of the orchestra: 'America! America!'"

Mr. Bloch hopes that "this anthem will become known and beloved, that the audience will rise to sing it, becoming thus an active and enthusiastic part of the work and its message of faith and hope."

The huge orchestra will include besides various drums, a gong, wood box, two anvils (one higher than the other, struck with a hammer), one steel plate (deep, struck with a heavy hammer), and one automobile horn (ad lib.). "Ad lib"! Let us surely have this horn.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE DEC 9

Mr Koussevitzky has chosen for the regular concerts this week an attractive program with Beethoven's Sixth Symphony and novelties by the young American composer, Copland, and the Czech Martinu. Copland seems to the Globe reviewer the most notable talent yet discovered among Americans under 40. The last work of his heard here was a jazz concerto which roused much discussion. Martinu has been but once before represented on Boston programs, by a tone poem, "The Tumult," which did not strike the Globe reviewer as interesting or important. Both novelties are likely to be in the modernist style so obnoxious to musical conservatives.

There will be innovations in the pair of Young People's concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoon, Dec 18 and 19, at 4 o'clock. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the first three numbers, and Richard Burgin the last two. Introductory remarks will be made before each number by Alfred Meyer, with stereopticon slides. The program will include the slow movement and finale of Haydn's "Surprise" symphony; the Andante from Mendelssohn's violin concerto, with Richard Burgin as soloist; Stravinsky's suite from the Ballet, "Petrouchka"; Larghetto from Mozart's horn concerto, with Georg Boettcher as soloist, and Dance of the Sylphs, and Rakoczy March by Berlioz.

A block of seats is on sale at Symphony Hall, and the remainder will be distributed through the schools of Greater Boston, in the usual fashion.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Two numbers by contemporary composers of importance will have their first public performances at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. They will be the latest score of Martinu, the Czech composer, entitled "La Symphonie," and two pieces for orchestra, by Aaron Copland. Serge Koussevitzky will also conduct Prokofieffe's violin concerto, with Miss Lea Luboshutz, as soloist. The program will close with Beethoven's "Pastorale" symphony.

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

Tomorrow evening in Symphony hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Koussevitzky, will give the second concert of the regular Monday evening series. The program will include: Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; Strauss's dance of Salome, from the opera, "Salome"; Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

There will be innovations in the pair of Young People's concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Symphony hall, on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons, Dec. 18 and 19, at 4 o'clock. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the first three numbers, Mr. Burgin the last two. Introductory remarks will be made before each number by Alfred Meyer, with stereopticon slides. The program will include the slow movement and finale of Haydn's "Surprise" symphony, the Andante from Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Mr. Burgin, soloist; Stravinsky's Suite from "Petrouchka"; Larghetto from Mozart's horn concerto, Mr. Boettcher, soloist, and Dance of the Sylphs, and Rakoczy march by Berlioz.

A block of seats is on sale at Symphony hall. The remainder will be distributed through the schools of greater Boston, in the usual fashion.

Incidents and Prospects

Possibly the annual obsession over Christmas is not such a peril to concerts as is customary to believe. Possibly not a few continue to take their pleasures where they usually find them; while possibly, yet again, it all depends upon the concert. Anyhow, on the Sunday before Christmas, Dec. 23, Mr. Horowitz will play the piano at Symphony Hall and were it mid-October, the inquiry for tickets could not be brisker. On the same evening the English Singers will re-appear at Symphony Hall—by every sign to the largest audience they have yet won in Boston.

Three concerts in a single day are nothing strange in Boston; but three of notable quality in the same afternoon are unusual. They are announced for Saturday [illegible] Miss Hess in Jordan Hall; Mme. Frijsh [illegible] Hotel Statler; the Prague Teachers' Choir of men in Symphony Hall for its first appearance in America.

To the credit of Mr. Koussevitzky and the management of the Symphony Orchestra, they declined promptly the symphony of Atterberg that won the Schubert Centenary Prize only to become the laughing-stock of Europe and America. Most of the better orchestras on this side of the Atlantic were like-minded. Thus far, only Mr. Mengelberg and the Philharmonic Society in New York have ventured it.

H. T. P.

[illegible] with a bubbli[illegible]

Indefinite Term

Mr. Koussevitzky's New Arrangement with the Symphony Orchestra

COMOEDIA, the Parisian journal of music and the theater, learns from its correspondent in New York that Mr. Koussevitzky's term as conductor of the Boston Orchestra has been extended indefinitely, to the satisfaction of all concerned. His preceding contract with the trustees expired at the end of the current season. The new arrangement, which replaces it, sets no limit to his stay, leaving it, virtually, to his own pleasure as the years may run. According to the correspondent Mr. Koussevitzky's salary "exceeds all expectations." That, however, is a matter with which only he himself and the trustees have to do.

TRANS.

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

NEWS AND COMMENT OF THE CURRENT WEEK IN MUSIC

STRAVINSKY AGAIN TO THE FORE

Last Score to Be Heard in America Wins Approval and Causes Debate—Composer's Nationalism Tested and Questioned

By OLIN DOWNES.

AND now it is "Apollon Musagète"! Whatever the debatable future of the latest compositions of Igor Stravinsky, he can certainly point with pride to one thing which has almost invariably characterized the evolution of a musical master ahead of his time. This is, that whatever Stravinsky writes, great or small, continues to stir up discussion and give marked concern, pro and con, to the critics. Much of this "réclame," of course, is due primarily to the sudden and immense reputation that Stravinsky made for himself, within a short six years, with his three acknowledged works of genius: "Oiseau de feu," "Petrouchka" and "Sacre du printemps." After the "Sacre du printemps," or soon after it, came the famous volte-face, when the elemental, sardonic, primordial Stravinsky, cultivating a style which became always simpler and more "classic," produced the "Symphony for Wind Instruments," the "Octuor" and the succession of works in the various old forms which his disciples claim as new light and revelation, and others, either less fanatical in their admiration or slower witted, regard as marked decadence, following the profoundly racial and revolutionary "Sacre."

The musical fortunes of Stravinsky, since its appearance, have been variously estimated. He essayed a grand form and the expression of a profoundly tragic theme in the "Oedipus Rex," produced here last season by Mr. Koussevitzky and given its première the preceding Spring in Paris. This work reassured some who had begun to doubt the later Stravinsky, and won him some new adherents. "Oedipus" is now followed by the ballet "Apollon Musagète," first produced at Mrs. Coolidge's chamber music festival in Washington and recently played in New York by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This composition met in many quarters with fresh favor. It is couched in the musical terms of the French classic ballet. It achieves at least the surface quality of the music of masques and ballets that amused the courts of the great monarchs. The flavor of the piece was summarized by Mr. Hale's citation in the Boston Symphony program book, to the effect that this score had two ancestral homes: Parnassus and Versailles.

***

For the writer, Stravinsky does not nearly equal in his later period the sincerity, the force, the originality of his famous earlier works, for the reason that he seems to have forsaken the fruitful nationalism and racial idiom of his more youthful music, and to have followed strange gods which are not those of his own people. He prates of a new classicism, abjures the charming romantic poetry of his least original but still very lovely score, "Oiseau de feu," and the bite and humanity of his "Petrouchka," and the cataclysmic energy of the "Sacre du printemps." Stravinsky's Russianism, which appears to have been the true and potent source of his former greatness, dwindles. It finds a temporary renaissance in what is actually the overhauling of an earlier score, "Noces." It becomes more miniature in form, though not yet extinct or impotent, in the sardonic and fantastical "L'Histoire du soldat," and humorous in the folk-vein of "Renard." Thereafter the spring runs into the ground or is dissipated in the sands, and we have the formerly gigantic Stravinsky aping now Bach, now Handel (according to his own statements, which ignore the fact that certain of the best pages of "Oedipus Rex" stem unmistakably from Moussorgsky) and now early French composers and their formulas; accomplishing this with a superb technic and unwonted finesse and sophistication of style; devoting himself, as his adverse critics believe, to manner instead of matter, and experiments rather than convictions; betraying the technical certainty of the composer of experience and the artistic uncertainty of a genius who has wandered from his path.

All this has been noted before. It is summed up here in connection with a very interesting and able essay upon Stravinsky, published in the October issue of The Dial, which, translated by Ezra Pound from the French of Boris de Schloezer, is one of the ablest and clearest defenses of the later tendencies of this composer that has appeared.

***

Highly significant words of Stravinsky, when he was asked his opinion of Scriabine, his compatriot, are quoted. Stravinsky described Scriabine to a Russian journalist as "a being devoid of all national character. He hasn't a passport. One must have a passport."

This is not a remark of many years ago, when Stravinsky was patently a nationalist in his art, but of much more recent date, corresponding with the period of the Stravinsky classicism. Stravinsky himself, then, believes in nationalism as the necessary basis for a truly creative art. How does he explain his own course since 1918 to the present time, when he seems to have definitely turned his back on everything that connotes racial expression or feeling? It is evident, in the words of Mr. de Schloezer, that "the author of the 'Octuor' and of so many other compositions into which there enters not one ounce of Russian material (Russian, that is, in the sense of Rimsky's 'Sadko' is Russian) . . . considers himself, even today, an essentially national artist. Before deciding whether his pretension is justified, we must try to solve a question of more general order: How can we determine the national character of any musical composition?"

There follows a pretty argument, brilliantly conducted. Mr. de Schloezer remarks, very truly, that the mere presence of melodic, rhythmic or harmonic formulae characteristic of the folk-music of a given nation does not necessarily constitute nationalism at all. "This hypothesis won't work." If it did, Beethoven's String Quartet, op. 59, quoting a Russian theme, would be a Russian composition, while Moussorgsky's marvelous "Children's Songs" would not. Composers, whatever their race or nationality, could "swap passports when the whim took them; to gain Greek nationality, for instance, one could simply reach into the Bourgauld-Ducoudray grab-bag; and Rimsky's collection (of Russian folk-songs) would permit any one of us to write Russian music. . . . We must, evidently, seek for other formulae.

***

"Admitting that each nation has what you might call its genius, something peculiar to it, and manifest particularly in its musical feeling, and even in its very conception of the sonorous art, and of musical beauty, how are we to compute the specific characteristics of this 'genius'? We can't get at them directly; the thing is offered us only in the series of productions which constitute the art of a people or of a country. France, certainly, possesses its musical traditions; we know them from the compositions of the masters, which seem to display among themselves a certain consanguinity, but this is very indefinite and undefinable. And who, moreover, guarantees us against the insurgence of some great composer who will turn the lot of these traditions bottom side up? One may be sure that, in such a contingency, people will not fail to object to this 'new movement,' and against this 'revolutionary' stuff they will set the 'true French tradition'; but . . . since the musician of genius will, in spite of all this, impose himself . . . they will end by annexing him, and by discovering that although he innovates, it is 'nevertheless undeniable that he' connects with the above-mentioned 'tradition' and that he is only developing and enriching it. Such, in short, was the story of Debussy, at first rejected as 'against clear ideas,' 'contrary to the Latin genius,' and so forth, and today (quite rightly) considered the French musician par excellence.

Mr. de Schloezer then sets out to find Stravinsky's passport.

The beginning of Russian music, as he observes, dates from Glinka, whom the writer wittily dubs the Peter the Great of Russian musical art. Glinka struck the national note in his "Life for the Czar," "Russlann and Ludmilla," and certain other works. "But here one should observe an interesting fact, gravid with consequence: Glinka's operas (and naturally his romances in higher degree), out of which all Russian music has emerged, generally seem to the foreigner insufficiently Russian. The Italian .cic-ments that one can easily notice in them annoy the European, who imagines that the art of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Borodine and Moussorgsky constitutes a progress from that of Glinka in that it is purer and more national. Yet the Russian opinion differs entirely from this, and it might seem to have some sort of value. Russians recognize themselves in this music full of Italian, French and German influence. One must not forget that the Five [the so-called "Neo-Russians" of the later nineteenth century] never denied Glinka, they considered themselves as his heirs, and saw 'Russlann' as the masterwork of Russian music."

***

The mistaken impression that the Westerner entertains of Russian music, continues Mr. de Schloezer, is perfectly explicable. He seeks in this art the points of difference with his own. The "Asiatic visage" is for the European the earmark of true Russian music. For him the deorientalized Russian is not the real one. But "Russlann and Ludmilla" is based on the "contrast between the Russian world and the Asiatic. This contrast is no less apparent, intentional and systematic in Borodine's 'Prince Igor.' . . . Ultimately one finds this contrast even in the 'Oiseau de feu,' the only work in which Stravinsky has offered sacrifice to musical Orientalism. Everywhere and always, in Russian music since Glinka, the Orient is treated as a picturesque element, its characteristics serve to underline still more heavily the specific characteristics of Russian song. The complete opposite is true of the Occidental elements audible in the works of Glinka and his successors, especially of Tchaikovsky." The works of Glinka, then, "bear witness to the profound affinity existing between Russian musical sensibility and European musical culture."

This is the basis of the argument that Mr. de Schloezer presents in support of the authenticity of Stravinsky's "passport." "Stravinsky's case seemed incomprehensible . . . to those who repeat the old gag about 'scratch the Russian and you find the Tartar.' They think Russian art ought, and of necessity, to be violent, medizened, nostalgic. . . . But any one knowing the good period of Russian history, from the reign of Alexander I through the first years of Nicholas I, will grasp the true affiliation of Stravinsky." And not only this, but "if we go back still further, beyond the Mongol invasions that modified the visage of antique Russia, we will find the same care for a harmony, the same formalist research, the same so-called 'classic' spirit, in both the Russian painting and building, that had drunk in the Byzantine traditions, which, being Byzantine, were, in consequence, Hellenistic; these were absorbed, and created admirable works, greatly superior to the debased Orientalistic product of the Muscovite era.

***

"One must hammer yet again on the fact that: If Occidental traditions had been really alien to Russian mentality and sensibility, the churches of Pskov and Novgorod, their frescoes, their ikons; and later in St. Petersburg, under Alexander I, the apparition of artists like Glinka and Pushkin, or today a work like Stravinsky's 'Oedipe,' that is to say, this art of equilibrium and luminosity, truly Apollonian, would be absolutely inexplicable. If, on the other hand, perfectly explainable if one admits that the Russians are not aliens to the family of Occidental races, bred on Graeco-Roman tradition; and that these artists, going for their schooling to European culture, find themselves in their normal habitat, and out take up something rightly their own."

These arguments are ingenious and plausible, and perhaps more than that. Certain flaws in them, certain fallacies, might be pointed out, as Mr. de Schloezer's assumption that the predominating spirit of Russian national art—folk-art, which was the only truly national art possessed by the people before the nineteenth century—because it was strongly influenced by Byzantine formulas, rises essentially from the spring of "Graeco-Roman tradition," and the fact that however Glinka may stand historically and culturally in relation to Russian music, the Russian music which has found its way over the borders is that of Tchaikovsky and the great five who followed him, who carried the banner of nationalism so proudly, and who founded on the clear and unmistakable basis of nationalism a new school of music which not only proved itself but exerted in turn an immense and vitalizing influence on the development of European music, especially in France. But we are not concerned here with counter-arguments. We are citing brilliant and suggestive critical comment by Mr. de Schloezer, who concludes by saying that, "If Stravinsky seems to us today the most notable representative of the European spirit in music, it is not because he is international but because he is essentially national. His universality comes from his genius, or, paraphrasing his own formula, 'the passport takes him over the frontiers.'"

George Gershwin, Whose "An American in Paris" Has First Performance Next Thursday by Philharmonic.

A TOSCANINI FOUNDATION.

Reports from Milan printed in the Italian press tell of a decision of a committee headed by the Podestà of that city and embracing many prominent citizens, formed for the purpose of honoring Maestro Toscanini upon the completion of his thirtieth year as director at La Scala, to establish a Toscanini Foundation. This foundation, which will have substantial financial backing and will be administered by the the organization of La Scala, will be devoted to welfare work among the children of the opera company's musicians.

HENRY HADLEY'S "SAFIE."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

My friend, Arthur Nevin, has just told me that Henry Hadley's one-act opera, "Safie," presented in Mainz in 1909, was in fact the first American opera to be produced in Germany. Mr. Nevin said that he never claimed to be the composer of the first American opera to be produced in Germany, but the first to be performed in a Royal German Opera House. ERNEST T. CARTER.

New York.

AN ATTERBERG AFTERMATH

THE original article in The London Sunday Times by Ernest Newman which precipitated the controversy over the Kurt Atterberg prize symphony (concluded to everybody's satisfaction by the composer's cabled denial of deliberate plagiarism designed to "fool the critics") has just been received in its entirety. Reviewing the first London performance of the work, Mr. Newman says:

"Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Symphony Orchestra gave us on Monday evening the first London performance of Kurt Atterberg's symphony that won the £2,000 prize offered by the Columbia Graphophone Company in connection with the Schubert centenary celebrations. The company seems to me to have received value for its money. Two thousand pounds is far too much to pay for a very bad symphony, and far too little to pay for a very good one. It is a fair price for a fair symphony, which is what Atterberg has delivered, f. o. b., as per esteemed order of yesterday's date and hoping for a continuation of valued custom. The Columbia Company has issued the work in four excellent records, so the world will be able to sample it for itself.

"The symphony, however, raises some curious questions for the curious mind. A work of this kind can hardly expect to get a perfectly fair hearing; the average man comes to it prepared for the worst, is disappointed if he does not get something as bad as he expected, and lays himself out to see all the faults of the work and be blind to whatever virtues it may possess.

"The symphony compares favorably enough with the majority of the new works one hears nowadays. We have to remember that the composer was bound by the conditions of the competition to deliver an article made according to specifications. The symphony was to be 'melodic' and it was not to be 'modernistic.' Considering how hampered he must have been in writing with one eye on the music and the other on the judges, I consider that Atterberg has turned out a very decent job of work.

"Every one on Monday was busy spotting reminiscences in the symphony; and it cannot be denied that they are plentiful and obvious. There may be two possible explanations of these. Atterberg may have looked down the list of judges, seen that they hailed from ten or eleven countries, and slyly made up his mind that he would put in a bit of something that would appeal to each of them in turn—a bit of 'Schehera zade' for the Russian Glazounov, a bit of 'Cockaigne' for Mr. Tovey, a bit of the 'New World Symphony' for Mr. Damrosch a bit of 'Petrouchka' for the modernist Alfano, a bit of Granados for Salazar, and so on. But I wonder if there may not be another explanation that, in their glee at the spotting of all these reminiscences, my respected colleagues have missed. I wonder!

"Atterberg (a Swede, by the way) is not merely a composer. He is a musical critic. That means that he is a very intelligent fellow, not likely to take either music or musicians too seriously. Suppose he looked round with the cynical smile that, as all the world knows, all critics wear, and decided to pull the world's leg? Competition judges are mostly innocent people, easily taken in. There was a beautiful case in America some years ago: if I remember rightly, a committee was just saved from awarding the prize to a particular work when, by the grace of God, some one discovered that it was a copy, sent in by some wicked joker, of Berlioz's 'Corsair' overture. But a subtler method than this would be to sow a symphony with themes that suggested well-known works to the experienced hearer and then instantaneously switch him off them. Are we quite sure that this is not what Atterberg has done? The tribute paid to certain other works in this symphony is so obvious that it would indeed be a strange thing if, while the most casual hearer is conscious of the quotations, the composer himself (who, I repeat, is also a critic) should be the one man in the world of music to be unaware of them. Look at this theme, for example, from the finale. * * *"

Mr. Newman then quotes a theme from the finale of Atterberg's symphony and asks, "What is this but a gay rearrangement of the main theme of the fourth movement of Berlioz's 'Symphonie Fantastique'?" He then quotes the Berlioz theme, and continues:

"I should be very surprised indeed to learn that Atterberg was not fully aware of the sources of this and others of his themes. And if my theory is correct, the laugh is Atterberg's today. He has had the satisfaction not only of pulling off the £2,000 prize, but of pulling, almost to the pulling-off point, the legs of all his fellow-critics. While they have been pluming themselves on their smartness in detecting his plagiarisms, he has probably been laughing in his sleeve at them. Atterberg, Atterberg!"

PRIZES AND PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

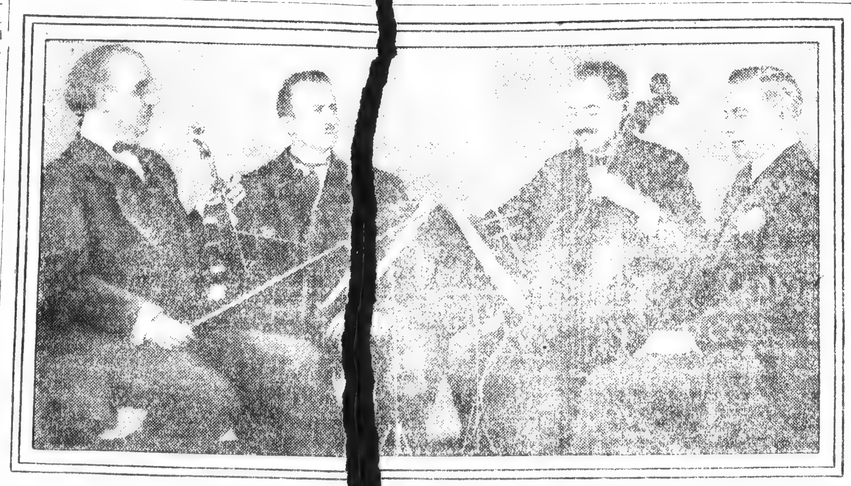
Mr. Kurt Atterberg, the winner of the $10,000 prize offered by the Columbia Phonograph Company for a symphony in the style of Schubert, is now reported to have confessed writing his prize symphony as a joke, plagiarizing other composers in order to bemuse the critics. Whether or not the confession is genuine, the humor of the situation has the poetic truth that is higher than mere fact. When the commercial company offered the prize, whatever its motives, it did a stupid and anti-artistic thing. It put an imposing array of dollars behind two implied propositions, both misleading: First, that a composer writes not for love of music but for love of money. Second, that he may therefore be induced by money to forego that arduous pursuit of his own style, which is the only concern of every real artist, and imitate any other that happens to be in financial demand.

The Columbia Phonograph Company abandoned its crude initial suggestion that composers should finish Schubert's Unfinished Symphony after several musicians, of whom the present writer had the honor to be one, had pointed out the absurdity of such a proposal. It substituted the almost equally demoralizing suggestion that composers write "in the style of Schubert," or "hommage à Schubert."

The outcome is a fiasco of which the poetic justice seems almost too good to be true. Whether Mr. Atterberg really turns out to have his tongue in his cheek or not, such an ironic response is the only appropriate one for the artist to make to the commercial propagandist.

DANIEL GREGORY MASON.

New York, Nov. 29, 1928.



The Flonzaley Quartet, Recently Closing Next Saturday Afternoon at the Town Hall.

Photo Copyright by Fernand de Gueldre.

GERMAN FOLK-OPERA

Native Types Among Recent Productions —Some Prime Novelties Yet in Reserve

By ALFRED EINSTEIN.

BERLIN, Nov. 22.

GRADUALLY, as the season progresses, the German operatic stages are beginning to put on their more important premières, though the most important ones are still being held in reserve.

In Dresden the one-act offering of the American musician Theodore Stearns, a lyric episode entitled "Snow Bird," was given, but I am obliged to confess regretfully that I was not present at the performance. It seems, however, that all trace of it has already disappeared.

At the Städische Oper in Berlin, Bruno Walter was instrumental in making an outstanding success of the three-act opera "Mondnacht," by Julius Bittner. This Viennese dramatist, whose principal occupation is (or was) that of an Austrian judge, is an old protégé of Walter. In fact, in a certain sense he is even his pupil, despite the fact that he is several years older than Walter. At any rate, it is said that the master hand of Walter touched up many spots in the score of "Mondnacht."

Bittner is what we in Germany and Austria call a truly native type of composer. He practices "home art"; he travels, though on a higher level, along the same path which Wilhelm Kienzl once trod with his sentimental, tear-producing "Evangelimann." One of Bittner's early successes was "Der Musikant" ("The Musician"), which showed a great deal of the Kienzl influence. Then came a one-act composition of the woodcut type entitled "Das Höllische Gold" ("The Infernal Gold"), in which he comes very close to the ideal of the folk-opera. After that he never had very much luck. He always wrote his own texts.

It is a funny thing about folk-opera—like walking on the blade of a knife or like a moonstruck person on the edge of a roof. The minute one becomes conscious of reality and loses one's somnambulistic sure-footedness, one crashes, just as the heroine of this latest of Bittner's operas falls to her death at the end of the third act, for such is the cruel fate of this dear, one might almost say sweet, Viennese girl, who paints porcelain plates in the daytime and wanders about on the roofs of Vienna at night.

***

She has the misfortune to meet on the street her attic room neighbor, First Lieutenant Josef von Altrichter ("assigned to the General Staff"). She happens to be carrying a few of her plates, which she drops, and of course there are shards. But, according to a German proverb, shards bring luck and our Lieutenant is very much in need of luck. He has gambling debts which he cannot pay, but which he must pay as a matter of honor if he does not want to force his creditor to put a bullet through his own head. Thus new hope is kindled; he will play again and maybe he will win, but to do that he must have not only luck but money; and behold! the tempter appears, the black devil, more black even than Kaspar in the "Freischütz." He is the false friend, Nicola Spaicic, merchant of Zara, who promises to provide money if the officer will guide the plans of Verona into his hands for the Italians (the action is in the year 1865).

After a violent battle with his conscience, our hero agrees to the proposal. Spaicic brings the money, but luck must be provided by the sweet girl who, standing behind the gambler's chair, draws down magic forces from the moon. And behold! it works; our friend empties his companions' pockets, whereupon he turns pious and vows to his guardian and get a transfer to a quiet garrison. The love night falls between the second and third act, just as it falls between the first and second in the case of Mr. Pinkerton and Madame Butterfly.

***

But then the shadows fall. Spaicic either cannot or will not return the plans, and in the third act, when the lovers have returned home, a Colonel, a General and several secret service men, more terrifying than feudal judges, await the hero. Spaicic has betrayed him. A grace period of one hour is given him in which to end his life; the necessary shooting iron is handed to him. Marie, sweet girl, wandering about in her sleep, hears the shot and falls to her death.

That is a strong yet simple plot, the kind that appeals to simple souls who like to go to the movies to have their hearts gladdened by the beloved films of golden Vienna with their mixture of humor, pathos and tragedy. It is important to remember, however, that this "film" is the work of a real honest-to-goodness Viennese. He speaks the language unmistakably, and though his figures, from the principal characters down to the wings of the scenery, never rise above the typical and conventional, they are nevertheless thoroughly Viennese and Austrian.

The music, too, is Austrian, at least to the extent that Bittner has provided ample local color; the military flavor is provided through the use of old Austrian bugle calls, which at times seem to clash a bit with the harmony. For the strictly Viennese effects of the second act all kinds of ingredients are used, local melodies in four-quarter time, declamatory turns from the "Rosenkavalier," touches of dialect from all parts of old Austria, waltz rhythms, and, to give the feeling of the time in which the action is laid, the cancan from the "Schöne Helena" is used as one of the leitmotivs.

But alas! if only the whole were more sturdy musically! The motif for the moon spell is thin; there is a thin three-quarter theme for the love duet (thin, but not smooth). In the dramatic scenes a hand that strikes with strength but also with brevity is revealed. The motivation and the interplay of the themes are poor; the way Bittner dresses up his homophonous style with series of fourths and sevenths is poor indeed. Bittner is certainly not a "modern" composer, but in one respect he is in the same class with the most up-to-date—his work contains too little music; and certainly a popular opera must have lots of music in it.

At all three of the Berlin opera houses there have been several other important new presentations of older operas. At the Städtische Oper, "Tannhäuser," under Walter Bruno, has been given with the obvious purpose of making of it the naïve, theatrical and romantic piece that our great-grandfathers knew; Under den Linden, a renovated "Walküre," under Leo Blech, is interpreted in a big way, both scenically and musically, and in the Platz der Republik there is a very lively, colorful, realistic presentation of "Carmen."

***

In the concert hall we were able, after a lapse of many years, to greet Serge W. Rachmaninoff again, both as pianist and as composer. As a pianist he immediately recaptured us all with his ingenious, simple and yet polished playing—in other words, his genuine musicianship. As a composer, however (he played his D minor concerto under Furtwängler), he belongs to that bygone period whose ideals were rather salonesque.

Another guest, who was considerably fêted socially, was the Rumanian composer, Georges Enesco. We heard one of his orchestra suites and a few Rumanian rhapsodies in which was revealed an elementary musician lacking a true feeling for style.

The greatest impression was made through Otto Klemperer, who presented the two latest works of Stravinsky and Ernst Krenek in one of his symphony concerts. The Stravinsky offering was "Apollon Musagète," an echo of "Oedipus Rex," while Krenek's "Little Symphony" served as a preliminary to three one-act offerings that had previously been given in Wiesbaden.

Different as these two works are, in one respect they are alike: both are intended as parodies. In the case of Stravinsky it is serious parody. He indulges in classicism, writing a series of ten ballet pieces for a glorified string orchestra. He becomes archaic. No longer do we find adaptations of the Bachian style or the free play with the gay muse of Pergolesi. Instead, there is an imitation of the severe cast of antiquity, or rather the plaster cast of the empire or of Biedermeyer. And when Lully or Rameau are introduced, they are seen from the empire point of view and their patron saints are Clementi or Kuhlau.

***

This strange relationship is actually in evidence, just as we find in the realm of pictorial art, for example, a relationship between Picasso and the drawings of Prud'hon or David.

Everything is tonal again; certainly occasional adulterations through the use of tones that fail to harmonize, as well as jumping the modulatory tracks every once in a while, do not constitute a new style synthesis. Some things can only be understood with the aid of the scenic presentation, as, for example, the violin solo like appearance of a violin playing Apollo.

Yet the whole thing grips because of its peculiar rigidity and coldness, because of the significance of the experiment. This significance is as great here as in "Oedipus Rex," no matter how much more alive and strong and pulsating the operatic oratorio was than the later ballet.

Krenek is less monumental and much more lively. His "Little Symphony" is a parody of the classic symphony. The parodying process begins with the very instrumentation; the strings consist only of violins and contrabasses, the hole in the middle register being plugged up with a chorus of pick instruments, beside which stands the "band" of winds and traps that sometimes becomes conscious of its up-to-dateness and starts to act like a jazz orchestra.

The symphonic form as well as the spirit of the symphony are treated rather roughly in this little work; and so are certain composers, for instance Brahms, who has to provide the second theme of the first movement. The entire slow movement is a rare piece of sanctimoniousness, in which hymn-like flights à la Pfitzner are carried ad absurdum. There are a thousand jests in melody and instrumentation, and yet the boldness of the whole thing is so charmingly amiable that all one can do is laugh and feel like shaking the composer's hand.

Alberto Franchetti, the composer of "Germania," has recently completed another opera, entitled "The Gonfaloniere." The libretto is by Gioacchino Forzano.

Karl Goepfart's choral work, "Roms Fall," was recently presented in Zutsen and Hengeloo, Holland, Ernst Wettig conducted.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

NEWS AND COM

STRAVINSKY AGAIN TO T

Last Score to Be Heard in America Wins App Debate—Composer's Nationalism Tested ar

By OLIN DOWNES.

AND now it is "Apollon Musagète"! Whatever the debatable future of the latest compositions of Igor Stravinsky, he can certainly point with pride to one thing which has almost invariably characterized the evolution of a musical master ahead of his time. This is, that whatever Stravinsky writes, great or small, continues to stir up discussion and give marked concern, pro and con, to the critics. Much of this "réclame," of course, is due primarily to the sudden and immense reputation that Stravinsky made for himself, within a short six years, with his three acknowledged works of genius: "Oiseau de feu," "Petrouchka" and "Sacre du printemps." After the "Sacre du printemps," or soon after it, came the famous volte-face, when the elemental, sardonic, primordial Stravinsky, cultivating a style which became always simpler and more "classic," produced the "Symphony for Wind Instruments," the "Octuor" and the succession of works in the various old forms which his disciples claim as new light and revelation, and others, either less fanatical in their admiration or slower witted, regard as marked decadence, following the profoundly racial and revolutionary "Sacre."

The musical fortunes of Stravinsky, since its appearance, have been variously estimated. He essayed a grand form and the expression of a profoundly tragic theme in the "Oedipus Rex," produced here last season by Mr. Koussevitzky and given its première the preceding Spring in Paris. This work reassured some who had begun to doubt the later Stravinsky, and won him some new adherents. "Oedipus" is now followed by the ballet "Apollon Musagète," first produced at Mrs. Coolidge's chamber music festival in Washington and recently played in New York by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This composition met in many quarters with fresh favor. It is couched in the musical terms of the French classic ballet. It achieves at least the surface quality of the music of masques and ballets that amused the courts of the great monarchs. The flavor of the piece was summarized by Mr. Hale's citation in the Boston Symphony program book, to the effect that this score had two ancestral homes: Parnassus and Versailles.

***

For the writer, Stravinsky does not nearly equal in his later period the sincerity, the force, the originality of his famous earlier works, for the reason that he seems to have forsaken the fruitful nationalism and racial idiom of his more youthful music, and to have followed strange gods which are not those of his own people. He prates of a new classicism, abjures the charming romantic poetry of his least original but still very lovely score, "Oiseau de feu," and the bite and humanity of his "Petrouchka," and the cataclysmic energy of the "Sacre du printemps." Stravinsky's Russianism, which appears to have been the true and potent source of his former greatness, dwindles. It finds a temporary renaissance in what is actually the overhauling of an earlier score, "Noces." It becomes more miniature in form, though not yet extinct or impotent, in the sardonic and fantastical "L'Histoire du soldat," and humorous in the folk-vein of "Renard." Thereafter the spring runs into the ground or is dissipated in the sands, and we have the formerly gigantic Stravinsky aping now Bach, now Handel (according to his own statements, which ignore the fact that certain of the best pages of "Oedipus Rex" stem unmistakably from Moussorgsky) and now early French composers and their formulas; accomplishing this with a superb technic and unwonted finesse and sophistication of style; devoting himself, as his adverse critics believe, to manner instead of matter, and experiments rather than convictions; betraying the technical certainty of the composer of experience and the artistic uncertainty of a genius who has wandered from his path.

All this has been noted before. It is summed up here in connection with a very interesting and able essay upon Stravinsky, published in the October issue of The Dial, which, translated by Ezra Pound from the French of Boris de Schloezer, is one of the ablest and clearest defenses of the later tendencies of this composer that has appeared.

***

Highly significant words of Stravinsky, when he was asked his opinion of Scriabine, his compatriot, are quoted. Stravinsky described Scriabine to a Russian journalist as "a being devoid of all national character. He hasn't a passport. One must have a passport."

This is not a remark of many years ago, when Stravinsky was patently a nationalist in his art, but of much more recent date, corresponding with the period of the Stravinsky classicism. Stravinsky himself, then, believes in nationalism as the necessary basis for a is Russian) . . . considers himself, even today, an essentially national artist. Before deciding whether his pretension is justified, we must try to solve a question of more general order: How can we determine the national character of any musical composition?"

There follows a pretty argument, brilliantly conducted. Mr. de Schloezer remarks, very truly, that the mere presence of melodic, rhythmic or harmonic formulae characteristic of the folk-music of a given nation does not necessarily constitute nationalism at all. "This hypothesis won't work." If it did, Beethoven's String Quartet, op. 59, quoting a Russian theme, would be a Russian composition, while Moussorgsky's marvelous "Children's Songs" would not. Composers, whatever their race or nationality, could "swap passports when the whim took them; to gain Greek nationality, for instance, one could simply reach into the Bourgauld-Ducoudray grab-bag; and Rimsky's collection (of Russian folk-songs) would permit any one of us to write Russian music. . . . We must, evidently, seek for other formulae.

***

"Admitting that each nation has what you might call its genius, something peculiar to it, and manifest particularly in its musical feeling, and even in its very conception of the sonorous art, and of musical beauty, how are we to compute the specific characteristics of this 'genius'? We can't get at them directly; the thing is offered us only in the series of productions which constitute the art of a people or of a country. France, certainly, possesses its musical traditions; we know them from the compositions of the masters, which seem to display among themselves a certain consanguinity, but this is very indefinite and undefinable. And who, moreover, guarantees us against the insurgence of some great composer who will turn the lot of these traditions bottom side up? One may be sure that, in such a contingency, people will not fail to object to this 'new movement,' and against this 'revolutionary' stuff they will set the 'true French tradition'; but . . . since the musician of genius will, in spite of all this, impose himself . . . they will end by annexing him, and by discovering that although he innovates, it is 'nevertheless undeniable that he' connects with the above-mentioned 'tradition' and that he is only developing and enriching it. Such, in short, was the story of Debussy, at first rejected as 'against clear ideas,' 'contrary to the Latin genius,' and so forth, and today (quite rightly) considered the French musician par excellence.

Mr. de Schloezer then sets out to find Stravinsky's passport.

The beginning of Russian music, as he observes, dates from Glinka, whom the writer wittily dubs the Peter the Great of Russian musical art. Glinka struck the national note in his "Life for the Czar," "Russlann and Ludmilla," and certain other works. "But here one should observe an interesting fact, gravid with consequence: Glinka's operas (and naturally his romances in higher degree), out of which all Russian music has emerged, generaliy seem to the foreigner insufficiently Russian. The Italian elements that one can easily notice in them annoy the European, who imagines that the art of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Borodine and Moussorgsky constitutes a progress from that of Glinka in that it is purer and more national. Yet the Russian opinion differs entirely from this, and it might seem to have some sort of value. Russians recognize themselves in this music full of Italian, French and German influence. One must not forget that the Five [the so-called "Neo-Russians" of the later nineteenth century] never denied Glinka, they considered themselves as his heirs, and saw 'Russlann' as the masterwork of Russian music."

***

The mistaken impression that the Westerner entertains of Russian music, continues Mr. de Schloezer, is perfectly explicable. He seeks in this art the points of difference with his own. The "Asiatic visage" is for the European the earmark of true Russian music. For him the deorientalized Russian is not the real one. But "Russlann and Ludmilla" is based on the "contrast between the Russian world and the Asiatic. This contrast is no less apparent, intentional and systematic in Borodine's 'Prince Igor.' . . . Ultimately one finds this contrast even in the 'Oiseau de feu,' the only work in which Stravinsky has offered sacrifice to musical Orientalism. Everywhere and always, in Russian music since Glinka, the Orient is treated as a picturesque element, its characteristics serve to underline still more heavily the specific characteristics of Russian song. The complete opposite is true of the Occidental elements audible in the works of Glinka and his

Tartar ought lent, any on Russia
Alexand of Nick affiliati only th further, that mo
Russia, for a ha research spirit, in and buil Byzantin
Byzanti Hellenis created perior produc

"On the fac had menta church their i in St.
the ap and P Stravi
this ar
ity, truly lutely inexpli hand, perfectly explainable if one admits that the Russians are not aliens to the family of Occidental races, bred on Graeco-Roman tradition; and that these artists, going for their schooling to European culture, find themselves in their normal habitat, and out take up something rightly their own."

These arguments are ingenious and plausible, and perhaps more than that. Certain flaws in them, certain fallacies, might be pointed out, as Mr. de Schloezer's assumption that the predominating spirit of Russian national art—folk-art, which was the only truly national art possessed by the people before the nineteenth century—because it was strongly influenced by Byzantine formulas, rises essentially from the spring of "Graeco-Roman tradition," and the fact that however Glinka may stand historically and culturally in relation to Russian music, the Russian music which has found its way over the borders is that of Tchaikovsky and the great five who followed him, who carried the banner of nationalism so proudly, and who founded on the clear and unmistakable basis of nationalism a new school of music which not only proved itself but exerted in turn an immense and vitalizing influence on the development of European music, especially in France. But we are not concerned here with counter-arguments. We are citing brilliant and suggestive critical comment by Mr. de Schloezer, who concludes by saying that, "If Stravinsky seems to us today the most notable representative of the European spirit in music, it is not because he is international but because he is essentially national. His universality comes from his genius, or, paraphrasing his own formula, 'the passport takes him over the frontiers.'"

A TOSCANINI FOUNDATION.

Reports from Milan printed in the Italian press tell of a decision of a committee headed by the Podestà of that city and embracing many prominent citizens, formed for the purpose of honoring Maestro Toscanini upon the completion of his thirtieth year as director at La Scala, to establish a Toscanini Foundation. This foundation, which will have substantial financial backing and will be administered by the the organization of La Scala, will be devoted to welfare work among the children of the opera company's musicians.

HENRY HADLEY'S "SAFIE."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

My friend, Arthur Nevin, has just told me that Henry Hadley's one-act opera, "Safie," presented in Mainz in 1909, was in fact the first American opera to be produced in Germany. Mr. Nevin said that he never claimed to be the composer of the first American opera to be produced in Germany, but the first to be performed in a Royal German Opera House. ERNEST T. CARTER.

New York.

MENT OF THE CUR

THE FORE

roval and Causes d Questioned

." They think Russian art and of necessity, to be vio- bedizened, nostalgic. . . . But e knowing the good period of n history, from the reign of ler I through the first years olas I, will grasp the true on of Stravinsky." And not s, but "if we go back still beyond the Mongol invasions dified the visage of antique we will find the same care rmony, the same formalist , the same so-called 'classic' both the Russian painting ding, that had drunk in the he traditions, which, being he, were, in consequence, tic; these were absorbed, and admirable works, greatly su- to the debased Orientalistic t of the Muscovite era.

***

must hammer yet again on that: If Occidental traditions en really alien to Russian y and sensibility, the s of Pskov and Novgorod, escoes, their ikons; and later etersburg, under Alexander I, arition of artists like Glinka shkin, or today a work like sky's 'Oedipe,' that is to say, of equilibrium, and luminos- pollonian, would be cable.

It is, on the other

George G rshwin, Whose "An American in Paris" Has First Performa ce Next Thursday by Philharmonic.

AN ATTERBERG AFT RMATH

THE o don
New controvers prize sym body's sa cabled de designed just been viewing ance of t
"Sir Th
don Symp
Monday performan symphony offered by phone Comp
the Schuber
The compa received v thousand p pay for a far too litt
one. It i symphony, has delive teemed ord hoping for custom. T issued the ords, so t sample it
"The sy some curio rious mindc can hardly fair hearing to it prepa appointed thing as b himself ou the work virtues it
"The s ably enou new work have to re was bound competitio made acco symphony was not to iginal article in The Lon- Sunday Times by Ernest an which precipitated the y over the Kurt Atterberg hony (concluded to every- isfaction by the composer's ial of deliberate plagiarism o "fool the critics") has eceived in its entirety. Re- e first London perform- work, Mr. Newman says: as Beecham and the Lon- ony Orchestra gave us on vening the first London e of Kurt Atterberg's hat won the £2,000 prize the Columbia Grapho- any in connection with t centenary celebrations. ny seems to me to have lue for its money. Two ounds is far too much to very bad symphony, and e to pay for a very good a fair price for a fair which is what Atterberg rd, f. o. b., as per es- er of yesterday's date and a continuation of valued he Columbia Company has work in four excellent rec- e world will be able to or itself.

mphony, however, raises s questions for the cu- d. A work of this kind expect to get a perfectly ; the average man comes red for the worst, is dis- if he does not get some- d as he expected, and lays t to see all the faults of and be blind to whatever ay possess.

mphony compares favor- h with the majority of the one hears nowadays. We member that the composer by the conditions of the to deliver an article ding to specifications. The was to be 'melodic' and it be 'modernistic.' Consid- ering how hampered he must have been in writing with one eye on the muse and the other on the judges, I consider that Atterberg has turned out a very decent job of work.

"Every one on Monday was busy spotting reminiscences in the symphony; and it cannot be denied that they are plentiful and obvious. There may be two possible explanations of these. Atterberg may have looked down the list of judges, seen that they hailed from ten or eleven countries, and slyly made up his mind that he would put in a bit of something that would appeal to each of them in turn—a bit of 'Scheherazade' for the Russian Glazounov, a bit of 'Cockaigne' for Mr. Tovey, a bit of the 'New World Symphony' for Mr. Damrosch a bit of 'Petrouchka' for the modernist Alfano, a bit of Granados for Salazar, and so on. But I wonder if there may not be another explanation that, in their glee at the spotting of all these reminiscences, my respected colleagues have missed. I wonder!

"Atterberg (a Swede, by the way) is not merely a composer. He is a musical critic. That means that he is a very intelligent fellow, not likely to take either music or musicians too seriously. Suppose he looked round with the cynical smile that, as all the world knows, all critics wear, and decided to pull the world's leg? Competition judges are mostly innocent people, easily taken in. There was a beautiful case in America some years ago: if I remember rightly, a committee was just saved from awarding the prize to a particular work when, by the grace of God, some one discovered that it was a copy, sent in by some wicked joker, of Berlioz's 'Corsair' overture. But a subtler method than this would be to sow a symphony with themes that suggested well-known works to the experienced hearer and then instantaneously switch him off them. Are we quite sure that this is not what Atterberg has done? The tribute paid to certain other works in this symphony is so obvious that it would indeed be a strange thing if, while the most casual hearer is conscious of the quotations, the composer himself (who, I repeat, is also a critic) should be the one man in the world of music to be unaware of them. Look at this theme, for example, from the finale. * * *"

Mr. Newman then quotes a theme from the finale of Atterberg's symphony and asks, "What is this but a gay rearrangement of the main theme of the fourth movement of Berlioz's 'Symphonie Fantastique'?" He then quotes the Berlioz theme, and continues:

"I should be very surprised indeed to learn that Atterberg was not fully aware of the sources of this and others of his themes. And if my theory is correct, the laugh is Atterberg's today. He has had the satisfaction not only of pulling off the £2,000 prize, but of pulling, almost to the pulling-off point, the legs of all his fellow-critics. While they have been pluming themselves on their smartness in detecting his plagiarisms, he has probably been laughing in his sleeve at them. Attaboy, Atterberg!"

PRIZES AND PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Mr. Kurt Atterberg, the winner of the $10,000 prize offered by the Columbia Phonograph Company for a symphony in the style of Schubert, is now reported to have confessed writing his prize symphony as a joke, plagiarizing other composers in order to bemuse the critics. Whether or not the confession is genuine, the humor of the situation has the poetic truth that is higher than mere fact. When the commercial company offered the prize, whatever its motives, it did a stupid and anti-artistic thing. It put an imposing array of dollars behind two implied propositions, both misleading: First, that a composer writes not for love of music but for love of money. Second, that he may therefore be induced by money to forego that arduous pursuit of his own style, which is the only concern of every real artist, and imitate any other that happens to be in financial demand.

The Columbia Phonograph Company abandoned its crude initial suggestion that composers should finish Schubert's Unfinished Symphony after several musicians, of whom the present writer had the honor to be one, had pointed out the absurdity of such a proposal. It substituted the almost equally demoralizing sug-

ND COM AGAIN TO T

d in America Wins App s Nationalism Tested a Russian) . . . considers himself, n today, an essentially national ist. Before deciding whether his tension is justified, we must try olve a question of more general r: How can we determine the onal character of any musical position?"

ere follows a pretty argument, antly conducted. Mr. de Schloe- remarks, very truly, that the presence of melodic, rhythmic rmonic formulae characteristic e folk-music of a given nation not necessarily constitute na- ism at all. "This hypothesis work." If it did, Beethoven's Quartet, op. 59, quoting a an theme, would be a Russian sition, while Moussorgsky's lous "Children's Songs" would Composers, whatever their race ionality, could "swap passports the whim took them; to gain nationality, for instance, one simply reach into the Bour- Ducoudray grab-bag; and Rim- collection (of Russian folk- would permit any one of us e Russian music. . . . We evidently, seek for other e.

***

tting that each nation has might call its genius, some- culiar to it, and manifest rly in its musical feeling, in its very conception of rous art, and of musical ow are we to compute the characteristics of this 'ge- We can't get at them di- he thing is offered us only eries of productions which the art of a people or of . France, certainly, pos- musical traditions; we from the compositions of s, which seem to display emselves a certain con- but this is very indefi- undefinable. And who, guarantees us against the of some great composer rn the lot of these tradi- side up? One may be in such a contingency, not fail to object to this ment,' and against this y' stuff they will set French tradition'; but the musician of genius of all this, impose him- y will end by annexing y discovering that al- novates, it is 'neverthe- ble that he' connects bove-mentioned 'tradi- t he is only developing it. Such, in short, of Debussy, at first 'against clear ideas,' the Latin genius,' and today (quite rightly) e French musician par oezer then sets out to y's passport. g of Russian music, s, dates from Glinka, ter wittily dubs the t of Russian musical struck the national Life for the Czar," Ludmilla," and cer- ks. "But here one an interesting fact, nsequence: Glinka's urally his romances), out of which all has emerged, gen- the foreigner insuf- . The Italian ele- an easily notice in e European, who e art of Rimsky- ine and Moussorg- progress from that t it is purer and Yet the Russian ntirely from this, to have some sort s recognize them- ic full of Italian, n influence. One hat the Five [the sians" of the later y] never denied dered themselves aw 'Russiann' as Russian music."

pression that the ns of Russian de Schloezer, is He seeks in this ference with his sage" is for the rk of true Rus- the deoriental- e real one. But milla" is based ween the Rus- Asiatic. This pparent, inten- in Borodine's Ultimately one even in the only work in offered sacri- alism. Every- Russian music is treated as its character- ne still more haracteristics complete op- cidental ele- ks of Glinka specially of s of Glinka, he profound

Tartar ought lent, any on Russia Alexan of Nich affiliati only th further, that mo Russia, for a ha research spirit, in and buil Byzanti Byzanti Hellenis created perior produc

"On the fac had h menta church their i in St. the ap and P Stravi this ar ity, tru lutely hand, p mits th to the bred o and th their sc find the tat, and ly their

These arguments are ingenious and plausible, and perhaps more than that. Certain flaws in them, certain fallacies, might be pointed out, as Mr. de Schloezer's assumption that the predominating spirit of Russian national art—folk-art, which was the only truly national art possessed by the people before the nineteenth century—because it was strongly influenced by Byzantine formulas, rises essentially from the spring of "Graeco-Roman tradition," and the fact that however Glinka may stand historically and culturally in relation to Russian music, the Russian music which has found its way over the borders is that of Tchaikovsky and the great five who followed him, who carried the banner of nationalism so proudly, and who founded on the clear and unmistakable basis of nationalism a new school of music which not only proved itself but exerted in turn an immense and vitalizing influence on the development of European music, especially in France. But we are not concerned here with counter-arguments. We are citing brilliant and suggestive critical comment by Mr. de Schloezer, who concludes by saying that, "If Stravinsky seems to us today the most notable representative of the European spirit in music, it is not because he is international but because he is essentially national. His universality comes from his genius, or, paraphrasing his own formula, 'the passport takes him over the frontiers.'"

A TOSCANINI FOUNDATION.

Reports from Milan printed in the Italian press tell of a decision of a committee headed by the Podestà of that city and embracing many prominent citizens, formed for the purpose of honoring Maestro Toscanini upon the completion of his thirtieth year as director at La Scala, to establish a Toscanini Foundation. This foundation, which will have substantial financial backing and will be administered by the the organization of La Scala, will be devoted to welfare work among the children of the opera company's musicians.

HENRY HADLEY'S "SAFIE."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

My friend, Arthur Nevin, has just told me that Henry Hadley's one-act opera, "Safie," presented in Mainz in 1909, was in fact the first American opera to be produced in Germany. Mr. Nevin said that he never claimed to be the composer of the first American opera to be produced in Germany, but the first to be performed in a Royal German Opera House. ERNEST T. CARTER.

New York.

MENT OF THE CUR HE FORE

oroval and Causes d Questioned

.' They think Russian art and of necessity, to be vio- edizened, nostalgic. . . . But e knowing the good period of n history, from the reign of ler I through the first years olas I, will grasp the true on of Stravinsky." And not s, but "if we go back still beyond the Mongol invasions dified the visage of antique we will find the same care rmony, the same formalist , the same so-called 'classic' both the Russian painting ding, that had drunk in the ne traditions, which, being he, were, in consequence, stic; these were absorbed, and admirable works, greatly su- to the debased Orientalistic t of the Muscovite era.

***

e must hammer yet again on t that: If Occidental traditions been really alien to Russian lity and sensibility, the es of Pskov and Novgorod, rescoes, their ikons; and later Petersburg, under Alexander I, parition of artists like Glinka ushkin, or today a work like sky's 'Oedipe,' that is to say, of equilibrium and luminos- pollonian, would be cable. It is, on the other ectly explainable if one ad- the Russians are not aliens mily of Occidental races, bred on Graeco-Roman tradition; and that these artists, going for their schooling to European culture, find themselves in their normal habitat, and not take up something rightly their own."

George G rshwin, Whose "An American in Paris" Has First Performa ce Next Thursday by Philharmonic.

AN ATTERBERG AFT RMATH

iginal article in The Lon- Sunday Times by Ernest an which precipitated the y over the Kurt Atterberg phony (concluded to every- isfaction by the composer's ial of deliberate plagiarism o "fool the critics") has eceived in its entirety. Re- he first London perform- work, Mr. Newman says: mas Beecham and the Lon- ony Orchestra gave us on vening the first London e of Kurt Atterberg's hat won the £2,000 prize the Columbia Grapho- any in connection with t centenary celebrations. ny seems to me to have lue for its money. Two ounds is far too much to very bad symphony, and le to pay for a very good a fair price for a fair which is what Atterberg red, f. o. b., as per er of yesterday's date and a continuation of valued he Columbia Company has work in four excellent re- he world will be able to or itself.

mphony, however, raises s questions for the cu- d. A work of this kind expect to get a perfectly ; the average man comes red for the worst, is dis- if he does not get some- d as he expected, and lays t to see all the faults of and be blind to whatever ay possess.

mphony compares favor- h with the majority of the one hears nowadays. We member that the composer by the conditions of the to deliver an article rding to specifications. The was to be 'melodic' and it be 'modernistic.' Consid- ering how hampered he must have been in writing with one eye on the muse and the other on the judges, I consider that Atterberg has turned out a very decent job of work.

"Every one on Monday was busy spotting reminiscences in the symphony; and it cannot be denied that they are plentiful and obvious. There may be two possible explanations of these. Atterberg may have looked down the list of judges, seen that they hailed from ten or eleven countries, and slyly made up his mind that he would put in a bit of something that would appeal to each of them in turn—a bit of 'Scheherazade' for the Russian Glazcunov, a bit of 'Cockaigne' for Mr. Tovey, a bit of the 'New World Symphony' for Mr. Damrosch a bit of 'Petrouchka' for the modernist Alfano, a bit of Granados for Salazar, and so on. But I wonder if there may not be another explanation that, in their glee at the spotting of all these reminiscences, my respected colleagues have missed. I wonder!

"Atterberg (a Swede, by the way) is not merely a composer. He is a musical critic. That means that he is a very intelligent fellow, not likely to take either music or musicians too seriously. Suppose he looked round with the cynical smile that, as all the world knows, all critics wear, and decided to pull the world's leg? Competition judges are mostly innocent people, easily taken in. There was a beautiful case in America some years ago: if I remember rightly, a committee was just saved from awarding the prize to a particular work when, by the grace of God, some one discovered that it was a copy, sent in by some wicked joker, of Berlioz's 'Corsair' overture. But a subtler method than this would be to sow a symphony with themes that suggested well-known works to the experienced hearer and then instantaneously switch him off them. Are we quite sure that this is not what Atterberg has done? The tribute paid to certain other works in this symphony is so obvious that it would indeed be a strange thing if, while the most casual hearer is conscious of the quotations, the composer himself (who, I repeat, is also a critic) should be the one man in the world of music to be unaware of them. Look at this theme, for example, from the finale. * * *"

Mr. Newman then quotes a theme from the finale of Atterberg's symphony and asks, "What is this but a gay rearrangement of the main theme of the fourth movement of Berlioz's 'Symphonie Fantastique'?" He then quotes the Berlioz theme, and continues:

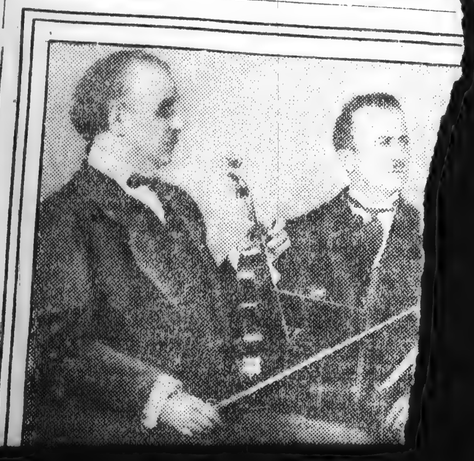
"I should be very surprised indeed to learn that Atterberg was not fully aware of the sources of this and others of his themes. And if my theory is correct, the laugh is Atterberg's today. He has had the satisfaction not only of pulling off the £2,000 prize, but of pulling, almost to the pulling-off point, the legs of all his fellow-critics. While they have been pluming themselves on their smartness in detecting his plagiarisms, he has probably been laughing in his sleeve at them. Attaboy, Atterberg!"

PRIZES AND PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Mr. Kurt Atterberg, the winner of the $10,000 prize offered by the Columbia Phonograph Company for a symphony in the style of Schubert, is now reported to have confessed writing his prize symphony as a joke, plagiarizing other composers in order to bemuse the critics. Whether or not the confession is genuine, the humor of the situation has the poetic truth that is higher than mere fact. When the commercial company offered the prize, whatever its motives, it did a stupid and anti-artistic thing. It put an imposing array of dollars behind two implied propositions, both misleading: First, that a composer writes not for love of music but for love of money. Second, that he may therefore be induced by money to forego that arduous pursuit of his own style, which is the only concern of every real artist, and imitate any other that happens to be in financial demand.

The Columbia Phonograph Company abandoned its crude initial suggestion that composers should finish Schubert's Unfinished Symphony after several musicians, of whom the present writer had the honor to be one, had pointed out the absurdity of such a proposal. It substituted the almost equally demoralizing suggestion that composers write "in the style of Schubert," or "hommage à



ENT WEEK IN MUSIC

GERMAN FOLK-OPERA

Native Types Among Recent Productions —Some Prime Novelties Yet in Reserve

By ALFRED EINSTEIN.

BERLIN, Nov. 22.

GRADUALLY, as the season progresses, the German operatic stages are beginning to put on their more important premières, though the most important ones are still being held in reserve.

In Dresden the one-act offering of the American musician Theodore Stearns, a lyric episode entitled "Snow Bird," was given, but I am obliged to confess regretfully that I was not present at the performance. It seems, however, that all trace of it has already disappeared.

At the Städische Oper in Berlin, Bruno Walter was instrumental in making an outstanding success of the three-act opera "Mondnacht," by Julius Bittner. This Viennese dramatist, whose principal occupation is (or was) that of an Austrian judge, is an old protégé of Walter. In fact, in a certain sense he is even his pupil, despite the fact that he is several years older than Walter. At any rate, it is said that the master hand of Walter touched up many spots in the score of "Mondnacht."

Bittner is what we in Germany and Austria call a truly native type of composer. He practices "home art"; he travels, though on a higher level, along the same path which Wilhelm Kienzl once trod with his sentimental, tear-producing "Evangelimann." One of Bittner's early successes was "Der Musikant" ("The Musician"), which showed a great deal of the Kienzl influence. Then came a one-act composition of the woodcut type entitled "Das Höllische Gold" ("The Infernal Gold"), in which he comes very close to the ideal of the folk-opera. After that he never had very much luck. He always wrote his own texts.

It is a funny thing about folk-opera—like walking on the blade of a knife or like a moonstruck person on the edge of a roof. The minute one becomes conscious of reality and loses one's somnambulistic sure-footedness, one crashes, just as the heroine of this latest of Bittner's operas falls to her death at the end of the third act, for such is the cruel fate of this dear, one might almost say sweet, Viennese girl, who paints porcelain plates in the daytime and wanders about on the roofs of Vienna at night.

***

She has the misfortune to meet on the street her attic room neighbor, First Lieutenant Josef von Altrichter ("assigned to the General Staff"). She happens to be carrying a few of her plates, which she drops, and of course there are shards. But, according to a German proverb, shards bring luck and our Lieutenant is very much in need of luck. He has gambling debts which he cannot pay, but which he must pay as a matter of honor if he does not want to force his creditor to put a bullet through his own head. Thus new hope is kindled; he will play again and maybe he will win, but to do that he must have not only luck but money; and behold! the tempter appears, the black devil, more black even than Kaspar in the "Freischütz." He is the false friend, Nicola Spaicic, merchant of Zara, who promises to provide money if the officer will guide the plans of Verona into his hands for the Italians (the action is in the year 1865).

After a violent battle with his conscience, our hero agrees to the proposal. Spaicic brings the money, but luck must be provided by the sweet girl who, standing behind the gambler's chair, draws down magic forces from the moon. And behold! it works; our friend empties his companions' pockets, whereupon he turns pious and vows to his guardian angel, Marie, that he will gamble no more, and promises to marry her and get a transfer to a quiet garrison. The love night falls between the second and third act, just as it falls between the first and second in the case of Mr. Pinkerton and Madame Butterfly.

***

But then the shadows fall. Spaicic either cannot or will not return the plans, and in the third act, when the lovers have returned home, a Colonel, a General and several secret service men, more terrifying than feudal judges, await the hero. Spaicic has betrayed him. A grace period of one hour is given him in which to end his life; the necessary shooting iron is handed to him. Marie, sweet girl, wandering about in her sleep, hears the shot and falls to her death.

That is a strong yet simple plot, the kind that appeals to simple souls who like to go to the movies to have their hearts gladdened by the beloved films of golden Vienna with their mixture of humor, pathos and tragedy. It is important to remember, however, that this "film" is the work of a real honest-to-goodness Viennese. He speaks the language unmistakably, and though his figures, from the principal characters down to the wings of the scenery, never rise above the typical and conventional, they are nevertheless thoroughly Viennese and Austrian.

The music, too, is Austrian, at least give the feeling of the time in which the action is laid, the cancan from the "Schöne Helena" is used as one of the leitmotivs.

But alas! if only the whole were more sturdy musically! The motif for the moon spell is thin; there is a thin three-quarter theme for the love duet (thin, but not smooth). In the dramatic scenes a hand that strikes with strength but also with brevity is revealed. The motivation and the interplay of the themes are poor; the way Bittner dresses up his homophonous style with series of fourths and sevenths is poor indeed. Bittner is certainly not a "modern" composer, but in one respect he is in the same class with the most up-to-date—his work contains too little music; and certainly a popular opera must have lots of music in it.

At all three of the Berlin opera houses there have been several other important new presentations of older operas. At the Städtische Oper, "Tannhäuser," under Walter Bruno, has been given with the obvious purpose of making of it the naïve, theatrical and romantic piece that our great-grandfathers knew; Under den Linden, a renovated "Walküre," under Leo Blech, is interpreted in a big way, both scenically and musically, and in the Platz der Republik there is a very lively, colorful, realistic presentation of "Carmen."

***

In the concert hall we were able, after a lapse of many years, to greet Serge W. Rachmaninoff again, both as pianist and as composer. As a pianist he immediately recaptured us all with his ingenious, simple and yet polished playing—in other words, his genuine musicianship. As a composer, however (he played his D minor concerto under Furtwängler), he belongs to that bygone period whose ideals were rather salonesque.

Another guest, who was considerably fêted socially, was the Rumanian composer, Georges Enesco. We heard one of his orchestra suites and a few Rumanian rhapsodies in which was revealed an elementary musician lacking a true feeling for style.

The greatest impression was made through Otto Klemperer, who presented the two latest works of Stravinsky and Ernst Krenek in one of his symphony concerts. The Stravinsky offering was "Apollon Musagète," an echo of "Oedipus Rex," while Krenek's "Little Symphony" served as a preliminary to three one-act offerings that had previously been given in Wiesbaden.

Different as these two works are, in one respect they are alike: both are intended as parodies. In the case of Stravinsky it is serious parody. He indulges in classicism, writing a series of ten ballet pieces for a glorified string orchestra. He becomes archaic. No longer do we find adaptations of the Bachian style or the free play with the gay muse of Pergolesi. Instead, there is an imitation of the severe cast of antiquity, or rather the plaster cast of the empire or of Biedermeyer. And when Lully or Rameau are introduced, they are seen from the empire point of view and their patron saints are Clementi or Kuhlau.

***

This strange relationship is actually in evidence, just as we find in the realm of pictorial art, for example, a relationship between Picasso and the drawings of Prud'hon or David.

Everything is tonal again; certainly occasional adulterations through the use of tones that fail to harmonize, as well as jumping the modulatory tracks every once in a while, do not constitute a new style synthesis. Some things can only be understood with the aid of the scenic presentation; so, for example, the violin solo is explained through the Renaissance-like appearance of a violin-playing Apollo.

Yet the whole thing grips because of its peculiar rigidity and coldness, because of the significance of the experiment. This significance is as great here as in "Oedipus Rex," no matter how much more alive and strong and pulsating the operatic oratorio was than the later ballet.

Krenek is less monumental and much more lively. His "Little Symphony" is a parody of the classic symphony. The parodying process begins with the very instrumentation; the strings consist only of violins and contrabasses, the hole in the middle register being plugged up with a chorus of pick instruments, beside which stands the "band" of winds and traps that sometimes becomes conscious of its up-to-dateness and starts to act like a jazz orchestra.

The symphonic form as well as the spirit of the symphony are treated rather roughly in this little work; and so are certain composers, for instance Brahms, who has to provide the second theme of the first movement. The entire slow movement is a rare piece of sanctimoniousness, in which hymn-like flights à la Pfitzner are carried ad absurdum. There are a thousand jests in melody and instrumentation, and yet the boldness of the whole thing is so charmingly amiable that all one can do is laugh the famous volte-face, when the elemental, sardonic, primordial Stravinsky, cultivating a style which became always simpler and more "classic," produced the "Symphony for Wind Instruments," the "Octuor" and the succession of works in the various old forms which his disciples claim as new light and revelation, and others, either less fanatical in their admiration or slower witted, regard as marked decadence, following the profoundly racial and revolutionary "Sacre."

The musical fortunes of Stravinsky, since its appearance, have been variously estimated. He essayed a grand form and the expression of a profoundly tragic theme in the "Oedipus Rex," produced here last season by Mr. Koussevitzky and given its première the preceding Spring in Paris. This work reassured some who had begun to doubt the later Stravinsky, and won him some new adherents. "Oedipus" is now followed by the ballet "Apollon Musagète," first produced at Mrs. Coolidge's chamber music festival in Washington and recently played in New York by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This composition met in many quarters with fresh favor. It is couched in the musical terms of the French classic ballet. It achieves at least the surface quality of the music of masques and ballets that amused the courts of the great monarchs. The flavor of the piece was summarized by Mr. Hale's citation in the Boston Symphony program book, to the effect that this score had two ancestral homes: Parnassus and Versailles.

***

For the writer, Stravinsky does not nearly equal in his later period the sincerity, the force, the originality of his famous earlier works, for the reason that he seems to have forsaken the fruitful nationalism and racial idiom of his more youthful music, and to have followed strange gods which are not those of his own people. He prates of a new classicism, abjures the charming romantic poetry of his least original but still very lovely score, "Oiseau de feu," and the bite and humanity of his "Petrouchka," and the cataclysmic energy of the "Sacre du printemps." Stravinsky's Russianism, which appears to have been the true and potent source of his former greatness, dwindles. It finds a temporary renaissance in what is actually the overhauling of an earlier score, "Noces." It becomes more miniature in form, though not yet extinct or impotent, in the sardonic and fantastical "L'Histoire du soldat," and humorous in the folk-vein of "Renard." Thereafter the spring runs into the ground or is dissipated in the sands, and we have the formerly gigantic Stravinsky aping now Bach, now Handel (according to his own statements, which ignore the fact that certain of the best pages of "Oedipus Rex" stem unmistakably from Moussorgsky) and now early French composers and their formulas; accomplishing this with a superb technic and unwonted finesse and sophistication of style; devoting himself, as his adverse critics believe, to manner instead of matter, and experiments rather than convictions; betraying the technical certainty of the composer of experience and the artistic uncertainty of a genius who has wandered from his path.

All this has been noted before. It is summed up here in connection with a very interesting and able essay upon Stravinsky, published in the October issue of The Dial, which, translated by Ezra Pound from the French of Boris de Schloezer, is one of the ablest and clearest defenses of the later tendencies of this composer that has appeared.

***

Highly significant words of Stravinsky, when he was asked his opinion of Scriabine, his compatriot, are quoted. Stravinsky described Scriabine to a Russian journalist as "a being devoid of all national character. He hasn't a passport. One must have a passport."

This is not a remark of many years ago, when Stravinsky was patently a nationalist in his art, but of much more recent date, corresponding with the period of the Stravinsky classicism. Stravinsky himself, then, believes in nationalism as the necessary basis for a truly creative art. How does he explain his own course since 1918 to the present time, when he seems to have definitely turned his back on everything that connotes racial expression or feeling? It is evident, in the words of Mr. de Schloezer, that "the author of the 'Octuor' and of so many other compositions into which there enters not one ounce of Russian material (Russian, that is, in the sense of Rimsky's 'Sadko' not. Composers, whatever their race or nationality, could "swap passports when the whim took them; to gain Greek nationality, for instance, one could simply reach into the Bourgauld-Ducoudray grab-bag; and Rimsky's collection (of Russian folk-songs) would permit any one of us to write Russian music. . . . We must, evidently, seek for other formulae.

***

"Admitting that each nation has what you might call its genius, something peculiar to it, and manifest particularly in its musical feeling, and even in its very conception of the sonorous art, and of musical beauty, how are we to compute the specific characteristics of this 'genius'? We can't get at them directly; the thing is offered us only in the series of productions which constitute the art of a people or of a country. France, certainly, possesses its musical traditions; we know them from the compositions of the masters, which seem to display among themselves a certain consanguinity, but this is very indefinite and undefinable. And who, moreover, guarantees us against the insurgence of some great composer who will turn the lot of these traditions bottom side up? One may be sure that, in such a contingency, people will not fail to object to this 'new movement,' and against this 'revolutionary' stuff they will set the 'true French tradition'; but . . . since the musician of genius will, in spite of all this, impose himself . . . they will end by annexing him, and by discovering that although he innovates, it is 'nevertheless undeniable that he' connects with the above-mentioned 'tradition' and that he is only developing and enriching it. Such, in short, was the story of Debussy, at first rejected as 'against clear ideas,' 'contrary to the Latin genius,' and so forth, and today (quite rightly) considered the French musician par excellence.

Mr. de Schloezer then sets out to find Stravinsky's passport.

The beginning of Russian music, as he observes, dates from Glinka, whom the writer wittily dubs the Peter the Great of Russian musical art. Glinka struck the national note in his "Life for the Czar," "Russlann and Ludmilla," and certain other works. "But here one should observe an interesting fact, gravid with consequence: Glinka's operas (and naturally his romances in higher degree), out of which all Russian music has emerged, generally seem to the foreigner insufficiently Russian. The Italian elements that one can easily notice in them annoy the European, who imagines that the art of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Borodine and Moussorgsky constitutes a progress from that of Glinka in that it is purer and more national. Yet the Russian opinion differs entirely from this, and it might seem to have some sort of value. Russians recognize themselves in this music full of Italian, French and German influence. One must not forget that the Five [the so-called "Neo-Russians" of the later nineteenth century] never denied Glinka, they considered themselves as his heirs, and saw 'Russlann' as the masterwork of Russian music."

***

The mistaken impression that the Westerner entertains of Russian music, continues Mr. de Schloezer, is perfectly explicable. He seeks in this art the points of difference with his own. The "Asiatic visage" is for the European the earmark of true Russian music. For him the deorientalized Russian is not the real one. But "Russlann and Ludmilla" is based on the "contrast between the Russian world and the Asiatic. This contrast is no less apparent, intentional and systematic in Borodine's 'Prince Igor.' . . . Ultimately one finds this contrast even in the 'Oiseau de feu,' the only work in which Stravinsky has offered sacrifice to musical Orientalism. Everywhere and always, in Russian music since Glinka, the Orient is treated as a picturesque element, its characteristics serve to underline still more heavily the specific characteristics of Russian song. The complete opposite is true of the Occidental elements audible in the works of Glinka and his successors, especially of Tchaikovsky." The works of Glinka, then, "bear witness to the profound affinity existing between Russian musical sensibility and European musical culture."

This is the basis of the argument that Mr. de Schloezer presents in support of the authenticity of Stravinsky's "passport." "Stravinsky's case seemed incomprehensible . . . to those who repeat the old gag about 'scratch the Russian and you find the perior[illegible] to the d[illegible]ased Orientalistic produc[illegible] of the Muscovite era.

***

"One [illegible]ust hammer yet again on the fac[illegible]hat: If Occidental traditions had [illegible]n really alien to Russian menta[illegible] and sensibility, the church[illegible] of Pskov and Novgorod, their f[illegible]coes, their ikons; and later in St. [illegible]tersburg, under Alexander I, the ap[illegible]rition of artists like Glinka and P[illegible]shkin, or today a work like Stravi[illegible]xy's 'Oedipe,' that is to say, this ar[illegible]f equilibrium and luminosity, tru[illegible]Apollonian, would be [illegible]. It is, on the other hand, p[illegible]fectly explainable if one admits th[illegible]the Russians are not aliens to the [illegible]mily of Occidental races, bred o[illegible]y Graeco-Roman tradition; and tha[illegible] these artists, going for their sch[illegible]oling to European culture, find then[illegible]selves in their normal habitat, and [illegible]ut take up something rightly their [illegible]wn."

These arguments are ingenious and plausible, and perhaps more than that. Certain flaws in them, certain fallacies, might be pointed out, as Mr. de Schloezer's assumption that the predominating spirit of Russian national art—folk-art, which was the only truly national art possessed by the people before the nineteenth century—because it was strongly influenced by Byzantine formulas, rises essentially from the spring of "Graeco-Roman tradition," and the fact that however Glinka may stand historically and culturally in relation to Russian music, the Russian music which has found its way over the borders is that of Tchaikovsky and the great five who followed him, who carried the banner of nationalism so proudly, and who founded on the clear and unmistakable basis of nationalism a new school of music which not only proved itself but exerted in turn an immense and vitalizing influence on the development of European music, especially in France. But we are not concerned here with counter-arguments. We are citing brilliant and suggestive critical comment by Mr. de Schloezer, who concludes by saying that, "If Stravinsky seems to us today the most notable representative of the European spirit in music, it is not because he is international but because he is essentially national. His universality comes from his genius, or, paraphrasing his own formula, 'the passport takes him over the frontiers.'"

A TOSCANINI FOUNDATION.

Reports from Milan printed in the Italian press tell of a decision of a committee headed by the Podestà of that city and embracing many prominent citizens, formed for the purpose of honoring Maestro Toscanini upon the completion of his thirtieth year as director at La Scala, to establish a Toscanini Foundation. This foundation, which will have substantial financial backing and will be administered by the the organization of La Scala, will be devoted to welfare work among the children of the opera company's musicians.

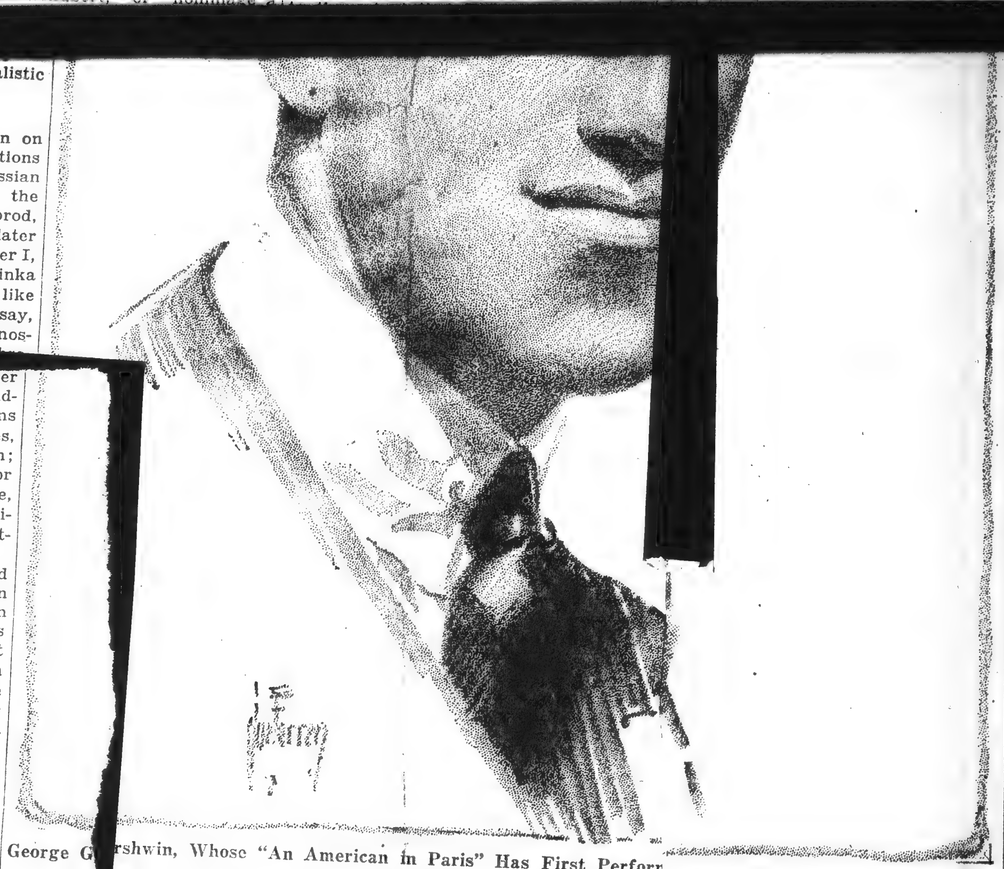
HENRY HADLEY'S "SAFIE."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

My friend, Arthur Nevin, has just told me that Henry Hadley's one-act opera, "Safie," presented in Mainz in 1909, was in fact the first American opera to be produced in Germany. Mr. Nevin said that he never claimed to be the composer of the first American opera to be produced in Germany, but the first to be performed in a Royal German Opera House.

ERNEST T. CARTER.

New York.



George G[illegible]rshwin, Whose "An American in Paris" Has First Perfor[illegible]ce Next Thursday by Philharmonic.

AN ATTERBERG AFTERMATH

THE o[illegible]iginal article in The London Sunday Times by Ernest Newm[illegible]an which precipitated the controvers[illegible]y over the Kurt Atterberg prize sym[illegible]hony (concluded to everybody's sa[illegible]isfaction by the composer's cabled de[illegible]ial of deliberate plagiarism designed [illegible]o "fool the critics") has just been[illegible] received in its entirety. Reviewing [illegible]he first London performance of th[illegible] work, Mr. Newman says:

"Sir Th[illegible]mas Beecham and the London Symp[illegible]hony Orchestra gave us on Monday [illegible]vening the first London performan[illegible]ce of Kurt Atterberg's symphony t[illegible]hat won the £2,000 prize offered by [illegible] the Columbia Graphophone Comp[illegible] any in connection with the Schuber[illegible]t centenary celebrations. The compa[illegible]ny seems to me to have received v[illegible]lue for its money. Two thousand p[illegible]ounds is far too much to pay for a [illegible]very bad symphony, and far too litt[illegible]e to pay for a very good one. It is[illegible] a fair price for a fair symphony, [illegible] which is what Atterberg has delive[illegible]red, f. o. b., as per esteemed ord[illegible]er of yesterday's date and hoping for[illegible] a continuation of valued custom. T[illegible]he Columbia Company has issued the [illegible]work in four excellent records, so t[illegible]he world will be able to sample it f[illegible]or itself.

"The sy[illegible]mphony, however, raises some curio[illegible]us questions for the curious mind[illegible]d. A work of this kind can hardly [illegible] expect to get a perfectly fair hearing[illegible]; the average man comes to it prepa[illegible]red for the worst, is disappointed [illegible]if he does not get something as ba[illegible]d as he expected, and lays himself ou[illegible]t to see all the faults of the work [illegible]and be blind to whatever virtues it m[illegible]ay possess.

"The sy[illegible]mphony compares favorably enoug[illegible]h with the majority of the new works [illegible]one hears nowadays. We have to re[illegible]member that the composer was bound[illegible] by the conditions of the competitio[illegible]n to deliver an article made acco[illegible]rding to specifications. The symphony [illegible]was to be 'melodic' and it was not to [illegible]be 'modernistic.' Considering how hampered he must have been in writing with one eye on the muse and the other on the judges, consider that Atterberg has turned out a very decent job of work.

"Every one on Monday was busy spotting reminiscences in the symphony; and it cannot be denied that they are plentiful and obvious. There may be two possible explanations of these. Atterberg may have looked down the list of judges, seen that they hailed from ten or eleven countries, and slyly made up his mind that he would put in a bit of something that would appeal to each of them in turn—a bit of 'Schehera-zade' for the Russian Glazounov, a bit of 'Cockaigne' for Mr. Tovey, a bit of the 'New World Symphony' for Mr. Damrosch a bit of 'Petrouchka' for the modernist Alfano, a bit of Granados for Salazar, and so on. But I wonder if there may not be another explanation that, in their glee at the spotting of all these reminiscences, my respected colleagues have missed. I wonder!

"Atterberg (a Swede, by the way) is not merely a composer. He is a musical critic. That means that he is a very intelligent fellow, not likely to take either music or musicians too seriously. Suppose he looked round with the cynical smile that, as all the world knows, all critics wear, and decided to pull the world's leg? Competition judges are mostly innocent people, easily taken in. There was a beautiful case in America some years ago: if I remember rightly, a committee was just saved from awarding the prize to a particular work when, by the grace of God, some one discovered that it was a copy, sent in by some wicked joker, of Berlioz's 'Corsair' overture. But a subtler method than this would be to sow a symphony with themes that suggested well-known works to the experienced hearer and then instantaneously switch him off them. Are we quite sure that this is not what Atterberg has done? The tribute paid to certain other works in this symphony is so obvious that it would indeed be a strange thing if, while the most casual hearer is conscious of the quotations, the composer himself (who, I repeat, is also a critic) should be the one man in the world of music to be unaware of them. Look at this theme, for example, from the finale. * * *"

Mr. Newman then quotes a theme from the finale of Atterberg's symphony and asks, "What is this but a gay rearrangement of the main theme of the fourth movement of Berlioz's 'Symphonie Fantastique'?" He then quotes the Berlioz theme, and continues:

"I should be very surprised indeed to learn that Atterberg was not fully aware of the sources of this and others of his themes. And if my theory is correct, the laugh is Atterberg's today. He has had the satisfaction not only of pulling off the £2,000 prize, but of pulling, almost to the pulling-off point, the legs of all his fellow-critics. While they have been pluming themselves on their smartness in detecting his plagiarisms, he has probably been laughing in his sleeve at them. Attaboy, Atterberg!"

PRIZES AND PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Mr. Kurt Atterberg, the winner of the $10,000 prize offered by the Columbia Phonograph Company for a symphony in the style of Schubert, is now reported to have confessed writing his prize symphony as a joke, plagiarizing other composers in order to bemuse the critics. Whether or not the confession is genuine, the humor of the situation has the poetic truth that is higher than mere fact. When the commercial company offered the prize, whatever its motives, it did a stupid and anti-artistic thing. It put an imposing array of dollars behind two implied propositions, both misleading: First, that a composer writes not for love of music but for love of money. Second, that he may therefore be induced by money to forego that arduous pursuit of his own style, which is the only concern of every real artist, and imitate any other that happens to be in financial demand.

The Columbia Phonograph Company abandoned its crude initial suggestion that composers should finish Schubert's Unfinished Symphony after several musicians, of whom the present writer had the honor to be one, had pointed out the absurdity of such a proposal. It substituted the almost equally demoralizing suggestion that composers write "in the style of Schubert," or "hommage à Schubert."

The outcome is a fiasco of which the poetic justice seems almost too good to be true. Whether Mr. Atterberg really turns out to have his tongue in his cheek or not, such an ironic response is the only appropriate one for the artist to make to the commercial propagandist.

DANIEL GREGORY MASON.

New York, Nov. 29, 1928.

The Flonzaley Quartet, Reappea[illegible]ing Next Saturday Afternoon at the Town Hall.

Photo Cop[illegible]yright by Fernand de Gueldre.

making an outst
the three-act oper
Julius Bittner. Th
tist, whose princ
(or was) that of is an old protégé o
in a certain sen
pupil, despite the eral years older any rate, it is sai hand of Walter spots in the score

Bittner is what Austria call a tru composer. He prac
he travels, though along the same pa
Kienzl once trod tal, tear-producing
One of Bittner's e
"Der Musikant" ( which showed a Kienzl influence. act composition of entitled "Das Höll Infernal Gold"), i very close to the opera. After that much luck. He own texts.

It is a funny opera—like walking knife or like a moo
the edge of a roof.
becomes conscious loses one's somnam edness, one crashes ine of this latest o falls to her death
third act, for such of this dear, one sweet, Viennese porcelain plates in wanders about o
Vienna at night.

***

She has the misfo
the street her attic
First Lieutenant Jo ("assigned to the
She happens to be her plates, which s course there are s cording to a Germa bring luck and ou
very much in need gambling debts whic but which he must of honor if he does his creditor to put his own head. Th kindled; he will
maybe he will win,
he must have not money; and behold!
pears, the black de even than Kaspar schütz." He is th
Nicola Spaicic, mer who promises to p
the officer will gui
Verona into his han ians (the action is i

After a violent bat science, our hero ag posal. Spaicic brings luck must be provid girl who, standing b bler's chair, draws forces from the moo
it works; our frie companions' pockets turns pious and vows [illegible], Marie, that he more, and promises and get a transfer t son. The love nigh the second and third falls between the firs
the case of Mr.
Madame Butterfly.

***

But then the shadow either cannot or will plans, and in the third lovers have returned h a General and several men, more terrifying judges, await the her betrayed him. A grac hour is given him in his life; the necessary is handed to him. Ma wandering about in h
the shot and falls to h

That is a strong ye the kind that appeals t who like to go to the their hearts gladdene loved films of golden their mixture of humo tragedy. It is importa ber, however, that this work of a real hone Viennese. He speaks unmistakably, and tho ures, from the princip down to the wings of never rise above the ty ventional, they are thoroughly Viennese an

The music, too, is Aus to the extent that Bitt vided ample local color:
flavor is provided thro of old Austrian bugle ca times seem to clash a harmony. For the stric effects of the second act ingredients are used, lo in four-quarter time, turns from the "Ros touches of dialect from old Austria, waltz rhyth

d be a Russian Moussorgsky's s Songs" would tever their race
"swap passports them; to gain
r instance, one into the Bour-
-bag; and Rim-
Russian folk-any one of us
sic. . . . We ek for other ch nation has s genius, some-and manifest usical feeling, conception of nd of musical o compute the s of this 'geat them differed us only uctions which a people or of certainly, pos-raditions; we ompositions of em to display certain con-very indefi-

And who,
s against the eat composer f these tradi-
One may be contingency, bject to this against this hey will set dition'; but an of genius impose him-by annexing
ing that alis 'neverthehe' connects oned 'tradily developing ch, in short, ssy, at first clear ideas,' genius,' and uite rightly) musician par

sets out to ort.
ssian music,
from Glinka, ly dubs the sian musical he national the Czar,"
," and cert here one esting fact, Glinka's
s romances
f which all erged, gengner insuf-Italian cley notice in pean, who f Rimsky-Moussorg-
s from that purer and e Russian from this,
some sort nize them-of Italian, ence. One Five [the f the later er denied hemselves sslann' as n music."

that the Russian nloezer, is ks in this with his is for the true Ruseoriental-
one. But is based the Rustic. This nt, inten-orodine's tely one in the work in ed sacri-
. Every-an music reated as haractertill more cteristics plete op-ntal ele-f Glinka ially of Glinka, profound Russian European

rgument ents in of Stravinsky's
le . . . g about find the Hellen created perior

produc

"On the fac had menta church their in St.
the ap
and P Stravi
this ar ity, tru lutely hand, mits th
to the bred o and tha their sc find then ly their

These arguments are ingenious and plausible, and perhaps more than that. Certain flaws in them, certain fallacies, might be pointed out, as Mr. de Schloezer's assumption that the predominating spirit of Russian national art—folk-art, which was the only truly national art possessed by the people before the nineteenth century—because it was strongly influenced by Byzantine formulas, rises essentially from the spring of "Graeco-Roman tradition," and the fact that however Glinka may stand historically and culturally in relation to Russian music, the Russian music which has found its way over the borders is that of Tchaikovsky and the great five who followed him, who carried the banner of nationalism so proudly, and who founded on the clear and unmistakable basis of nationalism a new school of music which not only proved itself but exerted in turn an immense and vitalizing influence on the development of European music, especially in France. But we are not concerned here with counter-arguments. We are citing brilliant and suggestive critical comment by Mr. de Schloezer, who concludes by saying that, "If Stravinsky seems to us today the most notable representative of the European spirit in music, it is not because he is international but because he is essentially national. His universality comes from his genius, or, paraphrasing his own formula, 'the passport takes him over the frontiers.'"

A TOSCANINI FOUNDATION.

Reports from Milan printed in the Italian press tell of a decision of a committee headed by the Podestà of that city and embracing many prominent citizens, formed for the purpose of honoring Maestro Toscanini upon the completion of his thirtieth year as director at La Scala, to establish a Toscanini Foundation. This foundation, which will have substantial financial backing and will be administered by the the organization of La Scala, will be devoted to welfare work among the children of the opera company's musicians.

HENRY HADLEY'S "SAFIE."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

My friend, Arthur Nevin, has just told me that Henry Hadley's one-act opera, "Safie," presented in Mainz in 1909, was in fact the first American opera to be produced in Germany. Mr. Nevin said that he never claimed to be the composer of the first American opera to be produced in Germany, but the first to be performed in a Royal German Opera House. ERNEST T. CARTER.

New York.

George G rshwin, Whose "An American in Paris" Has First Performa ce Next Thursday by Philharmonic.

AN ATTERBERG AFT RMATH

THE o iginal article in The London Sunday Times by Ernest Newm ering how hampered he must hav controvers an which precipitated the prize sym y over the Kurt Atterberg body's sa phony (concluded to everycabled de isfaction by the composer's designed ial of deliberate plagiarism just been o "fool the critics") has viewing eceived in its entirety. Reance of th e first London perform-
"Sir Tho work, Mr. Newman says:
don Symp mas Beecham and the Lon-Monday ony Orchestra gave us on performan vening the first London symphony t e of Kurt Atterberg's offered by hat won the £2,000 prize phone Comp the Columbia Graphothe Schuber any in connection with The compa t centenary celebrations.
received vs ny seems to me to have thousand p lue for its money. Two pay for a ounds is far too much to far too litt very bad symphony, and one. It i e to pay for a very good symphony, a fair price for a fair has delive which is what Atterberg teemed ord red, f. o. b., as per es-hoping for er of yesterday's date and custom. T a continuation of valued issued the he Columbia Company has ords, so t work in four excellent rec-sample it f e world will be able to
"The sy or itself.
some curio mphony, however, raises rious minde is questions for the cu-can hardly d. A work of this kind fair hearing expect to get a perfectly to it prepa ; the average man comes appointed red for the worst, is dis-thing as be if he does not get some-himself ou d as he expected, and lays the work t to see all the faults of virtues it n and be blind to whatever may possess.
"The sy mphony compares favorably enoug h with the majority of the new works one hears nowadays. We have to re member that the composer was bound by the conditions of the competitio to deliver an article made acco ding to specifications. The symphony was to be 'melodic' and it was not to be 'modernistic.' Consid-sure that this is not what Atterberg has done? The tribute paid to certain other works in this symphony is so obvious that it would indeed be a strange thing if, while the most casual hearer is conscious of the quotations, the composer himself (who, I repeat, is also a critic) should be the one man in the world of music to be unaware of them. Look at this theme, for example, from the finale. * * *"

Mr. Newman then quotes a theme from the finale of Atterberg's symphony and asks, "What is this but a gay rearrangement of the main theme of the fourth movement of Berlioz's 'Symphonie Fantastique'?" He then quotes the Berlioz theme, and continues:

"I should be very surprised indeed to learn that Atterberg was not fully aware of the sources of this and others of his themes. And if my theory is correct, the laugh is Atterberg's today. He has had the satisfaction not only of pulling off the £2,000 prize, but of pulling, almost to the pulling-off point, the legs of all his fellow-critics. While they have been pluming themselves on their smartness in detecting his plagiarisms, he has probably been laughing in his sleeve at them. Attaboy, Atterberg!"

PRIZES AND PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Mr. Kurt Atterberg, the winner of the $10,000 prize offered by the Columbia Phonograph Company for a symphony in the style of Schubert, is now reported to have confessed writing his prize symphony as a joke, plagiarizing other composers in order to bemuse the critics. Whether or not the confession is genuine, the humor of the situation has the poetic truth that is higher than mere fact. When the commercial company offered the prize, whatever its motives, it did a stupid and anti-artistic thing. It put an imposing array of dollars behind two implied propositions, both misleading: First, that a composer writes not for love of music but for love of money. Second, that he may therefore be induced by money to forego that arduous pursuit of his own style, which is the only concern of every real artist, and imitate any other that happens to be in financial demand.

The Columbia Phonograph Company abandoned its crude initial suggestion that composers should finish Schubert's Unfinished Symphony after several musicians, of whom the present writer had the honor to be one, had pointed out the absurdity of such a proposal. It substituted the almost equally demoralizing suggestion that composers write "in the style of Schubert," or "hommage à Schubert."

The outcome is a fiasco of which the poetic justice seems almost too good to be true. Whether Mr. Atterberg really turns out to have his tongue in his cheek or not, such an ironic response is the only appropriate one for the artist to make to the commercial propagandist.

DANIEL GREGORY MASON.

New York, Nov. 29, 1928.

The Flonzaley Quartet, Reappea ing Next Saturday Afternoon at the Town Hall.

Photo Cop yright by Fernand de Gueldre.

Oper in Berlin, Bruno Walter was instrumental in making an outstanding success of the three-act opera "Mondnacht," by Julius Bittner. This Viennese dramatist, whose principal occupation is (or was) that of an Austrian judge, is an old protégé of Walter. In fact, in a certain sense he is even his pupil, despite the fact that he is several years older than Walter. At any rate, it is said that the master hand of Walter touched up many spots in the score of "Mondnacht."

Bittner is what we in Germany and Austria call a truly native type of composer. He practices "home art"; he travels, though on a higher level, along the same path which Wilhelm Kienzl once trod with his sentimental, tear-producing "Evangelimann." One of Bittner's early successes was "Der Musikant" ("The Musician"), which showed a great deal of the Kienzl influence. Then came a one-act composition of the woodcut type entitled "Das Höllische Gold" ("The Infernal Gold"), in which he comes very close to the ideal of the folk-opera. After that he never had very much luck. He always wrote his own texts.

It is a funny thing about folk-opera—like walking on the blade of a knife or like a moonstruck person on the edge of a roof. The minute one becomes conscious of reality and loses one's somnambulistic sure-footedness, one crashes, just as the heroine of this latest of Bittner's operas falls to her death at the end of the third act, for such is the cruel fate of this dear, one might almost say sweet, Viennese girl, who paints porcelain plates in the daytime and wanders about on the roofs of Vienna at night.

***

She has the misfortune to meet on the street her attic room neighbor, First Lieutenant Josef von Altrichter ("assigned to the General Staff"). She happens to be carrying a few of her plates, which she drops, and of course there are shards. But, according to a German proverb, shards bring luck and our Lieutenant is very much in need of luck. He has gambling debts which he cannot pay, but which he must pay as a matter of honor if he does not want to force his creditor to put a bullet through his own head. Thus new hope is kindled; he will play again and maybe he will win, but to do that he must have not only luck but money; and behold! the tempter appears, the black devil, more black even than Kaspar in the "Freischütz." He is the false friend, Nicola Spaicic, merchant of Zara, who promises to provide money if the officer will guide the plans of Verona into his hands for the Italians (the action is in the year 1865).

After a violent battle with his conscience, our hero agrees to the proposal. Spaicic brings the money, but luck must be provided by the sweet girl who, standing behind the gambler's chair, draws down magic forces from the moon. And behold! it works; our friend empties his companions' pockets, whereupon he turns pious and vows to his guardian angel, Marie, that he will gamble no more, and promises to marry her and get a transfer to a quiet garrison. The love night falls between the second and third act, just as it falls between the first and second in the case of Mr. Pinkerton and Madame Butterfly.

***

But then the shadows fall. Spaicic either cannot or will not return the plans, and in the third act, when the lovers have returned home, a Colonel, a General and several secret service men, more terrifying than feudal judges, await the hero. Spaicic has betrayed him. A grace period of one hour is given him in which to end his life; the necessary shooting iron is handed to him. Marie, sweet girl, wandering about in her sleep, hears the shot and falls to her death.

That is a strong yet simple plot, the kind that appeals to simple souls who like to go to the movies to have their hearts gladdened by the beloved films of golden Vienna with their mixture of humor, pathos and tragedy. It is important to remember, however, that this "film" is the work of a real honest-to-goodness Viennese. He speaks the language unmistakably, and though his figures, from the principal characters down to the wings of the scenery, never rise above the typical and conventional, they are nevertheless thoroughly Viennese and Austrian.

The music, too, is Austrian, at least to the extent that Bittner has provided ample local color: the military flavor is provided through the use of old Austrian bugle calls, which at times seem to clash a bit with the harmony. For the strictly Viennese effects of the second act all kinds of ingredients are used, local melodies in four-quarter time, declamatory turns from the "Rosenkavalier," touches of dialect from all parts of old Austria, waltz rhythms, and, to is certainly not a "modern" composer, but in one respect he is in the same class with the most up-to-date—his work contains too little music; and certainly a popular opera must have lots of music in it.

At all three of the Berlin opera houses there have been several other important new presentations of older operas. At the Städtische Oper, "Tannhäuser," under Walter Bruno, has been given with the obvious purpose of making of it the naïve, theatrical and romantic piece that our great-grandfathers knew; Under den Linden, a renovated "Walküre," under Leo Blech, is interpreted in a big way, both scenically and musically, and in the Platz der Republik there is a very lively, colorful, realistic presentation of "Carmen."

***

In the concert hall we were able, after a lapse of many years, to greet Serge W. Rachmaninoff again, both as pianist and as composer. As a pianist he immediately recaptured us all with his ingenious, simple and yet polished playing—in other words, his genuine musicianship. As a composer, however (he played his D minor concerto under Furtwängler), he belongs to that bygone period whose ideals were rather salonesque.

Another guest, who was considerably fêted socially, was the Rumanian composer, Georges Enesco. We heard one of his orchestra suites and a few Rumanian rhapsodies in which was revealed an elementary musician lacking a true feeling for style.

The greatest impression was made through Otto Klemperer, who presented the two latest works of Stravinsky and Ernst Krenek in one of his symphony concerts. The Stravinsky offering was "Apollon Musagète," an echo of "Oedipus Rex," while Krenek's "Little Symphony" served as a preliminary to three one-act offerings that had previously been given in Wiesbaden.

Different as these two works are, in one respect they are alike: both are intended as parodies. In the case of Stravinsky it is serious parody. He indulges in classicism, writing a series of ten ballet pieces for a glorified string orchestra. He becomes archaic. No longer do we find adaptations of the Bachian style or the free play with the gay muse of Pergolesi. Instead, there is an imitation of the severe cast of antiquity, or rather the plaster cast of the empire or of Biedermeyer. And when Lully or Rameau are introduced, they are seen from the empire point of view and their patron saints are Clementi or Kuhlau.

***

This strange relationship is actually in evidence, just as we find in the realm of pictorial art, for example, a relationship between Picasso and the drawings of Prud'hon or David.

Everything is tonal again; certainly occasional adulterations through the use of tones that fail to harmonize, as well as jumping the modulatory tracks every once in a while, do not constitute a new style synthesis. Some things can only be understood with the aid of the scenic presentation; so, for example, the violin solo is explained through the Renaissance-like appearance of a violin-playing Apollo.

Yet the whole thing grips because of its peculiar rigidity and coldness, because of the significance of the experiment. This significance is as great here as in "Oedipus Rex," no matter how much more alive and strong and pulsating the operatic oratorio was than the later ballet.

Krenek is less monumental and much more lively. His "Little Symphony" is a parody of the classic symphony. The parodying process begins with the very instrumentation; the strings consist only of violins and contrabasses, the hole in the middle register being plugged up with a chorus of pick instruments, beside which stands the "band" of winds and traps that sometimes becomes conscious of its up-to-dateness and starts to act like a jazz orchestra.

The symphonic form as well as the spirit of the symphony are treated rather roughly in this little work; and so are certain composers, for instance Brahms, who has to provide the second theme of the first movement. The entire slow movement is a rare piece of sanctimoniousness, in which hymn-like flights à la Pfitzner are carried ad absurdum. There are a thousand jests in melody and instrumentation, and yet the boldness of the whole thing is so charmingly amiable that all one can do is laugh and feel like shaking the composer's hand.

Alberto Franchetti, the composer of "Germania," has recently completed another opera, entitled "The Gonfaloniere." The libretto is by Gioacchino Forzano.

Karl Goepfart's choral work, "Roms Fall," was recently presented in Zutsen and Hengeloo, Holland. Ernst Wettig conducted.

TRANS. DEC. 10

Music and M

Second Time, And to Larger, Deeper Residue

"The Song of The Earth" and a Clear Case for Mahler, Composer and Poet

WOULD that it had been a fair evening, instead of one bringing into these parts the first welcome touch of winter! Then, on Saturday, the onlooker could have assigned cause more confidently for the unusual number of empty seats in Symphony Hall. Was Mahler the deterrent or was it merely inclement weather? Or did any excuse serve, in a busy time, for rest and relaxation elsewhere? Mahler does demand hard listening; thinking only of the design he would accomplish, exacts it for upward of an hour. (The chances are that he never knew the word "concentration"; merely took for granted that useful function of the mind.) Besides, there is the anti-Mahler fetich, curiously developed in our capitals of music within the last ten years. In Dr. Muck's day, here in Boston, audiences flocked to hear his Fifth or his Second Symphony; clapped hands loudly. Reviewers joined their plaudits. All and sundry agreed to repetitions "by general request." Now, when Mr. Mengelberg proposes Mahler to the patrons of the Philharmonic Society in New York, or Mr. Koussevitzky leads him back, after ten years, into Symphony Hall, murmurs rise of distaste, dissent, dread. There is even an anti-Mahler formula that old men mumble, whether or not it applies to the music before them. Enough that it bears for signature the boresome name. The bystander might believe him co-mate in tedium with the great and good d'Indy.

The irritated Mahlerites also bestir themselves. There are more of them among musicians than many believe; while not all are conductors. Hearing his music, they use the superlative degree in comment, when a milder emphasis might be more persuasive. Between these interchanges, after seventy minutes of "The Song of the Earth," the plain man sits bewildered. With self-respect as an intelligent listener, can he take away only the memory of Mme. Cahier's singing and of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting? Must he poultice even that with recollection of a workaday Concerto of Handel transfigured by the sonority and plasticity of the string choir? Many a page of Bach, as the Handelites like to say, is routine and stencil. By the same token so also is many a page of Handel—among them this Twelfth Concerto Grosso, in B minor.

Yet there is a case for Mahler and for "The Song of the Earth." When it is put to him the plain man finds, with a shrug of relief, that it accords with more than one of his own impressions. Through the length and breadth of Central Europe from Oslo and Stockholm on the north to Munich and Vienna on the south, from the eastern border of France to the western border of Russia, Mahler persists as an eminent composer to be heard again and again with interest and satisfaction. These lands and folk are not unmusical. Holland sounds his praises: Mr. Newman and the late Mr. Langford of The Manchester Guardian were his champions in England. Paris hears him, not too reluctantly. With or without reason, he is presumed to continue the illustrious German line, the perdurable German tradition. By such titles he has a right to occasional entrance into the far-spreading concerts of the Boston Orchestra.

For better and for worse Mahler wrote a singular, individual, "very personal" music. It is like none other in the world; it has given birth to no progeny. For strangeness, as expression of a composer and a conductor through thirty years no mean figure from Vienna to New York, it deserves place on the catholic programs, ordained by long and honorable precedent upon Symphony Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky has restored the Symphony Orchestra to high quality and rank; given it new titles to distinction; upon no more sensitive instrument does a conductor play. He himself is a master of instrumental color, manipulation, suggestion. In all three Mahler, composing, excelled. Few conductors, unless they be wholly Latin or obstinately opinionated, may turn a score of Mahler without spontaneous wish to "try" it.

These are extraneous reflections. The plain man will prefer to give judgment by what he has heard, in the concert-hall, out of "The Song of the Earth." He will be dull-witted, indeed, if the texts of these seven songs, even after they have been milled through Chinese, German and English, do not interest him. Whether they are gay, as in three, or sombre as in four, in substance and quality they are well above most "literature" that has given occasion to music. To read them is to be curious how they will fare in tones. The plain man listens—dull-eared beyond remedy, if the rhythmic vigor, the whole propulsive ardor, of the first division do not stir him. He will lack imagination if the wan tone-picturing, the descent of spent, weary, solitary mood, do not lay hold upon him through the second. Through the third and the fourth, he listens to as light, graceful, fanciful, transparent music as though a Latin pen had written it. The fifth—and the music-maker of these adroit miniatures is singing out homely, frank and lusty. The sixth, the seventh, the tone-poem in which they are vocal obbligati or interludes—and lo! fatigue is forgotten in the strange and piercing beauty, the brooding haunted power of these final pages. Yes: "The Song of the Earth" is Mahler's least blemished "Symphony," the music in which he most fulfilled himself.

Talk to the plain man of Mahler's strivings and shortcomings, by and large, or as they peer here and there out of "The Song of the Earth" and he will fend you away—all this is actual experience at a supper party—as a reviewer by formula or as a school-room pedant. His emotions, by the new Symphony excited, have conquered him—for Mahler. He returns thanks and praise to Mr. Koussevitzky; though he know not a page of them, bids the conductor go on in future seasons to the Fifth or the Seventh Symphony, that they also may stir him. Mahler, he remarks bluntly, had faults but as yet needs no apologists. Meanwhile, the host goes to the bookshelves, pulls down a volume of Ernest Newman and reads out:

> It is at least arguable that Mahler's nine Symphonies represent on the whole the most significant body of work done in the symphonic form since Brahms; while even people who are not yet on the intellectual or the musical level of the Symphonies are as a rule sensitive to the beauty and the power of his songs. . . . One can hardly imagine a composer more sure of himself in latitudes not accessible to ordinary feet and this combined impression of bigness and certainly is one of the rarest impressions in the concert-room and the surest sign of the presence of a master. . . . But behind all this certainty of style and of technique is an imagination of a very unusual kind, vivid, ardent and vast, with the power of turning everything that passes through it into natural music. To minds that can enter into his with imaginative sympathy, Mahler is one of the subtlest forces in modern music.

The plain man was right: Mahler needs no apologists; for he has champions. And "The Song of The Earth is the end that crowned his work.

H. T. P.

last of the soli... aft

MUSIC

HERALD DEC 11

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The second program of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was given last night at Symphony hall. It included Prokofief's "Classical" Symphony, Debussy's "Prelude a L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," "The Dance of Salome," from Strauss's opera and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

This was a program admirably designed to exhibit the peculiar gifts of the conductor, and the remarkable skill of the excellent body of musicians under him. One might complain that the arrangement of the program could have been improved. "Salome's Dance," with its furiously excited ending, seemed a little out of place just before the Beethoven Symphony, even though an intermission separated them. And disregarded was Beethoven's plaintive note about the "Eroica": "If it be performed too late, there is danger that it will not produce on the audience, whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain."

Mr. Koussevitsky risked the weariness of the audience, but it must be admitted that the effects he strives for, while not always according to tradition, seldom allow the audience to lose interest in what is happening. His reading of the "Eroica," is not free from exaggeration, but it is stirring and majestic.

The polished ensemble which Symphony audiences have been taught to expect from the strings, was again apparent in Prokofief's charming "Classical" Symphony (which suggests a kinship to Stravinsky's excursion into classic ballet in "Apollon Musagete),—though momentary lack of precision marred the first movement.

Koussevitsky's interpretation of "L'-Apres-Midi d'un Faune," despite its finely wrought detail, was lacking in rhythmic life and impulse, and hence missed some of the fantastic spirit of Mallarme's poem.

"The Dance of Salome," with its hypnotic rhythm, was excellently worked up to its frenzied climax.

There was long applause for the conductor and the players. E. B.

A Second Monday for Symphonic Pleasures

HIGHLY favored among the audiences that listen to symphonic music was the one that heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall last evening. It was the second of the Monday evening series, and a program fit for the gods had been assembled. That little gem called Prokofiev's "Classical" symphony began it. Debussy's prelude, "To the Afternoon of a Faun," and the dance of Salome from Strauss's "Salome" continued it. Beethoven's monumental third symphony brought conclusion.

One need not quarrel with those who hold that Prokofiev's symphony is not many meanings. The application, of "Mozartean." That adjective may have course, comes out of Felix Borowski's remark that Prokofiev had tried to catch the spirit of Mozart and to write as Mozart would if he were now living. The composer himself, however, contented himself with calling the symphony "classical." Of course the themes are not the themes which a Mozart would have written, even a Mozart of the twentieth century. They are the themes of a Russian writing a certain type of "universal" music. It is doubtful whether Mozart would ever have used a Gavotte in a symphony. It is doubtful whether Mozart would have written a "Larghetto' 'with so much rhythmic activity as the present one. But certain modulations are typically those of Mozart. And the style, in matters more spiritual than technical (if indeed there can be such separation)—its refined and polished gayety, its shining elegance, its aristocratic sophistication, in these and many others—has definite affinities to that of Mozart. Probably further one should not go in comparison. Like unto a precious diamond, lustrously polished, glittering and sparkling in the suulight, was the performance of Mr. Koussevitzky and his men.

In like degree these forces displayed ...e many and various beauties of De...issy's so-called prelude. A delicious ...elange it is in the music as with ...allarmé, of fauns and forests, of Naiads and nymphs, of dreaming and of forgetful remembrance, of drowsy warmths, and finally of sleep. As fresh is this pioneer of "impressionism" today as it was when it first startled Paris a full generation ago. To Mr. Laurent and Mr. Gillet and Mr. Koussevitzky and a hundred others we of Boston owe its present beauties no less than to Claude Achille Debussy.

Excellent companion piece was the Strauss dance music. Again a music sensuous and languid. Again a music of wondrous color. Straussian energies thrust themselves upon one only at the very beginning and the very end. Between ...e the calm surfaces of a voluptuous ...ance. Artfully molded are they. Fused ...y a master's hand they run into each ...ther. Illusion of the gently swaying ...notion of the figure of the dancer, and ...ndeed toward the end, of her ardors, do ...hey bring. For a moment in closing the ...white heats of passion spring from ...massed strings. Mr. Koussevitzky gave ...voice to it all—the langurous movements, ...the postering and posing, scarce with ...motion at all, the inexhaustible interchange of subtle coloring, the flecks of momentary agitation, the gradual ascent, the final passion.

And again a hall filled with people was witness that Beethoven's "Eroica" is music of the gods. Never was music more grandly conceived. Seldom does it cut more deeply. Through heroic, energetic, tumultuous beginnings, it passes to a noble funeral march, a scherzo of rare lightness, to the final variations of huge dimensions. Above all it is a music of heroisms. So Mr. Koussevitzky played it. Of heroic proportions were the tumults of the first movement. The momentary lulls served but to fan the flames anew. Both the heights and the depths it sounded as these hundred men played it. The noble tragedy, the restrained gloom of the march is of a piece with such beginnings. For the orchestra of last evening the scherzo was play of virtuosity as well as poetic movement. No greater precision or lightness can one humanly expect from strings. For horns to match them is no less than marvel. It was accomplished last evening. And through the variations, in climax, the heroisms again mounted. Beethoven in his third is indeed a hero of heroes. And Koussevitzky with him.

A. H. M.

TRANS. DEC. 11 -

CLASSIC MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

8:45 A.M. Dec 11

By MOSES SMITH

No novelty stood on the second program of the Monday evening series of Symphony concerts, no hair-raising composition of a brazen ultra-modern to disturb the tranquility of the concert-goer who worships the familiar. This is very likely as it should be, for the listeners at these extra concerts, most of them new to symphonic music, should be led, not driven.

Prokofieff's "classical" symphony was written only a little more than ten years ago. But it is intentionally written in a simple idiom; it troubles no one's slumbers. With tongue in cheek, Prokofieff is said to be writing as a modern Mozart would. The music sounds much more like dressed up French and Russian ballet. Only the form is Mozart.

Debussy's masterpiece, "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and the more debatable Dance of Salome from Strauss' "Salome" were the middle numbers on the program. The Prelude was beautifully played. The Strauss was not so imaginatively interpreted by Mr. Koussevitzky, it seemed to us, as it was by his assistant, Richard Burgin, when he conducted a pair of concerts recently. This later reading was too strained, too affected to impress the listener with its sincerity. Furthermore, the instrumental balance was not always good.

The closing piece was Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which displayed Mr. Koussevitzky once more in his role of masterly interpreter of standard classics.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MONDAY CONCERT

GLOBE

Brilliant Performance of Familiar Music Pleases

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night the second of its five Monday concerts. Mr Koussevitzky chose, as usual, familiar numbers already heard this season in the Friday and Saturday series. Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Salome's dance from Richard Strauss' opera, and Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," all brilliantly performed, greatly pleased an audience which completely filled Symphony Hall. Every seat for this series has been sold.

Prokofieff's little symphony again proved the virtuosity of conductor and players. The music, though not intrinsically interesting, is very deftly written by a clever modern with no reverence and little real understanding of the 18th century. In it, the orchestra sounded particularly well.

Mr Koussevitzky's somewhat sentimentalized version of Debussy's "Faun" was last night chiefly notable for its display of the fine quality of the wood-wind players in the Boston Symphony. For Salome's dance, the conductor succeeded in evoking the alternating languor and frenzy the situation in Wilde's play demands.

The "Eroica" was eloquently interpreted, but in this number there were less precision of detail. Some of the attacks were not clean cut, some of the players were merely reeling off the notes without paying close attention to entrances and nuances. It is not so easy to make Beethoven sound well as it is to secure a virtuoso performance of Prokofieff's little symphony. The slow movement dragged, owing to an unduly slow pace.

Great familiar classics like the "Eroica" too often receive such routine, and rather slipshod performances as last night's, which only Mr Koussevitzky's interpretive talent saved from dullness. His sense of climax and feeling for emotional melody never desert him.

The next concert in this series will be given Jan 21. P. R.

PLAY SECOND O... MONDAY SERIE...

Symphony at Top Spee... Under Mr. Koussevitzk...

Pst Dec. 11

Music in which Mr. Koussevitzky a... hence the Symphony Orchestra excel... made the concert at Symphony Ha... last evening, the second of the c... rent Monday series. In many a p... formance at home and abroad condu... tor and players have tossed off be... lightly and surely as they did last e... ning, graceful measures of Prokofie... "Classical Symphony," with which t... programme began, have whipped up t... pace of the final movement almo... but not quite, to the point where... speed becomes confusion.

On a recent Friday afternoon an... Saturday evening at Symphony Ha... and at a subsequent concert in Ca... negie Hall Mr. Koussevitzky's and th... orchestra's performance of Debussy'... Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun,... repeated last evening, was lauded to th... skies. In the Dance of Salome fro... Richard Strauss' opera of the daughte... of Herodias and her lust for John th... Baptist, which made the third numbe... on this list of last evening, Mr. Kous... sevitzky once more showed his abilit... to endow this music with the exotic... sensual quality that all have not bee... able to draw from it, though by toke... of his performance it is latent in th... score.

And finally, for ending of the co... cert, came the "Eroica" Symphony o... Beethoven, in which on every repeti... tion Mr. Koussevitzky has showed tha... in this symphony at least he can b... eloquent, impassioned, sufficiently ro... mantic, and yet do no violence to th... composer's expressed intentions. Upo... this and upon the other pieces of th... evening, especially Strauss' dance, th... audience lavished its applause.

Concert-Chronicle

TRANS. — DEC 14

Presenting a Prize-Winner

LAST evening in Sanders Theater ...curred the third of the Cambri... concerts of the Boston Sympho... Orchestra. In the life of at least ... person it was an event. That per... was Leon Vartanian, pianist. His ... pearance marks the beginning of a ... policy on the part of the Boston S... phony Orchestra. Mr. Vartanian is ... pianist who last spring at the New E... land Conservatory of Music, in o... competition with his fellow students, ... the annual prize which consists of ... pianoforte. Now the Boston Sympho... Orchestra steps in and makes the w... ning of this competition even m... significant and attractive. For beg... ning with this year, the winner of ... prize is also assured an appearance ... soloist with the orchestra at one of ... regular concerts. Mr. Vartanian ... the first recipient of the honor. He h... chosen to play Chopin's Concerto in ... minor in proof of his pianistic sk... This is probably not the occasion ... comment on Chopin's concerto. Suff... it to say that like many another wo... from the Romanticists it does not br... the thrill to modern ears that it p... vided for an earlier generation. ... this Mr. Vartanian is in no wise ... blame. It was probably chosen for h... by his teachers. It is a work much us... and exceedingly useful in the schools, a... it did serve to give Mr. Vartanian ... excellent introduction to his larger au... ence. One noted first in Mr. Vartania... playing an exceedingly beautiful to... Limpid, bright, crystal clear it was ... all times. Unaided by other qualities ... would have made his playing a joy ... the listener. Aided by his other pianis... and musicianly accomplishments, ... served to increase and heighten pleasu... for Mr. Vartanian's technic is by ... means inconsiderable.

Preceding the concerto the orchest... played Handel's Concerto Grosso in ... minor for string orchestra, with the ... accustomed warmth and fullness of to... Largos and larghettos brought sustain... phrase, broadly songful line. Allegr... added work of decorative design, and t... contrasts between "concertino" a... "ripieno" which are the life-blood ... these concertos. Again and again, ... one hears these Koussevitzkian perfor... ances of the earlier classics, one wo... ders what would be the look of mar... and astonishment on the faces of t... Handels and the Bachs could they he... the ample and sonorous voice which th... music today is able to command.

Came for final number Cesar Franc... Symphony in D minor. That it ga... pleasure there can be no doubt. For t... audience clapped loud and long, till c... ductor bade the men rise in acknowle... ment. Even then the applause was sl... to subside. One may believe that ... was not entirely the electrifying climax ... which brought this applause, for wis... and beautifully Mr. Koussevitzky prop... tioned his work. A tempo slacker... here, a rhythm relaxed there, a sonor... softened elsewhere, and one caught ... gleam of the mystical Franck peeri... over the conductor's shoulder. Mast... ful are his advances in this symphon... as they march on and on to thrilli... climax. Of rare beauty always has be... the song of the second movement, ... equal lightness the scherzo which ... added to it. And when one adds to th... the feeling of ineffable light which ... seen only in the music of Franck, o... must conclude, small wonder that a... audience in Cambridge could not expre... itself highly enough in approval of sy... phony and performance. A. H. M.

TRANS. DEC. 10

Music and M

Second Time, And to Larger, Deeper Residue

"The Song of The Earth" and a Clear Case for Mahler, Composer and Poet

WOULD that it had been a fair evening, instead of one bringing into these parts the first welcome touch of winter! Then, on Saturday, the onlooker could have assigned cause more confidently for the unusual number of empty seats in Symphony Hall. Was Mahler the deterrent or was it merely inclement weather? Or did any excuse serve, in a busy time, for rest and relaxation elsewhere? Mahler does demand hard listening; thinking only of the design he would accomplish, exacts it for upward of an hour. (The chances are that he never knew the word "concentration"; merely took for granted that useful function of the mind.) Besides, there is the anti-Mahler fetich, curiously developed in our capitals of music within the last ten years. In Dr. Muck's day, here in Boston, audiences flocked to hear his Fifth or his Second Symphony; clapped hands loudly. Reviewers joined their plaudits. All and sundry agreed to repetitions "by general request." Now, when Mr. Mengelberg proposes Mahler to the patrons of the Philharmonic Society in New York, or Mr. Koussevitzky leads him back, after ten years, into Symphony Hall, murmurs rise of distaste, dissent, dread. There is even an anti-Mahler formula that old men mumble, whether or not it applies to the music before them. Enough that it bears for signature the boresome name. The bystander might believe him co-mate in tedium with the great and good d'Indy.

The irritated Mahlerites also bestir themselves. There are more of them among musicians than many believe; while not all are conductors. Hearing his music, they use the superlative degree in comment, when a milder emphasis might be more persuasive. Between these interchanges, after seventy minutes of "The Song of the Earth," the plain man sits bewildered. With self-respect as an intelligent listener, can he take away only the memory of Mme. Cahier's singing and of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting? Must he poultice even that with recollection of a workaday Concerto of Handel transfigured by the sonority and plasticity of the string choir? Many a page of Bach, as the Handelites like to say, is routine and stencil. By the same token so also is many a page of Handel—among them this Twelfth Concerto Grosso, in B minor.

Yet there is a case for Mahler and for "The Song of the Earth." When it is put to him the plain man finds, with a shrug of relief, that it accords with more than one of his own impressions. Through the length and breadth of Central Europe from Oslo and Stockholm on the north to Munich and Vienna on the south, from the eastern border of France to the western border of Russia, Mahler persists as an eminent composer to be heard again and again with interest and satisfaction. These lands and folk are not unmusical. Holland sounds his praises: Mr. Newman and the late Mr. Langford of The Manchester Guardian were his champions in England. Paris hears him, not too reluctantly. With or without reason, he is presumed to continue the illustrious German line, the perdurable German tradition. By such titles he has a right to occasional entrance into the far-spreading concerts of the Boston Orchestra.

For better and for worse Mahler wrote a singular, individual, "very personal" music. It is like none other in the world; it has given birth to no progeny. For strangeness, as expression of a composer and a conductor through thirty years no mean figure from Vienna to New York, it deserves place on the catholic programs, ordained by long and honorable precedent upon Symphony Hall. Mr. Koussevitzky has restored the Symphony Orchestra to high quality and rank; given it new titles to distinction; upon no more sensitive instrument does a conductor play. He himself is a master of instrumental color, manipulation, suggestion. In all three Mahler, composing, excelled. Few conductors, unless they be wholly Latin or obstinately opinionated, may turn a score of Mahler without spontaneous wish to "try" it.

These are extraneous reflections. The plain man will prefer to give judgment by what he has heard, in the concert-hall, out of "The Song of the Earth." He will be dull-witted, indeed, if the texts of these seven songs, even after they have been milled through Chinese, German and English, do not interest him. Whether they are gay, as in three, or sombre as in four, in substance and quality they are well above most "literature" that has given occasion to music. To read them is to be curious how they will fare in tones. The plain man listens—dull-eared beyond remedy, if the rhythmic vigor, the whole propulsive ardor, of the first division do not stir him. He will lack imagination if the wan tone-picturing, the descent of spent, weary, solitary mood, do not lay hold upon him through the second. Through the third and the fourth, he listens to as light, graceful, fanciful, transparent music as though a Latin pen had written it. The fifth—and the music-maker of these adroit miniatures is singing out homely, frank and lusty. The sixth, the seventh, the tone-poem in which they are vocal obbligati or interludes—and lo! fatigue is forgotten in the strange and piercing beauty, the brooding haunted power of these final pages. Yes: "The Song of the Earth" is Mahler's least blemished "Symphony," the music in which he most fulfilled himself.

Talk to the plain man of Mahler's strivings and shortcomings, by and large, or as they peer here and there out of "The Song of the Earth" and he will fend you away—all this is actual experience at a supper party—as a reviewer by formula or as a school-room pedant. His emotions, by the new Symphony excited, have conquered him—for Mahler. He returns thanks and praise to Mr. Koussevitzky; though he know not a page of them, bids the conductor go on in future seasons to the Fifth or the Seventh Symphony, that they also may stir him. Mahler, he remarks bluntly, had faults but as yet needs no apologists. Meanwhile, the host goes to the bookshelves, pulls down a volume of Ernest Newman and reads out:

> It is at least arguable that Mahler's nine Symphonies represent on the whole the most significant body of work done in the symphonic form since Brahms; while even people who are not yet on the intellectual or the musical level of the Symphonies are as a rule sensitive to the beauty and the power of his songs. . . . One can hardly imagine a composer more sure of himself in latitudes not accessible to ordinary feet and this combined impression of bigness and certainly is one of the rarest impressions in the concert-room and the surest sign of the presence of a master. . . . But behind all this certainty of style and of technique is an imagination of a very unusual kind, vivid, ardent and vast, with the power of turning everything that passes through it into natural music. To minds that can enter into his with imaginative sympathy, Mahler is one of the subtlest forces in modern music.

The plain man was right: Mahler needs no apologists; for he has champions. And "The Song of The Earth" is the end that crowned his work.

H. T. P.

MUSIC

TRANS. DEC 11

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The second program of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, was given last night at Symphony hall. It included Prokofief's "Classical" Symphony, Debussy's "Prelude a L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," "The Dance of Salome," from Strauss's opera and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

This was a program admirably designed to exhibit the peculiar gifts of the conductor, and the remarkable skill of the excellent body of musicians under him. One might complain that the arrangement of the program could have been improved. "Salome's Dance," with its furiously excited ending, seemed a little out of place just before the Beethoven Symphony, even though an intermission separated them. And disregarded was Beethoven's plaintive note about the "Eroica": "If it be performed too late, there is danger that it will not produce on the audience, whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain."

Mr. Koussevitsky risked the weariness of the audience, but it must be admitted that the effects he strives for, while not always according to tradition, seldom allow the audience to lose interest in what is happening. His reading of the "Eroica," is not free from exaggeration, but it is stirring and majestic.

The polished ensemble which Symphony audiences have been taught to expect from the strings, was again apparent in Prokofief's charming "Classical" Symphony (which suggests a kinship to Stravinsky's excursion into classic ballet in "Apollon Musagete),—though momentary lack of precision marred the first movement.

Koussevitsky's interpretation of "L'-Apres-Midi d'un Faune," despite its finely wrought detail, was lacking in rhythmic life and impulse, and hence missed some of the fantastic spirit of Mallarme's poem.

"The Dance of Salome," with its hypnotic rhythm, was excellently worked up to its frenzied climax.

There was long applause for the conductor and the players. E. B.

A Second Monday for Symphonic Pleasures

HIGHLY favored among the audiences that listen to symphonic music was the one that heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall last evening. It was the second of the Monday evening series, and a program fit for the gods had been assembled. That little gem called Prokofiev's "Classical" symphony began it. Debussy's prelude, "To the Afternoon of a Faun," and the dance of Salome from Strauss's "Salome" continued it. Beethoven's monumental third symphony brought conclusion.

One need not quarrel with those who hold that Prokofiev's symphony is not many meanings. The application, of "Mozartean." That adjective may have course, comes out of Felix Borowski's remark that Prokofiev had tried to catch the spirit of Mozart and to write as Mozart would if he were now living. The composer himself, however, contented himself with calling the symphony "classical." Of course the themes are not the themes which a Mozart would have written, even a Mozart of the twentieth century. They are the themes of a Russian writing a certain type of "universal" music. It is doubtful whether Mozart would ever have used a Gavotte in a symphony. It is doubtful whether Mozart would have written a "Larghetto' 'with so much rhythmic activity as the present one. But certain modulations are typically those of Mozart. And the style, in matters more spiritual than technical (if indeed there can be such separation)—its refined and polished gayety, its shining elegance, its aristocratic sophistication, in these and many others—has definite affinities to that of Mozart. Probably further one should not go in comparison. Like unto a precious diamond, lustrously polished, glittering and sparkling in the suulight, was the performance of Mr. Koussevitzky and his men.

In like degree these forces displayed the many and various beauties of Debussy's so-called prelude. A delicious melange it is in the music as with Mallarmé, of fauns and forests, of Naiads and nymphs, of dreaming and of forgetful remembrance, of drowsy warmths, and finally of sleep. As fresh is this pioneer of "impressionism" today as it was when it first startled Paris a full generation ago. To Mr. Laurent and Mr. Gillet and Mr. Koussevitzky and a hundred others we of Boston owe its present beauties no less than to Claude Achille Debussy.

Excellent companion piece was the Strauss dance music. Again a music sensuous and languid. Again a music of wondrous color. Straussian energies thrust themselves upon one only at the very beginning and the very end. Between are the calm surfaces of a voluptuous dance. Artfully molded are they. Fused by a master's hand they run into each other. illusion of the gently swaying motion of the figure of the dancer, and indeed toward the end, of her ardors, do they bring. For a moment in closing the white heats of passion spring from massed strings. Mr. Koussevitzky gave voice to it all—the languorous movements, the postering and posing, scarce with motion at all, the inexhaustible interchange of subtle coloring, the flecks of momentary agitation, the gradual ascent, the final passion.

And again a hall filled with people was witness that Beethoven's "Eroica" is music of the gods. Never was music more grandly conceived. Seldom does it cut more deeply. Through heroic, energetic, tumultuous beginnings, it passes to a noble funeral march, a scherzo of rare lightness, to the final variations of huge dimensions. Above all it is a music of heroisms. So Mr. Koussevitzky played it. Of heroic proportions were the tumults of the first movement. The momentary lulls served but to fan the flames anew. Both the heights and the depths it sounded as these hundred men played it. The noble tragedy, the restrained gloom of the march is of a piece with such beginnings. For the orchestra of last evening the scherzo was play of virtuosity as well as poetic movement. No greater precision or lightness can one humanly expect from strings. For horns to match them is no less than marvel. It was accomplished last evening. And through the variations, in climax, the heroisms again mounted. Beethoven in his third is indeed a hero of heroes. And Koussevitzky with him.

A. H. M.

TRANS. Dec. 11

Bos AM. Dec 11

CLASSIC MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

No novelty stood on the second program of the Monday evening series of Symphony concerts, no hair-raising composition of a brazen ultra-modern to disturb the tranquility of the concert-goer who worships the familiar. This is very likely as it should be, for the listeners at these extra concerts, most of them new to symphonic music, should be led, not driven.

Prokofieff's "classical" symphony was written only a little more than ten years ago. But it is intentionally written in a simple idiom; it troubles no one's slumbers. With tongue in cheek, Prokofieff is said to be writing as a modern Mozart would. The music sounds much more like dressed up French and Russian ballet. Only the form is Mozart.

Debussy's masterpiece, "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and the more debatable Dance of Salome from Strauss' "Salome" were the middle numbers on the program. The Prelude was beautifully played. The Strauss was not so imaginatively interpreted by Mr. Koussevitzky, it seemed to us, as it was by his assistant, Richard Burgin, when he conducted a pair of concerts recently. This later reading was too strained, too affected to impress the listener with its sincerity. Furthermore, the instrumental balance was not always good.

The closing piece was Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which displayed Mr. Koussevitzky once more in his role of masterly interpreter of standard classics.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MONDAY CONCERT

Brilliant Performance of Familiar Music Pleases

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night the second of its five Monday concerts. Mr Koussevitzky chose, as usual, familiar numbers already heard this season in the Friday and Saturday series. Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Salome's dance from Richard Strauss' opera, and Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," all brilliantly performed, greatly pleased an audience which completely filled Symphony Hall. Every seat for this series has been sold.

Prokofieff's little symphony again proved the virtuosity of conductor and players. The music, though not intrinsically interesting, is very deftly written by a clever modern with no reverence and little real understanding of the 18th century. In it, the orchestra sounded particularly well.

Mr Koussevitzky's somewhat sentimentalized version of Debussy's "Faun" was last night chiefly notable for its display of the fine quality of the wood-wind players in the Boston Symphony. For Salome's dance, the conductor succeeded in evoking the alternating languor and frenzy the situation in Wilde's play demands.

The "Eroica" was eloquently interpreted, but in this number there were less precision of detail. Some of the attacks were not clean cut, some of the players were merely reeling off the notes without paying close attention to entrances and nuances. It is not so easy to make Beethoven sound well as it is to secure a virtuoso performance of Prokofieff's little symphony. The slow movement dragged, owing to an unduly slow pace.

Great familiar classics like the "Eroica" too often receive such routine, and rather slipshod performances as last night's, which only Mr Koussevitzky's interpretive talent saved from dullness. His sense of climax and feeling for emotional melody never desert him.

The next concert in this series will be given Jan 21. P. R.

PLAY SECOND O MONDAY SERIE

Symphony at Top Spee Under Mr. Koussevitzk

Post Dec. 11

Music in which Mr. Koussevitzky ar hence the Symphony Orchestra excel made the concert at Symphony Ha last evening, the second of the cu rent Monday series. In many a pe formance at home and abroad condu tor and players have tossed off bo lightly and surely as they did last ev ning, graceful measures of Prokofie "Classical Symphony," with which t programme began, have whipped up t pace of the final movement almos but not quite, to the point where speed becomes confusion.

On a recent Friday afternoon an Saturday evening at Symphony Ha and at a subsequent concert in Ca negie Hall Mr. Koussevitzky's and th orchestra's performance of Debussy' Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun, repeated last evening, was lauded to th skies. In the Dance of Salome fro Richard Strauss' opera of the daughte of Herodias and her lust for John th Baptist, which made the third numbe on this list of last evening, Mr. Kous sevitzky once more showed his abilit to endow this music with the exoti sensual quality that all have not bee able to draw from it, though by toke of his performance it is latent in th score.

And finally, for ending of the con cert, came the "Eroica" Symphony o Beethoven, in which on every repeti tion Mr. Koussevitzky has showed tha in this symphony at least he can b eloquent, impassioned, sufficiently ro mantic, and yet do no violence to th composer's expressed intentions. Upo this and upon the other pieces of th evening, especially Strauss' dance, th audience lavished its applause.

Concert-Chronicle

TRANS. — DEC 14

Presenting a Prize-Winner

LAST evening in Sanders Theater curred the third of the Cambri concerts of the Boston Symph Orchestra. In the life of at least person it was an event. That per was Leon Vartanian, pianist. His pearance marks the beginning of a policy on the part of the Boston S phony Orchestra. Mr. Vartanian is pianist who last spring at the New E land Conservatory of Music, in o competition with his fellow students, the annual prize which consists of pianoforte. Now the Boston Symph Orchestra steps in and makes the w ning of this competition even m significant and attractive. For beg ning with this year, the winner of prize is also assured an appearance soloist with the orchestra at one of regular concerts. Mr. Vartanian w the first recipient of the honor. He chosen to play Chopin's Concerto in minor in proof of his pianistic sk This is probably not the occasion comment on Chopin's concerto. Suff it to say that like many another w from the Romanticists it does not bri the thrill to modern ears that it vided for an earlier generation. this Mr. Vartanian is in no wise blame. It was probably chosen for by his teachers. It is a work much u and exceedingly useful in the schools, a it did serve to give Mr. Vartanian excellent introduction to his larger au ence. One noted first in Mr. Vartania playing an exceedingly beautiful to Limpid, bright, crystal clear it was all times. Unaided by other qualities would have made his playing a joy the listener. Aided by his other pianis and musicianly accomplishments, served to increase and heighten pleasu for Mr. Vartanian's technic is by means inconsiderable.

Preceding the concerto the orchest played Handel's Concerto Grosso in minor for string orchestra, with the accustomed warmth and fullness of to Largos and larghettos brought sustain phrase, broadly songful line. Allegr added work of decorative design, and t contrasts between "concertino" a "ripieno" which are the life-blood these concertos. Again and again, one hears these Koussevitzkian perfor ances of the earlier classics, one wo ders what would be the look of mar and astonishment on the faces of t Handels and the Bachs could they h the ample and sonorous voice which th music today is able to command.

Came for final number Cesar Franc Symphony in D minor. That it ga pleasure there can be no doubt. For audience clapped loud and long, till c ductor bade the men rise in acknowle ment. Even then the applause was s to subside. One may believe that was not entirely the electrifying clima which brought this applause, for wis and beautifully Mr. Koussevitzky prop tioned his work. A tempo slacke here, a rhythm relaxed there, a sonor softened elsewhere, and one caught gleam of the mystical Franck peeri over the conductor's shoulder. Mast ful are his advances in this symphon as they march on and on to thrilli climax. Of rare beauty always has be the song of the second movement, equal lightness the scherzo which added to it. And when one adds to th the feeling of ineffable light which seen only in the music of Franck, o must conclude, small wonder that audience in Cambridge could not expre itself highly enough in approval of sy phony and performance. A. H. M.

PLAY SECOND OF MONDAY SERIES

Symphony at Top Speed Under Mr. Koussevitzky

Post Dec. 11

Music in which Mr. Koussevitzky and hence the Symphony Orchestra excels, made the concert at Symphony Hall last evening, the second of the current Monday series. In many a performance at home and abroad conductor and players have tossed off both lightly and surely as they did last evening, graceful measures of Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," with which the programme began, have whipped up the pace of the final movement almost, but not quite, to the point whereat speed becomes confusion.

On a recent Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall and at a subsequent concert in Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussevitzky's and the orchestra's performance of Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," repeated last evening, was lauded to the skies. In the Dance of Salome from Richard Strauss' opera of the daughter of Herodias and her lust for John the Baptist, which made the third number on this list of last evening, Mr. Koussevitzky once more showed his ability to endow this music with the exotic, sensual quality that all have not been able to draw from it, though by token of his performance it is latent in the score.

And finally, for ending of the concert, came the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, in which on every repetition Mr. Koussevitzky has showed that in this symphony at least he can be eloquent, impassioned, sufficiently romantic, and yet do no violence to the composer's expressed intentions. Upon this and upon the other pieces of the evening, especially Strauss' dance, the audience lavished its applause.

Concert-Chronicle

TRANS. — DEC 14

Presenting a Prize-Winner

LAST evening in Sanders Theater occurred the third of the Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the life of at least one person it was an event. That person was Leon Vartanian, pianist. His appearance marks the beginning of a new policy on the part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Vartanian is the pianist who last spring at the New England Conservatory of Music, in open competition with his fellow students, won the annual prize which consists of a pianoforte. Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra steps in and makes the winning of this competition even more significant and attractive. For beginning with this year, the winner of the prize is also assured an appearance as soloist with the orchestra at one of its regular concerts. Mr. Vartanian was the first recipient of the honor. He had chosen to play Chopin's Concerto in E minor in proof of his pianistic skill. This is probably not the occasion for comment on Chopin's concerto. Suffice it to say that like many another work from the Romanticists it does not bring the thrill to modern ears that it provided for an earlier generation. For this Mr. Vartanian is in no wise to blame. It was probably chosen for him by his teachers. It is a work much used and exceedingly useful in the schools, and it did serve to give Mr. Vartanian an excellent introduction to his larger audience. One noted first in Mr. Vartanian's playing an exceedingly beautiful tone. Limpid, bright, crystal clear it was at all times. Unaided by other qualities it would have made his playing a joy to the listener. Aided by his other pianistic and musicianly accomplishments, it served to increase and heighten pleasure, for Mr. Vartanian's technic is by no means inconsiderable.

Preceding the concerto the orchestra played Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra, with their accustomed warmth and fullness of tone. Largos and larghettos brought sustained phrase, broadly songful line. Allegros added work of decorative design, and the contrasts between "concertino" and "ripieno" which are the life-blood of these concertos. Again and again, as one hears these Koussevitzkian performances of the earlier classics, one wonders what would be the look of marvel and astonishment on the faces of the Handels and the Bachs could they hear the ample and sonorous voice which their music today is able to command.

Came for final number Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor. That it gave pleasure there can be no doubt. For the audience clapped loud and long, till conductor bade the men rise in acknowledgment. Even then the applause was slow to subside. One may believe that it was not entirely the electrifying climaxes which brought this applause, for wisely and beautifully Mr. Koussevitzky proportioned his work. A tempo slackened here, a rhythm relaxed there, a sonority softened elsewhere, and one caught a gleam of the mystical Franck peering over the conductor's shoulder. Masterful are his advances in this symphony, as they march on and on to thrilling climax. Of rare beauty always has been the song of the second movement, of equal lightness the scherzo which is added to it. And when one adds to this the feeling of ineffable light which is seen only in the music of Franck, one must conclude, small wonder that an audience in Cambridge could not express itself highly enough in approval of symphony and performance.

A. H. M.

TRANS. DEC 15

BOSTON EVENING T

Symphony

Three Moderns For Pleasures And Penalties

Martinu, Copland, Prokofiev, Through a Variegated Symphony Concert

THROUGH the intermission at the Symphony Concert superior persons grumbled. Plainly the new pieces from Martinu and Mr. Copland were no masterworks. Not long would they linger in any repertory. At best both were "occasional." With emotion Martinu had seen the first Czechoslovakian flag handed to the first Czechslovakian regiment; into music had transmuted scene and sensation. Sorting his papers, Mr. Copland had come upon two movements for string quartet written five years apart; as summer task had scored them for full string choir. Mr. Koussevitzky, considerate of young composers in whom he believes, had accepted both manuscripts; allotted them a third of a Symphony Concert when countless masterpieces from Bach to Bloch lay mute upon the shelves. The grousers groused: the gong rang; all concerned sat down to Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." Of that, as the Grand Inquisitor puts it in "The Gondoliers, there could be no possible, probable shadow of doubt.

Yet why talk of masterworks when Martinu's "La Symphonie" and Mr. Copland's Lento and Rondino are in question? Or why pretend to have expected either to be such? When these grumblers receive from the bookseller a parcel of new novels, they are content if it contains amusing stuff, discloses current and promising talents. They go to the play, and a well-flavored comedy or a full-fashioned drama gives them pleasure. They turn into the picture-show. No Velasquez and no Cézanne there await them; but they are well pleased to see "what the new men are doing." Why then apply this perpetual test of masterpieces to the one art of music much-enduring? For no sane reason that can be discovered or invented—unless it be that sorry thing which is custom. Year in and year out, in any series of symphony concerts, the frequenters hear much Bach and Beethoven, Brahms and Debussy, hear them usually at best. Must everything else aspire to these exalted standards? Must we pass our days and nights, as the rhetoric of self-complaisance has it, in unbroken "communion with the masterpieces?"

No human being, unless he were fossilized with self-righteousness, could endure such an existence in the arts. Music or literature, painting or the theater, would stiffen into rigor mortis under such conditions. If an art is alive, men of our own time are working in it. If we care at all about it, except as ritual for our assumed superiorities we wish to know what they are doing. By all odds it is the obligation of symphony concerts to renew at due interval the masterpieces of music. It is equally their obligation to make the musical discoveries, to publish the musical news, of the present hour. When Mr. Koussevitzky sets on a program these pieces of Martinu and Mr. Copland he is discharging an essential part of his duty as conductor, in the autumn of 1928, of an illustrious orchestra playing to an intelligent public. As reasonably talk of masterpieces when one shuts the covers of "The Bridge of San Luis Rey"; drops in to see the newest John; sits before O'Neill's latest piece?

Minor though they may be, both "novelties" were interesting and pleasurable in themselves; while on the lap of time, and nowhere else, rests their future. In these days or any other, masters that are, or are not, to be have written casual pieces. Only last week at the Symphony Concerts Handel turned off one such; while all the solemnities and superiorities bowed before it because, forsooth, Handel is a classic. Yet he was far from that in the year of grace, 1739, when he handed these Concerti Grossi to a publisher. In this autumn of 1928, may not Martinu and Mr. Copland have also their opportunity?

Martinu stood by at a military spectacle; sensation and emotion stirred in him. He casts them into a large-framed, full-voiced march-movement—and sublimates it. His musical material escapes commonplace; bears witness to tense and kindling mood; moves in reiterated rhythms, harder and harder driving; wears sonorities like a rich vesture; expands once into songful measures that seize the ear, diffuse emotion, exhale into that sensuous bitter-sweetness which is heritage to the Czechs of tones. Maybe, for those that hear also with their minds, Martinu, seeking a form that would suit his sensations and imaginings, has experimented with a contraction of the orthodox symphonic structure. Enough surely for one composer in one piece upon a single afternoon.

Mr. Copland with his two pieces is also in good case. The other day in these columns, someone was saying that the young modernists have no melody, cannot write it, if they would. One answer is the melody, single-voiced, unbroken, unflagging, that fills Mr. Copland's slow movement. It has substance, shape and fertility; by design but without labor it never relaxes the chosen pace; the harmony, the distribution of the string choir, round and support it. The sensuous ear takes pleasure; the mind follows close the progress; between composer and hearer flows the changeless mood. Mr. Copland has written a singularly complete and self-contained little piece; in miniature it is rather a tour de force gently accomplished. As pendant he sets a brief Rondino all artifice and delicate syncopation, both adroitly contrived. When poets would so amuse themselves they write triolets, vilanelles and the like, and no one misjudges them. They are taking their pleasure in belles-lettres and metrical forms, sharing it with us who read. There is a similar field in music and upon it in this Rondino Mr. Copland is no graceless performer. Again enough for two pieces from one pen on a single afternoon. There is no need to talk of masterpieces until the masterpiece comes and rends the composer's vitals. It would be a torturing process—every day.

Nor need our grumblers be quite so sure that these "novelties" from living hands forthwith descend into oblivion. Four years ago next spring Mr. Burgin played Prokofiev's Concerto for Violin upon the platform of Symphony Hall. Yesterday, on that selfsame stage, Miss Lea Luboshutz repeated it, and first impressions were renewed and deepened upon a far more receptive audience. Into a withering form, Prokofiev infuses like-giving injections. There are departures from orthodox structure. The musical substance, the mood that has engendered it, the composer's warming purpose, condition shape and movement. There are no deliberately displayful passages for the solo-instrument. Prokofiev asks much of it and of the violinist, but always in union or interplay with the orchestra. The moods are not the conventional moods of concertos. They are rooted in native wildness; they enter, declare themselves, give way to others, briefly, fitfully. They draw sap from the folk-song of the composer's native Russia; upspring from the ardors and candors of his own temperament. For no velvet-coated virtuoso in no orthodox mold of the concert-hall goes the whiplash scherzo—stinging rhythms, short phrases flinging up and down. The finale pushes its way into tonal being; outspreads songfully, darts away into the livelier game of rhythms. In the introductory Andantino, Prokofiev is all for abrupt mood and changeful inventions; measure against measure, it must sound and stir.

A Concerto written out of many impulses and inexhaustible fertility; a Concerto born of the rhapsodies and improvisations from which the form sprang; a Concerto alive because it breaks half the rules and gives good musical reason for such incontinence. It taxes the violinist; yet Miss Luboshutz, once protegée of Josef Hofmann, not once diminished it as free and full musical speech. It demands a native wildness and her temperament answered to the call. It is cut and thrust, unless Prokofiev stays for folk song, and Miss Luboshutz can make rhythms bite and phrases shrill. No doubt Prokofiev has disordered the concerto-parlor; but it no longer smells of mildew; turmoil, if the hearer likes, but also air and light.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have found the way, for these days, with the Pastoral Symphony. They are content to charm. The conductor's hand is light; he phrases gracefully; keeps the pace alert, the rhythm rippling; turns the harmonic and instrumental colors into pastel-tints; is all for sunny and transparent tone; would be as simple-minded and humorsome as Beethoven himself. The great Ludwig took his ease and his sport when he meandered the pleasant Viennese countryside. He was no romantic, awed, exalted and frenetic before Nature with a very large N. He may even have missed some of the emotions that Monsieur d' Indy and the program-book lavishly assign him. For music-making, his Nature was the gentle, prettified Nature of eighteenth-century poets. He was comforted and pleasured; his spirits brightened; he gave fancy wing.

To this day, the bright texture, the singing voice, the poetizing imagination of the first two movements have little aged. Hear, for rare sensation, a Beethoven who lets his melodies ramble spins filagree; is content with the calm loveliness of musical sounds. Note for note Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra deepen the general and particular delight. Through Part Two—the playful peasants, the thunder-storm in the drums, the shepherd's piping, the song of thanksgiving—it all depends. Naive listeners may still hear and believe. Others will take their pleasure in Mr. Koussevitzky's water-color brush and in the virtuosi of the orchestra. Bassoon, oboe, flute, clarinet, horns and strings, they point Beethoven's humors, gild for his sake many a commonplace. As "masterpiece," the Pastoral splits midway.

H. T. P.

COPLAND PIECES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Martinu's 'La Symphonie' in First Performance

Prokofieff's Violin Concerto Played by Lea Luboshutz

Two pieces for String Orchestra, by Aaron Copland, and Martinu's "La Symphonie," both performed for the first time anywhere, were the novelties on yesterday's Symphony concert program. Lea Luboshutz made her Boston debut as soloist in Prokofieff's concerto for violin. Beethoven's Sixth Symphony was the concluding number.

Copland, known here from other works as perhaps the most notable of the younger generation of American composers, wrote the two pieces heard yesterday for string quartet, one of them, a rondino, in his student days at Paris in 1923, the other last Spring. Last Summer at the MacDowell Colony in Peterboro, N H, he rescored them for string orchestra.

The "Lento molto" written last Spring is a grave, flowing melody rather in the spirit of some of Stravinsky's recent slow movements, such as that in the piano concerto. Though there are suggestions of the style of 17th and 18th century composers Copland like Stravinsky has not "played the sedulous ape" to anyone in particular. His melody and harmony are of notable originality and beauty. Here s a young man willing and able to vrite as he feels. The performance vas eloquent.

The little rondino, written as a student exercise is a curious piece of ingenuity. The notes of the chief theme ere designed, according to the composer, to spell the name "Gabriel aure." After reading a detailed explanation of how this improbable feat is accomplished, perhaps a listener might detect it by looking at the score, but one doubts if anyone merely hearing the rondino performed would ever have fond Faure's name concealed like a acrostic in the notes.

How many listeners to Schumann's "Carnaval" ever read the riddle of his "Sphinxes," which is "Asch" the name of a town in Bohemia; yet that is simple, at least in German notation, compared with Mr Copland's remarkable homage to Faure. The rondino is fluent and agreeable but not memorable music. There was a considerable amount of applause, but the composer did not come forward to acknowledge it. One wishes other composers would follow this admirable example.

Martinu, a Czech living in Paris, is remembered here by his "Bagarre" played last season. The program decorously translated this French word as "tumult," though "rumpus" would be much more literal. The piece heard yesterday, though entitled "La Symphonie," has nothing to do with symphonies either in form or in content. It is another "rumpus," this time a patriotic one, suggested by "the historic scene when the first Czecho-Slovak flag was presented to the first Czecho-Slovak regiment in 1918." The music is like a reminiscence of a military march, interrupted by recollections of patriotic airs. Tchaikovsky's "1812" is perhaps its nearest musical analogue. Martinu's modernistic rowdiness is rather too self-conscious to ring true. Clever manipulation of rhythms is the most remarkable characteristic of a piece not otherwise notable.

Miss Luboshutz, who has appeared in other cities in joint recital with Josef Hofmann, teaches at the Curtis Institute. Her technique proved amply adequate for the considerable difficulties of Prokofieff's concerto, first heard here three years since from Mr Burgin. She was cordially applauded.

This concerto, like the other modern pieces heard yesterday, suffers from the excessive ingenuity, the self-conscious cleverness that deadens the imaginations of so many 20th-century artists. Prokofieff's scherzo is an amusing "stunt" piece in the genre of Bazzini's "Ronde des Lutins." The other two movements also fail to stir the listener's emotions.

Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" was not well played. The staccati in the first movement were not neatly executed. There were too many sloppy attacks, too many passages where one group of instruments completely drowned out another. Mr Koussevizky succeeded, however, in making the thunderstorm more plausible than usual, and in giving a romantic tone to the "Scene by the Brook."

This symphony is one of Beethoven's most characteristic works, revealing the strength and the weakness of his imagination. The theme of the finale is unsurpassed among his lyric melodies, yet his treatment of it reminds one of the remark by some Englishman that "Beethoven seemed always trying to say things for which the words had not yet been invented."

The program for next week includes a Bach Brandenburg concerto in G major, Satie's "Gymnopedies," Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," and the first performance of Bloch's prize composition, "America," in which the Harvard Glee Club will assist.

P. R.

GLOBE DEC. 15

NEW AND OLD WITH SYMPHONY

POST DEC. 15

Two Pieces Fresh From Pen Heard for First Time

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The new and the old sharply divided the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. Before the intermission came compositions by three out-and-out moderns, Martinu, Copland and Prokofieff, the first two in their initial performances. After the pause the audience was permitted to rest and refresh its ears with the suavities of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," a work that has always received from Mr. Koussevitzky a particularly happy interpretation.

MARTINU'S CONTRIBUTION

The piece by Martinu, by title "La Symphonie," is the second composition by this Parisianized Czech to be heard at the Symphony Concerts. Its predecessor of last season, "The Tumult" aimed to suggest such excitments as those of a crowd at a football game. "La Symphonie," which is in fact no a symphony at all, was written in memory of the ceremony at Darne France, when the first Czechoslovakian flag was presented to the first Czechoslovakian regiment. Martinu, then finds his inspiration in the world of events, and he writes with a great muscularity and vigor, stressing rhythm at the expense of other factors. In "The Tumult" this energy is unremitting. In "La Symphonie" there is a quasi-melodic interlude for English horn solo accompanied by chords for the strings.

Had "La Symphonie" been briefer its effects would have been greater. Renewed when the interlude is done, Mr. Martinu's vigors after a time begins to pall.

Lento Molto Is Reposeful

From Mr. Copland comes ever the unexpected. The first piece by this young Brooklynite to be heard in Boston, the Symphony for organ and orchestra, proclaimed him a musically dangerous character. It was Walter Damrosch who declared that the man who could write a piece like this might some day commit murder. Yet the second Copland work to be made known to us by Mr. Koussevitzky, the Music for the Theatre, revealed genuine fancy. The hopes inspired by this ingenious and grateful composition were, however, soon after dashed by the extravagant Concerto for piano and orchestra. But now in the Lento Molto for strings of yesterday's concert we find Mr. Copland attempting, and not altogether unsuccessfully, to pour the new harmonic wine into the old bottles of the Bachian or Handelian Adagio.

There is in this piece a classic breadth, dignity and repose, if no marked melodic inventiveness. Its companion piece also for strings, composed in 1923, is of less importance. The notes of the chief theme are taken, either as letter or syllabic names, from the name Gabriel Faure G-A-B-re-si-E-la, etc., a procedure adopted at the time of Faure's death by several of his countrymen. But vital tunes come not this way, and Mr. Copland's recurring theme has little distinction. Nor do the contrasting matter and the musical treatment bring compensation.

Miss Luboshutz Capable

The extraordinarily clever and exhilarating Violin Concerto of Prokofieff which Mr. Burgin played here in 1 served yesterday to introduce to Boston Lea Luboshutz a notable violinist. With amazing verve she flung Prokofieff's difficult passages, apparently finding in them only a joyous relation.

It would now be a pleasure to hear Miss Luboshutz in a composition calling for deeper musical qualities. Yesterday's audience received her with well-deserved enthusiasm.

PLAY SECOND OF MONDAY SERIES

Symphony at Top Speed Under Mr. Koussevitzky

Post Dec. 11

Music in which Mr. Koussevitzky and hence the Symphony Orchestra excels, made the concert at Symphony Hall last evening, the second of the current Monday series. In many a performance at home and abroad conductor and players have tossed off both lightly and surely as they did last evening, graceful measures of Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," with which the programme began, have whipped up the pace of the final movement almost, but not quite, to the point whereat speed becomes confusion.

On a recert Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall and at a subsequent concert in Carnegie Hall Mr. Koussevitzky's and the orchestra's performance of Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," repeated last evening, was lauded to the skies. In the Dance of Salome from Richard Strauss' opera of the daughter of Herodias and her lust for John the Baptist, which made the third number on this list of last evening, Mr. Koussevitzky once more showed his ability to endow this music with the exotic, sensual quality that all have not been able to draw from it, though by token of his performance it is latent in the score.

And finally, for ending of the concert, came the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, in which on every repetition Mr. Koussevitzky has showed that in this symphony at least he can be eloquent, impassioned, sufficiently romantic, and yet do no violence to the composer's expressed intentions. Upon this and upon the other pieces of the evening, especially Strauss' dance, the audience lavished its applause.

Concert-Chronicle

TRANS. — DEC 14

Presenting a Prize-Winner

LAST evening in Sanders Theater occurred the third of the Cambridge concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the life of at least one person it was an event. That person was Leon Vartanian, pianist. His appearance marks the beginning of a new policy on the part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Vartanian is the pianist who last spring at the New England Conservatory of Music, in open competition with his fellow students, won the annual prize which consists of a pianoforte. Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra steps in and makes the winning of this competition even more significant and attractive. For beginning with this year, the winner of the prize is also assured an appearance as soloist with the orchestra at one of its regular concerts. Mr. Vartanian was the first recipient of the honor. He had chosen to play Chopin's Concerto in E minor in proof of his pianistic skill. This is probably not the occasion for comment on Chopin's concerto. Suffice it to say that like many another work from the Romanticists it does not bring the thrill to modern ears that it provided for an earlier generation. For this Mr. Vartanian is in no wise to blame. It was probably chosen for him by his teachers. It is a work much used and exceedingly useful in the schools, and it did serve to give Mr. Vartanian an excellent introduction to his larger audience. One noted first in Mr. Vartanian's playing an exceedingly beautiful tone. Limpid, bright, crystal clear it was at all times. Unaided by other qualities it would have made his playing a joy to the listener. Aided by his other pianistic and musicianly accomplishments, it served to increase and heighten pleasure, for Mr. Vartanian's technic is by no means inconsiderable.

Preceding the concerto the orchestra played Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor for string orchestra, with their accustomed warmth and fullness of tone. Largos and larghettos brought sustained phrase, broadly songful line. Allegros added work of decorative design, and the contrasts between "concertino" and "ripieno" which are the life-blood of these concertos. Again and again, as one hears these Koussevitzkian performances of the earlier classics, one wonders what would be the look of marvel and astonishment on the faces of the Handels and the Bachs could they hear the ample and sonorous voice which their music today is able to command.

Came for final number Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor. That it gave pleasure there can be no doubt. For the audience clapped loud and long, till conductor bade the men rise in acknowledgment. Even then the applause was slow to subside. One may believe that it was not entirely the electrifying climaxes which brought this applause, for wisely and beautifully Mr. Koussevitzky proportioned his work. A tempo slackened here, a rhythm relaxed there, a sonority softened elsewhere, and one caught a gleam of the mystical Franck peering over the conductor's shoulder. Masterful are his advances in this symphony, as they march on and on to thrilling climax. Of rare beauty always has been the song of the second movement, of equal lightness the scherzo which is added to it. And when one adds to this the feeling of ineffable light which is seen only in the music of Franck, one must conclude, small wonder that an audience in Cambridge could not express itself highly enough in approval of symphony and performance.

A. H. M.

TRANS. DEC 15

BOSTON EVENING T

Symphony

Three Moderns For Pleasures And Penalties

Martinu, Copland, Prokofiev, Through a Variegated Symphony Concert

THROUGH the intermission at the Symphony Concert superior persons grumbled. Plainly the new pieces from Martinu and Mr. Copland were no masterworks. Not long would they linger in any repertory. At best both were "occasional." With emotion Martinu had seen the first Czechoslovakian flag handed to the first Czechslovakian regiment; into music had transmuted scene and sensation. Sorting his papers, Mr. Copland had come upon two movements for string quartet written five years apart; as summer task had scored them for full string choir. Mr. Koussevitzky, considerate of young composers in whom he believes, had accepted both manuscripts; allotted them a third of a Symphony Concert when countless masterpieces from Bach to Bloch lay mute upon the shelves. The grousers groused: the gong rang; all concerned sat down to Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." Of that, as the Grand Inquisitor puts it in "The Gondoliers, there could be no possible, probable shadow of doubt.

Yet why talk of masterworks when Martinu's "La Symphonie" and Mr. Copland's Lento and Rondino are in question? Or why pretend to have expected either to be such? When these grumblers receive from the bookseller a parcel of new novels, they are content if it contains amusing stuff, discloses current and promising talents. They go to the play, and a well-flavored comedy or a full-fashioned drama gives them pleasure. They turn into the picture-show. No Velasquez and no Cézanne there await them; but they are well pleased to see "what the new men are doing." Why then apply this perpetual test of masterpieces to the one art of music much-enduring? For no sane reason that can be discovered or invented—unless it be that sorry thing which is custom. Year in and year out, in any series of symphony concerts, the frequenters hear much Bach and Beethoven, Brahms and Debussy, hear them usually at best. Must everything else aspire to these exalted standards? Must we pass our days and nights, as the rhetoric of self-complaisance has it, in unbroken "communion with the masterpieces?"

No human being, unless he were fossilized with self-righteousness, could endure such an existence in the arts. Music or literature, painting or the theater, would stiffen into rigor mortis under such conditions. If an art is alive, men of our own time are working in it. If we care at all about it, except as ritual for our assumed superiorities, we wish to know what they are doing. By all odds it is the obligation of symphony concerts to renew at due interval the masterpieces of music. It is equally their obligation to make the musical discoveries, to publish the musical news, of the present hour. When Mr. Koussevitzky sets on a program these pieces of Martinu and Mr. Copland he is discharging an essential part of his duty as conductor, in the autumn of 1928, of an illustrious orchestra playing to an intelligent public. As reasonably talk of masterpieces when one shuts the covers of "The Bridge of San Luis Rey"; drops in to see the newest John; sits before O'Neill's latest piece?

Minor though they may be, both "novelties" were interesting and pleasurable in themselves; while on the lap of time, and nowhere else, rests their future. In these days or any other, masters that are, or are not, to be have written casual pieces. Only last week at the Symphony Concerts Handel turned off one such; while all the solemnities and superiorities bowed before it because, forsooth, Handel is a classic. Yet he was far from that in the year of grace, 1739, when he handed these Concerti Grossi to a publisher. In this autumn of 1928, may not Martinu and Mr. Copland have also their opportunity?

Martinu stood by at a military spectacle; sensation and emotion stirred in him. He casts them into a large-framed, full-voiced march-movement—and sublimates it. His musical material escapes commonplace; bears witness to tense and kindling mood; moves in reiterated rhythms, harder and harder driving; wears sonorities like a rich vesture; expands once into songful measures that seize the ear, diffuse emotion, exhale into that sensuous bitter-sweetness which is heritage to the Czechs of tones. Maybe, for those that hear also with their minds, Martinu, seeking a form that would suit his sensations and imaginings, has experimented with a contraction of the orthodox symphonic structure. Enough surely for one composer in one piece upon a single afternoon.

Mr. Copland with his two pieces is also in good case. The other day in these columns, someone was saying that the young modernists have no melody, cannot write it, if they would. One answer is the melody, single-voiced, unbroken, unflagging, that fills Mr. Copland's slow movement. It has substance, shape and fertility; by design but without labor it never relaxes the chosen pace; the harmony, the distribution of the string choir, round and support it. The sensuous ear takes pleasure; the mind follows close the progress; between composer and hearer flows the changeless mood. Mr. Copland has written a singularly complete and self-contained little piece; in miniature it is rather a tour de force gently accomplished. As pendant he sets a brief Rondino all artifice and delicate syncopation, both adroitly contrived. When poets would so amuse themselves they write triolets, vilanelles and the like, and no one misjudges them. They are taking their pleasure in belles-lettres and metrical forms, sharing it with us who read. There is a similar field in music and upon it in this Rondino Mr. Copland is no graceless performer. Again enough for two pieces from one pen on a single afternoon. There is no need to talk of masterpieces until the masterpiece comes and rends the composer's vitals. It would be a torturing process—every day.

Nor need our grumblers be quite so sure that these "novelties" from living hands forthwith descend into oblivion. Four years ago next spring Mr. Burgin played Prokofiev's Concerto for Violin upon the platform of Symphony Hall. Yesterday, on that selfsame stage, Miss Lea Luboshutz repeated it, and first impressions were renewed and deepened upon a far more receptive audience. Into a withering form, Prokofiev infuses like-giving injections. There are departures from orthodox structure. The musical substance, the mood that has engendered it, the composer's warming purpose, condition shape and movement. There are no deliberately displayful passages for the solo-instrument. Prokofiev asks much of it and of the violinist, but always in union or interplay with the orchestra. The moods are not the conventional moods of concertos. They are rooted in native wildness; they enter, declare themselves, give way to others, briefly, fitfully. They draw sap from the folk-song of the composer's native Russia; upspring from the ardors and candors of his own temperament. For no velvet-coated virtuoso in no orthodox mold of the concert-hall goes the whiplash scherzo—stinging rhythms, short phrases flinging up and down. The finale pushes its way into tonal being; outspreads songfully, darts away into the livelier game of rhythms. In the introductory Andantino, Prokofiev is all for abrupt mood and changeful inventions; measure against measure, it must sound and stir.

A Concerto written out of many impulses and inexhaustible fertility; a Concerto born of the rhapsodies and improvisations from which the form sprang; a Concerto alive because it breaks half the rules and gives good musical reason for such incontinence. It taxes the violinist; yet Miss Luboshutz, once protegée of Josef Hofmann, not once diminished it as free and full musical speech. It demands a native wildness and her temperament answered to the call. It is cut and thrust, unless Prokofiev stays for folk song, and Miss Luboshutz can make rhythms bite and phrases shrill. No doubt Prokofiev has disordered the concerto-parlor; but it no longer smells of mildew; turmoil, if the hearer likes, but also air and light.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra have found the way, for these days, with the Pastoral Symphony. They are content to charm. The conductor's hand is light; he phrases gracefully; keeps the pace alert, the rhythm rippling; turns the harmonic and instrumental colors into pastel-tints; is all for sunny and transparent tone; would be as simple-minded and humorsome as Beethoven himself. The great Ludwig took his ease and his sport when he meandered the pleasant Viennese countryside. He was no romantic, awed, exalted and frenetic before Nature with a very large N. He may even have missed some of the emotions that Monsieur d' Indy and the program-book lavishly assign him. For music-making, his Nature was the gentle, prettified Nature of eighteenth-century poets. He was comforted and pleasured; his spirits brightened; he gave fancy wing.

To this day, the bright texture, the singing voice, the poetizing imagination of the first two movements have little aged. Hear, for rare sensation, a Beethoven who lets his melodies ramble, spins filagree; is content with the calm loveliness of musical sounds. Note for note Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra deepen the general and particular delight. Through Part Two—the playful peasants, the thunder-storm in the drums, the shepherd's piping, the song of thanksgiving—it all depends. Naïve listeners may still hear and believe. Others will take their pleasure in Mr. Koussevitzky's water-color brush and in the virtuosi of the orchestra. Bassoon, oboe, flute, clarinet, horns and strings, they point Beethoven's humors, gild for his sake many a commonplace. As "masterpiece," the Pastoral splits midway.

H. T. P.

COPLAND PIECES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Martinu's 'La Symphonie' in First Performance

Prokofieff's Violin Concerto Played by Lea Luboshutz

Two pieces for String Orchestra, by Aaron Copland, and Martinu's "La Symphonie," both performed for the first time anywhere, were the novelties on yesterday's Symphony concert program. Lea Luboshutz made her Boston debut as soloist in Prokofieff's concerto for violin. Beethoven's Sixth Symphony was the concluding number.

Copland, known here from other works as perhaps the most notable of the younger generation of American composers, wrote the two pieces heard yesterday for string quartet, one of them, a rondino, in his student days at Paris in 1923, the other last Spring. Last Summer at the MacDowell Colony in Peterboro, N H, he rescored them for string orchestra.

The "Lento molto" written last Spring is a grave, flowing melody rather in the spirit of some of Stravinsky's recent slow movements, such as that in the piano concerto. Though there are suggestions of the style of 17th and 18th century composers Copland like Stravinsky has not "played the sedulous ape" to anyone in particular. His melody and harmony are of notable originality and beauty. Here is a young man willing and able to write as he feels. The performance was eloquent.

The little rondino, written as a student exercise is a curious piece of ingenuity. The notes of the chief theme were designed, according to the composer, to spell the name "Gabriel Faure." After reading a detailed explanation of how this improbable feat is accomplished, perhaps a listener might detect it by looking at the score, but one doubts if anyone merely hearing the rondino performed would ever have fond Faure's name concealed like an acrostic in the notes.

How many listeners to Schumann's "Carnaval" ever read the riddle of his "Sphinxes," which is "Asch" the name of a town in Bohemia; yet that is simple, at least in German notation, compared with Mr Copland's remarkable homage to Faure. The rondino is fluent and agreeable but not memorable music. There was a considerable amount of applause, but the composer did not come forward to acknowledge it. One wishes other composers would follow this admirable example.

Martinu, a Czech living in Paris, is remembered here by his "Bagarre" played last season. The program decorously translated this French word as "tumult," though "rumpus" would be much more literal. The piece heard yesterday, though entitled "La Symphonie," has nothing to do with symphonies either in form or in content. It is another "rumpus," this time a patriotic one, suggested by "the historic scene when the first Czecho-Slovak flag was presented to the first Czecho-Slovak regiment in 1918." The music is like a reminiscence of a military march, interrupted by recollections of patriotic airs. Tchaikovsky's "1812" is perhaps its nearest musical analogue. Martinu's modernistic rowdiness is rather too self-conscious to ring true. Clever manipulation of rhythms is the most remarkable characteristic of a piece not otherwise notable.

Miss Luboshutz, who has appeared in other cities in joint recital with Josef Hofmann, teaches at the Curtis Institute. Her technique proved amply adequate for the considerable difficulties of Prokofieff's concerto, first heard here three years since from Mr Burgin. She was cordially applauded.

This concerto, like the other modern pieces heard yesterday, suffers from the excessive ingenuity, the self-conscious cleverness that deadens the imaginations of so many 20th-century artists. Prokofieff's scherzo is an amusing "stunt" piece in the genre of Bazzini's "Ronde des Lutins." The other two movements also fail to stir the listener's emotions.

Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" was not well played. The staccati in the first movement were not neatly executed. There were too many sloppy attacks, too many passages where one group of instruments completely drowned out another. Mr Koussevizky succeeded, however, in making the thunderstorm more plausible than usual, and in giving a romantic tone to the "Scene by the Brook."

This symphony is one of Beethoven's most characteristic works, revealing the strength and the weakness of his imagination. The theme of the finale is unsurpassed among his lyric melodies, yet his treatment of it reminds one of the remark by some Englishman that "Beethoven seemed always trying to say things for which the words had not yet been invented."

The program for next week includes a Bach Brandenburg concerto in G major, Satie's "Gymnopedies," Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody," and the first performance of Bloch's prize composition, "America," in which the Harvard Glee Club will assist.

P. R.

GLOBE
DEC. 15

415

NEW AND OLD WITH SYMPHONY

POST DEC. 15

Two Pieces Fresh From Pen Heard for First Time

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The new and the old sharply divided the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. Before the intermission came compositions by three out-and-out moderns, Martinu, Copland and Prokofieff, the first two in their initial performances. After the pause the audience was permitted to rest and refresh its ears with the suavities of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," a work that has always received from Mr. Koussevitzky a particularly happy interpretation.

MARTINU'S CONTRIBUTION

The piece by Martinu, by title "La Symphonie," is the second composition by this Parisianized Czech to be heard at the Symphony Concerts. Its predecessor of last season, "The Tumult" aimed to suggest such excitments as those of a crowd at a football game. "La Symphonie," which is in fact no a symphony at all, was written in memory of the ceremony at Darne France, when the first Czechoslovakian flag was presented to the first Czechoslovakian regiment. Martinu, then finds his inspiration in the world of events, and he writes with a great muscularity and vigor, stressing rhythm at the expense of other factors. In "The Tumult" this energy is unremitting. In "La Symphonie" there is a quasi-melodic interlude for English horn solo accompanied by chords for the strings.

Had "La Symphonie" been briefer its effects would have been greater. Renewed when the interlude is done, Mr. Martinu's vigors after a time begins to pall.

Lento Molto Is Reposeful

From Mr. Copland comes ever the unexpected. The first piece by this young Brooklynite to be heard in Boston, the Symphony for organ and orchestra, proclaimed him a musically dangerous character. It was Walter Damrosch who declared that the man who could write a piece like this might some day commit murder. Yet the second Copland work to be made known to us by Mr. Koussevitzky, the Music for the Theatre, revealed genuine fancy. The hopes inspired by this ingenious and grateful composition were, however, soon after dashed by the extravagant Concerto for piano and orchestra. But now in the Lento Molto for strings of yesterday's concert we find Mr. Copland attempting, and not altogether unsuccessfully, to pour the new harmonic wine into the old bottles of the Bachian or Handelian Adagio.

There is in this piece a classic breadth, dignity and repose, if no marked melodic inventiveness. Its companion piece also for strings, composed in 1923, is of less importance. The notes of the chief theme are taken, either as letter or syllabic names, from the name Gabriel Faure G-A-B-re-si-E-la, etc., a procedure adopted at the time of Faure's death by several of his countrymen. But vital tunes come not this way, and Mr. Copland's recurring theme has little distinction. Nor do the contrasting matter and the musical treatment bring compensation.

Miss Luboshutz Capable

The extraordinarily clever and exhilarating Violin Concerto of Prokofieff which Mr. Burgin played here in 1 served yesterday to introduce to Boston Lea Luboshutz a notable violinist. With amazing verve she flung Prokofieff's difficult passages, apparently finding in them only a joyous relation.

It would now be a pleasure to hear Miss Luboshutz in a composition calling for deeper musical qualities. Yesterday's audience received her with well deserved enthusiasm.

42

HERALD DEC. 15 '28

TH

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, given in Symphony hall, yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Martinu, "La Symphonie"; Copland, Two pieces for string orchestra. Prokofieff, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Beethoven, "Pastoral" symphony. Lea Luboshutz was the solo violinist. The pieces by Martinu and Copland were performed for the first time.

Even if the hearer had not been informed that Martinu's "Symphonie" was composed in remembrance of the presentation of the first Czekoslovakian flag to the first regiment of that country at Darney, France, in June, 1918—"the first grand solemn act in the independence of Czechoslovakia"—he would have been aware at the beginning of the performance that there was military, patriotic jubilation. Here is no "symphony" in the present meaning of the word. In years gone by an overture, a prelude or postlude to a song or chorus, a bit of incidental music to a play, was called a symphony. One may, if one pleases, speak of Martinu's composition as a symphony in three movements without pause, but the composer prefers to speak of it as "a grand march with a melodic contrast." This section of contrast—is it based on some folk song, or written in folk song spirit? Is it a reminder of past oppression and suffering? It is in an elegaic mood, beautiful, and treated with an impressive simplicity. As in Martinu's "La Begarre" ("Tumult") there is in the first and the closing sections the rhythmic urge and frenzy peculiar to this man of talent. The whole impression made by "La Symphonie" is, with the needed contrasting measures excepted, the expression of a jubilant crowd, delirious in their joy, discordant at times in the shouting to the heavens. It is true that Beethoven portrayed the same popular and tumultuous emotion in the last section of his "Egmont" overture, and took less time in doing it, but Martinu succeeds in maintaining the excitement, the hysteria of rejoicing. Unlike the music of certain contemporary composers who rely chiefly on rhythm, there is in "La Symphonie," the carrying out of a set purpose; if rhythmic patterns are repeated and repeated, it is as if the exulting people only grew more and more exalted at the thought of triumph and freedom. There is a refreshing solidity to this music, not frittered away by experiments in orchestral variants and digressions. The fugued pages towards the end are those that one might the most easily spare.

Mr. Copland's Two Pieces were first written for a string quartet: the second, a Rondino, in 1923; the first, a slow movement was completed last April. Of the two, the Rondino is the more effective, the more interesting in its new form. The slow movement begins in a promising manner, but it is not so firmly knit, so expressive in sentiment. As the music is playing one is tempted to say that Mr. Copland's joy is that of The Miller in the song: "To Wonder." The pieces, however, are more musical than his piano concerto and organ symphony, which have been performed here. It is a fair question to ask whether this composer is not more fortunate in the smaller forms. No one, hearing the Two Pieces, could again consider him as anti-Christ in music, or a musical bolshevik of dark and sinister deeds.

Prokofieff's violin concerto was first played in this country by Mr. Burgin three and a half years ago. The concerto well bears closer acquaintance by the brilliance of the taxing solo part and by the charmingly original instrumentation of many pages. Yesterday Miss Luboshutz, who is at the head of the Curtis music school in Philadelphia and the leader of the Curtis string quartet, was the soloist. Her performance was spirited, intelligent, excellent. Prokofieff does not favor the soloist with sweet romanzas or the opportunity to display emotional feeling to any noticeable extent. He seems to have entrusted his sensuous measures to the orchestra. And so the concerto is far from the traditional idea of a commanding violin and an obsequious accompaniment. It might be interesting to hear the concerto without the solo violin, but as it stands the work is highly original, pleasingly fantastic. Miss Luboshutz was heartily applauded—and deservedly.

Mr. Koussevitzky's sane and at the same time poetic reading of the "Pastoral" symphony is known. No doubt some of the ultra-conservatives allow the entrance of the cuckoo—though the name of the bird is unpleasing to the married ear—because the great Beethoven introduced it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 4. Satie-Debussy, "Gymnopedies." Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole, Block, "America" (first performance).

r by his papa until the ... ROY

POST DEC 16

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons of this week, at 4 o'clock, will bring the season's first pair of Young People's Concerts, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting the slow movement and finale of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, the Andante from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, in which Richard Burgin will be the soloist, and the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrushka," and Mr. Burgin conducting the Larghetto from Mozart's Horn Concerto, in which Georg Boettcher will be the soloist, and the Dance of the Sylphs and Rakoczy March of Berlioz. Alfred H. Meyer will make introductory remarks, illustrated by stereopticon slides.

* * * *

At the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Symphony Concerts of this week, in addition to the premiere of Bloch's "Epic rhapsody" "America," with the Harvard Glee Club joining in the finale as announced elsewhere in these columns, the programme will include the fourth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, Satie's "Gymnopedies" and the Spanish Rhapsody of Ravel.

Lea Luboshutz Soloist With Boston Orchestra

The imagination of Bohuslav Martinů seems to be running of late in open spaces; not empty ones, but those populated by surging crowds and by imposing pageants. Last year the Boston Symphony Orchestra produced his "La Bagarre," which was intended to portray the tension of spectators at a football game, and was dedicated to the memory of Lindbergh's landing at Bourget. At Symphony Hall yesterday, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the first performance of the composer's "La Symphonie." The title is somewhat mystifying. The work, though well built, is not the apotheosis of the symphonic form.

This musical historian now offers us a souvenir of the scene at Darney, France, when with much ceremony the first Czechoslovakian flag was presented to the first Czechoslovakian regiment, marking the Nation's independence. It was natural that Martinů should have been stirred by this event and that he should have wished to make a historical musical painting of it. No doubt the success of his previous landscape encouraged him, too.

In the rhythms that represent the movements of the crowd there is much that is reminiscent of the earlier effort. But this is not all. There is a melody of the folk type, given to the English horn (and beautifully played by Mr. Speyer), which evidently represents melancholy racial memories; and there is a majestic march doubtless intended to convey the military pomp of the occasion. This last owes something to Moussorgsky—the Slavic pageantry outshines the French. As a whole, not great music, but a well-made, entertaining bit of work. Yet the Friday afternoon audience did not recall the conductor even once.

Mr. Copland, author of the well-liked "Music for the Theater" and the much-debated Piano Concerto, was represented on this program by "Two Pieces for Orchestra of Strings." These were composed for string quartet and performed by the Lenox Quartet at a Copland-Sessions Concert of contemporary music in New York last season. One, a Rondino, was written in 1923; the other, Lento Molto, was finished last April. Both were scored last summer for orchestra. Mr. Copland has announced that he has forsworn jazz, which played a prominent part in his past compositions. And in fact, there is little trace of it even in the older of these two pieces. They might have been written together. Both are melodious, pleasing and undistinguished.

Far more novel than a musical novelty in Mr. Koussevitzky's programs is the appearance of a soloist. Yesterday Lea Luboshutz was heard in Prokofieff's Violin Concerto, which was first played in America by Mr. Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra, three years ago. The favorable impression made by the music at that time was renewed on the present occasion. The soloist distinguished herself by the apparent ease with which she conquered the difficulties of her part, making no effort to display her technical proficiency, but rather employing it in conjunction with the orchestra for the projection of the composer's musical thought.

As concluding number, Mr. Koussevitzky offered for contrast with all these modernists the simple joys of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, bestowing upon it as much care as he had given the less familiar works, and bringing it to a charming realization. L. A. S.

MONITOR
DEC. 15

MODERNS AND CLASSIC AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

Those who like the current cacophonies that pass for music have a good time at this week's Symphony concerts, for the program has two works that are played for the first time anywhere, and one, Prokofieff's Violin Concerto, which is not exactly a standard classic. If the connoisseurs are "fed up" with innocent trifles like Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony they need not hear it, for Mr. Koussevitzky has conveniently placed it after the intermission. In fact, the hall emptied appreciably before this symphony at the first concert.

The early-goers, not hearing the symphony, missed a fine performance, one of Mr. Koussevitzky's many inspired readings. Consequently, even though this is not one of Beethoven's greatest works, it atoned for the dullness of much of the opening half of the program—and we are old-fashioned enough to call such music dull.

Martinu, the Czech rebel, opened with a piece called "La Symphonie." A year ago he was introduced to the Symphony Concerts with "La Bagarre," in which the composer gave evidence of great gusto, enormous rhythmic vitality. The same qualities are evident in lesser degree in the latest work. There are measures of appalling harshness, and in contrast an English horn solo that is almost "sweet." If you accept his premises—that is to say, his themes—his development is extremely logical.

Martinu seems to have something to say, to be getting somewhere. We cannot offer the same opinion of Aaron Copland, the young American whose "Two Pieces for String Orchestra" were heard for the first time. An amusing article in the program notes offered us escape from boredom. The audience shared our feelings.

The Prokofieff concerto, first heard here with Richard Burgin as soloist three years ago, was beautifully played by Lea Luboshutz, who deserved the tremendous ovation she received. She tossed off this terribly difficult music with amazingly accurate intonation, with flawless style, and with beautiful tone when the music permitted. Prokofieff begins the first and third movements with lovely melodies, and then, ashamed of himself, proceeds to make noise.

BOS. AMER. DEC. 15-28

TRAVELER

NDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1928

SYMPHONY GETS RECORDS TODAY

The first Victor phonograph records made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky are to be formally presented to the conductor today.

Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller will make the presentation. Gov. Fuller, trustees and officials of the orchestra and a group of musically prominent people have been invited to attend. The presentation will be made in the president's room of the Oliver Ditson Company.

42

HERALD DEC. 15 '28

TH

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, given in Symphony hall, yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Martinu, "La Symphonie"; Copland, Two pieces for string orchestra. Prokoficff, Concerto for violin and orchestra; Beethoven, "Pastoral" symphony. Lea Luboshutz was the solo violinist. The pieces by Martinu and Copland were performed for the first time.

Even if the hearer had not been informed that Martinu's "Symphonie" was composed in remembrance of the presentation of the first Czekoslovakian flag to the first regiment of that country at Darney, France, in June, 1918—"the first grand solemn act in the independence of Czechoslovakia"—he would have been aware at the beginning of the performance that there was military, patriotic jubilation. Here is no "symphony" in the present meaning of the word. In years gone by an overture, a prelude or postlude to a song or chorus, a bit of incidental music to a play, was called a symphony. One may, if one pleases, speak of Martinu's composition as a symphony in three movements without pause, but the composer prefers to speak of it as "a grand march with a melodic contrast." This section of contrast—is it based on some folk song, or written in folk song spirit? Is it a reminder of past oppression and suffering? It is in an elegaie mood, beautiful, and treated with an impressive simplicity. As in Martinu's "La Begarre" ("Tumult") there is in the first and the closing sections the rhythmic urge and frenzy peculiar to this man of talent. The whole impression made by "La Symphonie" is, with the needed contrasting measures excepted, the expression of a jubilant crowd, delirious in their joy, discordant at times in the shouting to the heavens. It is true that Beethoven portrayed the same popular and tumultuous emotion in the last section of his "Egmont" overture, and took less time in doing it, but Martinu succeeds in maintaining the excitement, the hysteria of rejoicing. Unlike the music of certain contemporary composers who rely chiefly on rhythm, there is in "La Symphonie," the carrying out of a set purpose; if rhythmic patterns are repeated and repeated, it is as if the exulting people only grew more and more exalted at the thought of triumph and freedom. There is a refreshing solidity to this music, not frittered away by experiments in orchestral variants and digressions. The fugued pages towards the end are those that one might the most easily spare.

Mr. Copland's Two Pieces were first written for a string quartet: the second, a Rondino, in 1923; the first, a slow movement was completed last April. Of the two, the Rondino is the more effective, the more interesting in its new form. The slow movement begins in a promising manner, but it is not so firmly knit, so expressive in sentiment. As the music is playing one is tempted to say that Mr. Copland's joy is that of The Miller in the song: "To Wonder." The pieces, however, are more musical than his piano concerto and organ symphony, which have been performed here. It is a fair question to ask whether this composer is not more fortunate in the smaller forms. No one, hearing the Two Pieces, could again consider him as anti-Christ in music, or a musical bolshevik of dark and sinister deeds.

Prokofieff's violin concerto was first played in this country by Mr. Burgin three and a half years ago. The concerto well bears closer acquaintance by the brilliance of the taxing solo part and by the charmingly original instrumentation of many pages. Yesterday Miss Luboshutz, who is at the head of the Curtis music school in Philadelphia and the leader of the Curtis string quartet, was the soloist. Her performance was spirited, intelligent, excellent. Prokofieff does not favor the soloist with sweet romanzas or the opportunity to display emotional feeling to any noticeable extent. He seems to have entrusted his sensuous measures to the orchestra. And so the concerto is far from the traditional idea of a commanding violin and an obsequious accompaniment. It might be interesting to hear the concerto without the solo violin, but as it stands the work is highly original, pleasingly fantastic. Miss Luboshutz was heartily applauded—and deservedly.

Mr. Koussevitzky's sane and at the same time poetic reading of the "Pastoral" symphony is known. No doubt some of the ultra-conservatives allow the entrance of the cuckoo—though the name of the bird is unpleasing to the married ear—because the great Beethoven introduced it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Bach, Brandenburg Concerto, No. 4. Satie-Debussy, "Gymnopedies." Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole, Block, "America" (first performance).

r by his papa until the ...

POST DEC 16

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons of this week, at 4 o'clock, will bring the season's first pair of Young People's Concerts, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting the slow movement and finale of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, the Andante from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, in which Richard Burgin will be the soloist, and the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Petrushka," and Mr. Burgin conducting the Larghetto from Mozart's Horn Concerto, in which Georg Boettcher will be the soloist, and the Dance of the Sylphs and Rakoczy March of Berlioz. Alfred H. Meyer will make introductory remarks, illustrated by stereopticon slides.

* * * *

At the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Symphony Concerts of this week, in addition to the premiere of Bloch's "Epic rhapsody" "America," with the Harvard Glee Club joining in the finale as announced elsewhere in these columns, the programme will include the fourth Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, Satie's "Gymnopedies" and the Spanish Rhapsody of Ravel.

Lea Luboshutz Soloist With Boston Orchestra

The imagination of Bohuslav Martinŭ seems to be running of late in open spaces; not empty ones, but those populated by surging crowds and by imposing pageants. Last year the Boston Symphony Orchestra produced his "La Bagarre," which was intended to portray the tension of spectators at a football game, and was dedicated to the memory of Lindbergh's landing at Bourget. At Symphony Hall yesterday, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the first performance of the composer's "La Symphonie." The title is somewhat mystifying. The work, though well built, is not the apotheosis of the symphonic form.

This musical historian now offers us a souvenir of the scene at Darney, France, when with much ceremony the first Czechoslovakian flag was presented to the first Czechoslovakian regiment, marking the Nation's independence. It was natural that Martinŭ should have been stirred by this event and that he should have wished to make a historical musical painting of it. No doubt the success of his previous landscape encouraged him, too.

In the rhythms that represent the movements of the crowd there is much that is reminiscent of the earlier effort. But this is not all. There is a melody of the folk type, given to the English horn (and beautifully played by Mr. Speyer), which evidently represents melancholy racial memories; and there is a majestic march doubtless intended to convey the military pomp of the occasion. This last owes something to Moussorgsky—the Slavic pageantry outshines the French. As a whole, not great music, but a well-made, entertaining bit of work. Yet the Friday afternoon audience did not recall the conductor even once.

Mr. Copland, author of the well-liked "Music for the Theater" and the much-debated Piano Concerto, was represented on this program by "Two Pieces for Orchestra of Strings." These were composed for string quartet and performed by the Lenox Quartet at a Copland-Sessions Concert of contemporary music in New York last season. One, a Rondino, was written in 1923; the other, Lento Molto, was finished last April. Both were scored last summer for orchestra. Mr. Copland has announced that he has forsworn jazz, which played a prominent part in his past compositions. And in fact, there is little trace of it even in the older of these two pieces. They might have been written together. Both are melodious, pleasing and undistinguished.

Far more novel than a musical novelty in Mr. Koussevitzky's programs is the appearance of a soloist. Yesterday Lea Luboshutz was heard in Prokofieff's Violin Concerto, which was first played in America by Mr. Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra, three years ago. The favorable impression made by the music at that time was renewed on the present occasion. The soloist distinguished herself by the apparent ease with which she conquered the difficulties of her part, making no effort to display her technical proficiency, but rather employing it in conjunction with the orchestra for the projection of the composer's musical thought.

As concluding number, Mr. Koussevitzky offered for contrast with all these modernists the simple joys of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, bestowing upon it as much care as he had given the less familiar works, and bringing it to a charming realization. L. A. S.

MONITOR
DEC. 15

MODERNS AND CLASSIC AT SYMPHONY

By MOSES SMITH

Those who like the current cacophonies that pass for music have a good time at this week's Symphony concerts, for the program has two works that are played for the first time anywhere, and one, Prokofieff's Violin Concerto, which is not exactly a standard classic. If the connoisseurs are "fed up" with innocent trifles like Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony they need not hear it, for Mr. Koussevitzky has conveniently placed it after the intermission. In fact, the hall emptied appreciably before this symphony at the first concert.

The early-goers, not hearing the symphony, missed a fine performance, one of Mr. Koussevitzky's many inspired readings. Consequently, even though this is not one of Beethoven's greatest works, it atoned for the dullness of much of the opening half of the program—and we are old-fashioned enough to call such music dull.

Martinu, the Czech rebel, opened with a piece called "La Symphonie." A year ago he was introduced to the Symphony Concerts with "La Bagarre," in which the composer gave evidence of great gusto, enormous rhythmic vitality. The same qualities are evident in lesser degree in the latest work. There are measures of appalling harshness, and in contrast an English horn solo that is almost "sweet." If you accept his premises—that is to say, his themes—his development is extremely logical.

Martinu seems to have something to say, to be getting somewhere. We cannot offer the same opinion of Aaron Copland, the young American whose "Two Pieces for String Orchestra" were heard for the first time. An amusing article in the program notes offered us escape from boredom. The audience shared our feelings.

The Prokofieff concerto, first heard here with Richard Burgin as soloist three years ago, was beautifully played by Lea Luboshutz, who deserved the tremendous ovation she received. She tossed off this terribly difficult music with amazingly accurate intonation, with flawless style, and with beautiful tone when the music permitted. Prokofieff begins the first and third movements with lovely melodies, and then, ashamed of himself, proceeds to make noise.

BOS. AMER. DEC. 15. '28

TRAVELER

NDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1928

SYMPHONY GETS RECORDS TODAY

The first Victor phonograph records made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky are to be formally presented to the conductor today.

Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller will make the presentation. Gov. Fuller, trustees and officials of the orchestra, and a group of musically prominent people have been invited to attend. The presentation will be made in the president's room of the Oliver Ditson Company.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1928

"These Concerts Are Made Possible"

Guarantors of the Symphony Orchestra, 1928-1929

$62,686 in Hand: $90,000 Needed

THE PROGRAM-BOOKS of the Symphony Concerts are beginning to contain, with weekly additions, the list of subscribers to the fund that meets the annual operating deficit of the orchestra. Each year it tends to rise; each year, thus far, the interest and generosity of the public have risen with it. Old subscribers are stanch; new are annually added. The standards of the concerts have never been higher or the audiences larger and keener. The management relaxes not a whit of its prudence. Yet the trustees could do with more subscriptions and would welcome them from guarantors as widespread as are the audiences. "The orchestra can be carried on only by the generosity of those who believe it important in the life of Boston and are willing to help it financially." Here are those who have proved their faith by their works:

Abbott, Gordon
Adams, Miss Clara A.
Alford, Mrs. O. H.
Allen, Mrs. Thomas
Ames, Mrs. Hobart
Ames, Mrs. William H.
Anthony, Miss A. R.
Anthony, Miss Margaret
Atherton, Percy L.
Bacon, Charles E.
Baker, G. B.
Bancroft, Mrs. Hugh
Bangs, Miss Edith
Barkhouse, Mrs. Arthur J.
Barlow, R. S.
Barnet, Mr. and Mrs. S. J.
Barrett, Mrs. William E.
Bartlett, Mrs. Nelson S.
Bartol, Mrs. John W.
Baylies, Mrs. Walter C.
Beal, Miss Ida G.
Bearse, Mrs. Horace L.
Becker, Mrs. G. W.
Beckwith, Mrs. Daniel, Providence, R. I.
Beebe, Miss Sylenda
Bell, Mrs. Jaffrey de Hauteville
Bemis, Mr. and Mrs. A. Farwell
Best, Mrs. Edward H.
Bird, Mrs. Frances A. M.
Blake, Miss M. L.
Bliss, Henry W.
Bowditch, Dr. Vincent Y.
Boyden, Charles
Bradlee, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas S.
Bramhall, Miss Eleanor C.
Brewer, F. R.
Brown, George W.
Bruzza, Leo
Buckingham, Miss M. H.
Bullard, Miss Ellen T.
Bullard, Mrs. W. N., Newport, R. I.
Burnham, Miss Helen C.
Burnham, Miss M. C.
Burnham, Mrs. W. A.
Burr, I. Tucker
Cabot, Miss Amy W.
Cabot, Mrs. Arthur T.
Cabot, Frederick P.
Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B.
Carter, Mrs. J. W.
Case, Miss Louise W.
Chapin, Horace D.
Chapin, Miss Mabel H.
Chase, Mrs. Henry M.
Cheever, Dr. and Mrs. D.
Clark, Mrs. Myron H.
Cochran, Mrs. Edwin Paul, N H., Conn.
Codman, Miss C. A.
Codman, Mrs. Russell S.
Coffin, Winthrop
Coleman, Miss E. L.
Colt, Mr. and Mrs. James D.
Conant, Mrs. William C.
Converse, Miss Luna B., Woodstock, Vt.
Coolidge, Mr. and Mrs. Harold J.
Coolidge, Mrs. J. G.
Coolidge, Julian L.
Coonley, Mr. and Mrs. Howard
Crehore, Miss Lucy C.
Crosby, Mrs. S. V. R.
Cummings, Charles K.
Curtis, Charles F.
Curtis, Miss Harriot S.
Curtis, Mrs. Louis
Curtiss, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic H.
Cushing, Miss Sarah P.
Cushing, Mrs. W. E.
Cutler, Miss Elisabeth A.
In Memory of C. S. D.
Dabney, Mr. and Mrs. George B.
Daniels, Miss Mabel W.
Davenport, Mr. and Mrs. George H.
Day, Mrs. Henry B.
Dexter, Miss Rose L.
Donald, Mrs. Malcolm
Dunne, F. L. & Co.
Eager, Miss Mabel T.
Eaton, Miss L. H.
Edwards, Miss Hannah M.
Eisemann, Julius
Ellery, Mr. and Mrs. William
Ely, Miss Elizabeth B.
Emery, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick L.
Endicott, S. C.
Farlow, Dr. and Mrs. John W.
Farnsworth, William
Fay, A. D.
Fay, Mrs. D. B.
Fenollosa, William S.
Fisher, Miss Edith S.
[illegible] B.
Fitz, Mrs. W. Scott
Foote, Arthur
Foote, George L.
Fox, Felix
Frankenstein, Miss Lina H.
Frost, Mr. and Mrs. Donald McKay
Frost, Horace W.
Frothingham, Dr. and Mrs. Langdon
Frothingham, Mrs. Louis A.
Garritt, Mrs. Walter G.
Gaston, Mrs. W. A.
Gay, E. Howard
Gilbert, Miss Helen C.
Gilmore, Mrs. G. L.
Golden, E. I.
Goulston, Leopold Morse
Gray, Mrs. John Chipman
Gray, Morris
Greene, Edwin Farnham
Greene, Mrs. Edwin Farnham
Greenough, Mrs. Henry V.
Griffith, Miss Josephine
Gross, Mrs. Robert E.
Grover, Mrs. Frances L.
Hall, Mrs. H. S.
Hallowell, Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose
Harris, Miss Frances K.
Harwood, Mrs. John H.
Haughton, Mr. and Mrs. M. G.
Hawley, Mr. and Mrs. George
Heilman, William C.
Herman, Mrs. Joseph M.
Hicks, Mrs. John Jay
Higginson, Mrs. F. L.
Hill, Mrs. John F.
Holmes, Alice Marion
Holmes, Mr. and Mrs. E. J.
Holmes, Miss Ida E.
Homans, Miss Katharine A.
Homans, Miss Marian J.
Hopkins, Mr. and Mrs. Roland G.
Hornblower, Henry.
Hornblower, Mrs. Henry
Houghton, Mrs. Clement S.
Houghton, Miss Elizabeth G.
Houser, Mrs. H. M.
Howe, Henry S.
Howe, Mrs. Henry S.
Howe, Mrs. J. Murray
Howe, M. A. DeWolfe
Hoyt, Mrs. Charles C.
Hunnewell, Mrs. Henry S.
Hunt, Miss Abby W.
Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W.
Ivers, Miss Ella F.
Jack, Dr. Edwin E.
Jack, Dr. Frederick L.
Jackson, Dr. Henry
Jackson, Mrs. James
Jackson, Miss Margaret
Jackson, Robert A.
Jaques, Miss H. L.
Johnson, Arthur S.
Johnson, Mrs. E. J.
Johnson, Miss Edith Morse
Kaffenburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Albert W.
Kaufman, M. B.
Keeler, Mrs. L. M.
Kent, Mrs. Edward L.
King, The Misses
Koshland, Mr. and Mrs. Abraham
Koshland, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Lang, Miss Margaret Ruthven
Lapham, Mrs. Henry G.
Lasell, Miss Elizabeth
Lawrence, Mrs. John
Lee, Miss Bertha
Lee, Mr. and Mrs. George C.
Lee, Joseph
Leeds, Mrs. Adolph
Leland, Mrs. Lester
Leman, J. Howard
Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. George, Jr.
Lewis, Mrs. George
Little, Mrs. David M.
Livermore, Harris
Longfellow, Miss Alice M.
Lord, Mrs. W. H.
Lothrop, Mrs. Thornton K.
Lothrop, Mrs. W. S. H.
Lowell, Miss Lucy
Lucas, Mrs. William Henry
Luce, Stephen B.
Lyman, Arthur
Lyon, Mrs. George Armstrong
Lyons, John A.
Manning, Earl G.
Mason, Miss Fanny P.
Merrill, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. S.
Metcalf, Mrs. Jesse H.
Miller, Miss Mildred A.
Milliken, Arthur N.
Moir, Mrs. John
Moore, Mrs. Edward C.
Moors, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W.
Morison, Samuel Eliot
Morse, Henry Lee
Morse, Miss J. G.
Morse, J. Torrey
Morss, Mrs. Charles A.
Moseley, Mrs. F. S.
Mumford, Mrs. George S.
McKibbin, Miss Emily W.
McMichael, Mrs. L. G.
Nichols, Mrs. Henry G.
Nickerson, Mrs. W. G.
Nutter, George R.
Oakes, Mrs. Francis J.
Osgood, Miss Emily L.
Paine, Rev. George L.
Paine, R. T., 2d
Parkman, Mrs. Henry
Patton, James E.
Perera, G. L.
Pfaelzer, Mrs. Franklin T.
Pickman, Dudley L.
Pierce, Mrs. Edgar
Pierce, Mrs. M. V.
Post, Mrs. John R.
Potter, Mrs. Murray A.
Putnam, Mrs. George
Putnam, Mrs. James J.
Putnam, Miss Louisa H.
Putnam, Miss Marian C.
Rand, Mr. and Mrs. E. K.
Ranney, Miss Helen M.
Rantoul, The Misses
Rantoul, Mrs. Neal
Ratshesky, Mr. and Mrs. A. C.
Richardson, Mrs. Charles F.
Richardson, Mrs. F. L. W.
Richardson, Mrs. John
Richardson, W. K.
Rogers, Howard L.
Rothwell, Bernard J.
Rousmaniere, Mrs. E. S.
Sachs, Prof. Paul J.
Sampson, Mrs. Robert deW.
Sanger, Mrs. George P.
Saville, Mrs. William
Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B.
Sayles, Robert W.
Schneider, Miss Elizabeth
Scott, Mrs. Arnold
Sears, Miss Annie L.
Sears, Mr. and Mrs. Henry F.
Sears, Mrs. Montgomery
Silsbee, Mrs. George S.
Slattery, Mrs. Charles Lewis
Smith, Mr. and Mrs. F. Morton
Sortwell, Mrs. A. F.
Spalding, Mr. and Mrs. Walter R.
Spaulding, Miss Emma F.
Sprague, Phineas W.
Stackpole, Mrs. Frederick D.
Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs. Pierpont L.
Stanton, Miss Katherine
Starkweather, Mr. and Mrs. William G.
Steedman, Mrs. C. J., Providence, R. I.
Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander
Stevens, Moses T.
Stevenson, Mrs. Robert H.
Stone, Mrs. Galen L.
Streeter, Mrs. E. C.
Sturgis, The Misses
Tapley, Miss Alice P.
Tapley, Henry F.
Thaw, Mrs. Edward
Thorndike, Mrs. John L.
Thoron, Mr. and Mrs. Ward
Tower, Miss Florence E.
Tozzer, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred M.
Turner, Miss Nellie B.
Vaughan, Miss Bertha H.
Vaughan, Mrs. W. W.
Vorenberg, Felix
Wadsworth, Mrs. A. F.
Ware, Henry
Waring, Mrs. Guy
Warren, Bently W.
Watson, Mrs. Thomas R.
Watters, W. F.
Webster, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin S.
Weeks, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S.
Weidhorn, Leo
Weisberg, Edward L.
Welch, Mr. and Mrs. E. Sohier
Weld, Mrs. Charles G.
Wells, Mrs. Webster
Weston, Charles H.
Wetherbee, Martha
Wheatland, Richard
Wheelwright, Miss Mary C
White, Miss Gertrude R.
Whitin, Mrs. G. Marston
Whitney, Mrs. Margaret F. G.
Williams, Moses
Willson, Donald B.
Wilson, Miss A. E.
Winsor, Mrs. Frederick
Wolcott, Mrs. Roger
Wood, Dr. Nathan K.
Wrenn, Philip W.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Music and Musicians --- Plays and Players --- The Screen

Around Paris, From America, With Gershwin

His New Orchestral Piece, Played in New York, Makes Whoopee

ON a certain spring day in this year of grace, when the horse chestnuts were in bloom on the Avenue des Champs-Elysées and Frenchmen were scarce in the Ritz café, Mr. George Gershwin arrived with well-bred quiet in the loveliest city in the world. Probably [writes Mr. Gilman in The Herald Tribune] the boat train, in accordance with custom, was late; and doubtless Mr. Gershwin, wearied by his journey, retired early, and was soon lulled to sleep by the taxi horns that enliven the Place Vendôme—for surely Mr. Gershwin took rooms as near as possible to those occupied at the end of his life by Frédéric Chopin, who like Mr. Gershwin, contributed to the literature of the piano concerto.

It was probably not much later than the next morning that Mr. Gershwin set forth to gather those "impressions of an American visitor in Paris" which, as he has told us, form the subject matter of the new orchestral work that Mr. Damrosch and the Philharmonic Society disclosed to us Thursday evening. You may, therefore, imagine Mr. Gershwin sallying forth about noon, a copy of Miss Laughlin's "So You're Going to Paris!" under his arm, and in his briefcase one or two volumes of the works of that friend of all Parisian explorers, Georges Cain—perhaps the useful "Promenades dans Paris" and the "Coins de Paris" (which you may get in English if you prefer, as "Nooks and Corners of Old Paris"). He would have had, certainly, not less than a hundred francs in his wallet against the day's expenses, for Baedeker, even in the latest edition, warns us that "it is easy to spend the sum per day in Paris without being guilty of extravagance."

Miss Laughlin advises the American explorer in Paris to start from the Place de la Concorde and stop at the Café de la Paix for a cup of chocolate and a brioche; but apparently Mr. Gershwin went in the other direction: for Mr. Deems Taylor, in the circumstantial account of the composer's promenades which he contributed to the program notes, tells us that the American visitor swung down the Champs Elysées as far as the Grand Palais, where the spring Salon held forth. What the truth is, Mr. Gershwin's music does not betray. It contents itself at this point with giving us a "First Walking Theme" (so-called), which we hear from the strings in F major, allegretto graziosao—cheery tune, if not one of great price.

The composer has said that the opening part of "An American in Paris" is "developed in the typical French style, in the manner of Debussey and 'The Six,' though the themes are all original"—a slightly puzzling assertion; as if one should speak of "the typical German style, in the manner of Wagner and Hindemith." But doubtless Mr. Gershwin meant merely that he had striven to tell us in musical language that his American was in Paris, and not in Atlantic City.

According to Mr. Taylor's glossary, Mr. Gershwin was impressed by the Paris taxis, as well he might be—Mr. Taylor says they "amused" the composer, which implies a godlike and most enviable detachment on the part of Mr. Gershwin. He has imported his memories of them into his score through the means of four real Paris taxi-horns, and also by way of a special taxi-theme—which, to tell the truth, disappointed us by its incongruous gentility.

And our American friend—"perhaps," says Mr. Gershwin in his own account of the work, "after strolling into a café and having a few drinks—suddenly succumbs to a spasm of homesickness." This, says Mr. Taylor's more detailed account, was somewhere on the Left Bank, which our promenading American had reached to the accompaniment of two more "Walking Themes." At all events, he is seated before a café, exploring the mysteries of an Anise de Lozo, when he is accosted.

This Paphian incident survives in Mr. Gershwin's musical travelogue in the shape of a seductive violin-solo, delivered last night, with poetic injustice, by the blameless Mr. Guidi, concertmaster of the orchestra. Miss Laughlin in her book gives no warning of this peril to the American in Paris (though she does allude darkly to "those whose idea of Paris is bounded on the south by dear-knows-what"), and it is just possible that our Promenader derived small benefit from this encounter: for both the composer and his commentator tell us that melancholy now seized him.

Mr. Gershwin tactfully refers to this as "a spasm of homesickness"—and he makes no mention of the Circe of the violin-solo. Mr. Taylor says that the stroller "has the blues." And, sympathetically, so has Mr. Gershwin's orchestra. It is a good "blues," though not so good a one as we might have expected from Mr. Gershwin. But we accept it cheerfully, and are ready for the Charleston that follows it, an indefeasibly American subject that banishes with its lusty trumpet voice the melancholy sown in the Promenader's breast by Circe, or whoever or whatever it was that lowered his vibrations.

We know that he will soon be home again; home in blatant, barbarous, ineluctable New York, where, if an Anise de Lozo is rather hard to come by, and the façades of the Place Vendôme are an unattainable ideal of ripened loveliness, there are nevertheless a variety of things to hearten us—among them the music of Mr. Gershwin, with its gusto and naïveté, its tang of a new and urgent world, engaging, ardent, unpredictable.

Mr. Henderson was also amused and wrote in The Sun: "Mr. Taylor hinted that in one spot the composer met a compatriot, but did not tell who he was. He must have suspected that everyone would know it was John Alden Carpenter. Mr. Gershwin met some others on his pedestrian excursion and of course one of them was Igor Stravinsky, who pervades the sidewalks of Paris. No musician can escape him. And Mr. Gershwin must have seen, in the distance, at any rate, one Ferdie Grofé, who does things to instruments.

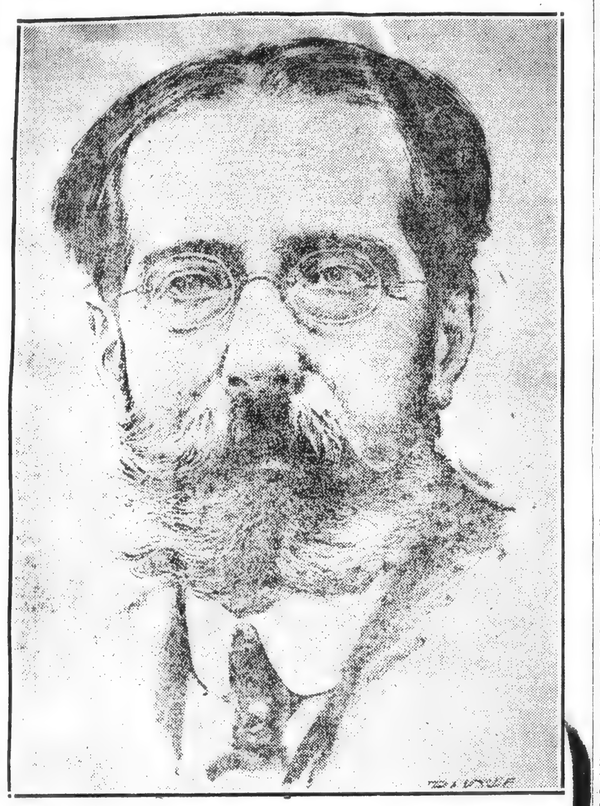
But Mr. Gershwin's piece should not be taken too seriously. It is a frank humoresque. It has a rollicking spirit and there is a most engaging candor about some of its ideas, especially the first walking theme, which is aptness incarnate. There is much cleverness in the score and some rudeness of manner. The American in Paris is a Broadway swaggerer, well acquainted with the music-halls the vaudeville shows and the operetta stars.

"Perhaps there will be some question as to the propriety of employing the Philharmonic to present such a work, but why should not the wise men relish a little nonsense now and then? Carefree jollity, even if it has just emerged long after midnight from one of those rigidly exclusive clubs whose white lights illumine the town, is not the worst thing in this hard-driven world. The audience seemed to like it. Mr. Damrosch manifestly enjoyed conducting it. The sages of the orchestra performed it with élan. It went over with a bang."

On the other side of the account Mr. Thompson of The Evening Post was scornful and discoverably indignant. He wrote: "The honks have it. Four automobile horns, vociferously assisted by three saxophones, two tom-toms, rattle, xylophone, wire brush, wood block and an ensemble not otherwise innocent of brass and percussion blew or thumped the lid off in Carnegie Hall when An American in Paris' had its first performance anywhere. George Gershwin, the American in question, was present to bow a dozen times from a box as the applause of Philharmonic subscribers was showered upon him, as well as upon the conductor, the indefatigable Walter Damrosch. For those not too deeply concerned with any apparently outmoded niceties of art, it was an amusing occasion. Audience, orchestra, the composer himself, smiled, chortled or laughed aloud as the work was being played. They found its musical buffoonery good fun in spite of, or perhaps because of, its blunt banality and its ballyhoo vulgarity. But after all, this is the twentieth century, and what is a little banality and vulgarity between friends? . . .

"As a work to exert a popular appeal in the picture houses, 'An American in Paris' is a distinct advance (?) over the same composer's much more earnest Piano-Concerto, in that it is cockier, more idiomatic, more content to be itself. It is nearer Tin-Pan Alley, hence more in the spirit of the 'Rhapsody in Blue.' Doubtless those who are convinced that the Rhapsody is good music will take this new work (of a form unspecified) to their bosoms similiarly. At any rate, it should meet the requirements of certain 'ultraists' who have been shouting for musical grotesquerie that will represent the age. It is whoopee music, and, judged as just that, it is fairly clever whoopee. To conceive of a symphonic audience listening to it with any degree of pleasure or patience twenty years from now, when whoopee is no longer even a word, is another matter. Then, [Mr. Thompson is citing the other items of the program] there will still be 'Franck with his outmoded spiritually, Lekeu with his discarded sentimentalism and Wagner with his stale bombast and his ridiculously inflated pathos.' Mr. Gershwin, too, heard their music last evening. One wondered what he thought of it."

In This Spanish Year



Fernandez-Arbos (New York Times)

Guest-Conductor at the Symphony Concerts of Jan. 18 and 19

Concert-Chronicle

Carols, Variously

IN a program devoted entirely to Christmas carols, the Mount Holyoke College Glee Club, conducted by Dr. William Churchill Hammond, produced music of surprising variety at the concert under the auspices of the Mount Holyoke Club of Boston in Jordan Hall, Saturday afternoon. There were carols of all kinds, ancient and modern, and from many lands. Some were presented a capella; others with the piano accompaniments of Miss Ruth E. Dyer. Dr. Hammond proffered additional pieces for organ and Miss Dyer for piano. The stage was appropriately decorated in Christmas greens with candles set on both sides of the stage. The audience was large, responsive, and in a mood to enjoy the festive occasion—so much so that Dr. Hammond was able to produce excellent results when he called upon the audience to join in the singing of the concluding carol of the afternoon.

The sixty women's voices of the Mount Holyoke Club are individually light and sweet; in combination, nicely balanced, well-blended. The singers answer immediately; cut off their phrases at the precise moment; smoothly increase or decrease the volume of sound in ensemble messa di voce. Dr. Hammond conducts without baton, preferring a style of direction which minutely follows the rhythms and nuances of his music rather than the rigid bar-lines and time signatures. That this method sometimes halts the even flow of measures or the arching of the complete design is evident; that it also produces refinements not otherwise possible was a discernible fact last Saturday.

Dr. Hammond skillfully contrasted the moods of his music. Beside carols happy and rejoicing in sentiment he placed others of tender feeling—a lullaby, perhaps, or the more picturesque harmonies of Russian music and of ancient carols in modern arrangement. Despite the limited harmonic range of much of the old music, he was able to refine his effects to distinctions that were subtle enough to make each carol individually interesting. There were also several carols, treated in more modern style, which were of particular interest—placed as they were beside so much traditional music. Among these were the Dutch carols, "Cradle Song" and "Two Snow White Doves," by Julius Rontgen. In these the composer has utilized modern harmonization, both in accompaniment and part-writing, to produce more effectively the impression that the older writers aimed at in the more limited manner of the day. The second of these two pieces was repeated by the desire of the audience, as many another number which found favor. N. M. J.

Bach—Desirably

The Bach Cantata Club—seventy-five singers, undergraduates or recent graduates of Harvard and Radcliffe with Mr. Wallace Woodworth as conductor—is making ready two public concerts. The first is announced for Friday evening, Jan. 11, in St. Paul's Cathedral, by courtesy of the Dean and Chapter. Three Church Cantatas will fill the program: No. 61, "Come, Redeemer, Come," for chorus, soli, orchestra and organ; No. 82, "It Is Enough," for baritone, strings and oboe; No. 11, "Praise Our God," for chorus, soli, orchestra and organ. In the spring at a second concert, in Emmanuel Church, Russian church-pieces from Kastalsky and Gretchaninov; Palestrina's setting of the hymn, "Stabat Mater," parts of Carissimi's early Italian oratorio, "Jephtha," will be sung. When within memory has a cantata of Bach been heard, publicly or privately in Boston? Only from such a choir may Palestrina's Stabat Mater come. Our saving remnant of cultivated amateurs should lend every support to these concerts. For subscriptions they may address Miss Sally Cabot at 367 Beacon Street.

Programs in Prospect

At his concert in Jordan Hall this evening, Mr. Gebhardt will play three new pieces of his own composing—"Voices of The Valley"; "Moon-Children"; "Cascades." They derive from Liszt and the Russians, which is to say that they are exercises in a "transcendental" piano-technique, sustained and colored by a fanciful or a poetic idea.

Mr. Rulon Robinson, for his concert in Jordan Hall tomorrow evening, turns into a new by-path in program-making. In one group he arrays seven Serenades for tenor voice. Schumann, Chausson, Fauré, Hahn, Poldowski, the English Shaw, the Bostonian Mason, are the composers.

As report goes, when the Harvard and the Smith Glee Clubs join voices in a concert at Symphony Hall on March 6, they will undertake Holst's "Hymn to Jesus"—a remarkable setting of a fragment from an apocryphal gospel, rarely heard anywhere.

Items of the Day

Sir Georg Henschel, as he now is, was the first conductor of the Boston Orchestra, and it is believable that in 1931 he expects to attend the semi-centennial rites. The other day in London, tempted by the British Broadcasting Company, he sang to his own accompaniment four or five of Schubert's songs — in the voice and style of his prime. And Sir Georg is in his seventy-ninth year.

Mr. Allan Farnham, the violinist, went from his beginnings in Boston to the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. Not long ago he was soloist at one of its Sunday Concerts, playing Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." The audience received him warmly; he waved away flowers "with surprised confusion"; was five times recalled. Said The News next day: "Mr. Farnham's talents are highly rhythmic and the difficult, involved time-patterns of Lalo had no terrors for him. His tone, too, was sweet and poignant, without ever attaining great volume. On in the matter of intonation did he betray any flaw. It was far more marked in the first movement than thereafter."

It is not too late to quote an apt saying of Mr. Edward Moore in The Chicago Tribune about Paul Whiteman and his orchestra:

> It is Mr. Whiteman's mission to shake music out of its pomposities, and he has the most expert band in the world for the purpose. And while they are doing it, they also do many fascinating things besides.

Mr. Wendt Leads His People Onward

THESE lines are to record an instance of how Mr. Theophile Wendt is shaping the People's Symphony into an organization of power. The instance was the concert of yesterday in the Statler Ballroom. The material, strangely enough—were Wagner's "Faust Overture" and Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. Paderewski's Concerto in A for Piano detracted a little from the general impression of freshened force; yet, by reason of contrast, even this may have served to heighten the consequence of the more vital portion of the program. . . . In advance, let it be said that the new conductor's efforts and labors are not overlooked by the general public. The audiences of late have been increasingly large.

Wagner's "A Faust Overture" is a curious piece. For three-quarters of a century it has received from reviewers puzzled and mistrustful comment. As regularly, audiences have clapped it. Composed while Wagner was ill in Paris, it possibly reflects the composer's displeasure at his lot at the time. Its instrumentation sounds heavy with horns, bassoons, trumpets and bass tuba. There is an inscription that laments the burden of life and the desirability of death. With its Wagnerian vigors, however, the People's Orchestra made progress. The strings bowed as one unit; not so many individual jig-saws. The wind sections produced unfaltering harmony. Possessing these improvements and having Mr. Wendt in the conductor's stand, the orchestra approaches with a feeling of real triumph such a dynamic climax as comes near the close of this piece.

To mark time before Chaikovsky, the orchestra presented Paderewski's Concerto with Miss Constance McGlinchee to play the piano part. Pedal down, piano top removed, loose wrist active, the pianist skimmed scales, announced melodies, tossed off trills at full tilt a la Rubinstein, without, it may be inferred, Rubinstein's accuracy and artistry. Miss McGlinchee's rhythmic energy is admirable; yet it runs away with her sense of fitness and proportion. Mr. Wendt and the orchestra filled in the march-like background of the first movement as convincingly as possible. For the string part of the slow movement, the conductor shaded and rounded phrases whenever the pitch was not uncomfortably high for the instruments. In the final section, Mr. Paderewski, as composer, mistakes patriotic excitement and pianistic display for composition of profound feeling and masterly design. The orchestra could do no more than proclaim these measures at martial pace.

Mr. Wendt's reading of Chaikovsky's Fifth was all the more notable in that it was individual as well as compelling. The characteristics that distinguish the new conductor now stand more apparent. There is no amount of preparation, however painstaking, that he will not endure; no detail of expression so small that it may be overlooked. We have been accustomed to an impetuous Chaikovsky. The power that Mr. Wendt disclosed in the Fifth Symphony derived its effectiveness from having been held in reserve before its eventual release. True, at times the listener stirs impatiently while the conductor still holds tight rein; yet Mr. Wendt prefers to have the orchestra produce accurate rather than [illegible]ized sounds while it is at the present stage of his acquaintance. More important—the cumulative potency of forces held in check should not be disregarded. Balance, the clarity with which the woodwinds iterated their opening theme; the steady motion while the orchestra swung through the theme of the after-beat; the exceptionally slow pace and soft utterance of the second movement. Not until the melody came to the 'cello did the conductor permit the full flood of tone. Surely then he builded toward and paused upon the lovely climatic pinnacle near the end of the movement; then the sharp change of pace, falling away again to the melodious close. In the final movement, the conductor gathered in and applied his forces. The opening measures were impressive. At the "Allegro" the rhythms whipped into line; through the "molto vivace" they drove; again paused for the majestic march—at last the quick summing-up. . . . Not within [illegible] the People's Symphony been led by so sure a hand.

N. M. J.

Guest-Conductors To Symphony Hall

For Four Concerts in January Honegger from Paris, Arbos from Madrid

THE TWO guest-conductors, annually called to the Symphony Concerts, draw near. As last year, one, Arthur Honneger of Paris, is primarily a composer who conducts in his own music; the other Enrique Fernandez-Arbos of Madrid, is conductor and nothing else. Monsieur Honneger will direct the concerts of Jan. 9 at Cambridge and of Jan. 11 and 12 in Boston, making at these three his first appearances in the United States. To Senor Arbos fall the concerts of Jan. 15 in Providence and of Jan. 18 and 19 in Boston. Last spring he was guest-conductor in New York; but he has not re-visited Boston since the distant day, during Gericke's second term, when he was concert-master at Symphony Hall.

"King David" and "Pacific 231," in degree "Judith" and "Horace Vainquer," have made Honegger the best-known modernist, save only Stravinsky, to the American public of concerts and opera; while above the rest—Stravinsky always excepted—he has interested and pleasured it. His vigor, directness, variety, the eclectic mind that makes him of all schools and of none, have alike commended him. A composer able to turn from the life and death of a Hebrew hero to the power and speed of a twentieth-century locomotive, was bound to win American ears. In "Judith," he gave new form and voice to opera, and audiences in Chicago and Boston found them good. In "Horace," he would do as much for ballet—and the time has passed when snarling old men, as happened in New York, could heap it with gutter-epithets. Recently, the so-called football piece, "Rugby," has engaged him.

What Honegger will proffer to Boston and Cambridge it is too early to say; but the other day in Paris he was conductor through this program of his own pieces:

Prelude to Shakspeare's Comedy, "The Tempest"
Suite from the Incidental Music to d' Annunzio's Tragedy, "Phædra" Chant de Joie
Rugby
Concertino for Piano
Pacific 231

Senor Arbos is the conductor of the Madrid Symphony Orchestra, cultivating cosmopolitan programs and fostering the younger Spanish composers. In Europe, north and south of the Pyrenees, he long since made his reputation. In New York, last March, with the moribund Damrosch Orchestra, he excited audiences by his playing of Spanish music—from de Falla and Albeniz, from the less-known Halffter and Espla. Even to Symphony Hall these Spaniards come rarely.

The Manifold Modernist

Arthur Honegger (Modern Music)

Guest as Composer and Conductor at the Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Jan. 10, in Boston on Jan. 11 and 12.

Vows of The Day

Signed and Sealed by Mr. Ziegfeld's Chorus

THE young persons in the minor parts and the chorus of Mr. Ziegfeld's newest musical play, "Whoopee," have taken the pledge. Here it is as he, or his press-agent, administered it to them, cast—shall one say?—in free verse:

I pledge myself to slenderness,
To a figure supple and lithe and slim,
To the grace of a finely proportioned body
That enables movement unhampered and free.
I renounce the false pleasures of the table,
Fattening foods, drinks and cloying sweets,
But I make no sacrifices:
I shall smoke cigarettes.

"The Messiah" in Museum Version

CAME yesterday the one-hundred-and-fifty-seventh performance of Handel's "The Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn Society. There had been much talk of a new re-working of the Messiah material by Mr. Thompson Stone. (There are already some sixty-six complete editions of it in the collection of the Paris Conservatoire.) It had been said that the performance would include "as many oboes as could be found in the town." Actually, one noted an orchestra of strings—from twelve first violins to five double basses—five oboes, two trumpets, kettle drums, a piano-harpsichord, the organ, and, of course, the chorus as usual. The textual revision, as far as performance revealed it, consisted of the rather welcome omission of a considerable body of the work, including the fugued portion of the introduction, and the transposition of the Hallelujah chorus to a position immediately before the Amen chorus. The two were sung without break. The effect was extremely satisfactory. The Amen chorus seems a natural pendant to the Hallelujah. The effectiveness of both, and certainly of the oratorio as a whole was increased by the change.

The orchestral accompaniment as used yesterday was revelation to the historian and antiquarian; that it increased pleasure or satisfaction in the beholder, is another question. To the historian it revealed a Handel frightfully hard up [illegible] had been completely ruined and was on the verge of leaving England when [illegible] invitation came to visit Ireland to [illegible] some concerts); writing feverishly and none too carefully to finish a new [illegible] of work; in his haste giving whole passages a "lick and a promise" by the simple expedient of sketching in a bass, the vocal part or parts, and a figured bass for harpsichord; thus finishing the nearly fifty numbers in a little over twenty days. Never mind the portions which have no more than a figured bass accompaniment. Handel was a skilled improviser upon the harpsichord from a figured bass and could be depended on to make the accompaniment interesting in the absence of a true orchestral part. Besides, his harpsichord had slender forces to cope with. And here is another point to be considered in restorations: Romain Roland assures us that his Messiah performances were given by twenty-three singers and thirty-three players! The balance of timbres thus secured cannot possibly be obtained with a chorus of four hundred. As for the oboes? Well, they give clue again to the fact that originals need not be considered too "sacred." In performance yesterday one heard oboes no more than a single time when they were doing other than doubling voice parts in the larger choruses. Handel used his favorite oboes to bolster up weak chorus parts, if one may argue from the plain facts of yesterday's use of them. Handel and Bach both worked in a work-a-day world, in which standardizations and traditions received little thought. They did the best they could under the circumstances and praised God that things were no worse. Exact restorations, even if they were possible, belong in the museum rather than on the concert platform. One must speak, however, of admirable contrasts between the tone of accompanying strings and accompanying harpsichord—practically the only two tonal values in the accompaniment. Often this contrast was exceedingly pleasant. The twanging harpsichord tone was a grateful resource in the hands of a busy master like Handel. Also, thanks are due Mr. Stone for his initiative in providing such a performance. Certainly, twice out of a hundred and fifty-eight times, a museum version is thing to excite curiosity.

Mr. Stone, during the year, has labored to good advantage with his chorus. It is well balanced. Its sonorities are good, especially in the male divisions it gives forth an admirable body of tone. It is responsive to him. Attacks do not come with the edge-like precision which Mr. Mollenhauer demanded from his chorus, but in all other matters one sees definite improvement. It is still debatable whether so large a chorus is desirable for all but the most massive effects. Dr. Davison has learned to cut down his chorus for many of the slighter things the Harvard Glee Club sings. Similarly, many of the florid choruses would undoubtedly sound better if no more than fifty singers out of the four hundred—

Continued on Following Page

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Koussevitzky Receives a Christmas Gift

(Transcript Photo by Frank E. Colby)

Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller Presents Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, With a Set of Stravinsky Records Made Under His Baton, While Governor Fuller Stands By

WITH Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as honor guest, prominent Bostonians interested in music, including Governor and Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, met in the president's room of the Oliver Ditson Company, 179 Tremont street at four yesterday, and listened to the first records made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the Victor Talking Machine Company, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky.

The records were "Petrouchka" and "Apollon Musagete," both by Stravinsky, the first requiring five sides of three discs and the second the reverse of the last Petrouchka seal. Mr. Koussevitzky obviously was pleased with the reproduction and from force of habit "conducted" with the index finger of his left hand as the first was played. Later he explained that Stravinsky's works were peculiarly adapted to successful recording because they were so constructed that they brought out the individual tones of the several instruments and were not blurred or distorted by the intrusion of ensembles which are difficult to reproduce.

A package of the records, tied with holiday ribbon was presented to Mr. Koussevitzky by Mrs. Fuller. William Arms Fisher, vice president of the Oliver Ditson Company, master of ceremonies, pointed out that the records created a new era in phonograph history in the combination of their making by the foremost orchestra in the world, led by the renowned conductor, using the works of one of the greatest of modern composers and mechanically perfected by the leading phonograph company of the world. Mr. Fisher presented Mrs. Fuller with a gift similar to the package given to Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mrs. William Arms Fisher was hostess at the gathering on behalf of the Oliver Ditson Company and Miss Gretchen Myers was hostess for the Victor Talking Machine Company.

THE BOSTON GLOBE—TUESI

SYMPHONY RECORDS PRESENTED TO KOUSSEVITZKY BY MRS FULLER

Presenting to Serge Koussevitsky, by Mrs Fuller, of phonograph records at the store of the Oliver Ditson Co. From left to right: Mrs Alvan T. Fuller, Mr Koussevitsky, Gov Fuller.

Phonograph records of "Petrouchka" and "Apollon Musagete," by Stravinsky, as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Serge Koussevitzky for the Victor Talking Machine Company, were presented to Mr Koussevitzky by Mrs Alvan T. Fuller at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon in the president's room on the 10th floor of the Oliver Ditson Building.

Gov Fuller was a guest, as were a number of persons prominent in social and musical circles. Following the presentation, the records were played. Mr Koussevitzky expressed himself as highly pleased with the recording of the pieces, particularly the "Petrouchka," which, he said, lent itself exceptionally well to the purpose. Copies of the same records were also given to Mrs Fuller.

Among the invited guests were N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Arthur Lyman, Edward M Pickman, Henry B Sawyer, Bentley W Warren, W H Brennan, Clarence Birchard, Richard Burgin, John N Burke, Mr and Mrs George W. Chadwick, Arthur Foote, Mr and Mrs Wallace Goodrich, Mr and Mrs M. Graeme Haughton, Mrs George Hawley, Prof Edward Burlingame Hill and Mrs Hill, Mr and Mrs Frederick Converse, G. E. Judd, Mr and Mrs Charles Martin Loeffler, Mr and Mrs Alexander Steinert, Mrs Bayard Thayer and Arthur W. Wiggin.

Koussevitzky Receives a Christmas Gift

(Transcript Photo by Frank E. Colby)

Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller Presents Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, With a Set of Stravinsky Records Made Under His Baton, While Governor Fuller Stands By

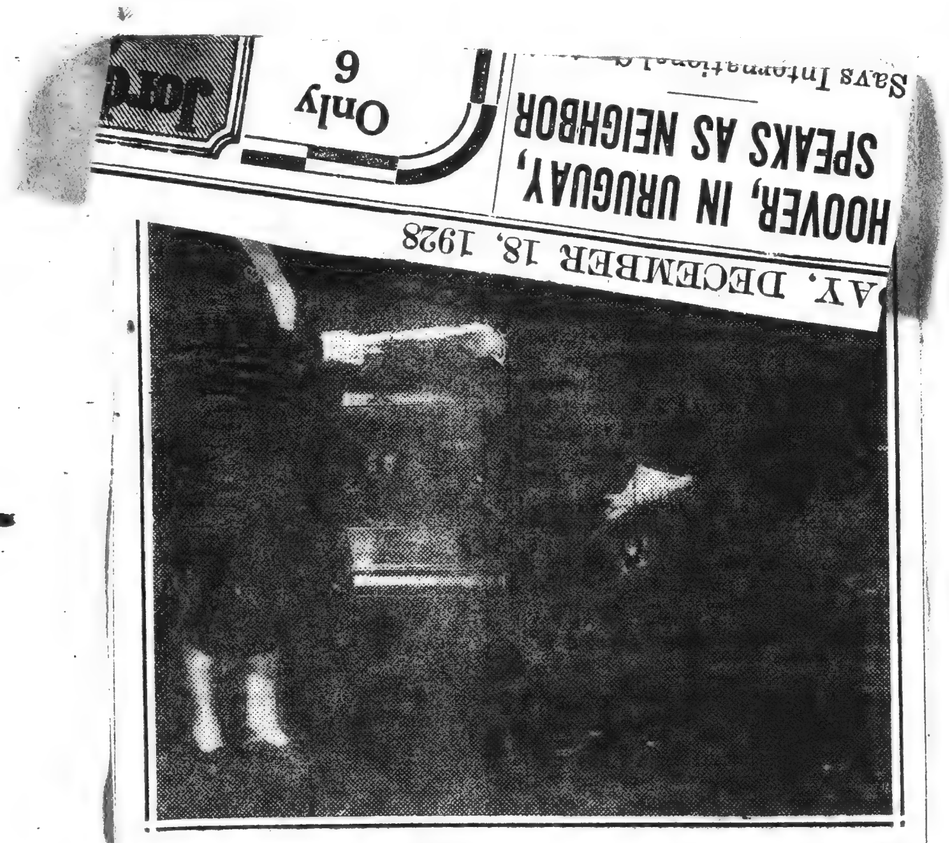
WITH Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as honor guest, prominent Bostonians interested in music, including Governor and Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, met in the president's room of the Oliver Ditson Company, 179 Tremont street at four yesterday, and listened to the first records made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the Victor Talking Machine Company, under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky.

The records were "Petrouchka" and "Apollon Musagete," both by Stravinsky, the first requiring five sides of three discs and the second the reverse of the last Petrouchka seal. Mr. Koussevitzky obviously was pleased with the reproduction and from force of habit "conducted" with the index finger of his left hand as the first was played. Later he explained that Stravinsky's works were peculiarly adapted to successful recording because they were so constructed that they brought out the individual tones of the several instruments and were not blurred or distorted by the intrusion of ensembles which are difficult to reproduce.

A package of the records, tied with holiday ribbon was presented to Mr. Koussevitzky by Mrs. Fuller. William Arms Fisher, vice president of the Oliver Ditson Company, master of ceremonies, pointed out that the records created a new era in phonograph history in the combination of their making by the foremost orchestra in the world, led by the renowned conductor, using the works of one of the greatest of modern composers and mechanically perfected by the leading phonograph company of the world. Mr. Fisher presented Mrs. Fuller with a gift similar to the package given to Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mrs. William Arms Fisher was hostess at the gathering on behalf of the Oliver Ditson Company and Miss Gretchen Myers was hostess for the Victor Talking Machine Company.

TRANS. DEC 18—



Presenting to Serge Koussevitsky, by Mrs Fuller, of phonograph records at the store of the Oliver Ditson Co. From left to right: Mrs Alvan T. Fuller, Mr Koussevitsky, Gov Fuller.

Phonograph records of "Petrouchka" and "Apoilon Musagete," by Stravinsky, as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Serge Koussevitzky for the Victor Talking Machine Company, were presented to Mr Koussevitzky by Mrs Alvan T. Fuller at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon in the president's room on the 10th floor of the Oliver Ditson Building.

Gov Fuller was a guest, as were a number of persons prominent in social and musical circles. Following the presentation, the records were played. Mr Koussevitzky expressed himself as highly pleased with the recording of the pieces, particularly the "Petrouchka," which, he said, lent itself exceptionally well to the purpose. Copies of the same records were also given to Mrs Fuller.

Among the invited guests were N. Penrose Hallowell, M. A. DeWolfe Howe, Arthur Lyman, Edward M Pickman, Henry B Sawyer, Bentley W Warren, W H Brennan, Clarence Birchard, Richard Burgin, John N Burke, Mr and Mrs George W. Chadwick, Arthur Foote, Mr and Mrs Wallace Goodrich, Mr and Mrs M. Graeme Haughton, Mrs George Hawley, Prof Edward Burlingame Hill and Mrs Hill, Mr and Mrs Frederick Converse, G. E. Judd, Mr and Mrs Charles Martin Loeffler, Mr and Mrs Alexander Steinert, Mrs Bayard Thayer and Arthur W. Wiggin.

46

TRANS, Dec 19

The Scr

Concert-Chronicle

New Departures

FROM six to sixteen—incidental adults aside—ranged the listeners at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. A few were so young that they slipped from their seats, propped their chins on the chairs in front; saw and heard as those absorbed in signs and wonders. At the other extreme, a few more would have been equally in place at the regular Symphony Concerts. As good little Americans, one and all "knew what they liked" and, being still in the candid years, did not hesitate to express that liking. Rhythm and sonority gave them most pleasure. They preferred the light-footed, brightly accented Finale of Haydn's Symphony in G major to the graces of the slow movement and the humor (such as it is) of the interrupting drum-stroke. They relaxed—as they will be saying when they are a bit older—while Mr. Burgin upon the violin and Mr. Boettcher upon the horn played suave, slow-paced measures from Mendelssohn and Mozart. Stravinsky's orchestra, resounding through fragments of "Petrushka," snapping or stamping out the rhythms, held them tense again. Loudly they clapped; yet loudest of all after Berlioz's "Rákóczy March" had fretted their nerves and clamored in their ears. Seemingly this young audience cares little for soloists; prefers the full orchestra to sample instruments; listens with its manners to tonal niceties; is "up and a-coming" when sonority and rhythm beat high. Thirty years ago youngsters were natural Wagnerians because they heard his music without prepossessions. Nowadays, being equally free from prejudice, they are natural modernists.

Usually the audience at these Children's Concerts is restless and talkative. Yesterday it was interested and still. Usually it goes home as from a study-hour. Yesterday it departed chattering and in spirits. The reasons were plain. Through a year or two past these youngsters' matinées have lapsed into routine. Now they were intelligently freshened. Over a screen went pictures of Haydn, Mozart, violins and horns; of personages and incidents in "Petrushka" each pat to the moment. Meanwhile from the stage Mr. Alfred Meyer talked familiarly of composers, instruments and the piece in hand; at the pauses in Stravinsky's ballet re-told amusingly the fable of the amorous puppets, the showman and the Russian folk. He did not "talk down" to the children; consequently they "took to him." Finally, Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Burgin led the orchestra through the several numbers as though they were playing to an audience of connoisseurs. Youngsters of the radio and the records knew at last how a living orchestra really sounds. If they had half an ear—and most of them had two whole ones—no wonder they clapped their hands. Another such matinée and there will be fewer empty seats than yesterday.

The interlopers of middle age also had their reflections—over Mr. Boettcher, for example. He is a horn-player of the first rank, skillful, sensitive, musician through and through, notable addition to the orchestra. Yesterday he gilded Mozart's trifle. There are other and richer concertos for horn—Strauss's, for example; through years such a piece has not been heard at the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Boettcher—and Mr. Koussevitzky—have their opportunity. Yesterday, as well, for the first time within the longest memory, the orchestra sat not in tiers, but on a single level. By first impression the tone gained in clarity, euphony, unanimity. For Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn it seemed the purer. Whatever the piece, it reached the ear close-woven, fine-textured. Not from layers or from groups did it come but from an orchestra one and indivisible. Evidently, Mr. Koussevitzky is consid-ering. H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Bloch's prize-piece—the new Symphonic Rhapsody, "America"—exacts diligent preparation. Into the finale a chorus must be fitted. Therefore Mr. Koussevitzky has returned to repertory numbers for the first part of the Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday: Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Satie's "Gymnopédies" as originally announced; Ravel's "The Waltz," as unescapable, year in and year out, in Boston as it is in Paris.

Mr. Sanromá, wearing a new aspect of young maturity, has returned from his studies in Europe. At the Symphony Concerts of next week, he will play Toch's Piano-Concerto; on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 12, in Jordan Hall, venture a recital of his own. Toch, a new composer hereabouts, is a German modernist who has dared to turn a concerto into music witty and gay.

Mme. Honegger will come with her husband to America; in Boston and elsewhere play the solo-part in his Concertino for Piano and Orchestra. . . . Mr. Gieseking, the pianist, may be expected for a single concert in Boston—on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20, in Symphony Hall.

Dec. 19
Herald

THE

MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

The first of The Young People's Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Andante and Finale from the "Surprise" Symphony. Mendelssohn, Andante from the violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist). Stravinsky, Orchestral Suite from "Petrouchka." Mozart, Larghetto from the horn concerto No. 3 (Mr. Boettcher, soloist). Berlioz, Ballet of the Sylphs and Rakoczy March from "The Damnation of Faust," Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the first three numbers. Mr. Burgin the last two. Alfred H. Meyer made short explanatory remarks in a pleasant manner and evidently interested the children as they were told something about the composers, the works that were played; different musical forms and instruments. Pictures were thrown on a screen; those illustrative of "Petrouchka" were helpful in enabling the children to enjoy Stravinsky's music. The experiment of putting the orchestra on a flat stage was made.

Might it not be well to have some "Skyscrapers" and "Adventures of a Perambulator" pictorially illustrated for the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening? Mr. Block's "America," to be played this week might thus be elucidated.

The program of yesterday does not call for comment except, perhaps, a note about Mozart's concerto for horn. He hurriedly wrote four of them for Leitgeb, a virtuoso on this instrument, but not at all a good musician; so that Mozart on the score of the first concerto wrote ironical remarks with reference to the player's lack of musicianly qualities.

The question might come up: What are the best compositions for a concert of this nature? This question admits of academic discussion. Children are the most easily pleased first of all by lively rhythms and great bursts of sound. (A noisy ending appeals to all audiences, old or young.) Yesterday, for example, there was much more applause after the gay Finale of Mozart's symphony than after the preceding Andante. They were pleased by Mr. Burgin's suave performance of Mendelssohn's genteel music. Did they fully appreciate Mr. Boettcher's beautiful tone? In their appreciation of Stravinsky's ballet they were greatly aided by the droll pictures on the screen. Would the young ones care for Bizet's little Suite with playthings and games, the titles of the movements? In these days "Alice in Wonderland" is relished more by parents than by their children.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon.

YOUNG PEOPLE AT SYMPHONY

Bos. Post Dec. 19

Stereopticon Is Used as Means to Aid Interest

Yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock Symphony Hall was largely filled with an assemblage of young people, many of them about to have their first glimpse of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And at the conclusion of the first number it was clear from audible comments that the youngest generation of our concert-goers is no less appreciative than its elders of the magnetic presence of Mr. Koussevitzky upon the conductor's podium.

There were other innovations yesterday at the first of the season's opening pair of Young People's Concerts, the second of which, with the same programme, befalls this afternoon at the same hour. Not only did Mr. Koussevitzky make his first appearance of some seasons in this series, but stereopticon slides were also added to the purely musical features of the programme, while replacing the brief programme-notes of the past few seasons there were spoken comments and explanations by Mr. Alfred H. Myer, admirably adapted to his auditors and effectively illustrated by these slides. Furthermore these remarks of Mr. Meyer's came before each individual movement of suite or symphony, so that there was no necessity for carrying information too long in the mind before bringing it to bear upon the music concerned. Altogether an excellent arrangement.

There were also soloists yesterday afternoon, as there will be today: Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the orchestra in the Andante of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerta, Bernard Zighera in the incidental piano solo in Stravinsky's orchestral suite drawn from his ballet "Petrushka," and Georg Boettcher as player of the French horn in third Horn Concerto of Mozart. In addition to these pieces the programme begins with two movements from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony and closes with the "Ballet of the Sylphs and the "Rakoczy March" from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust." Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the music of Haydn, Mendelssohn and Stravinsky, while Mr. Burgin took over the baton for the directing of that of Mozart and Berlioz.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

GLOBE Dec. 19

Burgin and Boettcher Heard as Soloists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday afternoon the first of its annual series of concerts for young people. The program, which will be repeated today at 4, included two movements from Haydn's "Surprise Symphony,'" the andante from Mendelssohn's violin concerto, with Richard Burgin as soloist; Stravinsky's "Petruchka;" the larghetto from a horn concerto by Mozart, with Georg Boettcher as soloist, and the "Dance of the Sylphs" and Hungarian march from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust."

Mr Koussevitzky conducted the first three numbers, Mr Burgin the remaining two. Alfred H. Meyer gave brief explanatory remarks, illustrated by stereopticon slides, before each number. An audience which by exception did not fill the hall listened eagerly and applauded enthusiastically. The week before Christmas is not the most suitable time for such concerts.

Mr Meyer avoided in his comments the annoying fault of most explanatory speakers to the young of trying to read a story into music written to be heard as music. What he said was clear, brief, free from pedantry, full of good sense, and not without the saving grace of humor.

Mr Koussevitzky, who has not conducted at these concerts in recent seasons, entered into the spirit of the occasion, and put plenty of life and energy into his interpretations. Mr Burgin and Mr Boettcher, both leading members of the orchestra, played with the expected admirable artistry The programs reminded the audience that phonograph records of the Boston Symphony's performance of "Petruchka" have just been issued. It is music in which Mr Koussevitzky excels.

Mr Burgin conducted with his usual skill. The program this time was better chosen than most if the purpose of these concerts is to introduce young people to the best orchestral music old and new. No Grieg, no Liadov, no third rate music. "Petruchka" may baffle some elders still, but it is going to be a classic within the lifetime of the young people in yesterday's audience. Seats for today's concert may still be had at the box office. Adults not accompanied by children are not admitted.

THE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

Ernest Bloch's "America: an Epic Rhapsody in three parts" will be performed this week by five leading orchestras of the country. The Philharmonic Society of New York will play it this afternoon. Boston will hear it tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe choir will be the chorus for the end of the Rhapsody. The composer hopes that the audience will also lift up their voices in patriotic strains. Will Mr. Koussevitzky give the word by saying: "The congregation will now rise and sing 'America'"?

The score contains several quotations from Walt Whitman, which reminds us that Mr. Marc Blitzstein of Philadelphia has composed "Four Coon-Shouts" with texts taken from Whitman's "Children of Adam." Then are to be performed in New York on Dec. 30.

Bach's concerto for violin, two flutes and strings, which had been announced for performance is put over till next week; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony is substituted for it, Ravel's "The Waltz" will be played instead of the "Spanish Rhapsody."

The program for next week will comprise Bach's concerto just mentioned, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Ernest Toch and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." The pianist will be Mr. Sanroma, who has returned from a year's study in Europe. He played the piano part when Mr. Koussevitzky introduced the concerto in Paris at his concert on the 24th of last May. The Parisian critics then praised Mr. Sanroma's playing, praised it warmly.

Vladimir Horowitz will play the piano in Symphony hall next Sunday afternoon: music by Bach-Busoni, Chopin, Debussy, Ravel and five pieces by Liszt, among them "Funerailles" and the "Mephisto" waltz. The English singers that night and in the same hall have for their program a list of Christmas carols. By the way, "The Oxford Book of Carols" compiled by Percy Dearmer, Vaughan Williams and Martin Shaw, published by the Oxford University Press, is remarkable for text and music, also for excellent preface and the many historical notes.

The People's Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wendt, conductor—he has put life by his careful and encouraging rehearsing into the players—will give a concert next Sunday afternoon at the Hotel Statler. Rosabelle Temple has for her subject at the Boston Public Library at 8 P. M., "Famous Hymns and How to Sing Them." At Ford hall (7:30 P. M.) the Paderson concert ensemble (violins, 'cello, flute, clarinet, trumpet, piano), will play. Next week beginning Christmas night, an Italian opera company from New York will perform operas by Verdi, Gounod, Leoncavallo and Mascagni at the Boston Opera House.

46

TRANS, Dec 19

The Sci

Concert-Chronicle

New Departures

FROM six to sixteen—incidental adults aside—ranged the listeners at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. A few were so young that they slipped from their seats, propped their chins on the chairs in front; saw and heard as those absorbed in signs and wonders. At the other extreme, a few more would have been equally in place at the regular Symphony Concerts. As good little Americans, one and all "knew what they liked" and, being still in the candid years, did not hesitate to express that liking. Rhythm and sonority gave them most pleasure. They preferred the light-footed, brightly accented Finale of Haydn's Symphony in G major to the graces of the slow movement and the humor (such as it is) of the interrupting drum-stroke. They relaxed—as they will be saying when they are a bit older—while Mr. Burgin upon the violin and Mr. Boettcher upon the horn played suave, slow-paced measures from Mendelssohn and Mozart. Stravinsky's orchestra, resounding through fragments of "Petrushka," snapping or stamping out the rhythms, held them tense again. Loudly they clapped; yet loudest of all after Berlioz's "Rákóczy March" had fretted their nerves and clamored in their ears. Seemingly this young audience cares little for soloists; prefers the full orchestra to sample instruments; listens with its manners to tonal niceties; is "up and a-coming" when sonority and rhythm beat high. Thirty years ago youngsters were natural Wagnerians because they heard his music without prepossessions. Nowadays, being equally free from prejudice, they are natural modernists.

Usually the audience at these Children's Concerts is restless and talkative. Yesterday it was interested and still. Usually it goes home as from a study-hour. Yesterday it departed chattering and in spirits. The reasons were plain. Through a year or two past these youngsters' matinées have lapsed into routine. Now they were intelligently freshened. Over a screen went pictures of Haydn, Mozart, violins and horns; of personages and incidents in "Petrushka" each pat to the moment. Meanwhile from the stage Mr. Alfred Meyer talked familiarly of composers, instruments and the piece in hand; at the pauses in Stravinsky's ballet re-told amusingly the fable of the amorous puppets, the showman and the Russian folk. He did not "talk down" to the children; consequently they "took to him." Finally, Mr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Burgin led the orchestra through the several numbers as though they were playing to an audience of connoisseurs. Youngsters of the radio and the records knew at last how a living orchestra really sounds. If they had half an ear—and most of them had two whole ones—no wonder they clapped their hands. Another such matinée and there will be fewer empty seats than yesterday.

The interlopers of middle age also had their reflections—over Mr. Boettcher, for example. He is a horn-player of the first rank, skillful, sensitive, musician through and through, notable addition to the orchestra. Yesterday he gilded Mozart's trifle. There are other and richer concertos for horn—Strauss's, for example; through years such a piece has not been heard at the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Boettcher—and Mr. Koussevitzky—have their opportunity. Yesterday, as well, for the first time within the longest memory, the orchestra sat not in tiers, but on a single level. By first impression the tone gained in clarity, euphony, unanimity. For Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn it seemed the purer. Whatever the piece, it reached the ear close-woven, fine-textured. Not in layers or from groups did it come but from an orchestra one and indivisible. Evidently, Mr. Koussevitzky is consi[dering] H. T. P.

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Bloch's prize-piece—the new Symphonic Rhapsody, "America"—exacts diligent preparation. Into the finale a chorus must be fitted. Therefore Mr. Koussevitzky has returned to repertory numbers for the first part of the Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday: Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Satie's "Gymnopédies" as originally announced; Ravel's "The Waltz," as unescapable, year in and year out, in Boston as it is in Paris.

Mr. Sanromá, wearing a new aspect of young maturity, has returned from his studies in Europe. At the Symphony Concerts of next week, he will play Toch's Piano-Concerto; on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 12, in Jordan Hall, venture a recital of his own. Toch, a new composer hereabouts, is a German modernist who has dared to turn a concerto into music witty and gay.

Mme. Honegger will come with her husband to America; in Boston and elsewhere play the solo-part in his Concertino for Piano and Orchestra. . . Mr. Gieseking, the pianist, may be expected for a single concert in Boston—on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 20, in Symphony Hall.

Dec. 19
Herald

THE

MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

The first of The Young People's Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Andante and Finale from the "Surprise" Symphony. Mendelssohn, Andante from the violin concerto (Mr. Burgin, violinist). Stravinsky, Orchestral Suite from "Petrouchka." Mozart, Larghetto from the horn concerto No. 3 (Mr. Boettcher, soloist). Berlioz, Ballet of the Sylphs and Rakoczy March from "The Damnation of Faust." Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the first three numbers. Mr. Burgin the last two. Alfred H. Meyer made short explanatory remarks in a pleasant manner and evidently interested the children as they were told something about the composers, the works that were played; different musical forms and instruments. Pictures were thrown on a screen; those illustrative of "Petrouchka" were helpful in enabling the children to enjoy Stravinsky's music. The experiment of putting the orchestra on a flat stage was made.

Might it not be well to have some "Skyscrapers" and "Adventures of a Perambulator" pictorially illustrated for the audiences of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening? Mr. Block's "America," to be played this week might thus be elucidated.

The program of yesterday does not call for comment except, perhaps, a note about Mozart's concerto for horn. He hurriedly wrote four of them for Leitgeb, a virtuoso on this instrument, but not at all a good musician; so that Mozart on the score of the first concerto wrote ironical remarks with reference to the player's lack of musicianly qualities.

The question might come up: What are the best compositions for a concert of this nature? This question admits of academic discussion. Children are the most easily pleased first of all by lively rhythms and great bursts of sound. (A noisy ending appeals to all audiences, old or young.) Yesterday, for example, there was much more applause after the gay Finale of Mozart's symphony than after the preceding Andante. They were pleased by Mr. Burgin's suave performance of Mendelssohn's genteel music. Did they fully appreciate Mr. Boettcher's beautiful tone? In their appreciation of Stravinsky's ballet they were greatly aided by the droll pictures on the screen. Would the young ones care for Bizet's little Suite with playthings and games, the titles of the movements? In these days "Alice in Wonderland" is relished more by parents than by their children.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon.

YOUNG PEOPLE AT SYMPHONY

Bos. Post Dec. 19

Stereopticon Is Used as Means to Aid Interest

Yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock Symphony Hall was largely filled with an assemblage of young people, many of them about to have their first glimpse of Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And at the conclusion of the first number it was clear from audible comments that the youngest generation of our concert-goers is no less appreciative than its elders of the magnetic presence of Mr. Koussevitzky upon the conductor's podium.

There were other innovations yesterday at the first of the season's opening pair of Young People's Concerts, the second of which, with the same programme, befalls this afternoon at the same hour. Not only did Mr. Koussevitzky make his first appearance of some seasons in this series, but stereopticon slides were also added to the purely musical features of the programme, while replacing the brief programme-notes of the past few seasons there were spoken comments and explanations by Mr. Alfred H. Myer, admirably adapted to his auditors and effectively illustrated by these slides. Furthermore these remarks of Mr. Meyer's came before each individual movement of suite or symphony, so that there was no necessity for carrying information too long in the mind before bringing it to bear upon the music concerned. Altogether an excellent arrangement.

There were also soloists yesterday afternoon, as there will be today: Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the orchestra in the Andante of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerta, Bernard Zighera in the incidental piano solo in Stravinsky's orchestral suite drawn from his ballet "Petrushka," and Georg Boettcher as player of the French horn in third Horn Concerto of Mozart. In addition to these pieces the programme begins with two movements from Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony and closes with the "Ballet of the Sylphs and the "Rakoczy March" from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust." Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the music of Haydn, Mendelssohn and Stravinsky, while Mr. Burgin took over the baton for the directing of that of Mozart and Berlioz.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

GLOBE Dec. 19

Burgin and Boettcher Heard as Soloists

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday afternoon the first of its annual series of concerts for young people. The program, which will be repeated today at 4, included two movements from Haydn's "Surprise Symphony,'" the andante from Mendelssohn's violin concerto, with Richard Burgin as soloist; Stravinsky's "Petruchka;" the larghetto from a horn concerto by Mozart, with Georg Boettcher as soloist, and the "Dance of the Sylphs" and Hungarian march from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust."

Mr Koussevitzky conducted the first three numbers, Mr Burgin the remaining two. Alfred H. Meyer gave brief explanatory remarks, illustrated by stereopticon slides, before each number. An audience which by exception did not fill the hall listened eagerly and applauded enthusiastically. The week before Christmas is not the most suitable time for such concerts.

Mr Meyer avoided in his comments the annoying fault of most explanatory speakers to the young of trying to read a story into music written to be heard as music. What he said was clear, brief, free from pedantry, full of good sense, and not without the saving grace of humor.

Mr Koussevitzky, who has not conducted at these concerts in recent seasons, entered into the spirit of the occasion, and put plenty of life and energy into his interpretations. Mr Burgin and Mr Boettcher, both leading members of the orchestra, played with the expected admirable artistry The programs reminded the audience that phonograph records of the Boston Symphony's performance of "Petruchka" have just been issued. It is music in which Mr Koussevitzky excels.

Mr Burgin conducted with his usual skill. The program this time was better chosen than most if the purpose of these concerts is to introduce young people to the best orchestral music old and new. No Grieg, no Liadov, no third rate music. "Petruchka" may baffle some elders still, but it is going to be a classic within the lifetime of the young people in yesterday's audience. Seats for today's concert may still be had at the box office. Adults not accompanied by children are not admitted.

THE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

Ernest Bloch's "America: an Epic Rhapsody in three parts" will be performed this week by five leading orchestras of the country. The Philharmonic Society of New York will play it this afternoon. Boston will hear it tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe choir will be the chorus for the end of the Rhapsody. The composer hopes that the audience will also lift up their voices in patriotic strains. Will Mr. Koussevitzky give the word by saying: "The congregation will now rise and sing 'America'"?

The score contains several quotations from Walt Whitman, which reminds us that Mr. Marc Blitzstein of Philadelphia has composed "Four Coon-Shouts" with texts taken from Whitman's "Children of Adam." Then are to be performed in New York on Dec. 30.

Bach's concerto for violin, two flutes and strings, which had been announced for performance is put over till next week; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony is substituted for it, Ravel's "The Waltz" will be played instead of the "Spanish Rhapsody."

The program for next week will comprise Bach's concerto just mentioned, a concerto for piano and orchestra by Ernest Toch and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." The pianist will be Mr. Sanroma, who has returned from a year's study in Europe. He played the piano part when Mr. Koussevitzky introduced the concerto in Paris at his concert on the 24th of last May. The Parisian critics then praised Mr. Sanroma's playing, praised it warmly.

Vladimir Horowitz will play the piano in Symphony hall next Sunday afternoon: music by Bach-Busoni, Chopin, Debussy, Ravel and five pieces by Liszt, among them "Funerailles" and the "Mephisto" waltz. The English singers that night and in the same hall have for their program a list of Christmas carols. By the way, "The Oxford Book of Carols" compiled by Percy Dearmer, Vaughan Williams and Martin Shaw, published by the Oxford University Press, is remarkable for text and music, also for excellent preface and the many historical notes.

The People's Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wendt, conductor—he has put life by his careful and encouraging rehearsing into the players—will give a concert next Sunday afternoon at the Hotel Statler. Rosabelle Temple has for her subject at the Boston Public Library at 8 P. M., "Famous Hymns and How to Sing Them." At Ford hall (7:30 P. M.) the Paderson concert ensemble (violins, 'cello, flute, clarinet, trumpet, piano), will play. Next week beginning Christmas night, an Italian opera company from New York will perform operas by Verdi, Gounod, Leoncavallo and Mascagni at the Boston Opera House.

Music and Musicians --- Plays and Players

A Rhapsody On America From Bloch

The Prize-Piece To Be Played This Week in Boston and Four Other Cities

IT IS no longer news that today, tomorrow and Saturday, five of the principal orchestras in the United States will play for the first times: "America, An Epic Rhapsody in Three Parts," written by Ernest Bloch. These orchestras are the Philharmonic in New York under the venerable Damrosch; the Philadelphia with Mr. Gabrilowitsch as guest-conductor; the Boston, the Chicago and the San Francisco with Messrs. Koussevitzky, Stock and Hertz at their several posts. Mr. Bloch's score won the prize of $3000—compare the sum with the preposterous Atterberg's $10,000!—offered three years ago to American composers by the weekly journal, Musical America, for an orchestral piece of symphonic dimensions, that was to be "a really representative work, one which will be to American music what the standard German, French and Russian works for orchestra are to the music of those countries." Musical America also undertook, as far as might be, "to assure the continuance of the successful work in the repertories of the leading American orchestras." Only the future may determine such permanence. For the present, and within a month, twelve orchestras in as many different cities will play "America" twice—large and rare fortune for a new piece.

Ninety-two scores were submitted. The judges were Messrs. Damrosch, Hertz, Koussevitzky, Stock, Stokowski, conductors all. The labor of examining so large a number of scores, the delays in sending them from examiner to examiner, made it impossible to secure decision and performance at the date first planned—about a year ago. The judgment in favor of "America" was unanimous. And Mr. Bloch's residence in America is a matter of a mere twelve years, his citizenhip of five! (He was born a Swiss Jew.) In enthusiasm for his adopted country, however, no native son tops him.

The first fly-leaf, in addition to the title, contains Walt Whitman's line, "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you." The second fly-leaf contains the dedication and a sort of preface by the composer:

> This symphony has been written in love for this country, in reverence to its past—in faith in its future. It is dedicated to the memory of Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, whose vision has upheld its inspiration.
>
> The ideals of America are imperishable. They embody the future credo of all mankind, a Union, in common purpose and under willingly accepted guidance, of widely diversified races, ultimately to become one race, strong and great. But, as Walt Whitman has said, "To hold men together by paper and seal or by compulsion is of no account. That only holds men together which aggregates all in a living principle, as the hold of the limbs of the body or the fibres of plants."
>
> Though this symphony is not dependent on a program, the composer wants to emphasize that he has been inspired by this very ideal.
>
> The anthem which concludes the work as its apotheosis, symbolizes the Destiny, the Mission of America. The symphony is entirely built upon it. From the first bar it appears, in root, dimly, slowly, taking shape, rising, falling, developing, and finally asserting itself victoriously in complete and decisive form.
>
> It is the hope of the composer that this anthem will become known and beloved, that the audience will rise to sing it, becoming thus an active and enthusiastic part of the work and its message of faith and hope.

It may be said at once that in Boston on Friday and Saturday the youth of Harvard and Radcliffe will sing this apotheosis-anthem. The scoring of the rhapsody is for the usual large orchestra of the present, including organ and four kettledrums. The percussion section calls for three players to manipulate: "Side-drum; tambourine, two bass-hrums, cymbals, tamtam, triangle, woodbox, Indian drum, glockenspiel, a bell in D, two anvils (one higher than the other) struck with a heavy hammer, one automobile horn ad lib, and in D-flat.

"It came to me on the steamer"—Mr. Bloch has been quoted as saying—when I arrived in New York Harbor in August, 1916. I felt the spirit of the country, and saw that an old English drinking song was not fit for the song of America. I wanted to write an Anthem that should rightfully belong to and reflect the country for which it might stand." When the competition was announced, the idea which had ever since been more or less in Mr. Bloch's mind, took shape in its present form. Sketches were complete by July, 1926, and the final score was completed on Washington's Birthday, 1927. The composer concludes: "A friend for whom I played the score said to me, 'It will make the name of America more beloved.' If it does, that is my prize."

For Mr. Gilman of the New York Herald Tribune Mr. Bloch wrote enlighteningly:

> I have never been preoccupied by being "new" (the new of today is old tomorrow), but by being true. And this Rhapsody is just the culmination. It is not different, in impulse and necessity, from all I have done. It is a part of my "Weltanschauung"—only the form and the "cadre" are different. In my "Psalms" I expressed my ultimate faith in the world—or, rather, in justice, as well as in Israel. My first Symphony (1901) held already this conviction that life could be possible and beautiful, when man decides at last to manage the planet. He has not learned that yet! And if he does not hurry, he may destroy, by his greed and stupidity, this mediocre little earth, which turns around a fifteenth-rate sun! In "Schelomo," alone of all my works, I ended in despair. And, at times, I am like Schelomo myself. But to others, to people, to poor struggling humanity, one must give a message of hope and faith.
>
> This I have tried to do in "America," in America's own language. No more as a Jew (though all my Jewish works are written rather by a man with Jewish roots than by a limited Hebrew), but as a man alone. I wrote it in such a way that any bootblack may understand it. Highbrows will hate me the more. I do not care! As long as I can live in a stable, and look at the mountains, and get my message out of me, I am rich.
>
> "America," then, is again a symbol (like my other works). But only when I am dead, or when (if my health gets better) I have written the few works I have still to get out, will people understand the unity of all my productions. It is too soon now, and there are too many fads and discordant voices of acrobats and virtuosi, and "professors" and theories and ratiocination, to allow them to see with their eyes, to hear with their ears, to feel with their souls. Only very few. . . . But these few count."

A motif of an ascending and descending forth, rhythmed to suit the word "America" is used as a motto throughout the Rhapsody. From it eventually the Anthem is developed. Throughout also appear various forms of what writers are pleased to call American folk-material. At the bottom of the pages all these sources are noted; along with running commentary, partly in quotations from Whitman, partly in captions for the successive divisions of the music. Though the composer assures us that this need not be printed in a program-book, that the Rhapsody will be understood without these helps, nevertheless they define it so completely that quotation seems inevitable. (Messrs. Birchard in Boston and New York are the publishers. The full score may be had at large or in miniature. The Anthem, to be reprinted in this place on Saturday next, may be had separately in a leaflet.) First, however, let us view the work broadly through the titles and subtitles of the three movements:

I.—"1620." The Soil—The Indians—England—The Mayflower—The Landing ot the Pilgrims.

II.—"1861-1865. Hours of Joy—Hours of Sorrow

> I hear America singing, the varied carols I hear. . . .
> Each singing what belongs to him or her and to no one else. . . .
> Singing with open mouths their strong melodious songs. [Walt Whitman

III.—"1926." The Present—The Future. . . .

> "As he sees the farthest he has the most faith." [Walt Whitman

The movement of "The Soil" begins poco lento—misterioso—with muted string-chords tremulando. The "America" motto is at once heard in the basses. Soon we come to the section devoted to the Indians, subdivided as Indian Life, "Organizing a War Party," a Death Song. Woven into the score are Indian Pueblo Songs from New Mexico, Mandan and Hidasta songs, Chippewa songs of war, of death, of love. The first Pueblo Song should be especially noted, as it is not very graceful, but will recur later in the Rhapsody.

In the transition to the English episode we hear the same mysterious chords as at the beginning; also the "America" motto. This division is an old English March, stirring in rhythm and bright in orchestral coloring. The motto is heard as "The Call to America," with accompanying chords a little less mysterious. There are poignant harmonies over "Struggles and Hardships"; eventually a horn sings an "Old Chantey," which develops into a broad and noble climax. "At Sea" is a little less turbulent. With shouts of joy (and the motto). "Land in Sight." The motto has now grown to a two-fold exclamation, "America! America!" exactly as it will appear later in the anthem. "Loneliness" follows in "tempo iniziale," with the first Pueblo Songs, interlarded with bright "Memories of England."

The composer leads us through "Struggles, Hardships Ahead" in sombre sonorities; "Building up a Nation"; "The Love of The Soil Comes into the Hearts of "The Pilgrims" (the motto in minor tonalities); to "In God we Trust," to the tune of "Old Hundred"—and suspicions of "Yankee Doodle." There is a brief reminiscence of the first Pueblo Song. Then five measures of "Faint Hopes in the Future," harmonies of harp and muted strings in conclusion.

At the beginning of the second movement an English horn unaccompanied sings an old ballad typifying "The South." Four solo strings join in. More voices are added, all "solo" until a chamber orchestra of sixteen instruments is playing. Massed strings [illegible] Negro folk-song, "Row After Row." A lullaby follows, and an oboe sings the motto "America" expressively. There is a considerable secton devoted to "Old Folks at Home," which ends in a Virginia reel to the tune "Pop Goes the Weasel." (Why is this title not listed in the score, along with the rest?) It is still going its round when "Hail, Columbia" is heard; after which strings and oboe play the motto, now with a second line (as in the Anthem) added. Always to the accompaniment of "Pop."

An entirely new division begins with enticing accompanimental dance rhythms. The reader suspects something Spanish and soon discovers the presence of a Creole folk-song, heard from the oboe. Into an exotic dance it grows, at the height of which, over the caption "Songs of the Civil War," come "Dixie," and soon the motto tossed frantically back and forth in the brass. There follows a full-bodied contrapuntal mélange in which strings play "John Brown's Body," wood-winds continue "Dixie," upper brasses the "Battle Cry of Freedom," lower brasses "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys Are Marching." More and more martial the music grows. There are echoes of the war songs. Then "After the Battle" the ballad for English horn at the beginning of the movement re-enters more solemnly; trumpets sing the new "America" as far as Mr. Bloch has developed it. In the score is another quotation from Whitman: "For my enemy is dead, a man divine as myself is dead." A few measures later we read the same poet's exclamation, "My captain! My captain!" On the last page amid dolorous chords, Bloch's own notation, "O! bleeding America."

The third movement begins allegro con spirito, "Present time." Bloch paints a hotly colored, vividly rhythmed, percussion-marked picture. What is his own mental slant when he throws upon this background the negro folk-songs, "I Went to the Hop Joint" and "The Coon-can Game" with their delicious grace notes and slides, their jazzed syncopations? "Turmoil of present time"—material "prosperity"—Speed—Noise. Is this a representation of or a satire on a large body of present-day music? At the height of it Bloch writes, "America's Call of Distress"—the motto inserted shriekingly into the climax. The first of the two negro songs returns for fuller development. A section "Frenetico," in several keys, in a raucous din leads to the "Inevitable Collapse." There is a shuddering decrescendo, and above Whitman's lines: "Give me solitude, give me Nature, give me again, O Nature, your primal sanities," the English horn sings again the Pueblo Song at the beginning of the first movement and with the same mysterious tremulando accompaniment.

There follows the "Call of America" with Whitman's lines, "Then turn, and be not alarmed, O Libertad—turn your undying face to where the future, greater than all the past is swiftly, surely preparing for you." "Man's Introspection" leads to "Reconstruction" beginning with "The Mastery of Man over the Machines, his Environment, and Himself"—a passage in which a harsh polytonal accompaniment figure dissolves gradually into conventional harmonies—and Ernest Bloch saying to himself, "I have charged myself, heeded or unheeded, to compose a march for these States." This whole section is a gradual expansion and gradual climactic ascent to the Anthem which is to "apotheosis. When he has reached a high point in this ascent, Bloch quotes,

> Over the carnage rose prophetic a voice:
> Be not disheartened, affection shall solve the problems of Freedom yet;
> Those who love each other shall become invincible,
> They shall yet make Columbia victorious,
> Sons of the Mother of All, you shall yet be victorious,
> You shall yet laugh to scorn the attacks of all the remainder of the earth.

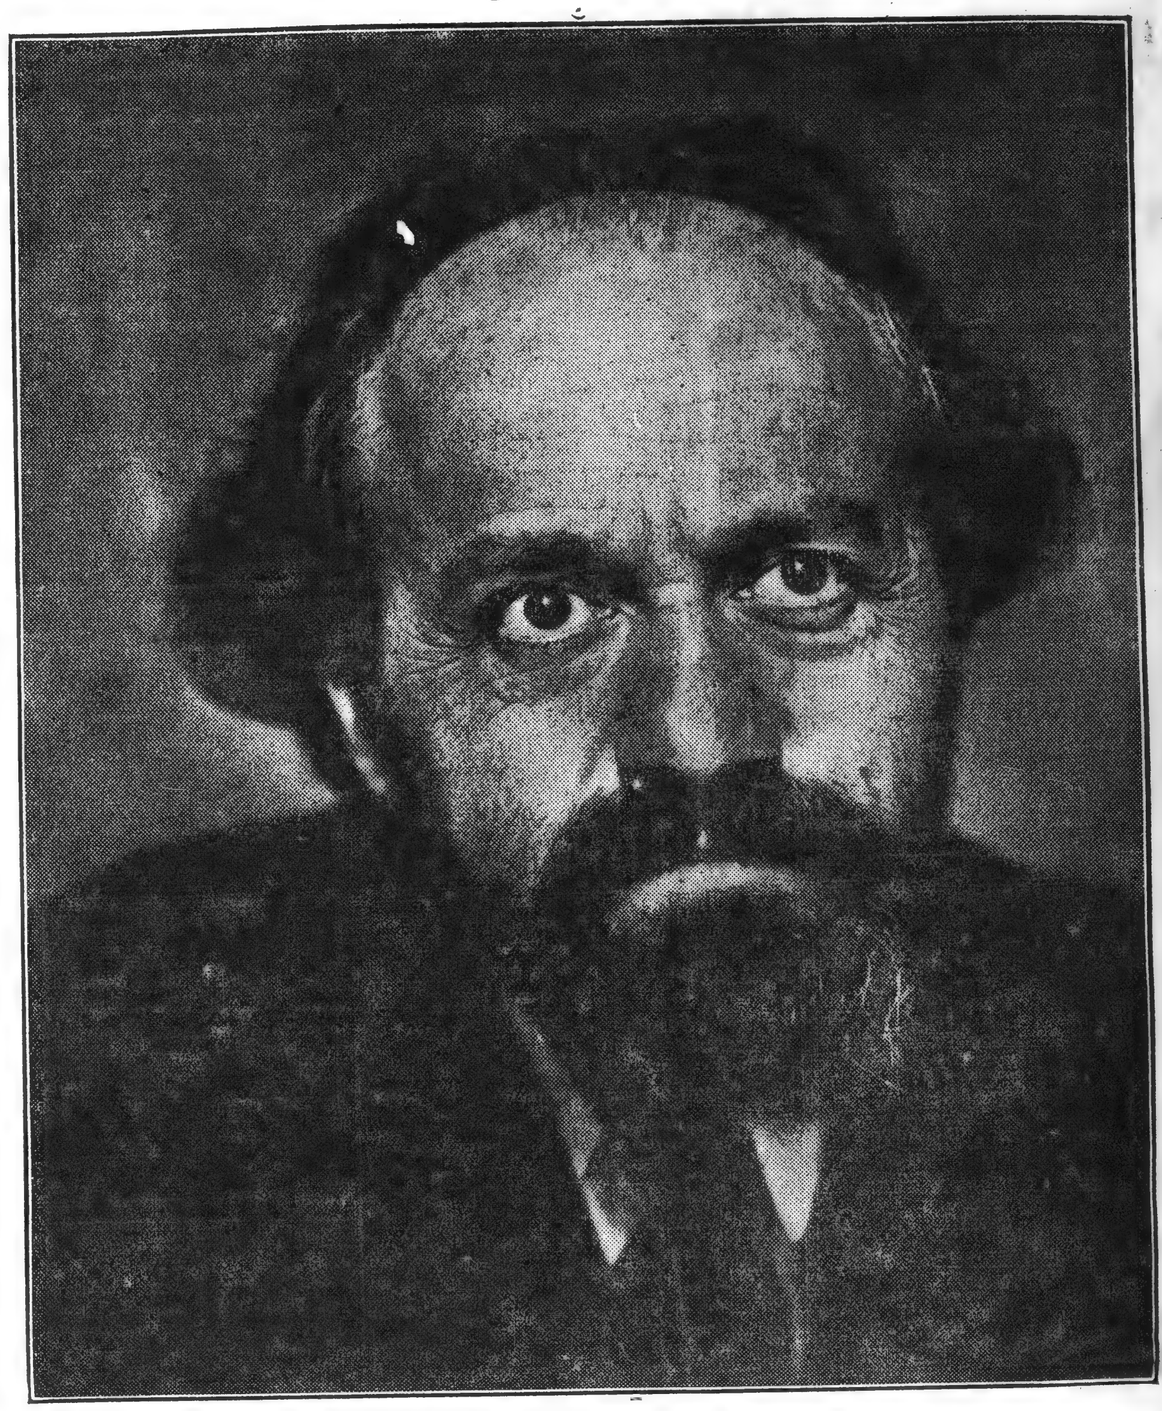
Then, twice more the motto as America's Call to the Nations of the World after which Whitman's line: "See . . . immigrants continually coming and landing . . ." as the ascent continues higher and higher, again "Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow," "Dixie," a sudden "tranquillo" which is but a final taking of breath before the supreme climax. Now the composer directs, "Here the people rise to sing the Anthem." After which the score contains a staff for "The People," who sing.

> America! America! Thy name is in my heart
> My love for thee arouses me to nobler thoughts and deeds.
> Our fathers builded a nation
> To give us Justice and Peace,
> Toward higher aims, toward brighter goals,
> Toward Freedom of all mankind.
> Our hearts we pledge, America,
> To stand by thee, to give to thee
> Our strength, our faiths, and our lives.
>
> A. H. B.

For various reasons Mr. Horowitz has cancelled his concert at Symphony Hall announced for next Sunday afternoon. He will give it, instead, on Friday afternoon, Jan. 4. Tickets hold good.

Continued on Following Page

His Strength and His Faith



Ernest Bloch

Composer of The Symphonic Rhapsody, "America"

(From an Autographed Photograph Lent by Boaz Piller of The Symphony Orchestra)

Music News of the Wo

Bloch's "America"

By L. A. SLOPER

A NEW anthem to America has sounded this week in the concert rooms of five of the symphony orchestras of the United States; within a month it will have been heard in a dozen such halls. This anthem brings to a conclusion Ernest Bloch's "America," an Epic Rhapsody in three parts for orchestra, which was chosen unanimously from among 92 scores as the winner of a prize of $3000 offered by the periodical Musical America. The judges were five conductors: Messrs. Damrosch, Hertz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski and the performances of the present week were given by the orchestras which they direct in New York, San Francisco, Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia.

It is perhaps significant that Ernest Bloch should have been the author of a prize-winning musical epic of America. He is by origin a Swiss Jew who migrated to the United States in 1916, and has been an American citizen only since 1923. Further, as a composer he has been known as distinctly the spokesman in tones of his own ancient race, its trials and its aspirations. Thus some of his best-known works are "Three Jewish Poems"; "Psalms," for soprano and orchestra; the Symphony "Israel"; "Schelomo," a Hebraic Rhapsody for cello and orchestra. To some it may seem a strange thing indeed that such a man should assume the mantle of musical chronicler and prophet of the United States.

Chamber Music

But not all of Bloch's music has been Hebraic. Those who are familiar with chamber music he has written since arriving on western shores—his string quartet and his violin sonata—know a wider than racial aspect of him. Of the sonata the present commentator wrote in 1923:

"It seems to represent the struggle of the individual to escape the commercialized stamp of the standardized product. The first movement, with its savage percussive piano rhythms stamping out the ineffectual cries of the violin, may well be taken to represent the violence of mob opinion crushing the dissenter. The quiet but perturbed second movement seems to express the emotions of the victim, suppressed but unyielding. The final Moderato seems to portray again the desperate determination of the crowd to punish nonconformists; but it concludes with a restatement of the unconquerable faith of individualism. Whether any of these meanings was intended by the composer, it is evident that music which can release such thoughts must be the product of profound conviction which goes deeper than the largely racial impulse which seemed to motivate Bloch's 'Schelomo' and the 'Psalms.'" Clearly, Bloch has not within a few months, and merely at the prompting of a prize, overleaped the racial boundaries.

Bloch, indeed, is very devoted to his adoptive country. Like many others among the new Americans, he perhaps appreciates its opportunities more than some of its native sons. He is, too, besides being a poet in tones, a thinker, a student of society, of history and of government, a natural democrat and an idealist. He has scanned American history and poetry; he profoundly admires some of America's great men, in particular Lincoln and Walt Whitman. To them, "whose vision has upheld its inspiration," this composition is dedicated. "This symphony has been written in love for this country, in reverence to its past—in faith in its future."

And in any event, why should it seem odd that a Jewish-American should sing of America? The United States is no longer an Anglo-Saxon nation. People of Bloch's race constitute a considerable portion of its population. They have not only contributed to commercial and financial development; they have had a strong influence in its artistic growth; and in particular they hold today probably a predominant place in its musical life. Perhaps, then, it is singularly appropriate that one of them should appear as America's tonal laureate.

Program Music

Bloch's "America" will do for musical companion-piece to Stephen Vincent Benét's "John Brown's Body." On the flyleaf of the score, published by C. C. Birchard & Co., Bloch has written: "The Ideals of America are imperishable. They embody the future credo of all mankind: a Union, in common purpose and under willingly accepted guidance, of widely diversified races, ultimately to become one race, strong and great. But, as Walt Whitman has said: 'To hold men together by paper and seal, or by compulsion, is of no account. That only holds men together which aggregates all in a living principle, as the hold of the limbs of the body or the fibers of plants.' Though this symphony is not dependent on a program, the composer wants to emphasize that he has been inspired by this very ideal."

The composition seems, however, very definitely to be program music. The first movement carries the story up to 1620; the second covers the period of the Civil War; the third deals with the present and the future, concluding with the anthem of faith in America. This anthem, the composer explains, "symbolizes the Destiny, the Mission, of America. The Symphony is entirely built upon it. From the first bars it appears, in root, dimly, slowly taking shape, rising, falling, developing, and finally asserting itself victoriously in its complete and decisive form." The motif, or motto, of the anthem, appears on the very first page, as an ascending and descending fourth, and is heard recurrently in development throughout.

For his other material, Bloch has gone to sources, employing an old English march, a sea shanty, Indian dances, Negro tunes, popular songs. An American audience is constantly recognizing familiar strains: "The Old Folks at Home," "John Brown's Body," "Hail Columbia," even "Pop Goes the Weasel." Dangerous material; your ordinary composer could hardly employ it without being trivial, making a mere medley. Bloch has so interwoven the songs that a musical tapestry of much beauty results. The depiction of armed conflict by means of these themes in the second part of the rhapsody does perhaps recall the "1812" Overture, and may in time become a similar object of contumely; but at this stage the experiment seems justified.

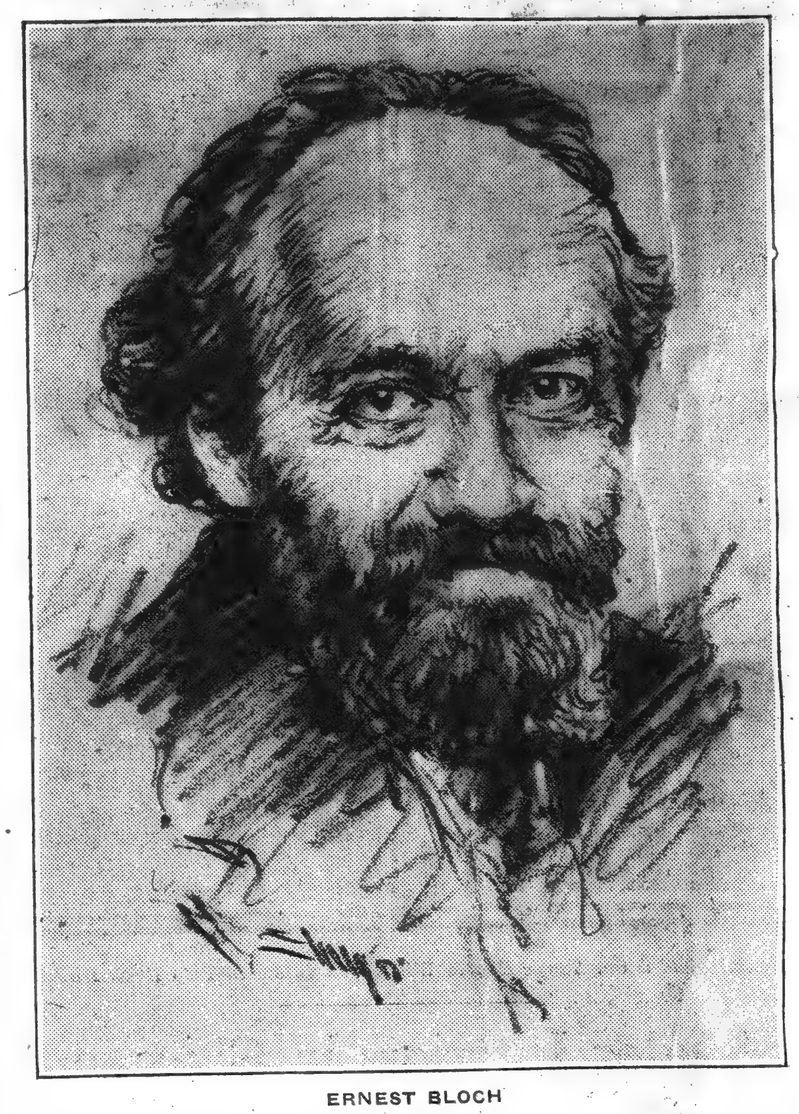
Captions, notes and directions by the composer and quotations from Walt Whitman are liberally scattered through the score. Bloch announces they are meant for guidance of the performers rather than for reproduction in programs; yet they would help the listener as well as the players to an understanding of the composer's purpose. The first section tells of the Soil, the Indians, then of old England, the Call of America, the passage, hardships, the landing, the forebodings and the faith in the future ("Old Hundred"). The second, after the passages already outlined, describes the mourning of the Nation at the close of the Civil War. The third, to depict "the present," is very jazzy and "blue" at the start. There are anvils, steel plates and an automobile horn to picture the turmoil of the period. "Material 'prosperity' —Speed—Noise—'Man Slave of the Machines,'" writes the composer at the foot of the page. Note that Bloch the idealist quotes "prosperity." After a long passage of this increasing violence, during which "America's Call of Distress" is heard, there comes "the inevitable collapse." Bloch cannot believe that such materialism can reign always. The descendant of a race of prophets looks to the future and speaks, again after Whitman: "Give me solitude, give me Nature, give me again, O Nature, your primal sanities!" Again the Call of America, and a gradual crescendo leading up to the affirmation of the anthem.

A History and an Augury

Such is Bloch's vision of America. A simple musical message, he considers it, understandable to everybody, except possibly the "highbrows" whom he disdains; at once a history and an augury in tones, a song of praise and hope. It expresses serene and noble beauty, impassioned revolt, assured faith. In conception and execution it warrants the qualification of "epic." The culminating anthem, being designed for the people to sing, is appropriately simple and stirring. Will it be adopted, as the composer hopes, by America? Will the work as a whole take a permanent place? It would be rash to attempt to answer these questions now.

The composer has reason to be grateful for the setting forth of his music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The work had been prepared with great care under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky. Its performance, which came after those of the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert and Ravel's "La Valse," was vibrant with eloquence. The slow building up of the climax in the final movement was masterly. The fresh, young voices of the collegians gave forth fervently the message to the Nation.

The composer hopes that this anthem "will become known and beloved, that the audience will rise to sing it." As it is not as yet sufficiently known, Mr. Koussevitzky probably was wise in refraining yesterday afternoon from inviting the audience of Symphony Hall to join in the singing. But the audience, either knowing what was expected of it or responding directly to the composer's emotion, rose of its own accord, and though it did not try to sing, remained standing until the work was finished, and lingered thereafter to applaud until the conductor called the performers to their feet to share the tribute.



ERNEST BLOCH

The Monitor Reader

(Answers to Questions Asked on The Next to the Last Page.)

1. An electric kitchen range.
2. "Don't swank, don't sneak, don't funk, don't grouse over failure, don't crow over success."
3. The engineless airplane.
4. Paris Salons, Cafes, Studios.
5. To preach the truth.
6. To teach English to children of all ages.
7. 7,707,252.
8. More than $5,000,000.
9. "The thing desired."
10. Julius Cæsar.

AMUSEMENTS

NEW YORK CITY

BOS DAILY ADVERTISER
DEC. 22—

Theaters

Bloch Rhapsody, 'America,' Heard at Symphony

Five orchestras in five cities unite this week in playing Ernest Bloch's prize rhapsody, "America." Naturally, it is new and noteworthy substance to stir Mr. Koussevitzky's ardor.

As played in Boston at the Symphony, it proved monumental music of many colors and many tongues. Back to 1620 goes Mr. Bloch for his first movement. Indian themes of the Southwest thread in and out the sombre rhythms, an old English march enters it, there is a capital chantey, a flourish of trumpets and finally a climax of more severity.

The second movement is the swords and roses of the old South. Creole folk song enter in, then Mr. Bloch borrows from Stephen Foster, "Pop Goes the Weasel" runs through the measure, "Suwanee River" is at hand, and so with a flourish of trumpets and drums "Dixie" breaks into the storm of Civil War. The whole ends amid dolorous chords.

Thence to the new America. Blues from Menphis, jazz from New Orleans, "We Went to the Hop Joint," start it off in swaggering style. It strides clear of jazz into brazen cacophony, it pales John Alden Carpenter and our moderns, it blares into noise and confusion, halts, swings back to a song of the Southwest again, breaks out at last into Mr. Bloch's new anthem with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe for vocal accompaniment.

A lesser man than Mr. Bloch would have made of all this no more nor less than a musical pastiche. But his artistry is such that he easily fits in folk song and ballad to the structure of its work. Walt Whitman is his literary model, he says, and sometimes, like Whitman, the work is dun colored, sombre and sterile.

Again, it rises to new heights for music of the American scene, the American mood. Throughout it is good workmanship, and one may say, as good a musical account of America as the present years are likely to see.

DEC 22 –

Music News of the Wo

Bloch's "America"

By L. A. SLOPER

A NEW anthem to America has sounded this week in the concert rooms of five of the symphony orchestras of the United States; within a month it will have been heard in a dozen such halls. This anthem brings to a conclusion Ernest Bloch's "America," an Epic Rhapsody in three parts for orchestra, which was chosen unanimously from among 92 scores as the winner of a prize of $3000 offered by the periodical Musical America. The judges were five conductors: Messrs. Damrosch, Hertz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski and the performances of the present week were given by the orchestras which they direct in New York, San Francisco, Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia.

It is perhaps significant that Ernest Bloch should have been the author of a prize-winning musical epic of America. He is by origin a Swiss Jew who migrated to the United States in 1916, and has been an American citizen only since 1923. Further, as a composer he has been known as distinctly the spokesman in tones of his own ancient race, its trials and its aspirations. Thus some of his best-known works are "Three Jewish Poems"; "Psalms," for soprano and orchestra; the Symphony "Israel"; "Schelomo," a Hebraic Rhapsody for cello and orchestra. To some it may seem a strange thing indeed that such a man should assume the mantle of musical chronicler and prophet of the United States.

Chamber Music

But not all of Bloch's music has been Hebraic. Those who are familiar with chamber music he has written since arriving on western shores—his string quartet and his violin sonata—know a wider than racial aspect of him. Of the sonata the present commentator wrote in 1923:

"It seems to represent the struggle of the individual to escape the commercialized stamp of the standardized product. The first movement, with its savage percussive piano rhythms stamping out the ineffectual cries of the violin, may well be taken to represent the violence of mob opinion crushing the dissenter. The quiet but perturbed second movement seems to express the emotions of the victim, suppressed but unyielding. The final Moderato seems to portray again the desperate determination of the crowd to punish nonconformists; but it concludes with a restatement of the unconquerable faith of individualism. Whether any of these meanings was intended by the composer, it is evident that music which can release such thoughts must be the product of profound conviction which goes deeper than the largely racial impulse which seemed to motivate Bloch's 'Schelomo' and the 'Psalms.'" Clearly, Bloch has not within a few months, and merely at the prompting of a prize, overleaped the racial boundaries.

Bloch, indeed, is very devoted to his adoptive country. Like many others among the new Americans, he perhaps appreciates its opportunities more than some of its native sons. He is, too, besides being a poet in tones, a thinker, a student of society, of history and of government, a natural democrat and an idealist. He has scanned American history and poetry; he profoundly admires some of America's great men, in particular Lincoln and Walt Whitman. To them, "whose vision has upheld its inspiration," this composition is dedicated. "This symphony has been written in love for this country, in reverence to its past—in faith in its future."

And in any event, why should it seem odd that a Jewish-American should sing of America? The United States is no longer an Anglo-Saxon nation. People of Bloch's race constitute a considerable portion of its population. They have not only contributed to commercial and financial development; they have had a strong influence in its artistic growth; and in particular they hold today probably a predominant place in its musical life. Perhaps, then, it is singularly appropriate that one of them should appear as America's tonal laureate.

Program Music

Bloch's "America" will do for musical companion-piece to Stephen Vincent Benét's "John Brown's Body." On the flyleaf of the score, published by C. C. Birchard & Co., Bloch has written: "The Ideals of America are imperishable. They embody the future credo of all mankind: a Union, in common purpose and under willingly accepted guidance, of widely diversified races, ultimately to become one race, strong and great. But, as Walt Whitman has said: 'To hold men together by paper and seal, or by compulsion, is of no account. That only holds men together which aggregates all in a living principle, as the hold of the limbs of the body or the fibers of plants.' Though this symphony is not dependent on a program, the composer wants to emphasize that he has been inspired by this very ideal."

The composition seems, however, very definitely to be program music. The first movement carries the story up to 1620; the second covers the period of the Civil War; the third deals with the present and the future, concluding with the anthem of faith in America. This anthem, the composer explains, "symbolizes the Destiny, the Mission, of America. The Symphony is entirely built upon it. From the first bars it appears, in root, dimly, slowly taking shape, rising, falling, developing, and finally asserting itself victoriously in its complete and decisive form." The motif, or motto, of the anthem, appears on the very first page, as an ascending and descending fourth, and is heard recurrently in development throughout.

For his other material, Bloch has gone to sources, employing an old English march, a sea shanty, Indian dances, Negro tunes, popular songs. An American audience is constantly recognizing familiar strains: "The Old Folks at Home," "John Brown's Body," "Hail Columbia," even "Pop Goes the Weasel." Dangerous material; your ordinary composer could hardly employ it without being trivial, making a mere medley. Bloch has so interwoven the songs that a musical tapestry of much beauty results. The depiction of armed conflict by means of these themes in the second part of the rhapsody does perhaps recall the "1812" Overture, and may in time become a similar object of contumely; but at this stage the experiment seems justified.

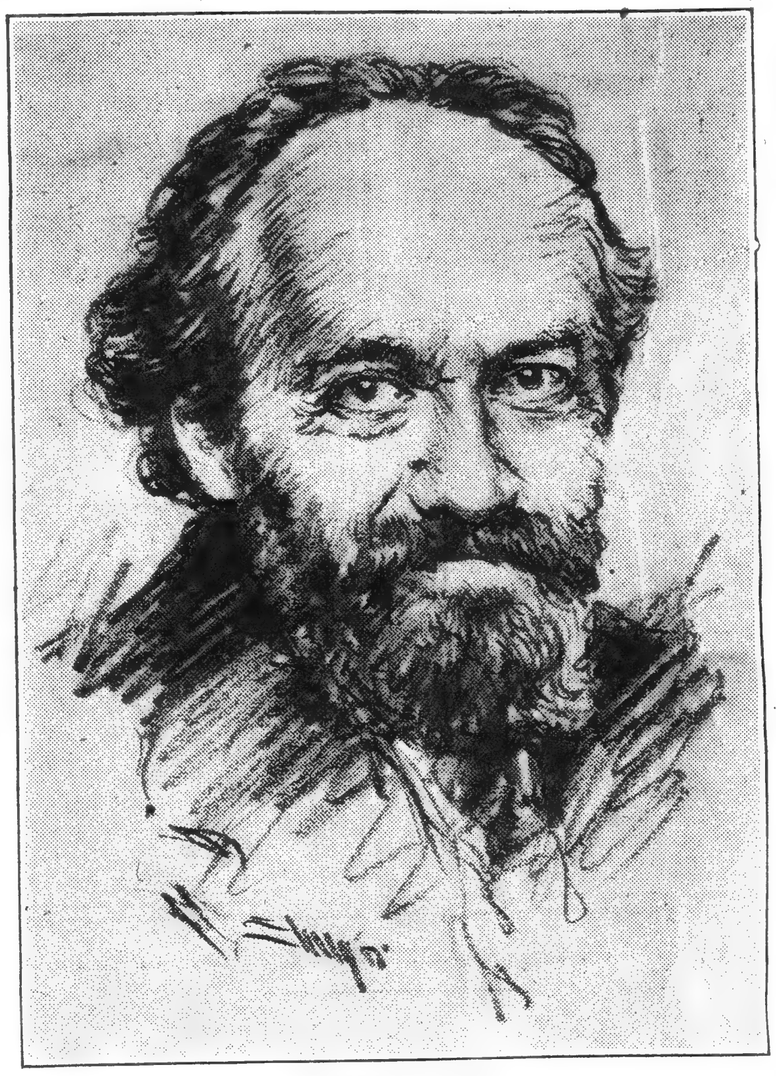
Captions, notes and directions by the composer and quotations from Walt Whitman are liberally scattered through the score. Bloch announces they are meant for guidance of the performers rather than for reproduction in programs; yet they would help the listener as well as the players to an understanding of the composer's purpose. The first section tells of the Soil, the Indians, then of old England, the Call of America, the passage, hardships, the landing, the forebodings and the faith in the future ("Old Hundred"). The second, after the passages already outlined, describes the mourning of the Nation at the close of the Civil War. The third, to depict "the present," is very jazzy and "blue" at the start. There are anvils, steel plates and an automobile horn to picture the turmoil of the period. "Material 'prosperity' —Speed—Noise—'Man Slave of the Machines,'" writes the composer at the foot of the page. Note that Bloch the idealist quotes "prosperity." After a long passage of this increasing violence, during which "America's Call of Distress" is heard, there comes "the inevitable collapse." Bloch cannot believe that such materialism can reign always. The descendant of a race of prophets looks to the future and speaks, again after Whitman: "Give me solitude, give me Nature, give me again, O Nature, your primal sanities!" Again the Call of America, and a gradual crescendo leading up to the affirmation of the anthem.

A History and an Augury

Such is Bloch's vision of America. A simple musical message, he considers it, understandable to everybody, except possibly the "highbrows" whom he disdains; at once a history and an augury in tones, a song of praise and hope. It expresses serene and noble beauty, impassioned revolt, assured faith. In conception and execution it warrants the qualification of "epic." The culminating anthem, being designed for the people to sing, is appropriately simple and stirring. Will it be adopted, as the composer hopes, by America? Will the work as a whole take a permanent place? It would be rash to attempt to answer these questions now.

The composer has reason to be grateful for the setting forth of his music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The work had been prepared with great care under the direction of Mr. Koussevitzky. Its performance, which came after those of the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert and Ravel's "La Valse," was vibrant with eloquence. The slow building up of the climax in the final movement was masterly. The fresh, young voices of the collegians gave forth fervently the message to the Nation.

The composer hopes that this anthem "will become known and beloved, that the audience will rise to sing it." As it is not as yet sufficiently known, Mr. Koussevitzky probably was wise in refraining yesterday afternoon from inviting the audience of Symphony Hall to join in the singing. But the audience, either knowing what was expected of it or responding directly to the composer's emotion, rose of its own accord, and though it did not try to sing, remained standing until the work was finished, and lingered thereafter to applaud until the conductor called the performers to their feet to share the tribute.



ERNEST BLOCH

The Monitor Reader

(Answers to Questions Asked on The Next to the Last Page.)

1. An electric kitchen range.
2. "Don't swank, don't sneak, don't funk, don't grouse over failure, don't crow over success."
3. The engineless airplane.
4. Paris Salons, Cafes, Studios.
5. To preach the truth.
6. To teach English to children of all ages.
7. 7,707,252.
8. More than $5,000,000.
9. "The thing desired."
10. Julius Cæsar.

AMUSEMENTS

NEW YORK CITY

BOS DAILY ADVERTISER
DEC. 22 –

Theaters

Bloch Rhapsody, 'America,' Heard at Symphony

Five orchestras in five cities unite this week in playing Ernest Bloch's prize rhapsody, "America." Naturally, it is new and noteworthy substance to stir Mr. Koussevitzky's ardor.

As played in Boston at the Symphony, it proved monumental music of many colors and many tongues. Back to 1620 goes Mr. Bloch for his first movement. Indian themes of the Southwest thread in and out the sombre rhythms, an old English march enters it, there is a capital chantey, a flourish of trumpets and finally a climax of more severity.

The second movement is the swords and roses of the old South. Creole folk song enter in, then Mr. Bloch borrows from Stephen Foster, "Pop Goes the Weasel" runs through the measure, "Suwanee River" is at hand, and so with a flourish of trumpets and drums "Dixie" breaks into the storm of Civil War. The whole ends amid dolorous chords.

Thence to the new America. Blues from Menphis, jazz from New Orleans, "We Went to the Hop Joint," start it off in swaggering style. It strides clear of jazz into brazen cacophony, it pales John Alden Carpenter and our moderns, it blares into noise and confusion, halts, swings back to a song of the Southwest again, breaks out at last into Mr. Bloch's new anthem with the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe for vocal accompaniment.

A lesser man than Mr. Bloch would have made of all this no more nor less than a musical pastiche. But his artistry is such that he easily fits in folk song and ballad to the structure of its work. Walt Whitman is his literary model, he says, and sometimes, like Whitman, the work is dun colored, sombre and sterile.

Again, it rises to new heights for music of the American scene, the American mood. Throughout it is good workmanship, and one may say, as good a musical account of America as the present years are likely to see.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

I.0

I.1

I.25

I.4

I.6

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Dec. 22. Symphony --- Globe Dec 22

Ernest Bloch In Rhapsody Upon America

TRANSCRIPT

To the Symphony Concerts Comes His Prize-Piece, For Better, For Worse

ERNEST BLOCH is a romantic idealist. In these days they are not many. Being such, he is simple of spirit, visionary, fervent, almost to fanaticism. Being such again, he chooses the vast conception, the manifold, far-spreading implication. Setting a title to his new symphonic piece, played yesterday afternoon by Mr Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, he does not hesitate to use the word "epic." Most of us, schooled to discretions and repressions, shiver at the thought of it, turn it this way and that, finally discard it. Mr. Bloch, about to set pen to music-paper, shapes a grandiose design; fills it with passionate utterance; would lift it to heaven-scaling climax. His unfinished Symphony, "Israel," bears these birthmarks. They are traceable in his setting of Psalms and in his "Jewish Poems"; discoverable in his Rhapsody, "Schelomo." They are also cut deep upon his new "America."

The play of Mr. Bloch's imagination can be vast, visionary and vague. Throughout "America" it is in such ferment. He contemplates us as humankind in the mass. He is profoundly moved by the abstractions of democracy. Confidently and rejoicingly, he embraces the future. For him all humanity is not too great or too baffling an image. Out of spiritual kinship, he sets a motto from Walt Whitman over his "Epic Rhapsody"; strews the score with other quotations as interpretive guides. They are the phrases of a similar temperament that found in words its expressive medium. Mr. Bloch stretches his tonal canvas from The Pilgrims of 1620 to the present day. Between, the Civil War nothing daunts him. For close, he turns seer and prophet. And all this in fulfillment of a faith and a vision, a desire and a passion, haunting him since he first saw these shores on an August day, twelve years ago.

Ernest Bloch is also a full-furnished composer. He can invent salient, significant musical ideas; develop, transform, enlarge, enrich them. He can conduct them graphically and meaningfully through the intricacies of a formal pattern, the mazes of the modern orchestra. If he goes to other sources than his own inventions, he can fertilize and vitalize the chosen matter; give it new shapes, surfaces and colors; heat it to new implications at the fires of his temperament. The structural art of music is wholly at his command. He can outspread, rear and fill whatever form he chooses, knitting it together firmly, plastically, in just proportions and luminous detail. He blends knowledge and imagination when he utilizes the manifold voices of a twentieth-century orchestra. Informed and eclectic, he declines no musical procedure; commits himself to none; employs independently whatever best serves his creative purpose.

With him the courses of poetic and musical design are one and indivisible. His modulations are not manipulation; his harmonies, no calculated and applied vesture. Both upspring from the nature of the musical thought and the musical progress. In impression upon the hearer, he accomplishes these things by no studious meditation, but in the full ardor of creation. The heat of a temperament, the fervor of the conception, the passion of release, fuse the idea and the expression into a single glowing, marching whole. Not one of Mr. Bloch's major pieces comes off tamely; his trifles strike sparks. Before nothing that he writes may even casual hearers sit indifferent. By sheer grandiosity he may overwhelm them, as he seemed to do yesterday; yet by his rhetoric even, are they spelled.

From the two-fold Bloch proceeds "America"—to risk a superlative, the most remarkable prize-piece that a composer has yet written. Consider, first, the execution. A motto-motiv unifies and characters this Rhapsody of symphonic dimensions. At the beginning it appears in germ; steadily it gains body, savor, impetus, impression. Never is it long absent from the hearer's ear; soon it is graven upon his imagination; finally it upswells into all-enfolding climax. This motto-motiv is graphically invented; it is even rhythmed to the word "America." From beginning to end, the course it follows, the development it receives, are feats of skill and imagination. A song of the Pueblo Indians, seemingly chosen as motiv of the soil, also recurs persistently, in repetition rather than development.

Into his tone-pictures—for that convenient phrase best labels the first two divisions and a part of the third—Mr. Bloch weaves an endless variety of American folk-music. It ranges from the "Old Hundredth" to "Pop Goes the Weasel." It includes negro ditties, Indian tunes, an English March, a sea-chantey, songs f[illegible] both combatants in the Civil War, Dix[illegible] and the Doxology. The whole catalogue—[illegible] as many items as were possible in a newspaper article—was set forth in this place last Thursday. These folk-motives are so numerous that in the quick traffic of the concert-hall an attentive ear may hardly recognize them all. One or another, however, is so intrinsically significant, graphically presented or vividly sublimated, that it makes instant and lively impression.

Incidental images and suggestion in tones also abound. The Pilgrims are at sea; home-sickness steals upon them. There are musical amenities, domestic and social, of the era before the Civil War. The embattled armies march across the tonal scene. . . . The Rhapsody passes to the present age of machinery and the dinful life of prosperity and publicity. By devices of the modernists, Mr. Bloch compasses sound and fury; then bids the orchestra shudder and shrink away. A tonal panorama, yet with no picture blurred or faltering. The ear receives them; the mind answers. Often enough, by a very present poetry, they touch the emotions.

More: Mr. Bloch weaves close and continuous this intrinsically episodic stuff. The motto-motiv and the song of the Pueblo Indians aid him not a little; but on his own part he does again a masterly feat of constructive skill and imagination. Finally, the advance and recession, the ultimate ascent toward climax and apotheosis. Mr. Bloch writes aboundingly and passionately. A mingled austerity and fervor possess him. He knows and sounds exaltation. Only at the end does it fail him, does he fail, as it seems, exhausted. The words and the music of the climactic Anthem, "for the people" in unison, match each other in commonplace. (Another page of this paper contains them.) They and crowd-suggestion brought the audience to its feet yesterday; but in one neighborhood at least, this one and that seized the opportunity to slip into wraps for the street.

For the spiritual side of the Rhapsody, much depends upon the receiving temperament. Those that crave the vast, the visionary; the vague, will draw from it sustenance, illumination, even exaltation. They will thrill to the expanse of Mr. Bloch's canvas, to the multifold array of matter in which he traverses, envisages and assimilates the American world. The sheer bigness and fullness of design and accomplishment will stir them to their vitals. They will lift up their hearts, as Mr. Bloch uplifts his, when he visions the future. They will share his Whitmanic inspirations. They will hear at his loftier and deeper moments a song of democracy; the voice of humankind in brotherhood and ascent; music doing its office—the incarnation in tones of abstract and far-flung concepts, till they pierce deep to the listening mind, well through the answering heart. At smallest, they will say that here is America idealizing itself at the bidding of a composer altogether sincere; America visioning in his tones its true and ultimate self. At largest, they will assert that here mounts the Rhapsody of faith in humankind and human living as Beethoven declared it, as Mahler strove to give voice. From Mr. Bloch's pages, from themselves as well, emotional fervors, even as yesterday, will course the concert-room.

Thrice unhappy, however, will be the state of the realists. They will seem indeed as devil's advocates. With a prayer for mercy from the idealists for this deafness, blindness and earthiness here may be set down, one and another thought traversing their heads. . . . assemble a myriad of American [illegible] motivs, to weave them into a con[illegible]ous tonal texture, to touch one and [illegible] other with musical beauty and sig[illegible]cance, is not to write the musi[illegible] of America. Rather, it is the scho[illegible]y and absorbent approach of a Euro[illegible]n minded to write such a music. Chadwick, in the Scherzi of this and ti[illegible] Symphony, in two divisions—"Noel" a[illegible] the finale—of his "Symphonic Sketch [illegible] wrote a music that none but an Ameri[illegible] can could have made. Mr. Carpenter did likewise in his Concertino; Mr. H[illegible]ll in his recent Symphony. Yet how sparingly, or not at all, did they utilize American folk-motivs.

To judge by his swarming quotations Mr. Bloch draws endless inspiration from Walt Whitman. From the earliest times to the present day, he has been a European rather than an American admiration. To unfold a tonal panorama of America, A. D. 1620, A. D. 1861-65, A. D. 1926, is not necessarily to absorb the American temperament as it flowers into music in Mr. Chadwick, Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Hill, even Mr. Gershwin. At bottom Mr. Bloch's American voice and spirit is basically a thing of labels, quotations, folk-material. For twelve years he has dwelt and worked in America from New York to San Francisco, through vicissitudes endured and conquered. For twice and thrice that time Mr. Loeffler has dwelt and worked in Boston. He remains in his kind an individual composer, looking in his mind and heart to write. So also does Mr. Bloch, though he stock his tonal pantry with scores of American jars.

Mr. Bloch is a romantic idealist, ardent and sincere. By that very nature he lapses into occasional simplicities, even naïvétes; tumbles headlong into the banalities of his Anthem. Musically, emotionally, all three are hard to bear. Much too closely, they approximate "America: an Epic Rhapsody" to "The Birth of a Nation: Epic of the Screen." By all means let Mr. Bloch tune his orchestra to the glories of democracy and sound his visions of its future. To do so is the privilege—or the fate—of the idealist. There are those, wrestling daily, as St. Paul says, with the beasts at Ephesus who may be pardoned when they fail to rise to this exaltation. Or, if human fellowship must be intoned, does it not require the genius of Beethoven, writing his final Symphony, to persuade these sons of earth and daily living? . . . Enough and more than enough. Kicks and blows are ever the portion of the realists—individualists all, lacking "communal" vision. They love too much the small thing done from day to day but done exceeding well.

Upon Mr. Bloch's Rhapsody Mr. Koussevitzky had evidently bestowed the rehearsals of the week. Thereby he achieved a performance that technically overlooked nothing and adjusted everything; that glamoured or intensified many a page, illuminating the thought or deepening the vision by the beauty or the puissance of the orchestral tone. Yet it is permissible to believe that the conductor has less intuitive sympathy with the assimilated and idealistic Americanism of Mr. Bloch than with the native and more earthly Americanism of Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Hill, Mr. Copland and Mr. Sessions. Competently, the Harvard-Radcliffe chorus did its feeble part.

Two repertory pieces, therefore, filled the remainder of the program: first, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" in cameo-cut, beautifully lyrical, gently impassioned performance—the very voice and loveliness of the music. Second, Ravel's tone-poem, "The Waltz"—Franco-American sheet-anchor when rehearsal of other numbers presses hard—in less sharp-edged and vividly colored version than is the conductor's wont. Or did the contrasting impression from the two familiar musics spring from the new seating of the orchestra all on the stage-level? Certainly the finer blendings, the clearer purities of tone thus gained, contributed to the beauty diffused by Schubert's pages. Possibly, "The Waltz" sounded less brilliant, less graphic, under the mellowing that the change from tiers may bring. In these matters the listener easily persuades himself that what he chances to believe is the actual sensation. If only the orchestra could be levelled or lifted at the composer's and the conducfor's will! The newest picture houses do almost as much.

H. T. P.

BLOCH'S "AMERICA" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Prize Composition Heard for First Time Here

Radcliffe Choral Society and Harvard Glee Club Assist

Mr Koussevitzky's revised program for yesterday's symphony concert began with the promised repetition of Schubert's B-minor Symphony, and substituted for Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" his more familiar "La Valse." These two familiar numbers, played and interpreted with the usual eloquence, preceded the event of the afternoon, the first performance of "America, an Epic Rhapsody," by Ernest Bloch, the noted Swiss-Jewish composer, now living in San Francisco.

A chorus from the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club assisted the orchestra in this number, which concludes with an anthem meant to "symbolize the destiny, the mission of America." The audience, though requested by Bloch in a program note to join in singing this anthem, did not do so. Neither words nor music were given in the program. Most of those present stood up during the latter portion of the anthem, however. At the end there was hearty and prolonged applause.

Bloch's "America" was the unanimous choice of the judges from 92 works submitted in competition for a prize of $3000 offered by Musical America. The judges were all orchestral conductors, Messrs Walter Damrosch, Hertz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski. To avoid dispute over the coveted honor of giving the "world premiere," it was agreed that Bloch's work should be played at the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic, Philadelphia Orchestra, Chicago Symphony and San Francisco Symphony this week. The Cincinnati Orchestra is also giving it.

The first of the subscription concerts this week in New York and Cincinnati came Thursday evening instead of Friday afternoon, as in the other four cities. One would like to know, however, the the origin of the Associated Press dispatch from New York, printed all over the United States in the Friday morning papers, announcing that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra had given Thursday evening "the world premiere of Bloch's 'America,'" adding that within a few days it was to be played in lesser cities. It is clear that Messrs Hertz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski may feel that Mr Damrosch, or his press agent, has stolen a march on them.

The important question to a member of the audience is not, of course, whether the performance is a "world premiere," but whether Bloch's Rhapsody is music worth hearing. He has divided it into three parts, "1620—The Soil-The Indians-England-The Mayflower-The Landing of the Pilgrims"; "1861-65—Hours of Joy-Hours of Sorrow," and "1926—The Present-The Future." There is a motto from Whitman "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you," and a dedication to the memory of Lincoln and Whitman. Without this program the music would not be intelligible or coherent.

Bloch's score is an epitome of almost all the various methods so far devised for writing "American music." It begins with quotations of American Indian themes, as in MacDowell and his school. Then there are an English folk song and a snatch of "Old Hundred," as in Stillman Kelley's "New England Symphony." Then in the second part there are popular tunes of the 1860s, notably "Swanee River" and "Pop Goes the Weasel" as in Converse's "California." In the finale there is some realistic, but rather poor jazz, and a good deal of orchestral imitation of big city noises, traffic, machines, and so on, as in Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" and Converse's "Flivver Ten Million." Through this historical potpourri, which one sceptical listener yesterday described as "The Young Musician's Outline of American History," run strains of Bloch's own invention, all of them forecasting the sonorous peroration, the anthem which he hopes may become nationally accepted.

Bloch has written very skillfully, introducing his familiar musical quotations gracefully, and planning his grand final climax effectively. The anthem has breadth of style and the singable quality needed for his purpose, though it did not strike one yesterday as on a par with Haydn's Austrian Hymn or Lvoff's Russian Hymn. It is, however, quite as good as the tune to which we sing "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," and better suited to its purpose than "The Star Spangled Banner." There are other admirable passages such as depicting the voyage of the Mayflower.

We wondered, when it was over, whether this sort of thing was worth doing at all. Heard as music, without reference to program notes and without consciousness of the associations clustering round 'Swanee River" and "Old Hundred," Bloch's Rhapsody would sound fragmentary and baffling. Of the three movements, the finale is by far the most effective, and the last cluttered up with musical allusions. But, on the whole, "America" proved disappointing.

P. R.

Post Dec. 22

SYMPHONY PRESENTS "AMERICA"

Bloch's Prize Piece Good in Spots, But Has Hokum

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An irony as subtle as it was unpremeditated went into the making of yesterday's Symphony programme. At the beginning stood Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony that for 43 years was known only to the man into whose possession it had chanced to fall. At the end came Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," the name of which, thanks to liberal publicity, had been on every concert-goers' tongue long before its first performance in New York two days ago.

Yet it is quite safe to prophesy that the Austrians' symphonic fragment will be played and beloved for decades upon decades after the Swiss-American's composition has passed into oblivion.

AWARDED $3000 PRIZE

To rehearse information lately in the public prints, Ernest Bloch's "America" was awarded last June the prize of $3000 for a "representatively American symphonic work," offered by the periodical Musical America. Five conductors of American symphony orchestras made the jury: Messrs. Damrosch, Hertz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski. And New York, San Francisco, Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia all received their initial hearings of the piece either yesterday or the day before.

A native of Geneva, of Jewish blood, and incidentally one of the outstanding composers of the day, Bloch has since 1916 made his residence in America. And like many another emigre to our shores, he has been moved by American ideals. The rhapsody "America" by testimony of an inscription on the score, bears witness to his "love for this country," his "reverence for its past," his "faith in its future."

Suggests Movie Music

In the first of its three movements this rhapsody paints the America of the aborgine and the coming of the Pilgrims; in the second the days before and during the Civil War; in the third the feverish present and, as the composer visions it, the glorious future. By way of conclusion and intended climax comes a so-called anthem to words presumably of the composer's authorship and which, according to the printed score, should be sung by the people, though in yesterday's performance at Symphony Hall it was sung only by the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe stationed on the stage.

At intervals throughout the printed score come also quotations from Walt Whitman, together with explanatory footnotes that suggest, as does much of the piece itself, a musical accompaniment for a motion-picture. Most pointedly, indeed, does the second section bring to mind that epic of the screen, "The Birth of a Nation." At the beginning the listeners can almost smell the magnolia blossoms about a Southern mansion and vision the leisurely life that passed behind the tall white portico. Later come "Dixie," "John Brown's Body," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," drum-rolls and other martial paraphernalia in a stirring ensemble. Throughout the rhapsody Mr. Bloch has made liberal use of our folk-music. Indian themes for the first movement; "Swanee River," "Pop Goes the Weasel" and "Hail, Columbia" in the second; "blues" and "coon-songs" in the third.

Eloquent in Spots

With the expected mastery and craftsmanship Bloch has marshalled this material and, knowing the man in his previous music, we are led to believe with sincerity as well. Now and then his music rises to genuine eloquence especially in the exalted close of the first section. There is no resisting the nostalgic mood of the beginning of the second movement, and the end of this section is deeply felt. The final anthem, which is prefigured from the commencement, is, however, intrinsically commonplace, and when all is said and done the characterizing word which first occurs is that term beloved of critics of the theatre "hokum."

Since the words of the anthem, themselves as trite as the tune they fit, were not yesterday printed in the programme-book they might not be sung, as the composer directed, by a standing audience. Nevertheless after the song was fairly begun two or three members of the audience rose, and most of the rest forthwith followed suit.

Orchestra on Level Stage

There was applause aplenty at the end, yet it can hardly be said with accuracy that the piece created a sensation.

And the performance, brilliant as it was, might have been more effective had not Mr. Koussevitzky misguidedly seated his orchestra on a level stage, to the obvious dulling of the tone quality, responsible for the relatively colorless a state of affairs no doubt likewise performance of Ravel's "La Valse" that yesterday followed the Symphony of Schubert.

NOTICE!

MUSIC

BLOCH'S "AMERICA"

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave its 10th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; Ravel's "The Waltz," and Bloch's "America: an Epic Rhapsody in Three Parts." Members of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club sang the hymn at the end of "America." The rhapsody was performed in Boston for the first time.

One can be a "100 per cent. American" without being excited over Mr. Bloch's panoramic, dioramic musical history and glorification of the United States. He attempted to portray in tones the North American Indians, the Mayflower leaving England, the landing of the Pilgrims and their trials and tribulations, the years of the civil war, the materialism and the mechanization (with anvils in the score) of the present age, the return of spiritual progress and hopes, and the United States handing out the hand of friendship to all the nations of the earth. A formidable task, indeed. And all this in one rhapsody.

The score is annotated with quotations from Walt Whitman. It is dedicated to his memory and to the memory of Lincoln. The titles of the tunes introduced from those of the Indians and "Old Hundred" to "I went to the hop joint" and the "Coon-can Game," are given: a thoughtful precaution on the part of Mr. Bloch, for a few of them are hardly recognizable in the performance on account of the thick instrumentation.

The first section ". . . 1620" is the most musical and the most interesting of the three. The Indian tunes have character and are not too sophistically treated. The contrast between the exultation of the arriving Pilgrims and their hours of depression and danger is well brought forward. The remaining portions of the rhapsody are too often bombastic after the manner of Mr. Babbitt addressing a meeting of Rotarians. What Hazlitt said of Marquis Wellesley speaking on affairs in India might often be applied to Mr. Bloch in his many enthusiastic moments: "Writhing with agony under a truism, and launching a commonplace with all the fury of a thunderbolt."

It was expected of Mr. Bloch that he would weave his selected tunes into the cloth of his orchestral loom with technical skill; not using them in the construction of a pot-pourri; for certain works of his that have been performed here—especially his concerto and those fired and glowing with his racial spirit—have shown his ability as a musical architect and decorator. But this ability is not so clearly displayed in "America" and the prevailing color, in his quiet and most boisterous moments, is drab.

There is little in this rhapsody to quicken the pulse or charm the spirit. His hymn at the end is of the Sunday school order, perhaps designedly so, for he wishes the congregation to rise and sing the hymn whenever the rhapsody is performed. He might as well have asked the congregation of yesterday to wave pocket American flags as they rose, for no music was provided for the worshippers—at least we saw none—and no one ventured to pipe up the patriotic strains.

Is it not probable that Mr. Bloch in his fervent appreciation of this country, in his love of its past history and his commendable hope for its future, undertook a task that no one could accomplish and remain a musician?

It is true that this rhapsody won the prize when 92 manuscripts were submitted in Musical America's "symphony contest." In 1861 Joachim Raff was awarded a prize by a Vienna society for his symphony "To the Fatherland." Raff attempted in this symphony to portray in tones the "deep thought, the civilized gentleness, the conquering perseverance of the German people," the love of the Germans for the chase and for song; the domestic hearth with wives and children all made happy through the cultivation of the Muses; the sorrow caused by the dismemberment of the united fatherland; but "Hope, the consoler, takes the composer by the hand, and filled with longing and presageful, he sees the new victory-crowned flight of his people to a glorious unity." This symphony, when performed, had no success. Mr. Nikisch brought it out in Boston early in 1890. The audience—musicians and laymen—would not have it; yet Raff was a musician of parts and a flaming patriot. Absit omen!

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did all that was possible for the success of the rhapsody. The stentorian ending naturally aroused applause.

There was a beautiful performance of he "Unfinished" symphony; that of Ravel's "Waltz" was greatly enjoyed by he audience.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week, as announced, is as follows: Bach, Brandenburg concerto, No. 4, G major; Toch, concerto for piano and orchestra (Mr. Sanroma; pianist); Carpenter, "Skyscrapers." It is probable that the program will include another piece.

Dec. 22. Symphony --- Al

Ernest Bloch In Rhapsody Upon America

TRANSCRIPT

To the Symphony Concerts Comes His Prize-Piece, For Better, For Worse

ERNEST BLOCH is a romantic idealist. In these days they are not many. Being such, he is simple of spirit, visionary, fervent, almost to fanaticism. Being such again, he chooses the vast conception, the manifold, far-spreading implication. Setting a title to his new symphonic piece, played yesterday afternoon by Mr Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, he does not hesitate to use the word "epic." Most of us, schooled to discretions and repressions, shiver at the thought of it, turn it this way and that, finally discard it. Mr. Bloch, about to set pen to music-paper, shapes a grandiose design; fills it with passionate utterance; would lift it to heaven-scaling climax. His unfinished Symphony, "Israel," bears these birthmarks. They are traceable in his setting of Psalms and in his "Jewish Poems"; discoverable in his Rhapsody, "Schelomo." They are also cut deep upon his new "America."

The play of Mr. Bloch's imagination can be vast, visionary and vague. Throughout "America" it is in such ferment. He contemplates us as humankind in the mass. He is profoundly moved by the abstractions of democracy. Confidently and rejoicingly, he embraces the future. For him all humanity is not too great or too baffling an image. Out of spiritual kinship, he sets a motto from Walt Whitman over his "Epic Rhapsody"; strews the score with other quotations as interpretive guides. They are the phrases of a similar temperament that found in words its expressive medium. Mr. Bloch stretches his tonal canvas from The Pilgrims of 1620 to the present day. Between, the Civil War nothing daunts him. For close, he turns seer and prophet. And all this in fulfillment of a faith and a vision, a desire and a passion, haunting him since he first saw these shores on an August day, twelve years ago.

Ernest Bloch is also a full-furnished composer. He can invent salient, significant musical ideas; develop, transform, enlarge, enrich them. He can conduct them graphically and meaningfully through the intricacies of a formal pattern, the mazes of the modern orchestra. If he goes to other sources than his own inventions, he can fertilize and vitalize the chosen matter; give it new shapes, surfaces and colors; heat it to new implications at the fires of his temperament. The structural art of music is wholly at his command. He can outspread, rear and fill whatever form he chooses, knitting it together firmly, plastically, in just proportions and luminous detail. He blends knowledge and imagination when he utilizes the manifold voices of a twentieth-century orchestra. Informed and eclectic, he declines no musical procedure; commits himself to none; employs independently whatever best serves his creative purpose.

With him the courses of poetic and musical design are one and indivisible. His modulations are not manipulation; his harmonies, no calculated and applied vesture. Both upspring from the nature of the musical thought and the musical progress. In impression upon the hearer, he accomplishes these things by no studious meditation, but in the full ardor of creation. The heat of a temperament, the fervor of the conception, the passion of release, fuse the idea and the expression into a single glowing, marching whole. Not one of Mr. Bloch's major pieces comes off tamely; his trifles strike sparks. Before nothing that he writes may even casual hearers sit indifferent. By sheer grandiosity he may overwhelm them, as he seemed to do yesterday; yet by his rhetoric even, are they spelled.

From the two-fold Bloch proceeds "America"—to risk a superlative, the most remarkable prize-piece that a composer has yet written. Consider, first, the execution. A motto-motiv unifies and characters this Rhapsody of symphonic dimensions. At the beginning it appears in germ; steadily it gains body, savor, impetus, impression. Never is it long absent from the hearer's ear; soon it is graven upon his imagination; finally it upswells into all-enfolding climax. This motto-motiv is graphically invented; it is even rhythmed to the word "America." From beginning to end, the course it follows, the development it receives, are feats of skill and imagination. A song of the Pueblo Indians, seemingly chosen as motiv of the soil, also recurs persistently, in repetition rather than development.

Into his tone-pictures—for that convenient phrase best labels the first two divisions and a part of the third—Mr. Bloch weaves an endless variety of American folk-music. It ranges from the "Old Hundredth" to "Pop Goes the Weasel." It includes negro ditties, Indian tunes, an English March, a sea-chantey, songs from both combatants in the Civil War, Dix[illegible] and the Doxology. The whole catalogue—as many items as were possible in a newspaper article—was set forth in this place last Thursday. These folk-motives are so numerous that in the quick traffic of the concert-hall an attentive ear may hardly recognize them all. One or another, however, is so intrinsically significant, graphically presented or vividly sublimated, that it makes instant and lively impression.

Incidental images and suggestion in tones also abound. The Pilgrims are at sea; home-sickness steals upon them. There are musical amenities, domestic and social, of the era before the Civil War. The embattled armies march across the tonal scene. . . . The Rhapsody passes to the present age of machinery and the dinful life of prosperity and publicity. By devices of the modernists, Mr. Bloch compasses sound and fury; then bids the orchestra shudder and shrink away. A tonal panorama, yet with no picture blurred or faltering. The ear receives them; the mind answers. Often enough, by a very present poetry, they touch the emotions.

More: Mr. Bloch weaves close and continuous this intrinsically episodic stuff. The motto-motiv and the song of the Pueblo Indians aid him not a little; but on his own part he does again a masterly feat of constructive skill and imagination. Finally, the advance and recession, the ultimate ascent toward climax and apotheosis. Mr. Bloch writes aboundingly and passionately. A mingled austerity and fervor possess him. He knows and sounds exaltation. Only at the end does it fail him, does he fail, as it seems, exhausted. The words and the music of the climactic Anthem, "for the people" in unison, match each other in commonplace. (Another page of this paper contains them.) They and crowd-suggestion brought the audience to its feet yesterday; but in one neighborhood at least, this one and that seized the opportunity to slip into wraps for the street.

For the spiritual side of the Rhapsody, much depends upon the receiving temperament. Those that crave the vast, the visionary, the vague, will draw from it sustenance, illumination, even exaltation. They will thrill to the expanse of Mr. Bloch's canvas, to the multifold array of matter in which he traverses, envisages and assimilates the American world. The sheer bigness and fullness of design and accomplishment will stir them to their vitals. They will lift up their hearts, as Mr. Bloch uplifts his, when he visions the future. They will share his Whitmanic inspirations. They will hear at his loftier and deeper moments a song of democracy; the voice of humankind in brotherhood and ascent; music doing its office—the incarnation in tones of abstract and far-flung concepts, till they pierce deep to the listening mind, well through the answering heart. At smallest, they will say that here is America idealizing itself at the bidding of a composer altogether sincere; America visioning in his tones its true and ultimate self. At largest, they will assert that here mounts the Rhapsody of faith in humankind and human living as Beethoven declared it, as Mahler strove to give voice. From Mr. Bloch's pages, from themselves as well, emotional fervors, even as yesterday, will course the concert-room.

Thrice unhappy, however, will be the state of the realists. They will seem indeed as devil's advocates. With a prayer for mercy from the idealists for this deafness, blindness and earthiness here may be set down, one and another thought traversing their heads. . . . assemble a myriad of American [illegible] motivs, to weave them into a continuous tonal texture, to touch one another with musical beauty and significance, is not to write the music of America. Rather, it is the scholarly and absorbent approach of a European minded to write such a music. Chadwick, in the Scherzi of this and the Symphony, in two divisions—"Noel" and the finale—of his "Symphonic Sketch" wrote a music that none but an American could have made. Mr. Carpenter did likewise in his Concertino; Mr. Hill in his recent Symphony. Yet how sparingly, or not at all, did they utilize American folk-motivs.

To judge by his swarming quotations Mr. Bloch draws endless inspiration from Walt Whitman. From the earliest times to the present day, he has been a European rather than an American admiration. To unfold a tonal panorama of America, A. D. 1620, A. D. 1861-65, A. D. 1926, is not necessarily to absorb the American temperament as it flowers into music in Mr. Chadwick, Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Hill, even Mr. Gershwin. At bottom Mr. Bloch's American voice and spirit is basically a thing of labels, quotations, folk-material. For twelve years he has dwelt and worked in America from New York to San Francisco, through vicissitudes endured and conquered. For twice and thrice that time Mr. Loeffler has dwelt and worked in Boston. He remains in his kind an individual composer, looking in his mind and heart to write. So also does Mr. Bloch, though he stock his tonal pantry with scores of American jars.

Mr. Bloch is a romantic idealist, ardent and sincere. By that very nature he lapses into occasional simplicities, even naïvétes; tumbles headlong into the banalities of his Anthem. Musically, emotionally, all three are hard to bear. Much too closely, they approximate "America: an Epic Rhapsody" to "The Birth of a Nation: Epic of the Screen." By all means let Mr. Bloch tune his orchestra to the glories of democracy and sound his visions of its future. To do so is the privilege—or the fate—of the idealist. There are those, wrestling daily, as St. Paul says, with the beasts at Ephesus who may be pardoned when they fail to rise to this exaltation. Or, if human fellowship must be intoned, does it not require the genius of Beethoven, writing his final Symphony, to persuade these sons of earth and daily living? . . . Enough and more than enough. Kicks and blows are ever the portion of the realists—individualists all, lacking "communal" vision. They love too much the small thing done from day to day but done exceeding well.

Upon Mr. Bloch's Rhapsody Mr. Koussevitzky had evidently bestowed the rehearsals of the week. Thereby he achieved a performance that technically overlooked nothing and adjusted everything; that glamoured or intensified many a page, illuminating the thought or deepening the vision by the beauty or the puissance of the orchestral tone. Yet it is permissible to believe that the conductor has less intuitive sympathy with the assimilated and idealistic Americanism of Mr. Bloch than with the native and more earthly Americanism of Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Hill, Mr. Copland and Mr. Sessions. Competently, the Harvard-Radcliffe chorus did its feeble part.

Two repertory pieces, therefore, filled the remainder of the program: first, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" in cameo-cut, beautifully lyrical, gently impassioned performance—the very voice and loveliness of the music. Second, Ravel's tone-poem, "The Waltz"—Franco-American sheet-anchor when rehearsal of other numbers presses hard—in less sharp-edged and vividly colored version than is the conductor's wont. Or did the contrasting impression from the two familiar musics spring from the new seating of the orchestra all on the stage-level? Certainly the finer blendings, the clearer purities of tone thus gained, contributed to the beauty diffused by Schubert's pages. Possibly, "The Waltz" sounded less brilliant, less graphic, under the mellowing that the change from tiers may bring. In these matters the listener easily persuades himself that what he chances to believe is the actual sensation. If only the orchestra could be levelled or lifted at the composer's and the conductor's will! The newest pictures houses do almost as much. H. T. P.

Globe Dec 22

BLOCH'S "AMERICA" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Prize Composition Heard for First Time Here

Radcliffe Choral Society and Harvard Glee Club Assist

Mr Koussevitzky's revised program for yesterday's symphony concert began with the promised repetition of Schubert's B-minor Symphony, and substituted for Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" his more familiar "La Valse." These two familiar numbers, played and interpreted with the usual eloquence, preceded the event of the afternoon, the first performance of "America, an Epic Rhapsody," by Ernest Bloch, the noted Swiss-Jewish composer, now living in San Francisco.

A chorus from the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club assisted the orchestra in this number, which concludes with an anthem meant to "symbolize the destiny, the mission of America." The audience, though requested by Bloch in a program note to join in singing this anthem, did not do so. Neither words nor music were given in the program. Most of those present stood up during the latter portion of the anthem, however. At the end there was hearty and prolonged applause.

Bloch's "America" was the unanimous choice of the judges from 92 works submitted in competition for a prize of $3000 offered by Musical America. The judges were all orchestral conductors, Messrs Walter Damrosch, Hertz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski. To avoid dispute over the coveted honor of giving the "world premiere," it was agreed that Bloch's work should be played at the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic, Philadelphia Orchestra, Chicago Symphony and San Francisco Symphony this week. The Cincinnati Orchestra is also giving it.

The first of the subscription concerts this week in New York and Cincinnati came Thursday evening instead of Friday afternoon, as in the other four cities. One would like to know, however, the the origin of the Associated Press dispatch from New York, printed all over the United States in the Friday morning papers, announcing that the New York Philharmonic Orchestra had given Thursday evening "the world premiere of Bloch's 'America,'" adding that within a few days it was to be played in lesser cities. It is clear that Messrs Hertz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski may feel that Mr Damrosch, or his press agent, has stolen a march on them.

The important question to a member of the audience is not, of course, whether the performance is a "world premiere," but whether Bloch's Rhapsody is music worth hearing. He has divided it into three parts, "1620—The Soil-The Indians-England-The Mayflower-The Landing of the Pilgrims"; "1861-65—Hours of Joy-Hours of Sorrow," and "1926—The Present-The Future." There is a motto from Whitman "O America, because you build for mankind, I build for you," and a dedication to the memory of Lincoln and Whitman. Without this program the music would not be intelligible or coherent.

Bloch's score is an epitome of almost all the various methods so far devised for writing "American music." It begins with quotations of American Indian themes, as in MacDowell and his school. Then there are an English folk song and a snatch of "Old Hundred," as in Stillman Kelley's "New England Symphony." Then in the second part there are popular tunes of the 1860s, notably "Swanee River" and "Pop Goes the Weasel" as in Converse's "California." In the finale there is some realistic, but rather poor jazz, and a good deal of orchestral imitation of big city noises, traffic, machines, and so on, as in Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" and Converse's "Flivver Ten Million." Through this historical potpourri, which one sceptical listener yesterday described as "The Young Musician's Outline of American History," run strains of Bloch's own invention, all of them forecasting the sonorous peroration, the anthem which he hopes may become nationally accepted.

Bloch has written very skillfully, introducing his familiar musical quotations gracefully, and planning his grand final climax effectively. The anthem has breadth of style and the singable quality needed for his purpose, though it did not strike one yesterday as on a par with Haydn's Austrian Hymn or Lvoff's Russian Hymn. It is, however, quite as good as the tune to which we sing "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," and better suited to its purpose than "The Star Spangled Banner." There are other admirable passages such as depicting the voyage of the Mayflower.

We wondered, when it was over, whether this sort of thing was worth doing at all. Heard as music, without reference to program notes and without consciousness of the associations clustering round 'Swanee River" and "Old Hundred," Bloch's Rhapsody would sound fragmentary and baffling. Of the three movements, the finale is by far the most effective, and the last cluttered up with musical allusions. But, on the whole, "America" proved disappointing. P. R.

Post Dec. 22

SYMPHONY PRESENTS "AMERICA"

Bloch's Prize Piece Good in Spots, But Has Hokum

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An irony as subtle as it was unpremeditated went into the making of yesterday's Symphony programme. At the beginning stood Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony that for 43 years was known only to the man into whose possession it had chanced to fall. At the end came Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," the name of which, thanks to liberal publicity, had been on every concert-goers' tongue long before its first performance in New York two days ago.

Yet it is quite safe to prophesy that the Austrians' symphonic fragment will be played and beloved for decades upon decades after the Swiss-American's composition has passed into oblivion.

AWARDED $3000 PRIZE

To rehearse information lately in the public prints, Ernest Bloch's "America" was awarded last June the prize of $3000 for a "representatively American symphonic work," offered by the periodical Musical America. Five conductors of American symphony orchestras made the jury: Messrs. Damrosch, Hertz, Koussevitzky, Stock and Stokowski. And New York, San Francisco, Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia all received their initial hearings of the piece either yesterday or the day before.

A native of Geneva, of Jewish blood, and incidentally one of the outstanding composers of the day, Bloch has since 1916 made his residence in America. And like many another emigre to our shores, he has been moved by American ideals. The rhapsody "America" by testimony of an inscription on the score, bears witness to his "love for this country," his "reverence for its past," his "faith in its future."

Suggests Movie Music

In the first of its three movements this rhapsody paints the America of the aborgine and the coming of the Pilgrims; in the second the days before and during the Civil War; in the third the feverish present and, as the composer visions it, the glorious future. By way of conclusion and intended climax comes a so-called anthem to words presumably of the composer's authorship and which, according to the printed score, should be sung by the people, though in yesterday's performance at Symphony Hall it was sung only by the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe stationed on the stage.

At intervals throughout the printed score come also quotations from Walt Whitman, together with explanatory footnotes that suggest, as does much of the piece itself, a musical accompaniment for a motion-picture. Most pointedly, indeed, does the second section bring to mind that epic of the screen, "The Birth of a Nation." At the beginning the listeners can almost smell the magnolia blossoms about a Southern mansion and vision the leisurely life that passed behind the tall white portico. Later come "Dixie," "John Brown's Body," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," drum-rolls and other martial paraphernalia in a stirring ensemble. Throughout the rhapsody Mr. Bloch has made liberal use of our folk-music. Indian themes for the first movement; "Swanee River," "Pop Goes the Weasel" and "Hail, Columbia" in the second; "blues" and "coon-songs" in the third.

Eloquent in Spots

With the expected mastery and craftsmanship Bloch has marshalled this material and, knowing the man in his previous music, we are led to believe with sincerity as well. Now and then his music rises to genuine eloquence especially in the exalted close of the first section. There is no resisting the nostalgic mood of the beginning of the second movement, and the end of this section is deeply felt. The final anthem, which is prefigured from the commencement, is, however, intrinsically commonplace, and when all is said and done the characterizing word which first occurs is that term beloved of critics of the theatre "hokum."

Since the words of the anthem, themselves as trite as the tune they fit, were not yesterday printed in the programme-book they might not be sung, as the composer directed, by a standing audience. Nevertheless after the song was fairly begun two or three members of the audience rose, and most of the rest forthwith followed suit.

Orchestra on Level Stage

There was applause aplenty at the end, yet it can hardly be said with accuracy that the piece created a sensation.

And the performance, brilliant as it was, might have been more effective had not Mr. Koussevitzky misguidedly seated his orchestra on a level stage, to the obvious dulling of the tone quality, responsible for the relatively colorless a state of affairs no doubt likewise performance of Ravel's "La Valse" that yesterday followed the Symphony of Schubert.

NOTICE!

49

MUSIC

BLOCH'S "AMERICA"

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave its 10th concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program comprised Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony; Ravel's "The Waltz," and Bloch's "America: an Epic Rhapsody in Three Parts." Members of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club sang the hymn at the end of "America." The rhapsody was performed in Boston for the first time.

One can be a "100 per cent. American" without being excited over Mr. Bloch's panoramic, dioramic musical history and glorification of the United States. He attempted to portray in tones the North American Indians, the Mayflower leaving England, the landing of the Pilgrims and their trials and tribulations, the years of the civil war, the materialism and the mechanization (with anvils in the score) of the present age, the return of spiritual progress and hopes, and the United States handing out the hand of friendship to all the nations of the earth. A formidable task, indeed. And all this in one rhapsody.

The score is annotated with quotations from Walt Whitman. It is dedicated to his memory and to the memory of Lincoln. The titles of the tunes introduced from those of the Indians and "Old Hundred" to "I went to the hop joint" and the "Coon-can Game," are given: a thoughtful precaution on the part of Mr. Bloch, for a few of them are hardly recognizable in the performance on account of the thick instrumentation.

The first section ". . . 1620" is the most musical and the most interesting of the three. The Indian tunes have character and are not too sophistically treated. The contrast between the exultation of the arriving Pilgrims and their hours of depression and danger is well brought forward. The remaining portions of the rhapsody are too often bombastic after the manner of Mr. Babbitt addressing a meeting of Rotarians. What Hazlitt said of Marquis Wellesley speaking on affairs in India might often be applied to Mr. Bloch in his many enthusiastic moments: "Writhing with agony under a truism, and launching a commonplace with all the fury of a thunderbolt."

It was expected of Mr. Bloch that he would weave his selected tunes into the cloth of his orchestral loom with technical skill; not using them in the construction of a pot-pourri; for certain works of his that have been performed here—especially his concerto and those fired and glowing with his racial spirit—have shown his ability as a musical architect and decorator. But this ability is not so clearly displayed in "America" and the prevailing color, in his quiet and most boisterous moments, is drab.

There is little in this rhapsody to quicken the pulse or charm the spirit. His hymn at the end is of the Sunday school order, perhaps designedly so, for he wishes the congregation to rise and sing the hymn whenever the rhapsody is performed. He might as well have asked the congregation of yesterday to wave pocket American flags as they rose, for no music was provided for the worshippers—at least we saw none—and no one ventured to pipe up the patriotic strains.

Is it not probable that Mr. Bloch in his fervent appreciation of this country, in his love of its past history and his commendable hope for its future, undertook a task that no one could accomplish and remain a musician?

It is true that this rhapsody won the prize when 92 manuscripts were submitted in Musical America's "symphony contest." In 1861 Joachim Raff was awarded a prize by a Vienna society for his symphony "To the Fatherland." Raff attempted in this symphony to portray in tones the "deep thought, the civilized gentleness, the conquering perseverance of the German people," the love of the Germans for the chase and for song; the domestic hearth with wives and children all made happy through the cultivation of the Muses; the sorrow caused by the dismemberment of the united fatherland; but "Hope, the consoler, takes the composer by the hand, and filled with longing and presageful, he sees the new victory-crowned flight of his people to a glorious unity." This symphony, when performed, had no success. Mr. Nikisch brought it out in Boston early in 1890. The audience—musicians and laymen—would not have it; yet Raff was a musician of parts and a flaming patriot. Absit omen!

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did all that was possible for the success of the rhapsody. The stentorian ending naturally aroused applause.

There was a beautiful performance of the "Unfinished" symphony; that of Ravel's "Waltz" was greatly enjoyed by the audience.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week, as announced, is as follows: Bach, Brandenburg concerto, No. 4, G major; Toch, concerto for piano and orchestra (Mr. Sanroma, pianist); Carpenter, "Skyscrapers." It is probable that the program will include another piece.

49

Dec. 22. Symphony --- Al Globe Dec 22

Ernest Bloch In Rhapsody Upon America

TRANSCRIPT

To the Symphony Concerts Comes His Prize-Piece, For Better, For Worse

ERNEST BLOCH is a romantic idealist. In these days they are not many. Being such, he is simple of spirit, visionary, fervent, almost to fanaticism. Being such again, he chooses the vast conception, the manifold, far-spreading implication. Setting a title to his new symphonic piece, played yesterday afternoon by Mr Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, he does not hesitate to use the word "epic." Most of us, schooled to discretions and repressions, shiver at the thought of it, turn it this way and that, finally discard it. Mr. Bloch, about to set pen to music-paper, shapes a grandiose design; fills it with passionate utterance; would lift it to heaven-scaling climax. His unfinished Symphony, "Israel," bears these birthmarks. They are traceable in his setting of Psalms and in his "Jewish Poems"; discoverable in his Rhapsody, "Schelomo." They are also cut deep upon his new "America."

The play of Mr. Bloch's imagination can be vast, visionary and vague. Throughout "America" it is in such ferment. He contemplates us as humankind in the mass. He is profoundly moved by the abstractions of democracy. Confidently and rejoicingly, he embraces the future. For him all humanity is not too great or too baffling an image. Out of spiritual kinship, he sets a motto from Walt Whitman over his "Epic Rhapsody"; strews the score with other quotations as interpretive guides. They are the phrases of a similar temperament that found in words its expressive medium. Mr. Bloch stretches his tonal canvas from The Pilgrims of 1620 to the present day. Between, the Civil War nothing daunts him. For close, he turns seer and prophet. And all this in fulfillment of a faith and a vision, a desire and a passion, haunting him since he first saw these shores on an August day, twelve years ago.

Ernest Bloch is also a full-furnished composer. He can invent salient, significant musical ideas; develop, transform, enlarge, enrich them. He can conduct them graphically and meaningfully through the intricacies of a formal pattern, the mazes of the modern orchestra. If he goes to other sources than his own inventions, he can fertilize and vitalize the chosen matter; give it new shapes, surfaces and colors; heat it to new implications at the fires of his temperament. The structural art of music is wholly at his command. He can outspread, rear and fill whatever form he chooses, knitting it together firmly, plastically, in just proportions and luminous detail. He blends knowledge and imagination when he utilizes the manifold voices of a twentieth-century orchestra. Informed and ec[illegible] he declines no musical procedur[illegible] to none; employs [illegible] best serves his c[illegible]

With him the [illegible] sical design are [illegible] modulations ar[illegible] harmonies, no[illegible] vesture. Both [illegible] of the musical [illegible] progress. In [illegible] hearer, he ac[illegible] no studious [illegible] ardor of cres[illegible] perament, th[illegible] the passion [illegible] the expressi[illegible] marching wi[illegible] major piece[illegible] strike spar[illegible] writes may [illegible] ferent. B[illegible] overwhelm[illegible] terday; yet [illegible] spelled.

They will thrill to the expanse of Mr. Bloch's canvas, to the multifold array of matter in which he traverses, envisages and assimilates the American world. The sheer bigness and fullness of design and accomplishment will stir them to their vitals. They will lift up their hearts, as Mr. Bloch uplifts his, when he visions the future. They will share his Whitmanic inspirations. They will hear at his loftier and deeper moments a song of democracy; the voice of humankind in brotherhood and ascent; music doing its office—the incarnation in tones of abstract and far-flung concepts, till they pierce deep to the listening mind, well through the answering heart. At smallest, they will say that here is America idealizing itself at the bidding of a composer altogether sincere; America visioning in his tones its true and ultimate self. At largest, they will assert that here mounts the Rhapsody of faith in humankind and human living as Beethoven declared it, as Mahler strove to give [illegible] voice. From Mr. Bloch's pages, from themselves as well, emotional fervors, even as yesterday, will course the concert-room.

Thrice unhappy, however, will be the state of the realists. They will seem indeed as devil's advocates. With a prayer for mercy from the idealists fo[illegible] this deafness, blindness and earthines[illegible] here may be set down, one and anot[illegible] thought traversing their heads. . . . assemble a myriad of American f[illegible] motivs, to weave them into a con[illegible] ous tonal texture, to touch one an[illegible] other with musical beauty and si[illegible] cance, is not to write the musi[illegible] of America. Rather, it is the scho[illegible]y and absorbent approach of a Euro[illegible]n minded to write such a music. [illegible] Chadwick, in the Scherzi of this and t[illegible] Symphony, in two divisions—"Noel" a[illegible] the finale—of his "Symphonic Sketch[illegible] wrote a music that none but an Ameri[illegible] can could have made. Mr. Carpenter did [illegible]kewise in his Concertino; Mr. H[illegible]" in his recent Symphony. Yet how sparingly, or not at all, did they utilize American folk-motivs.

To judge by his swarming quotations Mr. Bloch draws endless inspiration from Walt Whitman. From the earliest times to the present day, he has been a European rather than an American admiration. To unfold a tonal panorama of America, A. D. 1620, A. D. 1861-65, A. D. 1926, is not necessarily to absorb the American temperament as it flowers into music in Mr. Chadwick, Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Hill, even Mr. Gershwin. At bottom Mr. Bloch's American voice and spirit is basically a thing of labels, quotations, folk-material. For twelve years he has dwelt and worked in America from New York to San Francisco, through vicissitudes endured and conquered. For twice and thrice that time Mr. Loeffler has dwelt and worked in Boston. He remains in his kind an individual composer, looking in his mind and heart to write. So also does Mr. Bloch, though he stock his tonal pantry with scores of American jars.

Mr. Bloch is a romantic idealist, ardent and sincere. By that very nature he lapses into occasional simplicities, even naïvétes; tumbles headlong into the banalities of his Anthem. Musically, emotionally, all three are hard to bear. Much too closely, they approximate "America: an Epic Rhapsody" to "The Birth of a Nation: Epic of the Screen." By all means let Mr. Bloch tune his orchestra to the glories of democracy and sound his visions of its future. To do [illegible] the privilege—or the fate—of the [illegible] are those, wrestling [illegible]says, with the beasts [illegible]ay be pardoned when [illegible]o this exaltation. Or, [illegible]ship must be intoned, [illegible]quire the genius of [illegible]g his final Symphony, [illegible]se sons of earth and [illegible]. Enough and more [illegible] Kicks and blows are [illegible] of the realists—individu[illegible]ing "communal" vision. [illegible]uch the small thing done [illegible] but done exceeding well.

[illegible]och's Rhapsody Mr. Kous[illegible] evidently bestowed the re[illegible] the week. Thereby he [illegible]rformance that technically [illegible]othing and adjusted every[illegible]lamoured or intensified many [illegible]uminating the thought or [illegible]he vision by the beauty or [illegible]e of the orchestral tone. Yet [illegible]sible to believe that the con[illegible]less intuitive sympathy with [illegible]lated and idealistic American[illegible]. Bloch than with the native [illegible] earthly Americanism of Mr. [illegible] and Mr. Hill, Mr. Copland [illegible]Sessions. Competently, the Har[illegible]cliffe chorus did its feeble part. [illegible]epertory pieces, therefore, filled [illegible]ainder of the program: first, [illegible]t's "Unfinished Symphony" in [illegible]ut, beautifully lyrical, gently im[illegible]ed performance—the very voice [illegible]weliness of the music. Second, [illegible]s tone-poem, "The Waltz"—Franco[illegible]can sheet-anchor when rehearsal [illegible]er numbers presses hard—in less [illegible]edged and vividly colored version [illegible]is the conductor's wont. Or did [illegible]contrasting impression from the two [illegible]liar musics spring from the new [illegible]ing of the orchestra all on the stage[illegible]? Certainly the finer blendings, the [illegible]rer purities of tone thus gained, con[illegible]uted to the beauty diffused by Schu[illegible]t's pages. Possibly, "The Waltz" [illegible]anded less brilliant, less graphic, un[illegible] the mellowing that the change from [illegible]rs may bring. In these matters the [illegible]stener easily persuades himself that [illegible]hat he chances to believe is the actual [illegible]ensation. If only the orchestra could [illegible]e levelled or lifted at the composer's and [illegible] the conductor's will! The newen picture [illegible] houses do almost as much. H. T. P.

It is definitely announced that Quincy Mining will resume mining operations in No. 2 shaft Jan. 1. For the skilbroad has been opened from the surface to the bottom of No. 2 shaft as repairs, following a fire, were completed and since that time rock hoisted just from the forty-first level. In fact, the shaft caved on the forty-second, 1927, position. No mining has been done in this compartment since October, when the shaft was damaged by fire. Mining will resume under a new method now is being put into effect, for the avoiding trouble from "air blasts." This new method now is being put into effect, for the avoiding trouble from "air blasts." This new method now is being put into effect, for the avoiding trouble from "air blasts." This

50

"AMERICA" IS MASTERFUL RHAPSODY

By MOSES SMITH

Ernest Bloch's "America," which is being produced for the first time by five leading orchestras this week, crowds the other two numbers, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Ravel's "La Valse" into the "also ran" class at the current Boston Symphony concerts.

Contrary to his usual esoteric fashion, Bloch writes in a way that even a music critic can understand. Dedicating his work to Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, the composer gives a musical outline of American history in three episodes, the written pages of the score being freely sprinkled with literary asides, mostly Whitmania.

This vast program is carried out in musical speech by throwbacks to music of, or suggesting, the period and place. First the soil, music of the Indians, an English marching tune, the Mayflower, the landing of the Pilgrims. An old southern song suggests the South "befo' de war." "Swanee River" and "Pop Goes the Weasel" complete the picture. The dark hours of the Rebellion, ending "O Captain! My Captain!"

In the last movement — modern America, nervous, jazz-mad, material. But not for long. The composer's faith in the future, suggested from the very beginning by persistent use of a motto theme, bursts out into a great national anthem.

The composition is, in my opinion, "big stuff," though not a masterpiece. The gradual development leading to the anthem is magnificent, one of the greatest things of our time. The quoted tunes would, in other hands, have made of the work a jargon. Not so with Bloch. The structure is organic, the speech one-voiced. The orchestration is masterly in its economy, in its sureness of effect. Only occasionally does Bloch ramble, sentimentalize—and then, wonder of wonders, in the idiom of Puccini.

But the anthem itself, as sung by Harvard and Radcliffe students, was disappointing. It was a case of preparation surpassing achievement. This is an opinion based on a single hearing. A second impression tonight may cause it to be revised.

Music Notes and Comment

Globe Dec. 23

Vladimir Horowitz is prevented by illness from giving the recital scheduled for today at Symphony Hall. He will appear there Friday afternoon, Jan 4, instead, with the program announced for today. Tickets dated Dec 23 will be good for Jan 4. Those who wish it may secure a refund at the box office.

Mr Koussevitsky has set for this week's symphony concerts a program without a symphony. The novelty on it is the much discussed piano concerto of the modernist Toch, to be heard for the first time in America. Jesus Sanroma, formerly pianist of the Boston Symphony, the first and only pianist to hold a position as a permanent member of the orchestra, will be the soloist. He has been studying in Europe and has played this concerto there. Mr Sanroma, a Porto Rican, studied for some years in Boston, and has many local friends and admirers.

The English Singers, noted for their choice of unusually beautiful and seldom heard old music, have chosen a remarkably appealing Christmas program for their concert here tonight. Similar programs in New York have won them large audiences and high praise.

Coming concerts at Symphony Hall include Roland Hayes next Sunday, Horowitz Jan 4; the American debut of the Prague Teachers' Chorus Jan 5; Werrenrath Jan 6; Heifetz Jan 13 and the admirable pianist, unsurpassed in this generation, Walter Gieseking, Jan 20.

There is this week the usual holiday lull in recital giving. Nothing calls the reviewers to Jordan Hall until after New Year's. But then the musical season resumes in full flood.

The two guest conductors who will afford Mr Koussevitzky a midseason vacation from his duties with the Boston Symphony are to be the composer Honegger Jan 11 and 12 and the Spaniard E. Fernandez Arbos Jan 18 and 19. Honegger is known here by his opera "Judith," his tone poem "Pacific 231" his oratorio "King David," and other works. Arbos was concert master of the Boston Symphony a quarter of a century ago, under Gericke. He has since become a leading European orchestral conductor.

Gertrude Ehrhart, well-known Boston soprano, will sing an air from Krenek's jazz opera "Johnny Spielt Auf" and other interesting

N.Y. Times Dec. 23 1928

NEWS AND CO

BLOCH'S "AMERICA"

Work Shows Skillful Use of Native Themes —The Composer's Fitness for His Task

By OLIN DOWNES.

IT is too soon to rush into print with ex cathedra utterances upon the subject of Ernest Bloch's symphony "America," given its first performances, almost simultaneously, in five different cities last week, and soon to be given other "first performances" in Los Angeles, Cleveland and Cincinnati. Few scores have been given such an impressive introduction to the public. Few prize competitions have brought out a work which made so strong an impression upon the judges. The number of performances given this "epic rhapsody," as Mr. Bloch calls it, were due to the faith of the judges in the music. When it was awarded the $3,000 prize in the competition instituted by Musical America there was immediate and very genuine rivalry among the conductors for the first production of the work. Mr. Koussevitzky finally suggested that all the conductors who belonged to the jury should give it simultaneously. His suggestion met with immediate favor, though it is true that Mr Damrosch, after much and adroit diplomatic exchange, secured a performance of the work a day earlier than his colleagues. Such a welcome would not have been extended a score of the kind ordinarily produced by a contest and a monetary award. It is noteworthy, for example, that Mr. Koussevitzky declined to perform the Atterburg symphony of Schubert competition fame. The symphony of Bloch was chosen by the judges and performed on its merits. There is no question of its significance as a symphony, whatever its exact and ultimate status may prove to be.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who performed the symphony last Friday and Saturday in Boston, has under consideration its repetition in this city. Meanwhile certain preconceptions, which seemed to have occupied the mind of the musical public in advance of the performance of the work, are open for comment. One of them is the attitude which appears to deny Mr. Bloch the right to compose a symphony dedicated to and professedly representative of American ideals. It has been pointed out, with some emphasis on the part of the more conservative, that he was born in Switzerland, that he is of the Jewish race, and that most of his music, up to the present time, has been emphatically and profoundly racial in expression. Ernest Bloch has been in America only since 1916. Since that time he has become an American citizen. Can a composer of such background produce an American symphony?

***

The answer depends largely upon the definition of what an American symphony has to be. Anton Dvorak came to America in 1895, when he wrote a charming work, which has attained deserved popularity, the "New World" symphony. In this work he employed motives bearing ostensible relation to folk-music of the American soil. But the melodies suggested in the score were not original with the white American people. As for the quality of the music, it was Dvorak, in one of his most fortunately creative moods. And it was the music, as a certain commentator very truly put it, of a homesick Czech, longing for his native land.

This music was far more innocent of historical or interpretive intent than Mr. Bloch's. A distant relation to the emotion involuntarily expressed by Dvorak, in Bloch's development, is his powerful and prophetic-minded "Israel" symphony, played here a few weeks ago by Mr. Mengelberg. Here is spiritual nostalgia, expressed with a poignancy and depth of feeling that were not in the cosmos of the Bohemian peasant. Bloch's American symphony is in an entirely different category.

***

What is its title to citizenship? Certainly not the fact that the composer uses themes, many themes, associated with the whole span of the life of the American nation. Of these themes the ones that can be called authentically national are principally those by Stephen Foster, indubitably a one hundred percenter, and, if resemblance is sufficient, the parody of jazz tunes in the finale. The other themes are of aboriginal or alien descent. Like the American people, they come from England, Ireland, Germany and many other places. They stem from negro and Indian. They constitute the warp and woof of such national music as we possess. Beyond them, either musically or racially speaking, we cannot go for a family tree. The true Americans live now a rather disagreeable and limited existence on reservations, while the conquerors of the land proclaim its greatness—and theirs—to the breeze. Mr. Bloch quotes Indian themes, of the original Americans, in reference to the virgin soil and the history of the march of the nation, and he does this with much poetic feeling, but this musical background and panorama are not in themselves, any more than are the other thematic quotations, tokens of an American symphony.

As to Bloch's justification, moral as well as legal, emotional as well as that of eminent domain, in composing an American symphony, there can be no question. America holds the same place in the imagination of this composer of foreign descent as it held in the bosoms of the Pilgrim Fathers. They had reason to know what America meant, and so has he. The conception of a land with a unique and unbounded destiny is as likely to be implanted in an immigrant as it is to exist in the hallowed homes of generations of dwellers on the American soil. In fact, more likely. The bitter truth is that a relatively small percentage of Americans have pondered on the history, the significance, the destiny of this nation. While the name of Lincoln is on every tongue, and the name of Walt Whitman widely known—these men to whose memory the Bloch symphony is dedicated—the actual understanding of them in the average American breast is far from commensurate with their prophetic significance. It would not be impudent, and it would not be at all surprising, if a symphony which betrayed the consciousness that American musicians have longed to see realized in their art should come from a naturalized American citizen, with the vision and perspective of his experience, and with a conviction of Americanism that the individual long secure in the power and prosperity of his land often fails to feel. The complete sincerity of Mr. Bloch in this last work is beyond dispute. It is to be seen and felt in the score. Those who have talked with him at almost any time in the last two years could bear testimony to his obsession with this subject. No one could have been more fully aware of the nature of his task and its difficulties. The purpose may or may not have been completely fulfilled. That will be determined by the future. What we know is that an important contribution has been made by a great composer to the literature of American music.

***

Mr. Bloch has harmonized and developed in ways of his own many melodies which have been treated by other composers. It is noteworthy that as a rule he has employed very simple progressions. Sophisticated harmony is usually out of place with folk-music; it would have been especially inappropriate here. There is a theme in the second movement of the "America" symphony which is of Creole origin, and is employed in the score of Henry Gilbert's "Dance on Place Congo." The Gilbert harmonization, per se, is more interesting than that of Bloch. The appropriateness of Bloch's tonic and dominant harmony to his purpose, however, is evident. Wisely or unwisely, he has conceived of a symphony for the great mass of the people, couched in terms with which they are familiar. Popular idioms are to become assimilated elements of his own style.

What is a composer's treatment of a folk-melody, or his attitude toward folk-music, to be? Is the folk-element in music to loom as large in days to come as it did in the democratic nineteenth century? Can a peasant ever again come to America and write another New World symphony?

By all signs and tokens, no. Untutored communities of the past, whose state of mind and environment made possible the secretion of folk-music, are vanishing. The self-consciousness of the town will soon penetrate the furthest hamlet. Isolation, purity of ancestral traditions, the unconsciousness and naïveté that make great the art of uneducated peoples, are things of the past. Modern communications and dissemination of ideas have put an end to them. The peasant will never hold his own against the encroachment of more highly organized and culturally developed communities. Real folk-music cannot be made much longer. There will not be left any "folk" in the old and idyllic meaning of that term. The whole race will gear its knowledge, if not its intelligence, a notch higher. Then what becomes of folk-melody, plenary inspiration of so many great composers of the past, and well-spring, as many still claim, of the music of the future?

***

There is an immense store of folk-melody, so far as its actual material goes, still available for employment and research. But that is not the point. The racial spirit, of course, never dies. Old roots have a way of spreading and discovering new nourishment in the ground. The same principle holds true of all national schools of music. But the place of the individual artist, who has always, in the last analysis, borne the burden of artistic development, is more important today, in the light of rapidly changing conditions, than ever before. He is the man to perceive the beauty and truth of racial tradition and popular expression, and to preserve these things in his creations.

Left to themselves, peoples lose their way. The necessity for guidance is always there. By his example, in separating the true from the false, the real from what is shoddy, or inept, or vulgarly imitative, the individual artist comes to the rescue of his community. That is peculiarly his mission, and it was never more so than now. In a new cycle of civilization self-knowledge is more necessary than ever before. The sincerity of the artist must be strong enough—that, and his creative impulse—to survive his self-consciousness and not to lose the common touch, or kinship with the vital currents of feeling in his community. Every great figure has done this in the past, and every significant one will do so in the future. Perhaps it was not amiss that Mr. Bloch looked at American music, as it were, from the outside, before he began to exploit it in the artistic sense. What is astonishing is that with such a wealth of thematic material he has pre-

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, will give the 11th concert of the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series this week. A new score of special interest will be the piano concerto by Ernest Toch. The soloist will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, who has just returned from a year abroad, during which time he specially studied this score with the composer. Mr. Sanroma played the Toch concerto at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris last summer. The concert will open with Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 4, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, and close with a suite from Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers."

Bos Herald Dec. 23

LOUISE GROODY admits that h

* * * *

The performances of Bloch's "America" at the symphony concerts of the week just ended recall the competition in which it won first place. Sponsored by the periodical "Musical America," this competition elicited 91 scores—but no hitherto "unrecognized" geniuses. Without but a single exception the outstanding works came from composers of well-known abilities. The exception, one of the pieces accorded honorable mention, was a symphony by Robert Russell Bennett of New York city, at present a student in Paris and, incidentally, the orchestrator of much of Kern's "Showboat." The other works accorded this "mention" were "Broadway," a symphonic piece by Samuel Gardner; a Jazz Suite by Louis Gruenberg and "The Piper," a symphonic poem by Wintter Watts.

* * * *

After the symphony concerts of this week Mr. Koussevitzky will not be heard in Boston for the space of four weeks. The first week of the new year will find the orchestra in New York, and upon its return Arthur Honegger, composer of "Pacific 231," of "Judith" and of "King David," will conduct the concerts of Jan. 11 and 12, presumably to be devoted to his own music. For the concerts of Jan. 18 and 19 Senor Enrique Fernandez Arbos of Maidrid will return to Boston to lead the orchestra of which he was concert-master during the second term of Mr. Gericke as conductor.

* * * *

It is said that Mme. Honegger is to accompany her husband upon his trip to American shores and that in Boston as in other cities, she will be the soloist in his concertino for piano and orches-

* * * *

Jesus Sanroma, the young Boston pianist just returned from studies and recitals in Europe who is to play Toch's concerto with the Boston orchestra at the Symphony Concerts of this week, plans to give a recital of his own in Jordan Hall on the afternoon of Saturday, Jan. 12.

* * * *

Although Krenek's "Jonny Spielt

Bos Post Dec. 23

N.Y. Tribune

f orchestra by his Thursday Beethoven concerts.

Mr. Koussevitzky's numbers for the Boston Symphony concerts of January 3 and 4, in Carnegie Hall, have not yet been announced, but the program for Friday night, January 4, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, consists of Handel's twelfth concerto grosso, the Schumann piano concerto, with Jesus Sanroma as soloist, and Ernest Bloch's "America" symphony. This may, although not inevitably, imply that the Bloch symphony will figure on one of the Carnegie Hall programs.

Dec. 23

Sessions's Symphony

served certain big lines and central impressions, so that his work is not like a pot-pourri of popular airs but an organized and symphonic, if necessarily episodic, composition. For such organization of a score crowded with detail, a consummate technique was a necessity.

nance in he Symphony Koussevitzky's Symphony It was no small rising rly this s heard, Boston, at the International Festival for Contemporary Music. The correspondent of the Daily Telegraph sent this report to London:

Mr. Sessions, a pupil of Ernest Bloch and the winner last year of the American Prix de Rome, is exceedingly able and his work is full of humor and imagination. My own impression, after hearing the symphony in rehearsal and in public performance, is that the composer will presently give us something much better than this. His three movements present a tentative causerie rather than a synthesis.

"AMERICA" IS MASTERFUL RHAPSODY

By MOSES SMITH

Ernest Bloch's "America," which is being produced for the first time by five leading orchestras this week, crowds the other two numbers, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Ravel's "La Valse" into the "also ran" class at the current Boston Symphony concerts.

Contrary to his usual esoteric fashion, Bloch writes in a way that even a music critic can understand. Dedicating his work to Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, the composer gives a musical outline of American history in three episodes, the written pages of the score being freely sprinkled with literary asides, mostly Whitmania.

This vast program is carried out in musical speech by throwbacks to music of, or suggesting, the period and place. First the soil, music of the Indians, an English marching tune, the Mayflower, the landing of the Pilgrims. An old southern song suggests the South "befo' de war." "Swanee River" and "Pop Goes the Weasel" complete the picture. The dark hours of the Rebellion, ending "O Captain! My Captain!"

In the last movement — modern America, nervous, jazz-mad, material. But not for long. The composer's faith in the future, suggested from the very beginning by persistent use of a motto theme, bursts out into a great national anthem.

The composition is, in my opinion, "big stuff," though not a masterpiece. The gradual development leading to the anthem is magnificent, one of the greatest things of our time. The quoted tunes would, in other hands, have made of the work a jargon. Not so with Bloch. The structure is organic, the speech one-voiced. The orchestration is masterly in its economy, in its sureness of effect. Only occasionally does Bloch ramble, sentimentalize—and then, wonder of wonders, in the idiom of Puccini.

But the anthem itself, as sung by Harvard and Radcliffe students, was disappointing. It was a case of preparation surpassing achievement. This is an opinion based on a single hearing. A second impression tonight may cause it to be revised.

Music Notes and Comment

Vladimir Horowitz is prevented by illness from giving the recital scheduled for today at Symphony Hall. He will appear there Friday afternoon, Jan 4, instead, with the program announced for today. Tickets dated Dec 23 will be good for Jan 4. Those who wish it may secure a refund at the [illegible]

Mr Koussevitsky has set for this week's symphony concerts a program without a symphony. The novelty on it is the much discussed piano concerto of the modernist Toch, to be heard for the first time in America. Jesus Sanroma, formerly pianist of the Boston Symphony, the first and only pianist to hold a position as a permanent member of the orchestra, will be the soloist. He has been studying in Europe and has played this concerto there. Mr Sanroma, a Porto Rican, studied for some years in Boston, and has many local friends and admirers.

The English Singers, noted for their choice of unusually beautiful and seldom heard old music, have chosen a remarkably appealing Christmas program for their concert here tonight. Similar programs in New York have won them large audiences and high praise.

Coming concerts at Symphony Hall include Roland Hayes next Sunday, Horowitz Jan 4; the American debut of the Prague Teachers' Chorus Jan 5; Werrenrath Jan 6; Heifetz Jan 13 and the admirable pianist, unsurpassed in this generation, Walter Gieseking, Jan 20.

There is this week the usual holiday lull in recital giving. Nothing calls the reviewers to Jordan Hall until after New Year's. But then the musical season resumes in full flood.

The two guest conductors who will afford Mr Koussevitzky a midseason vacation from his duties with the Boston Symphony are to be the composer Honegger Jan 11 and 12 and the Spaniard E. Fernandez Arbos Jan 18 and 19. Honegger is known here by his opera "Judith," his tone poem "Pacific 231" his oratorio "King David," and other works. Arbos was concert master of the Boston Symphony a quarter of a century ago, under Gericke. He has since become a leading European orchestral conductor.

Gertrude Ehrhart, well-known Boston soprano, will sing an air from Krenek's jazz opera "Johnny Spielt Auf" and other interesting

N.Y. Times Dec. 23 1928

NEWS AND CO

BLOCH'S "AMERICA"

Work Shows Skillful Use of Native Themes —The Composer's Fitness for His Task

By OLIN DOWNES.

It is too soon to rush into print with ex cathedra utterances upon the subject of Ernest Bloch's symphony "America," given its first performances, almost simultaneously, in five different cities last week, and soon to be given other "first performances" in Los Angeles, Cleveland and Cincinnati. Few scores have been given such an impressive introduction to the public. Few prize competitions have brought out a work which made so strong an impression upon the judges. The number of performances given this "epic rhapsody," as Mr. Bloch calls it, were due to the faith of the judges in the music. When it was awarded the $3,000 prize in the competition instituted by Musical America there was immediate and very genuine rivalry among the conductors for the first production of the work. Mr. Koussevitzky finally suggested that all the conductors who belonged to the jury should give it simultaneously. His suggestion met with immediate favor, though it is true that Mr Damrosch, after much and adroit diplomatic exchange, secured a performance of the work a day earlier than his colleagues. Such a welcome would not have been extended a score of the kind ordinarily produced by a contest and a monetary award. It is noteworthy, for example, that Mr. Koussevitzky declined to perform the Atterburg symphony of Schubert competition fame. The symphony of Bloch was chosen by the judges and performed on its merits. There is no question of its significance as a symphony, whatever its exact and ultimate status may prove to be.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who performed the symphony last Friday and Saturday in Boston, has under consideration its repetition in this city. Meanwhile certain preconceptions, which seemed to have occupied the mind of the musical public in advance of the performance of the work, are open for comment. One of them is the attitude which appears to deny Mr. Bloch the right to compose a symphony dedicated to and professedly representative of American ideals. It has been pointed out, with some emphasis on the part of the more conservative, that he was born in Switzerland, that he is of the Jewish race, and that most of his music, up to the present time, has been emphatically and profoundly racial in expression. Ernest Bloch has been in America only since 1916. Since that time he has become an American citizen. Can a composer of such background produce an American symphony?

***

The answer depends largely upon the definition of what an American symphony has to be. Anton Dvorak came to America in 1895, when he wrote a charming work, which has attained deserved popularity, the "New World" symphony. In this work he employed motives bearing ostensible relation to folk-music of the American soil. But the melodies suggested in the score were not original with the white American people. As for the quality of the music, it was Dvorak, in one of his most fortunately creative moods. And it was the music, as a certain commentator very truly put it, of a homesick Czech, longing for his native land.

This music was far more innocent of historical or interpretive intent than Mr. Bloch's. A distant relation to the emotion involuntarily expressed by Dvorak, in Bloch's development, is his powerful and prophetic-minded "Israel" symphony, played here a few weeks ago by Mr. Mengelberg. Here is spiritual nostalgia, expressed with a poignancy and depth of feeling that were not in the cosmos of the Bohemian peasant. Bloch's American symphony is in an entirely different category.

***

What is its title to citizenship? Certainly not the fact that the composer uses themes, many themes, associated with the whole span of the life of the American nation. Of these themes the ones that can be called authentically national are principally those by Stephen Foster, indubitably a one hundred percenter, and, if resemblance is sufficient, the parody of jazz tunes in the finale. The other themes are of aboriginal or alien descent. Like the American people, they come from England, Ireland, Germany and many other places. They stem from negro and Indian. They constitute the warp and woof of such national music as we possess. Beyond them, either musically or racially speaking, we cannot go for a family tree. The true Americans live now a rather disagreeable and limited existence on reservations, while the conquerors of the land proclaim its greatness—and theirs—to the breeze. Mr. Bloch quotes Indian themes, of the original Americans, in reference to the virgin soil and the history of the march of the nation, and he does this with much poetic feeling, but this musical background and panorama are not in themselves, any more than are the other thematic quotations, tokens of an American symphony.

As to Bloch's justification, moral as well as legal, emotional as well as that of eminent domain, in composing an American symphony, there can be no question. America holds the same place in the imagination of this composer of foreign descent as it held in the bosoms of the Pilgrim Fathers. They had reason to know what America meant, and so has he. The conception of a land with a unique and unbounded destiny is as likely to be implanted in an immigrant as it is to exist in the hallowed homes of generations of dwellers on the American soil. In fact, more likely. The bitter truth is that a relatively small percentage of Americans have pondered on the history, the significance, the destiny of this nation. While the name of Lincoln is on every tongue, and the name of Walt Whitman widely known—these men to whose memory the Bloch symphony is dedicated—the actual understanding of them in the average American breast is far from commensurate with their prophetic significance. It would not be impudent, and it would not be at all surprising, if a symphony which betrayed the consciousness that American musicians have longed to see realized in their art should come from a naturalized American citizen, with the vision and perspective of his experience, and with a conviction of Americanism that the individual long secure in the power and prosperity of his land often fails to feel. The complete sincerity of Mr. Bloch in this last work is beyond dispute. It is to be seen and felt in the score. Those who have talked with him at almost any time in the last two years could bear testimony to his obsession with this subject. No one could have been more fully aware of the nature of his task and its difficulties. The purpose may or may not have been completely fulfilled. That will be determined by the future. What we know is that an important contribution has been made by a great composer to the literature of American music.

***

Mr. Bloch has harmonized and developed in ways of his own many melodies which have been treated by other composers. It is noteworthy that as a rule he has employed very simple progressions. Sophisticated harmony is usually out of place with folk-music; it would have been especially inappropriate here. There is a theme in the second movement of the "America" symphony which is of Creole origin, and is employed in the score of Henry Gilbert's "Dance on Place Congo." The Gilbert harmonization, per se, is more interesting than that of Bloch. The appropriateness of Bloch's tonic and dominant harmony to his purpose, however, is evident. Wisely or unwisely, he has conceived of a symphony for the great mass of the people, couched in terms with which they are familiar. Popular idioms are to become assimilated elements of his own style.

What is a composer's treatment of and environment made possible the secretion of folk-music, are vanishing. The self-consciousness of the town will soon penetrate the furthest hamlet. Isolation, purity of ancestral traditions, the unconsciousness and naïveté that make great the art of uneducated peoples, are things of the past. Modern communications and dissemination of ideas have put an end to them. The peasant will never hold his own against the encroachment of more highly organized and culturally developed communities. Real folk-music cannot be made much longer. There will not be left any "folk" in the old and idyllic meaning of that term. The whole race will gear its knowledge, if not its intelligence, a notch higher. Then what becomes of folk-melody, plenary inspiration of so many great composers of the past, and well-spring, as many still claim, of the music of the future?

***

There is an immense store of folk-melody, so far as its actual material goes, still available for employment and research. But that is not the point. The racial spirit, of course, never dies. Old roots have a way of spreading and discovering new nourishment in the ground. The same principle holds true of all national schools of music. But the place of the individual artist, who has always, in the last analysis, borne the burden of artistic development, is more important today, in the light of rapidly changing conditions, than ever before. He is the man to perceive the beauty and truth of racial tradition and popular expression, and to preserve these things in his creations.

Left to themselves, peoples lose their way. The necessity for guidance is always there. By his example, in separating the true from the false, the real from what is shoddy, or inept, or vulgarly imitative, the individual artist comes to the rescue of his community. That is peculiarly his mission, and it was never more so than now. In a new cycle of civilization self-knowledge is more necessary than ever before. The sincerity of the artist must be strong enough—that, and his creative impulse—to survive his self-consciousness and not to lose the common touch, or kinship with the vital currents of feeling in his community. Every great figure has done this in the past, and every significant one will do so in the future. Perhaps it was not amiss that Mr. Bloch looked at American music, as it were, from the outside, before he began to exploit it in the artistic sense. What is astonishing is that with such a wealth of thematic material he has pre-

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, will give the 11th concert of the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series this week. A new score of special interest will be the piano concerto by Ernest Toch. The soloist will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, who has just returned from a year abroad, during which time he specially studied this score with the composer. Mr. Sanroma played the Toch concerto at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris last summer. The concert will open with Bach's Brandenburg concerto No. 4, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, and close with a suite from Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers."

LOUISE GROODY admits that [illegible]

Bos Herald Dec. 23

* * * *

The performances of Bloch's "America" at the symphony concerts of the week just ended recall the competition in which it won first place. Sponsored by the periodical "Musical America," this competition elicited 91 scores—but no hitherto "unrecognized" geniuses. With but a single exception the outstanding works came from composers of well-known abilities. The exception, one of the pieces accorded honorable mention, was a symphony by Robert Russell Bennett of New York city, at present a student in Paris and, incidentally, the orchestrator of much of Kern's "Showboat." The other works accorded this "mention" were "Broadway," a symphonic piece by Samuel Gardner; a Jazz Suite by Louis Gruenberg and "The Piper," a symphonic poem by Wintter Watts.

Dec. 23

* * * *

After the symphony concerts of this week Mr. Koussevitzky will not be heard in Boston for the space of four weeks. The first week of the new year will find the orchestra in New York, and upon its return Arthur Honegger, composer of "Pacific 231," of "Judith" and of "King David," will conduct the concerts of Jan. 11 and 12, presumably to be devoted to his own music. For the concerts of Jan. 18 and 19 Senor Enrique Fernandez Arbos of Maidrid will return to Boston to lead the orchestra of which he was concert-master during the second term of Mr. Gericke as conductor.

Bos Post

* * * *

It is said that Mme. Honegger is to accompany her husband upon his trip to American shores and that in Boston as in other cities, she will be the soloist in his concertino for piano and orches-

* * * *

Jesus Sanroma, the young Boston pianist just returned from studies and recitals in Europe who is to play Toch's concerto with the Boston orchestra at the Symphony Concerts of this week, plans to give a recital of his own in Jordan Hall on the afternoon of Saturday, Jan. 12.

* * * *

Although Krenek's "Jonny Spielt

[illegible] by his [illegible] concerts [illegible]

Mr. Koussevitzky's numbers for the Boston Symphony concerts of January 3 and 4 in Carnegie Hall, have not yet been announced, but the program for Friday night, January 4, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, consists of Handel's twelfth concerto grosso, the Schumann piano concerto, with Jesus Sanroma as soloist, and Ernest Bloch's "America" symphony. This may, although not inevitably, imply that the Bloch symphony will figure on one of the Carnegie Hall programs.

Herald Tribune Dec. 23

Sessions's Symphony

First News of Performance in Europe

TWO years ago, at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky produced the first Symphony of Roger Sessions. It was played three times; made no small stir; clearly signaled a rising American composer. Early this month, at Geneva it was heard, for the first time outside Boston, at the International Festival for Contemporary Music. The correspondent of the Daily Telegraph sent this report to London:

Mr. Sessions, a pupil of Ernest Bloch and the winner last year of the American Prix de Rome, is exceedingly able and his work is full of humor and imagination. My own impression, after hearing the symphony in rehearsal and in public performance, is that the composer will presently give us something much better than this. His three movements present a tentative causerie rather than a synthesis.

TRANS. DEC. 24-'28

Music and M

A Rhapsody on America Made From Outside

Second Hearing and Clearer Impression of Bloch's Prize-Piece

DECIDEDLY, there are two audiences at the Symphony Concerts. At the instigation of a few overzealous spirits most of the company rose on Friday afternoon to stand solemnly (unless they were putting on wraps) through the commonplaces of Mr. Bloch's final "Anthem." The assembly of Saturday evening is sophisticated beyond that sort of thing. It gathers to hear music; prefers to hear it sitting; discovered no reason to rise because these banalities happen to salute America. In words and in tones "The Star-Spangled Banner" may leave something to be desired; but as verse and tune it overtops Mr. Bloch's balderdash. In New York, in Boston, in Chicago, not a reviewer spared that "Anthem"; nor is it likely to escape unscathed in other cities. The composer's ardors deceive him. His "Anthem" fills the weakest pages of his Rhapsody.

Mr. Koussevitzky discerned as much and did his best to strengthen them by rhythmic urge, broad phrasing, large sonority. He labored as well, and to ampler result, with the preceding pages of ascent, where the composer first sags and is audibly pumping to his climax. Elsewhere, the Rhapsody gained by clearer, warmer, more confident performance. The conductor better knew and felt it; the orchestra responded zealously; the audience listened intently. The first division moved more insistently and in sharper contrasts; the texture of the second, woven out of many American songs, was better defined; the din of a mechanized civilization had more satiric and Bloch-like bite. As on Friday, the applause was long and hearty; but it left no impression of a discoveed masterpiece as when, for example, "The Rite of Spring" was first played at Symphony Hall.

As it went to the reviewing ear, "America" neither gained nor lost by repetition. In mass and in detail the impression remained much the same. More, however, than at the first hearing, the piece seemed a European's homage of external admiration rather than rhapsodic outpouring of an American spirit, by the composer absorbed and in him crying for release. Imagine a European composer of sufficient American experience setting himself the task that Mr. Bloch undertook. The chances are that he would turn to American folk-song for materia musica; con Whitman for inciting verse; fasten upon the contrasts of North, South and, probably, West; revert to the America of The Pilgrims; pounce upon the America of the machines; vision human brotherhoods and similar beguilements, more fascinating as a rule to the European than the American imagination; end as likely as not, with an apotheosis to catch the communal ear. He would produce in short a music as plainly written from the outside as is this "Epic Rhapsody," prize-crowned as "representative of America." Mr. Bloch was born a European; well into middle life he dwelt and worked in Europe. He is also a man and a musician of strong idiosyncrasies. Though he love America with all his heart and mind and soul; though he abide here till the end of his days, he will remain a European settled among us, a composer of pith and moment by individual and racial qualities.

An American composer is in different case. However cosmopolitan his culture, he writes an American music from within. He has no need to search out motivs from American folk-song. He invents his own; while his mind and spirit give them American tang. As little need he turn the leaves of Whitman. America is in his blood and his living. He sees no occasion to hark back to the landing of The Pilgrims or the Civil War when American life is in pulse around him. In whatever mood he may contemplate our present American civilization, it kindles him to artistic purpose as it did Mr. Carpenter in "Skyscrapers." He has no desire to produce a Bloch-like "Anthem," because it is not his custom to cry in a loud voice that he loves his mother. He is less concerned with cosmic tonal visions of humankind than with the expression in music of his own corner in this American world.

New England blows through Mr. Hill's tone-poem to Amy Lowell's "Lilacs"; is open or under-note in his Symphony. There is a Scherzo in one of Mr. Chadwick's Symphonies—the second, if recollection holds—that is rough American play; "Noel" in his "Symphonic Sketches" is the voice of tender American sentiment, oversweetened to the very life; his "Vagrom Ballad" in the same series, American humor at tomfooleries. To hear Mr. Copland's Piano-Concerto was to find in tones out-speaking our nervous hurly-burly, our hollow hullabaloo. Not a little of Henry Gilbert's later music derives directly from the common American temperament genial and communicative, unaffected and choiceless. The New York of pleasure-seeking and the frivolities is written clear in Mr. Gershwin's symphonic pieces. If we must have an "epic," which is rather a large order for a music as young as ours, a modest composer in Chicago has more nearly approached it than any of his brethren. He chose, however, to call it no more than "Skyscrapers: Ballet of American Life in Three Scenes." Yet in that selfsame piece, most musically expressed, abides our America here and now, the America of city and town, alive and pungent, desirable and cherishable, be its mass, routine, naïvetés what they may. Never once does Mr. Bloch see or feel or express that America of the Americans.

Throughout and in essence "America: An Epic Rhapsody" is European and external; whereas Mr. Carpenter in his "Perambulator," his Concertino, his "Skyscrapers"; Mr. Hill in his "Lilacs" and his Symphony, Mr. Chadwick here and there; Mr. Gilbert oftener than not; Mr. Copland in his Concerto; Mr. Gershwin in his symphonic pieces and his musical plays (which at best are more significant than most "serious" musicians choose to believe) all write an intrinsically American music, recognizable as nothing else. They need none of Mr. Bloch's complex machinery because they write from within; none of his loud affirmations—was ever a score so foot-noted?—because their music speaks for its American self. There are high qualities a-plenty in his Rhapsody—they were recounted in this place last Saturday—but they remain intrinsically personal or essentially European.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

A "Unified" Program

YESTERDAY, for the concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wendt had selected a program which largely took into account the fact that it was to be played in the midst of the Christmas season. The place of honor at the beginning went to the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah." Immediately there followed a fantasy upon two Walloon Christmas Carols, by the Belgian composer, Joseph Jongen. And a little later, the orchestra played the whole of Chaikovsky's suite from the ballet "The Nutcracker,"—on the story of a fairy-tale of Hoffman, about a certain Marie's Christmas toys, and their wars on mice, and their various dances and games. The moods Mr. Wendt had thus indicated, he enlarged upon and amplified in the rest of his program. The motif of the children received further consideration in the Prayer and Angel's Scene out of Humperdinck's opera, "Hansel and Gretel"; the motif of the dance in Johann Strauss's overture to "Die Fledermaus" and in the Weber-Weingartner "Invitation to the Dance." There remained the air from Bach's suite in D major, excellently placed between Jongen's fantasy and the scene out of "Hansel and Gretel," and Jarnefelt's "Præludium" between Chaikovsky's suite and Weber's programmatic waltz.

There was much music that was entirely charming on this program. Advocates of the "unified program" could cite it in support of their thesis. Those who are inclined to disagree with the philosophy underlying that type of program making could find in it an equal evidence for their ideas. Having no axe to grind in the matter, no pet theory to support, one is inclined to feel that a whole afternoon of miniatures produces its weariness as much as might an august Berliner "Beethoven-Abend." By all means let Mr. Wendt play occasionally a Strauss waltz. It is peculiarly in place on a People's Symphony program. But why on earth follow it speedily with another waltz of Weber? The Nutcracker suite was a joy to listen to, drew much and deserved applause from an appreciative audience. But again, why follow its eight numbers with a Jarnefeldt prelude much in the same genre? Mr. Wendt is inclined to observe the unities in his programs. He has given heavy programs that demanded the most sustained attention throughout an entire afternoon. And now comes a program entirely the opposite. But contrast as well as unity has its place under the sun—yes, even in a "unified" program.

Neither Joseph Jongen nor Armas Jarnefelt are heard much here in Boston. Yet Jongen is a leading musician and composer of Belgium, who as a youth easily captured all the prizes offered at the local conservatory—Liége, and is professor of composition at the Brussels Conservatory. And Jarnefelt, in Finland, stands in second place only because there is the genius of Sibelius to tower above him. Jongen in his fantasy showed himself skilled in the devices of the science of composition, in the arts of compelling that science to evoke moods definite, interesting, at times agreeably persuasive. Sombre, darkening colors—browns in various shades, tints and half-tints, shall we say?—he likes best to throw into his picture. And his two tunes, the one an exceedingly naive diatonic little melody, the other piquant and sparkling, both benefited by the background he set for him. By all means, let the People's Symphony acquaint us further with the orchestral works of Joseph Jongen. And as to Jarnefelt's "Præludium"—it contained much that was charming and spicy. It would have been more tellingly effective had one heard it almost anywhere else than following the "Nutcracker" suite.

The orchestra played well throughout. It was probably at its best in Chaikovsky. Those definite effects, so easily marred, came with all definiteness and clarity. Mr. Wendt's conducting was at all times authoritative. The People's Symphony Orchestra seems by this time to have settled down to a new level of routine incomparably higher than any they have ever known. For the [illegible]

8 A MONITOR
DEC. 7 - 1928.

Bloch's "America"—Other Views

SPECIAL FROM MONITOR BUREAU

Chicago

ERNEST BLOCH'S "America" was the most stimulating constituent of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's concerts, Dec. 21 and 22. A previous study of Mr. Bloch's score did not make it seem as if his efforts would be weighted with success. "America" contains so many tunes of Indian, Negro and other origin that the composition presented the appearance of a potpourri of gargantuan proportions. The anthem, too, with which the piece concludes, did not leave an impression of originality.

Mr. Bloch's masterly technique saved his production from the failure which would have enveloped a similar work by a composer less able and adroit. This technique was concerned, not only with the gorgeous orchestral garb in which "America" was clothed, but the remarkable fashion in which the whole was fitted together, so that the total impression was one of unity and strength. For once the composer was able to forget that he must be racial at any cost. For once he looked at symphonic music through the medium of the theater. The anthem at the end of the piece might be banal, but the accumulation of excitement leading into it and the majestic sonority with which the tune is scored must have left even the most fastidious connoisseurs a little dazed. Of the success of "America" the listeners left no doubt. There was great applause and Mr. Stock and the orchestra—to whom the composer owes great gratitude—stood to acknowledge it. No attempt was made to encourage the audience, as Bloch wished, to sing the final hymn. And that, perhaps, was just as well.

Rosa Linda Soloist

The remainder of the program was devoted to Mendelssohn's seldom-played overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Debussy's "Fêtes," and two works for piano and orchestra—César Franck's Symphonic Variations and the Hungarian Fantasie by Liszt—which were performed by Rosa Linda. It has not been often that the concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra have presented their patrons with an artist as mature for her age as is Miss Linda. This performer, who is only 15, negotiated the two compositions with astonishing skill and brilliancy. Her strength may here and there have been insufficient to dominate the orchestra, but there was no doubt as to the charm of her touch and the certainty with which she overcame the difficulties of the works.

At the Opera the new performances of the week have been Halévy's "La Juive" (Dec. 19) and Donizetti's "L'Elisir d'Amore" (Dec. 22). In the former Mme. Leider took the rôle which in former performances had been the property of Rosa Raisa. The Rachel of the new artist was excellently conceived and not less excellently sung. As a whole, the performance lacked something of spontaneity, but Halévy's music is becoming strangely wan. It should be added that Charles Marshall was effective as Eleazar and Alexander Kipnis made the Cardinal into a more or less human figure. Donizetti's work brought forward Margherita Salvi as Adina, a part in which she played and sang with charm. Mr. Schipa was as fluent and elegant as usual in the music of Nemorino, and Barre Hill, one of the new American vocalists, sang with real beauty of tone and acted with less confidence the rôle of the young farmer who loves Adina.

The Apollo Club

The Apollo Club offered its annual performance of "The Messiah" Dec. 20. Edgar Nelson, who succeeded Harrison Wild as director of the organization, was highly successful in infusing enthusiasm into the singers' work. The choruses were interpreted with verve, and Mr. Nelson was able even to persuade the orchestra that Handel's music was worthy of its sense of poetry and its skill. The soloists, who also accomplished effective labors, were Ruth Rodgers, soprano; Karolyn Harris, contralto; Arthur Kraft, tenor, and Frank Cuthbert, bass.

F. B.

SPECIAL TO THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

CINCINNATI—The contribution of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra to the six simultaneous premières of Ernest Bloch's "America" had an unusual feature. Fritz Reiner conducted the Christmas festival concert on Dec. 20, when the Bloch composition was presented, had asserted it was his object to present the Bloch music in the spirit in which it was composed, and he had made preparations to utilize the most distinctively "American" chorus that could be assembled in Cincinnati.

Mr. Reiner, a native Hungarian, became an American citizen last July. He has been impressed by phases of American life which he regards as peculiar to the United States. One of these is the participation of American mothers in careers other than in motherhood. Another is the public school system. Accordingly he determined that these two points of view should be represented. For the first, he chose a choral group known as "The Mothersingers." This is a Cincinnati chorus of 135 mothers, led by Will R. Reeves, Cincinnati director of community singing. To these, Mr. Reiner added a chorus of 1000 voices taken from the public and parochial high schools of Cincinnati. Fifteen schools were represented, and each unit of the chorus learned the Bloch score before they were assembled for final rehearsals.

Chorus in Gallery

No stage in Cincinnati is large enough to accommodate such a group, and accordingly the entire gallery of the Music Hall was used for the high school chorus. The orchestra and the "Mothersingers" occupied the stage. It was discovered that of the 135 mothers on the stage 54 had children singing in the gallery.

When these two choruses were joined in the concluding strains of the Bloch rhapsody, the emotional effect was, of course, tremendous. Throughout the last five minutes applause, cheering and shouts of "Bravo," made the music almost inaudible.

Such a performance proves one thing. Whatever the ultimate verdict may be regarding the Bloch score from a musical standpoint, it is obvious that it has compelling emotional power and that an audience can be made to come to its feet with the final movement.

This is interesting in the light of what goes before in the composition. Up to the conclusion no one would be likely to assert that the music is primarily emotional in significance. Indeed, the composer has deliberately worked against this end, both by following a very elaborate program, and by fastening attention upon the extraordinary dexterity with which he has utilized folk songs, dance tunes and hymns. His constant quotation, however authentic as to sources, contributes to the program rather than to the power and sweep of the music itself. It becomes impressive as an exercise in dexterity rather than as a compelling bit of origination.

Nevertheless, Bloch has used these materials with great felicity. The string quartet, for example, at the opening of the second movement, is beautiful writing, and is a noble preservation of an American folk tune. Indeed, the skill with which these familiar melodies are orchestrated is extraordinary, and it is only in the material with which they are joined that occasional banalities are evident.

The festival was marked also by a brilliant presentation of the Debussy cantata, "The Blessed Damozel." It was ably handled by orchestra and the chorus of the "Mothersingers." It became also a triumph for Ruth Townsend, Cincinnati mezzo-soprano. Hulda Lashanska had been engaged to sing the exquisite soprano score, and came to Cincinnati for rehearsals. At the last moment she was prevented from appearing and with only one rehearsal Mrs. Townsend learned the soprano soli as well as the contralto score, for which she had been engaged, and gave a musicianly performance. Cincinnati lost nothing by the change.

The Mothersingers presented also a group of Christmas cantatas of Prætorius, Cornelius and Gevaert, and the high school chorus sang five familiar Christmas songs and hymns.

ca" in the programs he is prepa[illegible] the next visit of the Symphon[illegible] ra to that city. The only pieces [illegible] ly chosen thus far are Mr. Car[illegible]
's "Skyscrapers" and Toch's Con[illegible] ith Mr. Sanromá as pianist.

isseurs in orchestral tone seeme[illegible] ee last Friday and Saturda[illegible] hubert's "Unfinished Symphony"[illegible] by the seating of the Symphony[illegible] ra on a level. Over Ravel's [illegible] opinion was divided. Some be[illegible] hat it neither gained nor lost, es[illegible] in the performance of Saturday.[illegible] und the edge of the music dulled.[illegible] ting his experiments, Mr. Kouss[illegible] will next keep the strings on but raise the wood winds and the

TRANS. DEC. 24-'28

A Rhapsody on America Made From Outside

Second Hearing and Clearer Impression of Bloch's Prize-Piece

DECIDEDLY, there are two audiences at the Symphony Concerts. At the instigation of a few overzealous spirits most of the company rose on Friday afternoon to stand solemnly (unless they were putting on wraps) through the commonplaces of Mr. Bloch's final "Anthem." The assembly of Saturday evening is sophisticated beyond that sort of thing. It gathers to hear music; prefers to hear it sitting; discovered no reason to rise because these banalities happen to salute America. In words and in tones "The Star-Spangled Banner" may leave something to be desired; but as verse and tune it overtops Mr. Bloch's balderdash. In New York, in Boston, in Chicago, not a reviewer spared that "Anthem"; nor is it likely to escape unscathed in other cities. The composer's ardors deceive him. His "Anthem" fills the weakest pages of his Rhapsody.

Mr. Koussevitzky discerned as much and did his best to strengthen them by rhythmic urge, broad phrasing, large sonority. He labored as well, and to ampler result, with the preceding pages of ascent, where the composer first sags and is audibly pumping to his climax. Elsewhere, the Rhapsody gained by clearer, warmer, more confident performance. The conductor better knew and felt it; the orchestra responded zealously; the audience listened intently. The first division moved more insistently and in sharper contrasts; the texture of the second, woven out of many American songs, was better defined; the din of a mechanized civilization had more satiric and Bloch-like bite. As on Friday, the applause was long and hearty; but it left no impression of a discoveed masterpiece as when, for example, "The Rite of Spring" was first played at Symphony Hall.

As it went to the reviewing ear, "America" neither gained nor lost by repetition. In mass and in detail the impression remained much the same. More, however, than at the first hearing, the piece seemed a European's homage of external admiration rather than rhapsodic outpouring of an American spirit, by the composer absorbed and in him crying for release. Imagine a European composer of sufficient American experience setting himself the task that Mr. Bloch undertook. The chances are that he would turn to American folk-song for materia musica; con Whitman for inciting verse; fasten upon the contrasts of North, South and, probably, West; revert to the America of The Pilgrims; pounce upon the America of the machines; vision human brotherhoods and similar beguilements, more fascinating as a rule to the European than the American imagination; end as likely as not, with an apotheosis to catch the communal ear. He would produce in short a music as plainly written from the outside as is this "Epic Rhapsody," prize-crowned as "representative of America." Mr. Bloch was born a European; well into middle life he dwelt and worked in Europe. He is also a man and a musician of strong idiosyncrasies. Though he love America with all his heart and mind and soul; though he abide here till the end of his days, he will remain a European settled among us, a composer of pith and moment by individual and racial qualities.

An American composer is in different case. However cosmopolitan his culture, he writes an American music from within. He has no need to search out motivs from American folk-song. He invents his own; while his mind and spirit give them American tang. As little need he turn the leaves of Whitman. America is in his blood and his living. He sees no occasion to hark back to the landing of The Pilgrims or the Civil War when American life is in pulse around him. In whatever mood he may contemplate our present American civilization, it kindles him to artistic purpose as it did Mr. Carpenter in "Skyscrapers." He has no desire to produce a Bloch-like "Anthem," because it is not his custom to cry in a loud voice that he loves his mother. He is less concerned with cosmic tonal visions of humankind than with the expression in music of his own corner in this American world.

New England blows through Mr. Hill's tone-poem to Amy Lowell's "Lilacs"; is open or under-note in his Symphony. There is a Scherzo in one of Mr. Chadwick's Symphonies—the second, if recollection holds—that is rough American play; "Noel" in his "Symphonic Sketches" is the voice of tender American sentiment, oversweetened to the very life; his "Vagrom Ballad" in the same series, American humor at tomfooleries. To hear Mr. Copland's Piano-Concerto was to find in tones out-speaking our nervous hurly-burly, our hollow hullabaloo. Not a little of Henry Gilbert's later music derives directly from the common American temperament genial and communicative, unaffected and choiceless. The New York of pleasure-seeking and the frivolities is written clear in Mr. Gershwin's symphonic pieces. If we must have an "epic," which is rather a large order for a music as young as ours, a modest composer in Chicago has more nearly approached it than any of his brethren. He chose, however, to call it no more than "Skyscrapers: Ballet of American Life in Three Scenes." Yet in that self-same piece, most musically expressed, abides our America here and now, the America of city and town, alive and pungent, desirable and cherishable, be its mass, routine, naivétés what they may. Never once does Mr. Bloch see or feel or express that America of the Americans.

Throughout and in essence "America: An Epic Rhapsody" is European and external; whereas Mr. Carpenter in his "Perambulator," his Concertino, his "Skyscrapers"; Mr. Hill in his "Lilacs" and his Symphony, Mr. Chadwick here and there; Mr. Gilbert oftener than not; Mr. Copland in his Concerto; Mr. Gershwin in his symphonic pieces and his musical plays (which at best are more significant than most "serious" musicians choose to believe) all write an intrinsically American music, recognizable as nothing else. They need none of Mr. Bloch's complex machinery because they write from within; none of his loud affirmations—was ever a score so foot-noted?—because their music speaks for its American self. There are high qualities a-plenty in his Rhapsody—they were recounted in this place last Saturday—but they remain intrinsically personal or essentially European.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

A "Unified" Program

YESTERDAY, for the concert of the People's Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wendt had selected a program which largely took into account the fact that it was to be played in the midst of the Christmas season. The place of honor at the beginning went to the Pastoral Symphony from Handel's "Messiah." Immediately there followed a fantasy upon two Walloon Christmas Carols, by the Belgian composer, Joseph Jongen. And a little later, the orchestra played the whole of Chaikovsky's suite from the ballet "The Nutcracker,"—on the story of a fairy-tale of Hoffman, about a certain Marie's Christmas toys, and their wars on mice, and their various dances and games. The moods Mr. Wendt had thus indicated, he enlarged upon and amplified in the rest of his program. The motif of the children received further consideration in the Prayer and Angel's Scene out of Humperdinck's opera, "Hansel and Gretel"; the motif of the dance in Johann Strauss's overture to "Die Fledermaus" and in the Weber-Weingartner "Invitation to the Dance." There remained the air from Bach's suite in D major, excellently placed between Jongen's fantasy and the scene out of "Hansel and Gretel," and Jarnefelt's "Præludium" between Chaikovsky's suite and Weber's programmatic waltz.

There was much music that was entirely charming on this program. Advocates of the "unified program" could cite it in support of their thesis. Those who are inclined to disagree with the philosophy underlying that type of program making could find in it an equal evidence for their ideas. Having no axe to grind in the matter, no pet theory to support, one is inclined to feel that a whole afternoon of miniatures produces its weariness as much as might an august Berliner "Beethoven-Abend." By all means let Mr. Wendt play occasionally a Strauss waltz. It is peculiarly in place on a People's Symphony program. But why on earth follow it speedily with another waltz of Weber? The Nutcracker suite was a joy to listen to, drew much and deserved applause from an appreciative audience. But again, why follow its eight numbers with a Jarnefeldt prelude much in the same genre? Mr. Wendt is inclined to observe the unities in his programs. He has given heavy programs that demanded the most sustained attention throughout an entire afternoon. And now comes a program entirely the opposite. But contrast as well as unity has its place under the sun—yes, even in a "unified" program.

Neither Joseph Jongen nor Armas Jarnefelt are heard much here in Boston. Yet Jongen is a leading musician and composer of Belgium, who as a youth easily captured all the prizes offered at the local conservatory—Liége, and is professor of composition at the Brussels Conservatory. And Jarnefelt, in Finland, stands in second place only because there is the genius of Sibelius to tower above him. Jongen in his fantasy showed himself skilled in the devices of the science of composition, in the arts of compelling that science to evoke moods definite, interesting, at times agreeably persuasive. Sombre, darkening colors—browns in various shades, tints and half-tints, shall we say?—he likes best to throw into his picture. And his two tunes, the one an exceedingly naive diatonic little melody, the other piquant and sparkling, both benefited by the background he set for him. By all means, let the People's Symphony acquaint us further with the orchestral works of Joseph Jongen. And as to Jarnefelt's "Præludium"—it contained much that was charming and spicy. It would have been more tellingly effective had one heard it almost anywhere else than following the "Nutcracker" suite.

The orchestra played well throughout. It was probably at its best in Chaikovsky. Those definite effects, so easily marred, came with all definiteness and clarity. Mr. Wendt's conducting was at all times authoritative. The People's Symphony Orchestra seems by this time to have settled down to a new level of routine incomparably higher than any that have ever known. For the maintainment of that new level they are to be congratulated; for maintaining that level even more so. But routine has its dangers, no matter how high the level.

A. H. M.

Programs to Hand

From Roland Hayes, tenor, for his concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 30:

Stets Barg die Liebe Sie—Heller Blick...Haydn
"Repose of the Holy Family" from "The Childhood of Christ" ..... Berlioz Mon bras pressait ..... Widor
Extase ..... Duparc
Le thé ..... Kœchlin
Air of Azael from "The Prodigal Son"..Debussy
Sofie gathering Flowers (Chinese)..... Griffes
The Red Cockatoo (Chinese)..... Fairchild
A Feast of Lanterns (Chinese)..... Griffes
Sakura (Japanese) ..... Matsuyama Negro Spirituals:
"You better min' "
"When I Die"
"Jesus lay your head in de Winder"
"Its Me, O Lord"

From George Copeland, pianist, for his concert in Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 3:

Gavotte—Mussette ..... Gluck
Sarabande—Passepied I—Passapied II .. Bach
Aria Pastoralis Variata ..... Murschhauser
Study—Waltz ..... Chopin
Gymnopédie No. III..... Satie
Danse de Puck—Et la Lune Descend sur le Temple Qui Fût—La Puerta del Vino—General Lavine—Clair de Lune—Voiles— Debussy
Bourrée Fantasque ..... Chabrier
Danse Espagnole from the Opera, "La Vida Breve" ..... De Falla
Danse Espagnole No. V..... Granados
Malaguena ..... Albeniz
Tientos—Danse Gitane ..... Infante
Malaguena ..... Lecuona

From the Prague Teachers' Chorus of men's voices, Metod Dolezil, conductor, for its first concert in the United States at Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 5:

Song of the Sea ..... Smetana
The Wicked Sweetheart—The Sparrow's Party ..... Dvorák
On the Field Path—Hymnus..... Foerster
Seventy Thousand ..... Janácek
Christmas Cradle Song ..... Novak
Ostrava, "Epic of the Coal-Mines"..... Kunc
The Morning Star (Slovak)..... Kricka
Song of the Border Sentinels (Czech)...Jindrich
The Barracks (Slovak) ..... Kricka
Tit-for-Tat (Czech Dance) ..... Palla
Cardás (Slovak Dance) ..... Pokorny

Incidents and Prospects

Contrary to report in New York, Mr. Koussevitzky will not include Bloch's "America" in the programs he is preparing for the next visit of the Symphony Orchestra to that city. The only pieces definitely chosen thus far are Mr. Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" and Toch's Concerto, with Mr. Sanromá as pianist.

Connoisseurs in orchestral tone seemed to agree last Friday and Saturday that Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" gained by the seating of the Symphony Orchestra on a level. Over Ravel's "Waltz" opinion was divided. Some believed that it neither gained nor lost, especially in the performance of Saturday. More found the edge of the music dulled. Continuing his experiments, Mr. Koussevitzky will next keep the strings on a level; but raise the wood winds and the brass.

B MONITOR DEC. 7-1928

Bloch's "America"—Other Views

SPECIAL FROM MONITOR BUREAU

Chicago

ERNEST BLOCH'S "America" ... the most stimulating con... the Chicago Sym... Dec. 21 ... "Bravo," made the music almost inaudible.

Such a performance proves one thing. Whatever the ultimate verdict may be regarding the Bloch score from a musical standpoint, it is obvious that it has compelling emotional power and that an audience ... made to come to its feet with ...al movement.

... is interesting in the light of ... goes before in the composition. ... the conclusion no one would be ... to assert that the music is ...rily emotional in significance. ...d, the composer has deliberately ...d against this end, both by ...ving a very elaborate program, ...by fastening attention upon the ...ordinary dexterity with which ...as utilized folk songs, dance ...s and hymns. His constant quo... however authentic as to ...ces, contributes to the program ...er than to the power and sweep ...e music itself. It becomes im...sive as an exercise in dexterity ...er than as a compelling bit of ...ination.

...evertheless, Bloch has used these ...erials with great felicity. The ...ng quartet, for example, at the ...ning of the second movement, is ...utiful writing, and is a noble ...servation of an American folk ...e. Indeed, the skill with which ...se familiar melodies are orches...ted is extraordinary, and it is ...ly in the material with which they ...e joined that occasional banalities ...e evident.

The festival was marked also by a ...illiant presentation of the Debussy ...ntata, "The Blessed Damozel." It ...as ably handled by orchestra and ...e chorus of the "Mothersingers." It ...ecame also a triumph for Ruth ...ownsend, Cincinnati mezzo-soprano. ...tulda Lashanska had been engaged to sing the exquisite soprano ...core, and came to Cincinnati for ...ehearsals. At the last moment ...he was prevented from appearing ...nd with only one rehearsal Mrs. ...ownsend learned the soprano soli ...s well as the contralto score, for ...which she had been engaged, and ...gave a musicianly performance. Cincinnati lost nothing by the change.

The Mothersingers presented also a group of Christmas cantatas of Prætorius, Cornelius and Gevaert, and the high school chorus sang five familiar Christmas songs and hymns.

G. Fox & Co. Inc. HARTFORD
The Annual After-
...Dec. 21
BOYLE PRODUCTS CO., New Haven, Conn.
BOYLE
GRAPEFRUIT CORER
Out Come Seeds and Core in a Jiffy!
...Makes a messy job, easy and quick, and the fruit looks better to serve. Ask Your dealer for circular and good proposition for agents.
KANSAS CITY POWER & LIGHT
Kansas City Power & Light Co. reports for 12 months ended Nov. 30 profit of $5,338,297 after interest, amortization, taxes, etc., but before depreciation, compared with $4,673,581 in previous 12 months. November profit was $534,425 after the above charges, compared with $465,554 in November, 1927.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

52

Dec 27 - TRANS - '28

Music and Musicians === Plays an

Ernest Toch, Adding Humor To Modernism

Mr. Koussevitzky Presents His Piano-Concerto and "The Disturbance"

After Ernest Bloch
Follows Ernest Toch

NOT poetry certainly, but fact. With the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Opus 38, to be played at the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky is introducing Toch to Boston with an outstanding piece, one that has won wide praise. Said Mr. L. Dunton Green in The Chesterian, in his account of the International Musical Festival at Frankfort in 1927, "The Concerto will rank in course of time among the great pianoforte concertos of musical literature." At the same time Mr. Koussevitzky is re-introducing to Boston Mr. Jesus-Maria Sanromá, after eighteen months of study in Berlin and Paris, under Schnabel and Cortot. For the performance of this Concerto Mr. Sanromá also studied with Toch himself. At Mr. Koussevitzky's Paris concerts of 1928 Mr. Sanromá played it. He will also repeat it next week in New York.

Ernest Toch is one of that host of musicians who were intended and educated by their parents for some profession other than music. He was born in Vienna in December, 1887, and at the university studied philosophy and medicine. Reviewers speak of him as Dr. Toch—whether M. D. or Ph. D does not appear. However, in 1909 and 1910 he won the Mozart Exhibition and the Mendelssohn Exhibition, both prizes for musical studies, and in four consecutive years received the Austrian State Prize for composition. He studied the piano under Rehberg at Frankfort. Otherwise he is largely self-taught. In 1913 he was made Professor of Composition at the Hochschule für Musik at Mannheim. He has written largely for orchestra, chamber orchestra, and for various ensemble combinations. In style, he is a thoroughly modern eclectic. One can trace in the Piano Concerto, for example, such divergent influences as Debussy, Stravinsky, the modern South-German mehanists, Schönberg, of course, and to go farther back, of Weber and Schumann. From the evidence of the printed score his own individuality is strong enough to fuse all this into a style that is distinctly personal, that is Ernest Toch and no other.

Toch takes to polytonality as a duck takes to water. He is not content, however, with merely combinations of keys; there are passages in which rigorous whole-tone schemes are set on one plane against definite tonalities on other planes. Toch likes dissonance. The most cursory examination of the score of the concerto will reveal the diminished and augmented octave as favorite intervals. He is of course vigorously contrapuntal, as are all thorough-going modernists. But he does not eschew melody. Melody has as much place in the score of the new piece as in Concertos of many a classic composer.

The piano concerto (without key designation but actually in the key of C major) is dedicated to the composer's wife. It is scored for the usual large orchestra with a few slight modifications. Toch asks two of the unusual clarinets in C in addition to two of the more ordinary clarinets in B-flat. He further directs that the players of the two B-flat clarinets take at certain times clarinets in D. He asks for the sonorous contrabass tuba instead of the customary bass tuba. Like Bloch last week, he uses a percussion section that requires three players in addition to the kettle-drummer. In a preliminary note Toch also says: "The orchestra does not play the rôle of accompanist to a solo instrument, but rather that of developing a consistently symphonic score." From this remark it must not be argued that the piano-part is merely an orchestral voice. By no means. The solo-opportunities are as ample as in most concertos of his romantic forbears. It is trite and true that one cannot carry water on two shoulders; but Toch ably accomplishes the dual purpose of making his piano a genuine solo-instrument and at the same time of writing a true symphonic score.

"Toch is firmly rooted in the great tradition of German classicists," says Mr. Green in the article above mentioned, "but his spirit is thoroughly modern, unsentimental (but by no means unfeeling) and immensely dynamic. From the first fragmentary exposition of the principal theme (portions of which pervade the whole of the other movements) the attention is firmly riveted. When it appears in its full form it fulfills all the expectations aroused by the initial fragment; and when after it has been leavened by a strangely beautiful polytonal second theme, it bursts out of the brass in augmentation, as the final climax of the first movement, the impression is simply overwhelming."

The three movements are: I. Molto Pesante; II. Adagio; III. Rondo Disturbato. At the beginnng the piano in stark octaves weightily announces the motiv out of which the principal theme grows. The single measure has a sevenfold repetition, in different rhythms and at different speeds. With the dominant motiv thus persistently exposed there is no excuse for any listener "getting lost." The orchestra follows with eight measures of material which is not used again until very near the end of the Concerto. Next it devotes itself to many and various repetitions of the one-measure motiv. A long and brilliant cadenza in which the favorite altered octaves are in evidence, leads into an Allegro. Clarinets announce the full theme, which becomes the subject of an extended fugal exposition. After this has passed through several stages of development, introducing several secondary themes, the piano "tenderly and quietly" introduces a second theme which alternates between a melodic lyricism and an impish piquancy. For sixteen measures the piano travels alone with this theme, after which the first violins take it up against a delicate accompaniment in the other strings and ornamental passage-work in the piano. A little later, the piano announces another contrasting theme, in even quieter mood than the preceding. The orchestra (this time an oboe and flutes) takes it up after a few measures.

When the decrescendo has continued to delicate sonorities, 'cellos and basses mysteriously return with the first motiv, pizzicato. Gradually they lead to a development of this principal theme, from which the piano emerges with a cadenza-like passage, which muted strings soon join in the second contrasting theme. The sonorities here are lovely. When the piano takes up this theme only three solo-strings continue in the ensemble. Lower strings begin another development of the principal theme; while wood-winds, muted brass and three high solo strings continue with the contrast theme. These eventually merge into a huge crescendo which develops the main theme and leads to the section in which the chief motiv is heard in augmentation—that is in notes of longer time-value than is usual for it—and powerfully in all the bass instruments. Between the first three statements of this motiv are breath-taking piano glissandos. More and more broadly the theme is developed, coming finally to a brilliant climax in which piano and orchestra share a last unison statement of the theme.

The Adagio is a movement of rare delicacy. The harmonies of Debussy are used to give all manner of tints and shades and half-shades. The style suggests somewhat the imaginative flights of a Bach in his freest fantasias, and the suggestion holds true of the piano part in many a measure and of various orchestral voices as well. Where the piano is brilliant it suggests the pianistic style of Weber. It is largely a chamber orchestra that provides accompaniment. Soloists from the strings are combined with individual voices in the winds. There are climaxes, to be sure, in which the full orchestra is used; but they are not much more than contrast against the more delicate instrumentation. The form is three-part. The theme of the first part is harmonic—shifting, swaying, subtle chords, interwoven with various contrapuntal strands. The piano sings it first, then it is developed in the orchestra. The piano also announces the contrasting theme, a long, flowing, melodic line. An oboe follows with it, after which there is development and then return to the first part.

In the "Rondo Disturbato" the composer has his little joke with his themes. A humorous effect he surely intended with his "struggle" near the end of the movement. But there is also a humor far beyond that which the composer intended. A small boy on a farm, imitating a cackling hen, might be said by his musical brother from the city, to be burlesquing Toch's theme as well as copying the fowl. In fact Mr. Sanromá possesses a program which he cherishes, on the back of which is scrawled in pencil this theme, ornamented with birds of the barnyard. Let no one misunderstand. Toch did not "lift" his theme from the poultry-yard. Nothing was further from his thought. He merely wrote a theme which should be piquant, saucy, suitable to a lively rondo and to the humorous use he was going to make of it near the end of his score. Enter Mr. Sanromá (orchestral musicians are notoriously apt at tracing "sources" and making comparisons between themes in various works) happily making noises which contain the denominator common to the musical theme and the hen on its nest. By some trick of chance, Toch, unknown to Sanromá, its also in the garden, overhears the pianist, himself succumbs to the spirit of the unintended joke, takes the discovery quickly into the house to the good Frau. Eventually composer and pianist in their glee together ornament the back of the program.

As chief contrast for this theme Toch places the most sustained theme in the Concerto. It enters in violins and 'cellos with the piano playing ornamental figuration. After which the rondo follows its usual course, as rondos should. But in the last repetition, before the lyric theme has sung itself to completion, it is rudely interrupted by the saucy main theme. Toch writes the words "The Disturbance" into the score. There comes swiftly a tremendous, cataclysmal, forbidding chord under the word of command, "Quiet!" after which there are three measures of rest with a long pause on the last measure. The lyric theme re-enters "timidly," the main theme interrupts, and we have the whole comedy over again. With a third attempt, the interrupting theme seems to gain ground; increases in vigor, but is again silenced. The fourth time it is not disturbed, it seems to have triumphed, but its triumph is short-lived; for trombones and strings, all in the highest registers, collapse to the depths by means of a sickening glissando. The composer annotates, ". . . But, but . . ." and "tearfully, likewise tragi-comically." Another long pause, and the piano, solo, goes on with the first theme, which has triumphed after all. Through another cadenza it leads to a brilliant and climactic orchestral statement of the main theme.

A. H. M.

The North

Ernest Toch

Composer of The New Piano-Concerto at The Symphony Concerts

SEE PAGE 142 FOR HERALD-GLOBE-POST CRITICISMS

Programs to Hand

From the Flute-Players' Club for concert of chamber-pieces in the gall of the Art Club next Sunday afternoo

Sonata for Flute, Viola da Gamba, Harp, Leclair
Sonata for Horn, Trumpet, Trombone..Poulenc
Three Counterpoints for Piccolo, English Horn, Violin, Violoncello..... Honegger
Quartet for Two Violins, Viola, Violoncello on The Name B-La-F, Dedicated to M. P. Belaieff:
Allegro .....Rimsky-Korsakov
Scherzo .....Liadov
Spanish Serenade .....Borodin
Finale .....Glazunov

A program to quicken expectation. The quartet made by the four Russians in honor of their patron and publisher is one of the jeux d'esprit of music. Seldom in this Western world does it come to hearing. Flute, harp, viola are a rare combination in the concert-hall. Leclair ventured it in the eighteenth century. And when within memory have horn, trumpet and trombone been mated for a chamber-piece? These sportive Parisians will try anything—once. The contributing virtuosi are Messrs. Elcus, Ludovici, Lefranc A. Zighera (Strings); Paul Bergor (Harp); Laurent (Flute); Speyer (English Horn); Valkenier (Horn); Mager (Trumpet), Rochut (Trombone).

From the Flonzaley Quartet for the second concert of their final series in Boston at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 9:

Quartet in D major (Op. 64, No. 5)...Haydn
Sonata for Two Violins and Violoncello ...Handel (Messrs. Pochon, Betti, d'Archambeau)
Quartet in E-flat major, Op. 127...Beethoven

From Miss Gertrude Ehrhart for her concert in Jordan Hall (Mr. Slonimsky, pianist) on Monday evening, Jan. 7—with many a departure from routine and much novel music:

"Se tu m'ami" from the Ballet with Songs, 'Pulcinella" ....Pergolese-Stravinsky
Air from the Opera, "Der Freischütz"..Weber
The Ugly Duckling: Fairy Tale from Hans Christian Andersen.....Prokofiev
Three Songs to Texts of Bogdanovitch..Dukelsky
L'Amour .....Obouhov
Gaetan's Song .....Gnessin
Invocation .....Bloch
Footsteps in the Sand.....Steinert
My Little Pool—A Very Great Musician (The Melancholy Story of an Unrequited Love) .....Slonimsky
Josephine's Song from "Pinafore".....Sullivan
The Man I Love.....Gershwin
Air with Jazz Interlude from the Opera "Jonny spielt auf" .....Krenek

Incidents and Prospects

Sibelius's Third Symphony, warmly received at the Symphony Concerts last October, will be repeated tomorrow and Saturday. To make room for it Bach's Concerto drops from the program. When the orchestra visits New York next week, the Symphony will again be played.

Mr. Sanromá's concert of piano-pieces announced for Saturday afternoon, Jan. 12, in Jordan Hall, is cancelled. He will be heard [illegible] Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 17.

The prizes for 1927 from the Paderewski Fund for American Composers have been awarded to Hans Levy Heniot of Lavinia—a suburb of Chicago—for orchestral pieces, and to Homer C. Humphrey of Boston for a chamber-piece. Mr. Heniot receives $1000; Mr. Humphrey, $500. Both are music-teachers. Mr. Humphrey is organist as well.

Though no date has been set, there is fair likelihood that Yehudi Menuhin, the child-prodigy of the violin who made such stir in New York last winter, will play in Boston before the season ends.

52

Dec 27 - TRANS - '28

Music and Musicians === Plays an

Ernest Toch, Adding Humor To Modernism

Mr. Koussevitzky Presents His Piano-Concerto and "The Disturbance"

After Ernest Bloch
Follows Ernest Toch

NOT poetry certainly, but fact. With the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Opus 38, to be played at the Symphony Concerts tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky is introducing Toch to Boston with an outstanding piece, one that has won wide praise. Said Mr. L. Dunton Green in The Chesterian, in his account of the International Musical Festival at Frankfort in 1927, "The Concerto will rank in course of time among the great pianoforte concertos of musical literature." At the same time Mr. Koussevitzky is re-introducing to Boston Mr. Jesus-Maria Sanroma, after eighteen months of study in Berlin and Paris, under Schnabel and Cortot. For the performance of this Concerto Mr. Sanroma also studied with Toch himself. At Mr. Koussevitzky's Paris concerts of 1928 Mr. Sanroma played it. He will also repeat it next week in New York.

Ernest Toch is one of the host of musicians who were intended and educated by their parents for some profession other than music. He was born in Vienna in December, 1887, and at the university studied philosophy and medicine. Reviewers speak of him as Dr. Toch—whether M. D. or Ph. D does not appear. However, in 1909 and 1910 he won the Mozart Exhibition and the Mendelssohn Exhibition, Imperial prizes for music studies, and in four consecutive years received the Austrian State Prize for composition. He studied the piano under Rehberg at Frankfort, and otherwise he is largely self-taught. In 1913 he was made Professor of Composition at the Hochschule für Musik at Mannheim. He has written largely for orchestra, chamber orchestra, and for various ensemble combinations. In style, he is a thoroughly modern eclectic. One can trace in the Piano Concerto, for example, such divergent influences as Debussy, Stravinsky, the modern South-German mechanists, Schönberg, of course, and to go farther back, of Weber and Schumann. From the evidence of the printed score his own individuality is strong enough to fuse all this into a style that is distinctly personal, that is Ernest Toch and no other.

Toch takes to polytonality as a duck takes to water. He is not content, however, with merely combinations of keys; there are passages in which rigorous whole-tone schemes are set on one plane against definite tonalities on other planes. Toch likes dissonance. The most cursory examination of the score of the concerto will reveal the diminished and augmented octave as favorite intervals. He is of course vigorously contrapuntal, as are all thoroughgoing modernists. But he does not eschew melody. Melody has its usual place in the score of the new piece as in Concertos of many a classic composer.

The piano concerto (without key designation but actually in the key of C major) is dedicated to the composer's wife. It is scored for the usual large orchestra with a few slight modifications. Toch asks two of the musical clarinets in C in addition to two of the more ordinary clarinets in B-flat. He further directs that the players of the two B-flat clarinets take at certain times clarinets in D. He asks for the octobass contrabass tuba instead of the customary bass tuba. Like Bloch last week, he uses a percussion section that requires three players in addition to the kettle-drummer. In a preliminary note Toch also says: "The orchestra does not play the rôle of accompanist to a solo instrument, but rather that of developing a consistently symphonic score." From this remark it must not be argued that the piano-part is merely an orchestral voice. By no means. The solo-opportunities are as ample as in most concertos of his romantic forbears. It is trite and true that one cannot carry water on two shoulders; but Toch ably accomplishes the dual purpose of making his piano a genuine solo-instrument and at the same time of writing a true symphonic score.

"Toch is firmly rooted in the great tradition of German classicists," says Mr. Green in the article above mentioned, "but his spirit is thoroughly modern, unsentimental (but by no means unfeeling) and immensely dynamic. From the first fragmentary exposition of the principal theme (portions of which pervade the whole of the other movements) the attention is firmly riveted. When it appears in its full form it fulfills all the expectations aroused by the initial fragment; and when after it has been leavened by a strangely beautiful polytonal second theme, it bursts out of the brass in augmentation, as the final climax of the first movement, the impression is simply overwhelming."

The three movements are: I. Molto Posante. II. Adagio. III. Rondo Disturbato. At the beginnng the piano in stark octaves weightily announces the motiv out of which the principal theme grows. The single measure has a sevenfold repetition, in different rhythms and at different speeds. With the dominant motiv thus persistently exposed there is no excuse for any listener "getting lost." The orchestra follows with eight measures of material which is not used again until very near the end of the Concerto. Next it devotes itself to many and various repetitions of the one-measure motiv. A long and brilliant cadenza in which the favorite altered octaves are in evidence, leads into an Allegro. Clarinets announce the full theme, which becomes the subject of an extended fugal exposition. After this has passed through several stages of development, introducing several secondary themes, the piano "tenderly and quietly" introduces a second theme which alternates between a melodic lyricism and an impish piquancy. For sixteen measures the piano travels alone with this theme after which the first violins take it up against a delicate accompaniment in the other strings and ornamental passage-work in the piano. A little later, the piano announces another contrasting theme, in even quieter mood than the preceding. The orchestra (this time an oboe and flutes) takes it up after a few measures.

When the decrescendo has continued to delicate sonorities, 'cellos and basses mysteriously return with the first motiv, pizzicato. Gradually they lead to a development of this principal theme, from which the piano emerges with a cadenza-like passage, which muted strings soon join in the second contrasting theme. The sonorities here are lovely. When the piano takes up this theme only three solo-strings continue in the ensemble. Lower strings begin another development of the principal theme: while wood-winds, muted brass and three high solo strings continue with the contrast theme. These eventually merge into a huge crescendo which develops the main theme and leads to the section in which the chief motiv is heard in augmentation—that is in notes of longer time-value than is usual for it—and powerfully in all the bass instruments. Between the first three statements of this motiv are breath-taking piano glissandos. More and more broadly the theme is developed, coming finally to a brilliant climax in which piano and orchestra share a last unison statement of the theme.

The Adagio is a movement of rare delicacy. The harmonies of Debussy are used to give all manner of tints and shades and half-shades. The style suggests somewhat the imaginative flights of a Bach in his freest fantasias, and the suggestion holds true of the piano part in many a measure and of various orchestral voices as well. Where the piano is brilliant it suggests the pianistic style of Weber. It is largely a chamber orchestra that provides accompaniment. Soloists from the strings are combined with individual voices in the winds. There are climaxes, to be sure, in which the full orchestra is used; but they are not much more than contrast against the more delicate instrumentation. The form is three-part. The theme of the first part is harmonic—shifting, swaying, subtle chords, interwoven with various contrapuntal strands. The piano sings it first, then it is developed in the orchestra. The piano also announces the contrasting theme, a long, flowing, melodic line. An oboe follows with it, after which there is development and then return to the first part.

In the "Rondo Disturbato" the composer has his little joke with his themes. A humorous effect he surely intended with his "struggle" near the end of the movement. But there is also a humor far beyond that which the composer intended. A small boy on a farm, imitating a cackling hen, might be said by his musical brother from the city, to be burlesquing Toch's theme as well as copying the fowl. In fact Mr. Sanromá possesses a program which he cherishes, on the back of which is scrawled in pencil this theme, ornamented with birds of the barnyard. But to continue: Toch did not "lift" his theme from the poultry-yard. Nothing was further from his thought. He merely wrote a theme which should be piquant, saucy, suitable to a lively rondo and to the humorous use he was going to make of it near the end of his score. Enter Mr. Sanromá (orchestral musicians are notoriously apt at tracing "sources" and making comparisons between themes in various works) happily making noises which contain the denominator common to the musical theme and the hen on its nest. By some trick of chance, Toch, unknown to Sanromá, is also in the garden overhears the pianist, himself succumbs to the spirit of the unintended joke, takes the discovery quickly into the house to the good Frau. Eventually composer and pianist in their glee together ornament the back of the program.

As chief contrast for this theme Toch places the most sustained theme in the Concerto. It enters in violins and 'cellos with the piano playing ornamental figuration. After which the rondo follows its usual course, as rondos should. But in the last repetition, before the lyric theme has sung itself to completion, it is rudely interrupted by the saucy main theme. Toch writes the words "The Disturbance" into the score. There comes swiftly a tremendous, cataclysmal, forbidding chord under the word of command, "Quiet!" after which there are three measures of rest with a long pause on the last measure. The lyric theme re-enters "timidly," the main theme interrupts, and we have the whole comedy over again. With a third attempt, the interrupting theme seems to gain ground; increases in vigor, but is again silenced. The fourth time it is not disturbed, it seems to have triumphed, but its triumph is short-lived; for trombones and strings, all in the highest registers, collapse to the depths by means of a sickening glissando. The composer annotates, ". . . But, but . . ." and "tearfully, likewise tragi-comically." Another long pause, and the piano, solo, goes on with the first theme, which has triumphed after all. Through another cadenza it leads to a brilliant and climactic orchestral statement of the main theme.

A. H. M.

The North

Ernest Toch

Composer of The New Piano-Concerto at The Symphony Concerts

SEE PAGE 142 FOR BOSTON GLOBE POST CRITICISMS

Programs to Hand

From the Flute-Players' Club for concert of chamber-pieces in the gall of the Art Club next Sunday afternoo

Sonata for Flute, Viola da Gamba, Harp... Leclair
Sonata for Horn, Trumpet, Trombone...Perrene
Three Contrapoints for Piccolo, English Horn, Violin, Violoncello.....Honegger
Quartet for Two Violins, Viola, Violoncello on The Name B-la-F, Dedicated to M. P. Belaieff:
Allegro.....Rimsky-Korsakov
Scherzo.....Liadov
Spanish Serenade.....Borodin
Finale.....Glazunov

A program to quicken expectation. The quartet made by the four Russians in honor of their patron and publisher is one of the jeux d'esprit of music. Seldom in this Western world does it come to hearing. Flute, harp, viola are a rare combination in the concert-hall. Leclair ventured it in the eighteenth century. And when within memory have horn, trumpet and trombone been mated in chamber-pieces? These sportive Parisians will try anything—once. The contributing virtuosi are Messrs. Eleus, Lebovici, Lefranc, A. Zighera (Strings); Paul Bazgor (Harp); Laurent (Flute); Speyer (English Horn); Valkenier (Horn); Mager (Trumpet), Rochut (Trombone).

From the Flonzaley Quartet for the second concert of their final series in Boston at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 9:

Quartet in D major, Op. 64, No. 5.....Haydn
Sonata for Two Violins and Violoncello.....Handel
(Messrs. Pochon, Betz, d'Archambeau)
Quartet in F-flat major, Op. 127.....Beethoven

From Miss Gertrude Ehrhart for her concert in Jordan Hall (Mr. Slonimsky, pianist) on Monday evening, Jan. 7, with many a departure from routine and much novel music:

"Se ti m'ami" from the Ballet with Songs, "Pulcinella".....Pergolese-Stravinsky
Air from the Opera, "Der Freischütz"...Weber
The Ugly Duckling; Fairy Tale.....
Hans Christian Andersen.....Prokofiev
Three Songs to Texts of Bogdanovitch.Dukelsky
L'Amour.....Obouhov
Gaetan's Song.....Gnessin
Invocation.....Bloch
Pictures in the Sand.....Steinert
My Lady's Past; A Very Great Musician; The Melancholy Story of an Unrequited Love.....Slonimsky
Cosidine's Song from "Pinafore".....Sullivan
The Man I Love.....Gershwin
Air with Jazz Intermede from the Opera "Jonny spielt auf".....Krenek

Incidents and Prospects

Sibelius's Third Symphony, warmly received at the Symphony Concerts last October, will be repeated tomorrow and Saturday. To make room for it Bach's Concerto drops from the program. When the orchestra visits New York next week, the Symphony will again be played.

Mr. Sanromá's concert of piano-pieces announced for Saturday afternoon, Jan. 12, in Jordan Hall, is cancelled. He will be heard instead in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 17.

The prizes for 1927 from the Paderewski Fund for American Composers have been awarded to Hans Levy Heniot of Ravinia—a suburb of Chicago—for an orchestral pieces, and to Homer C. Humphrey of Boston for a chamber-piece. Mr. Heniot receives $1000; Mr. Humphrey, $500. Both are music-teachers. Mr. Humphrey is organist as well.

Though no date has been set, there is a fair likelihood that Yehudi Menuhin, the child-prodigy of the violin who made such stir in New York last winter, will play in Boston before the season ends.

The South

(Walery, Paris)

Jesus-Maria Sanroma

Pianist in Toch's Concerto at The Symphony Concert

TRANS. Dec 28-29

Honegger's Program

Pieces Unheard, or Only Once Heard, in Boston

FROM Honegger in Paris, the management of the Symphony Orchestra has received the following program for the concerts at which he will be guest-composer and conductor, in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 11 and 12. It consists wholly of his own pieces, viz.:

Song of Nigamon.
Summer Pastoral.
Mimed Symphony, "Horace Victorieux."
Concertino for Piano and Orchestra (Pianist: Andrée Vaurabourg-Honegger.)
Nocturne from the Opera, "Judith" (Soprano: Cobina Wright.)
Symphonic Movement, "Rugby."

"The Song of Nigamon" (1917) is relatively early work. "Summer Pastoral" is a pretty little thing with hardly a trace of modernism. "Horace Victorieux," heard and vilified at the Symphony Concerts under Mr. Monteux in 1922, is Honegger fierce and acrid. The Concertino is an amiable trifle, played at Arthur Fiedler's concert of modernist music last February. The Nocturne is an episode in Honegger's first opera, "Judith," produced by the Chicago Company two years ago. "Rugby," suggested by the movements and tensities of a football match, is only a few months old . . . Many will regret the absence of "Pacific 231," the orchestral—or locomotive—piece by which Honegger is best known in America.

MONITER

Toch's Piano Concerto Performed in Boston

Dec, 29-'28

For the eleventh program of the season, Dec. 28 and 29, Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra proffered the Third Symphony of Sibelius, Toch's Piano Concerto and the concert version of Carpenter's Ballet, "Skyscrapers." The pianist was Jesús María Sanromá.

Toch's concerto, performed in Berlin and Frankfort in 1927 and played by Elly Ney with the Chicago Orchestra last season, was heard yesterday for the first time in Boston. Possibly, if it had been composed and presented to us much sooner, it might have made a more profound impression. But it is many years now since we first gazed with amazement upon "Feuerwerke," and not a few since "Horace Victorieux" burst upon our astonished vision. In the meantime, sitting at the feet of many instructors, from Stravinsky and Schönberg to Martinů and Copland, we have learned much about what may be done with tonalities, rhythms and orchestral colors. Thus nowadays, before mounting on pinions of enthusiasm, we are disposed to examine attentively the musical scene which is set before us.

Toch undoubtedly has the full equipment of the modern orchestral craftsman. Employing a huge aggregation of instruments, he can produce unpleasant sounds with the best of them. When he elects to return to the methods of the impressionists, as in his slow movement, he can even be ingratiating. But looking beneath his brave exterior, we are unable to discern what supports it. Was there substance here which required to be expressed? The musical material strikes us as undistinguished; the form and manner as highly competent, even brilliant, but in no way original. The humor, even, of the final movement is traditionally Teutonic. With regret, we are unable to share the expectation which has been expressed that this concerto "will rank in the course of time among the great pianoforte concertos of musical literature."

The concerto nevertheless had a warm reception. But this may very likely have been due in part to the playing of Mr. Sanromá, who is a musical product of Boston. He was graduated with honors from the New England Conservatory of Music and was formerly official pianist of the Boston Orchestra. For the last year and a half he has been in Europe, studying with Schnabel and Cortot. He also coached with Toch in this concerto, so that we may conclude that his interpretation of it was authentic. He accomplished a tour de force.

If we were bent on forecasting we should prefer to risk a surmise that the Third Sibelius Symphony has a better hope than the concerto of finding a permanent place in the repertory. The good impression it made on its first performance in Boston, six weeks ago, was confirmed yesterday. Mr. Koussevitzky was well advised in repeating it so soon. Carpenter's music again seemed to feel the need of its original setting on the Metropolitan Opera stage.

L. A. S.

MU

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this week has been slightly changed from the one that had been announced. The third symphony of Sibelius will be performed instead of Bach's concerto for two flutes, violin and string orchestra. Toch's concerto for piano and orchestra will be heard for the first time in Boston and Mr. Sanroma will then play in public for the first time since his return from Europe, having studied with Cortot in Paris and Schnabel in Berlin. He played the piano part of this concerto when Mr. Koussevitzky produced the work in Paris last May. (Mr. Sanroma had studied it with the composer.)

This concerto was written at Mannheim in 1926. It was first performed at Berlin when Elly Ney gave a concert in 1927, playing in the same concert Brahms's B-flat major and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto for good measure. She was the pianist when Mr. Stock brought out the concerto in Chicago on Feb. 3 of this year—the first performance in the United States.

Toch, born at Vienna, in 1887, at first studied medicine, also philosophy in that city; but he gave up the idea of practising as a physician, and resolved to be a musician. As a composer he is wholly self-taught, but he won the Mendelssohn prize, the Mozart prize, and four times in succession the prize offered by the Austrian government for composers. He studied piano playing at Frankfort with Willy Rehberg, a Swiss pianist and composer. The list of Toch's compositions includes an opera "The Bacchantes" (after Euripides), incidental music for a play, a 'cello concerto, a symphony for solo voices, chorus, orchestra and organ, 12 string quartets; The Chinese Flute, a chamber symphony for 14 solo instruments and a soprano voice; piano pieces and violin pieces. He also has composed music for Andersen's story of the Princess and the Pea turned into a one-act opera.

The score of the concerto contains a note saying that to the orchestra belongs development of a symphonic work: it does not take the role of an accompaniment to the piano. "The composer begs the conductor to take this fact into consideration in that which concerns the composition of the orchestra and with regard to rehearsals."

The form of the concerto is free; the music, like much that is contemporaneous in this art, is written in the atonal and polytonal manner.

Carpenter's ballet music has been performed here under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. The ballet itself was brought out at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1926. It may be remembered that Diaghilev, meeting Carpenter in Paris, suggested a ballet with an American subject. Carpenter thought of music which should represent the hurry and

SYMPHONY IN MODERNIST PROGRAM

Dec 29

By MOSES SMITH

The current pair of Symphony concerts is something in the nature of a "Welcome Home" celebration for Jesus Maria Sanroma, young Boston pianist who, after more than a year of study abroad, returns as soloist in Ernest Toch's piano concerto. It is the first time the composer has appeared on a Boston Symphony program.

Mr. Sanroma had played this concerto at one of Mr. Koussevitzky's Paris concerts last spring. He had also studied it with the composer. His playing therefore has authority and conviction. The piano part is of great difficulty. But Mr. Sanroma had so well mastered his part that he devoted most of his attention to following the conductor's baton. He received a long ovation for his brilliant performance.

The concerto as a whole may be spoken of as wild, even in these days of savage music. Harsh and blaring dissonances are piled up one after another, a battery of percussion instruments dispenses assorted noises, and throughout the composer is writing in many keys simultaneously, or in no key at all. The sensational elements aside, there are a few beautiful passages, but a first hearing offers us no clue as to why the piece has been so warmly praised abroad.

Sibelius' third symphony in C major, heard here earlier in the year for the first time, opens the program. As we listened to this beautiful music for a second time we were increasingly mystified by the inability of conductors to make anything of this score in rehearsals. The first two movements, in Mr. Koussevitzky's version, seemed clear as daylight. Only the last movement seemed a bit puzzling. The present performance, which was evidently prepared hastily, was not so good as the first.

Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" was the last number, completing a modernist program. Coming immediately after Toch's concerto, it is not favorably placed. And yet allowing for this fact, we do not see in this work a great American picture, as others have called it. Clever it is, undoubtedly, but essentially second-rate.

BOS. DAILY ADVERTISER

December 29, 1928

San Roma Soloist In Toch Concerto

The tides of modernism beat strong upon Symphony Hall yesterday and today, when Ernst Toch's concerto for piano is given its first hearing in Boston.

Jesus Maria San Roma, young, ardent and accomplished pianist, was set to the difficult task of the solo portion of the new piece from the modernistic German. If San Roma were not so able an artist, the performance might have easily driven the conservatives from the concert hall.

For the music of Herr Toch may be called almost wildly modernistic. To the concerto form he brings new and almost unheard of rhythms, florid and warring themes, melodies set in the sharp idiom of jazz. With all this, he is well grounded in the Germanic tradition, and he proves craftsman par excellence.

If he strays from the strictures of the conventional concerto, it is because he feels he may with impunity. To his pianist he sets a monumental task, to orchestra and conductor a well-nigh insurmountable one. Upon it, Mr. Koussevitzky and his men piled vigor and ardor upon polytonal themes, hard-bitten melodies, demoniacally driven measures for brass and strings.

To make the modernistic program complete, Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," with Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner as soloists, completed the program. Sibelius Symphony in major had begun it.

ma[illegible] Among [illegible] Mrs. Jea[illegible] Marlow, who looks [illegible] but wa[illegible] down the [illegible] to help [illegible] and husband.

Post Dec 29

Symphony Members Entertain Conductor

For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the members last night entertained their conductor at dinner, when Serge Koussevitzky and Madame Koussevitzky were guests of honor at a dinner dance at the Hotel Statler. The members of the orchestra and their wives made up a party of 200.

Bos. Post
Dec. 30. 1928.

Honegger to Lead Next Symphony--- Musical Notes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When next the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Boston it will be led, not by Mr. Koussevitzky but by Arthur Honegger, young but already world-renowned French composer, now on his first visit to this country. The concerts to be conducted by M. Honegger are those of Jan. 11 and 12, and the programme will consist entirely of his compositions. Of these, a "Chant de Migamon" and the tone-poem "Rugby," which describes a game of football, will be new to Boston. The other pieces are the "Pastorale d'Ete," "Horace Victorieux," the Concertino for piano and orchestra, with the composer's wife as soloist, and a Nocturne from the opera "Judith," to be sung by Cobina Wright.

* * * *

As already announced in these columns, E. Fernandez Arbos of Madrid, will succeed M. Honegger as conductor of a pair of Symphony Concerts. From 1903 to 1904, that is to say during Mr. Gericke's second term as conductor of our orchestra, Mr. Arbos set at the head of the first violins. Not a few patrons of the Symphony Concerts must remember the striking figure that the Spaniard made.

* * * *

SEE PAGE 104

DEC. 29 CRITICISM OF TRANSCRIPT.

53

Globe

Music Notes and Comment

Dec 29 1928

The Boston Symphony is away this week. Next week the noted composer Honegger will make his American debut as guest conductor here in a program of his own compositions which includes the first American performance of his latest work "Rugby," an attempt to depict a football game in tones. As the title shows, Honegger has found his inspiration in the English and not the American form of the sport. Mme Honegger will play the piano solo in her husband's Concertino. Cobina Wright will sing the Nocturne from the opera "Judith," produced here by the Chicago Civic Opera two years ago and to be repeated this season with Mary Garden as Judith. The other numbers are "Chant de Migamon," "Pastorale d'Ete" and "Horace Victorieux." The last named work was produced here by Mr Monteux, but has not since been heard at the Symphony Concerts. Some will regret that Honegger is not to conduct here the tone poem about a locomotive, "Pacific 231," by which he is best known to Boston audiences.

Times.

Mephisto says in Musical America for Dec 22, like the Cleveland Orchestra, the Boston Symphony seems to have no intention of trifling with a series of companionate marriages. Since the coming of Koussevitzky five years ago, it has been among the monogamous of our musical organizations and to all intents and purposes it will continue to be so. There is a new contract just drawn up, I understand, one that favors King Koussevitzky in every way. In essence, he is to remain as long as he will with a salary, my informant tells me, to "exceed all expectations." (Whether his or the Boston trustees is beside the issue.) Presumably, at any rate, it elevates him to a financial class with Toscanini and Stokowski. Toscanini received approximately $60,000 for his half season here last year. The Stokowski figures, I understand, are not far distant.

Walter Gieseking will make a single visit to Boston this season to appear at the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, Jan 20. The great German pianist is welcomed as the finest living master of the subtler shadings of pianoforte playing.

A significant debut will be the recital here of Lawrence Tibbett in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Jan 27. This singer's operatic debut at the Metropolitan Opera House in a performance of Verdi's "Falstaff," is still remembered. Since then, the young baritone has taken his place as one of the foremost American singers in opera. His recital tours have been no less successful.

TRANS. Dec 28-28

Honegger's Program

Pieces Unheard, or Only Once Heard, in Boston

FROM Honegger in Paris, the management of the Symphony Orchestra has received the following program for the concerts at which he will be guest-composer and conductor, in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 11 and 12. It consists wholly of his own pieces, viz.:

Song of Nigamon.
Summer Pastoral.
Mimed Symphony, "Horace Victorieux."
Concertino for Piano and Orchestra (Pianist: Andrée Vaurabourg-Honegger.)
Nocturne from the Opera, "Judith" (Soprano: Cobina Wright.)
Symphonic Movement, "Rugby."

"The Song of Nigamon" (1917) is relatively early work. "Summer Pastoral" is a pretty little thing with hardly a trace of modernism. "Horace Victorieux," heard and vilified at the Symphony Concerts under Mr. Monteux in 1922, is Honegger fierce and acrid. The Concertino is an amiable trifle, played at Arthur Fiedler's concert of modernist music last February. The Nocturne is an episode in Honegger's first opera, "Judith," produced by the Chicago Company two years ago. "Rugby," suggested by the movements and tensities of a football match, is only a few months old . . . Many will regret the absence of "Pacific 231," the orchestral—or locomotive—piece by which Honegger is best known in America.

MONITER

Toch's Piano Concerto Performed in Boston

Dec, 29-1928

For the eleventh program of the season, Dec. 28 and 29, Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra proffered the Third Symphony of Sibelius, Toch's Piano Concerto and the concert version of Carpenter's Ballet, "Skyscrapers." The pianist was Jesús María Sanromá.

Toch's concerto, performed in Berlin and Frankfort in 1927 and played by Elly Ney with the Chicago Orchestra last season, was heard yesterday for the first time in Boston. Possibly, if it had been composed and presented to us much sooner, it might have made a more profound impression. But it is many years now since we first gazed with amazement upon "Feuerwerke," and not a few since "Horace Victorieux" burst upon our astonished vision. In the meantime, sitting at the feet of many instructors, from Stravinsky and Schönberg to Martinu and Copland, we have learned much about what may be done with tonalities, rhythms and orchestral colors. Thus nowadays, before mounting on pinions of enthusiasm, we are disposed to examine attentively the musical scene which is set before us.

Toch undoubtedly has the full equipment of the modern orchestral craftsman. Employing a huge aggregation of instruments, he can produce unpleasant sounds with the best of them. When he elects to return to the methods of the impressionists, as in his slow movement, he can even be ingratiating. But looking beneath his brave exterior, we are unable to discern what supports it. Was there substance here which required to be expressed? The musical material strikes us as undistinguished; the form and manner as highly competent, even brilliant, but in no way original. The humor, even, of the final movement is traditionally Teutonic. With regret, we are unable to share the expectation which has been expressed that this concerto "will rank in the course of time among the great pianoforte concertos of musical literature."

The concerto nevertheless had a warm reception. But this may very likely have been due in part to the playing of Mr. Sanromá, who is a musical product of Boston. He was graduated with honors from the New England Conservatory of Music and was formerly official pianist of the Boston Orchestra. For the last year and a half he has been in Europe, studying with Schnabel and Cortot. He also coached with Toch in this concerto, so that we may conclude that his interpretation of it was authentic. He accomplished a tour de force.

If we were bent on forecasting we should prefer to risk a surmise that the Third Sibelius Symphony has a better hope than the concerto of finding a permanent place in the repertory. The good impression it made on its first performance in Boston, six weeks ago, was confirmed yesterday. Mr. Koussevitzky was well advised in repeating it so soon. Carpenter's music again seemed to feel the need of its original setting on the Metropolitan Opera stage.

L. A. S.

MU

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this week has been slightly changed from the one that had been announced. The third symphony of Sibelius will be performed instead of Bach's concerto for two flutes, violin and string orchestra. Toch's concerto for piano and orchestra will be heard for the first time in Boston and Mr. Sanroma will then play in public for the first time since his return from Europe, having studied with Cortot in Paris and Schnabel in Berlin. He played the piano part of this concerto when Mr. Koussevitzky produced the work in Paris last May. (Mr. Sanroma had studied it with the composer.)

This concerto was written at Mannheim in 1926. It was first performed at Berlin when Elly Ney gave a concert in 1927, playing in the same concert Brahms's B-flat major and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto for good measure. She was the pianist when Mr. Stock brought out the concerto in Chicago on Feb. 3 of this year—the first performance in the United States.

Toch, born at Vienna, in 1887, at first studied medicine, also philosophy in that city; but he gave up the idea of practising as a physician, and resolved to be a musician. As a composer he is wholly self-taught, but he won the Mendelssohn prize, the Mozart prize, and four times in succession the prize offered by the Austrian government for composers. He studied piano playing at Frankfort with Willy Rehberg, a Swiss pianist and composer. The list of Toch's compositions includes an opera "The Bacchantes" (after Euripides), incidental music for a play, a 'cello concerto, a symphony for solo voices, chorus, orchestra and organ, 12 string quartets; The Chinese Flute, a chamber symphony for 14 solo instruments and a soprano voice; piano pieces and violin pieces. He also has composed music for Andersen's story of the Princess and the Pea turned into a one-act opera.

The score of the concerto contains a note saying that to the orchestra belongs development of a symphonic work: it does not take the role of an accompaniment to the piano. "The composer begs the conductor to take this fact into consideration in that which concerns the composition of the orchestra and with regard to rehearsals."

The form of the concerto is free; the music, like much that is contemporaneous in this art, is written in the atonal and polytonal manner.

Carpenter's ballet music has been performed here under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. The ballet itself was brought out at the Metropolitan Opera House in 1926. It may be remembered that Diaghilev, meeting Carpenter in Paris, suggested a ballet with an American subject. Carpenter thought of music which should represent the hurry and

SYMPHONY IN MODERNIST PROGRAM

By MOSES SMITH

The current pair of Symphony concerts is something in the nature of a "Welcome Home" celebration for Jesus Maria Sanroma, young Boston pianist who, after more than a year of study abroad, returns as soloist in Ernest Toch's piano concerto. It is the first time the composer has appeared on a Boston Symphony program.

Mr. Sanroma had played this concerto at one of Mr. Koussevitzky's Paris concerts last spring. He had also studied it with the composer. His playing therefore has authority and conviction. The piano part is of great difficulty. But Mr. Sanroma had so well mastered his part that he devoted most of his attention to following the conductor's baton. He received a long ovation for his brilliant performance.

The concerto as a whole may be spoken of as wild, even in these days of savage music. Harsh and blaring dissonances are piled up one after another, a battery of percussion instruments dispenses assorted noises, and throughout the composer is writing in many keys simultaneously, or in no key at all. The sensational elements aside, there are a few beautiful passages, but a first hearing offers us no clue as to why the piece has been so warmly praised abroad.

Sibelius' third symphony in C major, heard here earlier in the year for the first time, opens the program. As we listened to this beautiful music for a second time we were increasingly mystified by the inability of conductors to make anything of this score in rehearsals. The first two movements, in Mr. Koussevitzky's version, seemed clear as daylight. Only the last movement seemed a bit puzzling. The present performance, which was evidently prepared hastily, was not so good as the first.

Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" was the last number, completing a modernist program. Coming immediately after Toch's concerto, it is not favorably placed. And yet allowing for this fact, we do not see in this work a great American picture, as others have called it. Clever it is, undoubtedly, but essentially second-rate.

BOS. DAILY ADVERTISER

December 29, 1928

San Roma Soloist In Toch Concerto

The tides of modernism beat strong upon Symphony Hall yesterday and today, when Ernst Toch's concerto for piano is given its first hearing in Boston.

Jesus Maria San Roma, young, ardent and accomplished pianist, was set to the difficult task of the solo portion of the new piece from the modernistic German. If San Roma were not so able an artist, the performance might have easily driven the conservatives from the concert hall.

For the music of Herr Toch may be called almost wildly modernistic. To the concerto form he brings new and almost unheard of rhythms, florid and warring themes, melodies set in the sharp idiom of jazz. With all this, he is well grounded in the Germanic tradition, and he proves craftsman par excellence.

If he strays from the strictures of the conventional concerto, it is because he feels he may with impunity. To his pianist he sets a monumental task, to orchestra and conductor a well-nigh insurmountable one. Upon it, Mr. Koussevitzky and his men piled vigor and ardor upon polytonal themes, hard-bitten melodies, demoniacally driven measures for brass and strings.

To make the modernistic program complete, Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," with Marie Sundelius and Joseph Lautner as soloists, completed the program. Sibelius Symphony in major had begun it.

ma[illegible]n the [illegible]. Among [illegible] Mrs. Jea[illegible]e Marlo[illegible], who look[illegible] but wa[illegible] down the [illegible]orium to help h[illegible] invalid husband.

BOS. Dec 29

Symphony Members Entertain Conductor

For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the members last night entertained their conductor at dinner, when Serge Koussevitzky and Madame Koussevitzky were guests of honor at a dinner dance at the Hotel Statler. The members of the orchestra and their wives made up a party of 200.

BOS. POST
DEC. 30. 1928.

Honegger to Lead Next Symphony--- Musical Notes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When next the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Boston it will be led, not by Mr. Koussevitzky but by Arthur Honegger, young but already world-renowned French composer, now on his first visit to this country. The concerts to be conducted by M. Honegger are those of Jan. 11 and 12, and the programme will consist entirely of his compositions. Of these, a "Chant de Migamon" and the tone-poem "Rugby," which describes a game of football, will be new to Boston. The other pieces are the "Pastorale d'Ete," "Horace Victorieux," the Concertino for piano and orchestra, with the composer's wife as soloist, and a Nocturne from the opera "Judith," to be sung by Cobina Wright.

• • • •

As already announced in these columns, E. Fernandez Arbos of Madrid, will succeed M. Honegger as conductor of a pair of Symphony Concerts. From 1903 to 1904, that is to say during Mr. Gericke's second term as conductor of our orchestra, Mr. Arbos set at the head of the first violins. Not a few patrons of the Symphony Concerts must remember the striking figure that the Spaniard made.

• • • •

53

GLOBE

Music Notes and Comment

Dec 30 1928

The Boston Symphony is away this week. Next week the noted composer Honegger will make his American debut as guest conductor here in a program of his own compositions which includes the first American performance of his latest work "Rugby," an attempt to depict a football game in tones. As the title shows, Honegger has found his inspiration in the English and not the American form of the sport. Mme Honegger will play the piano solo in her husband's Concertino. Cobina Wright will sing the Nocturne from the opera "Judith," produced here by the Chicago Civic Opera two years ago and to be repeated this season with Mary Garden as Judith. The other numbers are "Chant de Migamon," "Pastorale d'Ete" and "Horace Victorieux." The last named work was produced here by Mr Monteux, but has not since been heard at the Symphony Concerts. Some will regret that Honegger is not to conduct here the tone poem about a locomotive, "Pacific 231," by which he is best known to Boston audiences.

Times.

Mephisto says in Musical America for Dec 22, like the Cleveland Orchestra, the Boston Symphony seems to have no intention of trifling with a series of companionate marriages. Since the coming of Koussevitzky five years ago, it has been among the monogamous of our musical organizations and to all intents and purposes it will continue to be so. There is a new contract just drawn up, I understand, one that favors King Koussevitzky in every way. In essence, he is to remain as long as he will with a salary, my informant tells me, to "exceed all expectations." (Whether his or the Boston trustees is beside the issue.) Presumably, at any rate, it elevates him to a financial class with Toscanini and Stokowski. Toscanini received approximately $60,000 for his half season here last year. The Stokowski figures, I understand, are not far distant.

Walter Gieseking will make a single visit to Boston this season to appear at the Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall, Jan 20. The great German pianist is welcomed as the finest living master of the subtler shadings of pianoforte playing.

A significant debut will be the recital here of Lawrence Tibbett in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, Jan 27. This singer's operatic debut at the Metropolitan Opera House in a performance of Verdi's "Falstaff," is still remembered. Since then, the young baritone has taken his place as one of the foremost American singers in opera. His recital tours have been no less successful.

SEE PAGE 104

DEC. 29 CRITICISM OF TRANSCRIPT

5 54

Music and M

Sport, Pastime, Two Parisians And Toch Again

Modernism at Its Best and Diversions by The Flute-

TRANS. Players DEC 31 1928

TOCH'S Concerto, repeated at the Symphony Concert of Saturday to as much applause as could be expected and with no little warmth toward Mr. Sanromá in the piano-part, is modernism as it should be. The composer is a thoroughly schooled musician, of a liberal culture—to use an old phrase—as well. Being such, he is no scorner of the musical past; has no mind to tilt at it overtly; does not believe that the art of music was new-born into the world, a naked and a noisy babe, shortly after the late war. On the other hand, he is righteously resolved to write, as he lives, in the spirit of his own day; to find for it a musical speech both appropriate and stimulating.

The concerto-form is ancient and orthodox; by common consent, even of conservatives, it much needs invigoration. Toch set himself to the task. Concertos have followed two fashions—either they were as symphonic as Brahms, or once Beethoven, could make them, with the piano as additional instrument; or they were as showy and virtuoso-like as Liszt or Saint-Saëns could fashion them. Toch would be, and is, symphonic; while he also gives the pianist individual opportunity. The romantics distilled themselves into the slow movements of concertos. Toch writes his in romantic, but unsentimental, vein; clothes and colors it with harmonies and timbres that first entered into music with Debussy and Ravel. (Once they were the modernists, the grumblers may remember; whereas now they are classics both.) Toch would be humorous in an episode of the Finale. Who but Strauss set him the example of these thematic jests? Toch begins his Concerto with sonorous proclamation. The masters—as the conservatives like to call them—were hardly averse to such resounding periods.

Toch, however, lives and works in his own time, which is this second decade of the twentieth century. (It is within belief that posterity will regard it more justly than some whose lives have overlapped into it.) In music not only would it reanimate ageing forms; it would also relax them. Hence the freedoms of Toch's Concerto, which, be it noted, are never mere vagaries but always part of a defined and sustained design. Dissonance, atonality, polytonality, have become integral parts of the music of this day. No one can know whether they will persist or how subsequent generations may utilize them. Mr. Casella, for example, believes that they are already declining. Yet to such composers as Toch they are natural, honest, urgent musical speech; while to more ears than the hide-bound choose to believe, it is also grateful and stimulating. To youngsters not a few Toch's first movement was no "welter," but clean-lined, clear-spoken music, outflung at the end with power, yielding more than once new and strange sensation that may yet pass for beauty.

Above all this is a dynamic time that exalts motion. From beginning to end, Toch's Concerto moves; strides, upswings, flings out and will not be stayed. In rhythmic vitality it never flags. Whatever the musical matter or mood, whether orchestra or pianist is in the lead, whether that orchestra is full-throated or only the murmur of a few instruments, never comes an instant of hesitation. Into the course the Concerto catches the listener and only the end releases him. Eager or reluctant, he must go on and on to new adventure—another trait of the time; to fresh and instant impression adjusting himself as best he may.

To experience these things is to feel the zest of creation; to do them is to write a music that is alive—in the image, under the impulse, with the voice, of our immediate time. No composer worthy the name can escape his time-spirit, individualist or genius though he be. It is in Rameau and in Wagner, in Beethoven, Schubert, Strauss, Debussy. May not the modernists share it and not be whipped for an unescapable course of nature? In Toch, as in Hindemith, there is that to which our youth instinctively and irresistibly answers; along with them many an elder who lives cheerfully in this realistic, materialistic, hard-bitten, hard-driven time. Believer or not, there are modernists, composing or hearing, who can be no other, if they would.

friendly audience with ingenuities. A sufficient nude lady (upon canvas) turned her back, which was comely, toward the players and preferred the society of a deep red butterfly. From another fra—for these were the galleries of the Ar Club—a youth in blue overalls with outs read legs listened unperturbed; while th and that grave gentleman, plainly s ing for his portrait, batted not so much an eye, though Poulenc dared him with Sonata for horn, trumpet and trombone and Honegger followed with three "C nterpoints" for four voices, two winds, t strings. Necessarily the Sonata w short; nor did it teem with what th learned call "thematic invention." t the trumpet, with Mr. Mager to play t, disported itself as a florid instrum t through the first movement; while the last—Rondeau—the partnered ee went nearly breathless with quick t rns and passing quips. In the interve ng slow movement Poulenc forgot tha a horn can sing and went dull. Elsewh e he was amusing without freakis ess. A Prelude for two voices; a Chor e for three; a Canon for all four was H egger's stint. His scholarship was un trusive; his invention sufficient to his ed; his counterpoint adept—the new c nterpoint that meanders dissonantly bout and keeps the voices in charac as they spin the web. To the minor ncients the modernists return with t se pastimes; but those amiable gentler n in small clothes kept no pepper-pot and spice-boxes on their writing tables.

The oney-pot was more the mode as stood ar when Mr. Laurent, Mr. Bregor and M Alfred Zighera played old Leclair's onata for flute, piano (or harp), viola gamba. The slow movements, for in oduction and middle piece, exhaled sweet and wistful melancholy, a gentle music caught from the musing air, le discreetly into the salons. The quick ovements were as gay as might be, a more salon-like, with the light tossin of figures from voice to voice, and a end two minutes before the game migh have become tedious. "Quaint" we ca these pieces nowadays, but they were as natural to eighteenth-century musi making as Honegger's "Counterpoin are to our.

Fi lly, the Russians went a-trifling—Rim y-Korsakov, Lyadov, Borodin, Gla nov, each in a movement of a stri -quartet on the theme B-A-F, wh may be read Be-la-ef, which was —o rather who was—no other than their pu sher Belaiev. They "sprang it" on hi as we should say nowadays, at a bi day dinner, after every one, as Rimsk confesses in his autobiography, "w well-wined." To the lay ear and im gination there might be more fertile an suggestive themes; but with it the fo do their prettiest. Lyadov comes of rather well in a Scherzo, hop-skip-and-a- mp; Borodin betters him with a flash of imagination into a short Spanish S enade, without so much as losing his b th or his idiom. Figures and such li carry Rimsky and Glazunov resp ctively through the first and the last A egro. Their readiness is pleasing; not o e are they banal, but there is that it the theme to turn them both plaintive. S ce it was half-past four in the afternoon, and Governor Smith was not el cted, nobody in the audience could possibly have been "well wined," but nearly everyone was amused—not least Messrs. Ecus, Lebovici, Lefranc and Zighera, playing as though across the table Belaiev and the four composers were beaming.

Of course the grave and the pure will shake their heads over these diversions. An afternoon, a Sunday afternoon, "wasted" and "music, heavenly maid," and education, and all that sort of thing. But who was not entertained, and entertainment, musically, is not always an easy thing to come by? Blessings on Poulenc's and Honegger's modernist heads! They will try anything once, which is to have an exceedingly good time in a lively world; while, with their brethren, they have brought the heavenly maid back to the salons she used cheerfully to frequent. She must have recognized old Leclair waiting at the door to bow her in again; while somewhere between the caviare and the cognac the Russian four must have toasted her. May be it was in magnums!

Incidents and Prospects

Choosing wholly from the classics, Miss Hess, the pianist, announces these pieces for her concert in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon next:

Variations in F minor.....Haydn
Sonata in A-flat major, Op. 110.....Beethoven
Sonata.....Schubert Dances.....
Intermezzo in A-flat—Caprice.....Brahms
Rhapsody in G minor.....
Carneval.....Schumann

Thursday and next Saturday, Mr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra will be heard in New York at Carnegie Hall. Toch's Concerto for Piano, with Mr. Sanromá as pianist, stands on both programs. For Thursday, the other numbers are Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor for Strings, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Carpenter's "Skyscrapers"; for Saturday, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony and Ravel's "Waltz." Next Sunday, on the return journey, conductor and orchestra will give a concert

"For To Please"

yesterd
noon, The Flute-Players entertained

Amusements

HERALD TRIBUNE DECEMBER 30, 1928

Mengelberg Gives Mahler Work, Bostonians Play New Concerto

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will give Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" (Song of the Earth) for its Carnegie Hall concerts of next Thursday afternoon and Friday night under Willem Mengelberg's direction. Margaret Matzenauer, Metropolitan Opera contralto, and Richard Crooks, tenor, will be the soloists.

"Das Lied von der Erde" is a symphony in six parts, for orchestra and vocal solos; its text is six poems taken from "The Chinese Flute," a collection of Chinese lyrics chosen and translated into German by Hans Bethge. The poems are titled "The Drinking Song of Earthly Woe," "Autumn Solitude," "Of Youth," "Of Beauty," "The Drunkard in Spring" and "The Farewell of a Friend." The work was first performed in Munich, in November, 1911, six months after Mahler's death; its first performance in the United States was by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski, on December 15, 1916. It has not been played by the two New York orchestral organizations which amalgamated this year to form the Philharmonic-Symphony, but it has been given here by the Society of the Friends of Music under Artur Bodanzky.

Mr. Mengelberg will conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony this afternoon at Carnegie Hall in a private concert for the American Association for the Advancement of Science and affiliated societies. Next Sunday, before beginning a tour, Mr. Mengelberg will lead the Philharmonic-Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, giving a Sinfonia or Overture by Johann Christian Bach, Mozart's E flat symphony and Beethoven's seventh symphony. Next Saturday morning, in Carnegie Hall, Walter Damrosch will conduct his last children's concert of the season, giving a program illustrating "Animals in Music."

Owing to the increasing lateness of subscribers, notes the management, due to traffic conditions, and the rule of not admitting latecomers during the first number, evening Philharmonic-Symphony concerts are henceforth to begin at 8:45 instead of 8:30 as before. It is hopefully noted that the extra quarter of an hour should allow the audience time enough to be punctual and hear the entire program. (Still, we doubt if it would be advisable next Friday night for Mr. Mengelberg to give the "Lied von der Erde" without pauses.)

Maurice van Praag, personnel manager of the Philharmonic-Symphony, has just been made an officer of the Academy of Fine Arts [illegible] French Ministry of Public Instruction.

At the Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Serge Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of a piano concerto by the German composer Ernest Toch, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Mr. Sanroma also played this work under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction in its Paris premiere last spring.

According to the description of the concerto provided by the Boston Symphony management, Toch treats the orchestra not as an accompaniment but as an independent and important part of the score. The finale, "Rondo Disturbato," is described as being in a humorous vein, in the nature of an argument between a loudly assertive and a softly persuasive theme. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and the concert version of Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers," with Marie Sundelius, soprano, formerly of the Metropolitan, and Joseph Lautner, tenor, as soloists, will be heard Thursday; Saturday's symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral."

The program for Friday at the Brooklyn Academy of Music has been changed and now consists of the Pastoral Symphony, Schumann's piano concerto, with Mr. Sanroma as soloist, and "Skyscrapers."

Mischa [illegible] give his only [illegible] York recital this season on Tuesday night, February 26.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays its second New York visit this week.

in Springfield. Thereafter, for two weeks, Mr. Koussevitzky goes on holiday.

Prokofiev, the familiar Russian, will revisit the United States next autumn as composer, conductor, pianist. Already, his agents announce, the Boston Orchestra has engaged him for seven concerts—three as pianist, possibly at one or another [illegible]

Music in The Land

New: From Strauss

AT the Philharmonic Concerts in New York last week, from Mr. Mengelberg, the orchestra and a men's choir, Strauss's new song-cycle, "Die Tageszeiten," was heard for the first times in America. Said Mr. Thompson in The Evening Post: "There are four songs in the cycle, 'Morning,' 'Noonday Peace,' 'Evening' and 'Night,' settings of nature poems by Eichendorff, to whom Wolf turned for some of his texts. They are as representative of Strauss in decline as 'Helen in Egypt.' In them he has indeed descended to the level of the Liederkranz composer. If his music is to be viewed in that light, it is as agreeable as it is uninspired. The last of the series, 'Night,' possesses the sumptuous scoring of the Strauss of an earlier day, and for this reason most nearly escapes the commonplace."

Said Mr. Gilman in The Herald Tribune: "'Helen' or no 'Helen,' Richard Strauss remains indisputably the foremost living composer, and a new work from his pen compels respectful if not hopeful attention. . . . Strauss in his excelling moments—and he has had many—is a great poet of tones. In his lesser moments—in much of 'Die Tageszeiten'—he is a sentimentalist, obtuse and slack

Continued on Following Page

oks Soloists Thursday in New Symphony

SOLOIST WITH PHILHARMONIC

Margaret Matzenauer, contralto at the Metropolitan, will sing with orchestra, Thursday

Orchestral Echoes

Ernest Toch's piano concerto will be an event of special interest at both concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This will be its first New York performance, with Jesus Sanroma as soloist. Sanroma also played at the first Parisian performance of this piece at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" last spring.

Toch treats the orchestra not as an accompaniment, but as an independent and important part of his score. The finale, entitled "Rondo Disturbato" is in humorous vein, in the nature of an argument between a loudly assertive and a softly persuasive theme. Mr. Koussevitzky will also perform at the Thursday concert Handel's concerto grosso in B minor; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" ballet, in which the soloists will be Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

The Saturday matinee program will include, beside Toch's Concerto, Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony No. 6, and Ravel's "La Valse."

* * *

s open to the American-born conctor in this country—namely, the dio and movie fields. He has conted three years at the Capitol Thea in New York, and as conductor at t Stanley Theatre in Philadelphia he h a special opportunity to gain experience in symphonic music because of he policy of the late Jules Mastbaum, owner of the theatre, to present ser us music of the highest type to mo e audiences. Mr. Harris is at present conducting for the National Broadcas g Company.

M Ossip Gabrilowitsch, President of the chubert Memorial, will direct the firs half of the program, herewith giv

Pr de to "Die Meistersinger von rnberg" .....Wagner
Co rto, Opus 23, in B minor, for piano orchestra.....Tschaikowsky Isabelle Yalkovsky.

INTERMISSION

Sy ony No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms Conducted by Graham Harris.

* * *

Th first free symphony concert of the s es this year in the Metropolitan Muse of Art, under David Mannes, will given Saturday evening, Jan. 5. Th rogram:

phal March from "Sigurd Josal-also assist in arrangement of a full program of concerts for the 1929-1930 season.

* * *

Arthur Honegger, whose arrival in this country has been awaited with growing interest for some years, sailed from Havre Dec. 26, and will arrive in New York Jan. 3. He will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra the week of Jan. 6, and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra Jan. 19 and 20. Mme. Cobina Wright, who will accompany him on his trans-continental tour, will entertain him in New York before their departure, with a repetition of her celebrated Society Circus.

* * *

After a four weeks' engagement at the Stanley Theatre, Utica, as guest conductor, Alois Reiser, conductor of the Mark Strand Theatre Orchestra is back again at the theatre. Mr. Reiser's schedule called for only one week.

Modern Music Bores Europe, Says Lhevinne

Josef Lhevinne, pianist, who has just returned from an extensive 56

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 1

Koussevitzky Names Brahms' Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will open its Providence season next Tuesday evening, Dec. 4, in the Albee Theatre. Koussevitzky has chosen, for the symphony of the programme, the second of Brahms in D major. This is perhaps the most popular of Brahms' four symphonies. The reason is not hard to find, for it is easily the most melodious of the four. Never was Brahms, the poet and romantic lyricist, more inspired than in this score.

Serge Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," which is also on the programme, is, in a sense, a delightful musical joke. The modern Russian composer, who can do terrifying things in music when he wishes, for once has put modernity behind him, and composed a little 12-minute symphony in the form and style of the 18th century "as Mozart might have done it, were he living today." Beethoven's glorious "Leonore" overture No. 3 will open the programme. This master score is famous for the trumpet calls played off stage, proclaiming the deliverance of the imprisoned hero in Goethe's drama. Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" will complete what might be called a "programme of masterpieces."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

DEC 1

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS HERE TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee theatre, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen, for the symphony of the programme, the Second of Brahms in D major. This is perhaps the most popular of Brahms' four symphonies. The reason is not hard to find, for it is easily the most melodious of the four. Never was Brahms the poet and romantic lyricist more inspired than in this score.

Serge Profofieff's "Classical Symphony," which is also on the programme, is in a sense, a delightful musical joke. The modern Russian composer, who can do terrifying things in music when he wishes, for once has put modernity behind him, and composed a little 12 minute symphony in the form and style of the 188th century "as Mozart might have done it, were he living today." Beethoven's glorious "Leonore" Overture No. 3 will open the programme. This master score is famous for the trumpet calls played off stage, proclaiming the deliverance of the imprisoned hero in Goethe's drama. Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," will complete what might be called a "programme of masterpieces."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

DEC 3 1

For Koussevitzky

In Boston, Mrs. Alvan Tufts Fuller wife of Governor Fuller, presented Serge Koussevitzky with the first Boston Symphony Orchestra records made under his leadership for the Victor Talking Machine Co. The records were of Stravinsky's Petrovshka and an excerpt from the new Apollon Musagete, both, according to Conductor Koussevitzky, peculiarly adapt for successful recording.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
NEWS

DEC 2 - 1928

The Boston Symphony orchestra made its first visit of the season here this past week. Of course, it is pretty well known by this time that the Boston organization has again come completely into its own under the conductorship of the able Koussevitzky. Time was, not so long ago, when it seemed that the famous orchestra was going the down grade but, immediately, the guiding hand of Koussevitzky began its effect and today this orchestra stands as it did under such eminent conductors as Gericke, Nikish and Karl Muck.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York American

DEC 2 - 1928

Art-Song Effect Heightened By Moderate Histrionic Aid; Sparks from Musical Anvil

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

THERE came to Town Hall here recently in recital, an English baritone, Herbert Heyner. Whilst singing, he used gestures, bits of pantomime, winks and nods, and reflected also in his facial expressions the moods and action of the numbers on his programme.

Leonard Liebling

Heyner's unusual methods chased fearsome tremors down the spines of the conservatives. Some of them even asserted that if such extraneous aids to interpretation became general in recital, there would follow the certain desecration and degeneration of the art of concert-singing.

Is that really so? Let us examine the question with reverence and without heated partisanship.

Heyner, aside from pantomimic illustration and facial expression, puts into his publishments also high qualities of musicianship, taste, intelligence, text-enunciation and uncommon adeptness in the interpretative and colorful use of tone. Those qualities in themselves stamp him as a ranking artist in singing and delivery. The compositions he presents comprise examples of the best styles in ancient and modern songs, and offer further evidence of his aesthetic insight and serious purpose.

* * *

Yielding to no one in our desire to see the vocal recital uphold its time-honored and sacrosanct dignity, nevertheless, we say sincerely that the Heyner performances are singularly and impressively artistic and convincing and that our enjoyment of them was heightened strongly by the physical illustrations which he employs to drive home the nature of the texts and the moods of the music.

In Vocalists' Faces

No great concert vocalists ever assume a sad expression when singing a joyous song, or bear laughing features while voicing measures that are mournful. Some indulge in a stamp of the foot, lowering of the head, raising of a hand, or taking a step forward or backward, to lend realistic emphasis to the meaning of the words.

Coloraturas nearly always try to smile happily when they toss off their lightsome trills and roulades. Religious music invariably results in uplifted eyes and eyebrows and a raptly sanctimonious expression of face on the part of the singer. Roystering ditties (particularly about sailors or pirates) bring about an assertive chest, swaying shoulders and an altogether braggadoccio manner. Such physical first aids to interpretation could be cited without end in connection with even the most respected artist of the concert-platform.

* *

After all, the object of the words and music in a song is to tell a story or establish and project a mood. We contend that Herbert Heyner's methods add to the meaning and eloquence of his purely vocal and verbal presentations, and therefore are legitimate and justified. They might well be imitated by certain wooden and otherwise immobile and uninspiring representatives of concert-singing.

Providing, of course, that they apply them with the same intelligent restraint and unerring refinement as that intellectual English baritone. He never really acts; he only indicates and emphasizes.

Wise Geraldine

Another artist of striking mental attainments is Geraldine Farrar. She realizes that her vocal resources, through long-continued, strenpous demands of opera activity, no longer lend themselves to the requirements of the lyric stage. Therefore she has focussed her undeniable interpretative talents upon such concert-songs as fall within the present range of her equipment in tone.

Mme. Farrar's tactful retirement from the operatic boards shames those singers who try to make that career outlast their powers to pursue it with results artistically dignified and aurally agreeable to the listeners.

The former Manon, Zaza, Butterfly, Juliet and Mimi, now is practising an art infinitely more exalted (and difficult) than the singing of opera. It is fortunate, however, that she possesses the penetrative thought and fine musical instinct to succeed in her new endeavor. Most of her late colleagues at the Metropolitan would fail lamentably if they tried to come before the public with a programme of Schubert, Schumann, Mozart, Scarlatti, Strauss, Grieg and Rubinstein, as Geraldine Farrar did most successfully in this town not very long ago.

* * *

Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagette," done here recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra knocked the props from under our local modernistic fraternity. It is a piece melodious, conventional in harmony, classical in spirit, and contrapuntally imitative of Bach, Gluck and Handel.

The conservatives regard Stravinsky's feat as a brilliant step in advance; the radicals look upon it as a tragic bounce backward.

Stravinsky has an impish sense of humor and must be enjoying the confusion and consternation he has created in the camps of the modernistic cohorts who so long have acknowledged him as their dauntless chief.

What are they to do now? Has Stravinsky deserted them for good? Are they to renounce him or to follow his, to them, precipitate and somewhat disgraceful retreat? And if the latter, where is their leader likely to leap next?

From Musical Anvil

Suppose they start furiously to writing fugues, minuets, sarabandes, and rondos! Pan Stravinsky might then suddenly hop off in an entirely new direction, soar for hitherto unexplored heights, and write a radio fantasy, a television oratorio, or an ether-wave symphony.

Meanwhile, pity the plight of the lesser modernistic crew, sitting with pen poised, blinking and wondering, dazed and doleful, waiting like the betrayed Wotan, for fiery destruction or triumphant deliverance.

Apropos the Vienna Opera house cut off Wotan's immemorial, umbrageous whiskers. It remains now but for the Danube impresario to bob Isolde's hair and to put knee skirts on Bruennhilde.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

DEC 2 - 1928

Enlivening of Concert Stage Seen in Singer's Gestures

Herbert Heyner of England Pleases and Displeases—Praise for Geraldine Farrar's Work —Stravinsky Shows Moderns How to Do It

By LEONARD LIEBLING
Universal Service Music Critic

NEW YORK, Dec. 1.—There came to Town hall here recently in recital, an English baritone, Herbert Heyner. Whilst singing, he used gestures, bits of pantomime, winks, and nods, and reflected also in his facial expressions, the moods and action of the numbers on his program.

Heyner's unusual methods chased fearsome tremors down the spines of the conservatives. Some of them even asserted that if such extraneous aids to interpretation became general in recital, there would follow the certain desecration and degeneration of the art of concert-singing.

Heyner, aside from pantomime illustration and facial expression puts into his publishments also high qualities of musicianship, taste, intelligence, text-enunciation; and uncommon adeptness in the interpretive and colorful use of tone. Those qualities in themselves stamp him as a ranking artist in singing and delivery. The compositions he presents comprise examples of the best styles in ancient and modern songs, and offer further evidence of his aesthetic insight and serious purpose.

Yielding to no one in our desire to see the vocal recital uphold its time-honored and sacrosanct dignity, nevertheless we say sincerely that the Heyner performances are singularly and impressively artistic and convincing; and that our enjoyment of them was heightened strongly by the physical illustrations which he employs to drive home the nature of the texts and the moods of the music.

After all, the object of the words and music in a song, is to tell a story or establish and project a mood. We content that Herbert Heyner's methods add to the meaning and eloquence of his purely vocal and verbal presentations, and therefore are legitimate and justified. They might well be imitated by certain wooden and otherwise immobile and uninspiring representatives of concert-singing.

Providing, of course, that they apply them with the same intelligent restraint and unerring refinement as that intellectual English baritone. He never really acts; he only indicates and emphisizes.

Another artist of striking mental attainments is Geraldine Farrar. She realizes that her vocal resources, through long-continued, strenuous demands of Opera activity, no longer lend themselves to the requirements of the lyric stage. Therefore she has focussed her undeniable interpretive talents upon such concert-songs as fall within the present range of her equipment in tone.

Mme. Farrar's tactful retirement from the operatic boards shames those singers who try to make that career outlast their powers to pursue it with results artistically dignified, and aurally agreeable to the listeners.

The former Manon, Zaza, Butterfly, Juliet and Mimi, now is practising an art more exalted (and difficult) than the singing of Opera. It is fortunate, however, that she possesses the penetrative thought and fine musical instinct to succeed in her new endeavor. Most of her late colleagues at the Metropolitan would fail lamentably if they tried to come before the public with a program of Schubert, Schumann, Mozart, Scarlatti, Strauss, Grieg and Rubinstein, as Geraldine Farrar did most successfully in this town not very long ago.

Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagette," done here recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra, knocked the props from under our local modernistic fraternity. It is a piece melodious, conventional in harmony, classical in spirit, and contrapuntally imitative of Bach, Gluck and Handel.

The conservatives regard Stravinsky's feat as a brilliant step in advance; the radicals look upon it as a tragic bounce backward. Stavinsky has an impish sense of humor and must be enjoying the confusion and consternation he has created in the camps of the modernistic cohorts who so long have acknowledged him as their dauntless chief.

What are they to do now? Has Stravinsky deserted them for good? Are they to renounce him or to follow his, to them, precipitate and somewhat disgraceful retreat? And if the latter, where is their leader likely to leap next?"

Suppose they start furiously to writing fugues, minuets, sarabandes and rondos? Pan Stravinsky might then suddenly hop off in an entirely new direction, soar for hitherto unexplored heights and write a radio fantasy, a television oratorio, or an ether-wave symphony.

Meanwhile, pity the plight of the lesser modernistic crew, sitting with pen poised, blinking and wondering, dazed and doleful, waiting like the betrayed Wotan, for fiery destruction or triumphant deliverance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Boston Symphony Group Opens in New York

A principal event in New York's musical season was the opening Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall on November 23, last. Mr. Koussevitzky then presented Stravinsky's new music, "Apollo, leader of the Muses," for the first time there. After this, as also after Schuman's B-flat Symphony, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which completed the program, the conductor with a standing orchestra behind him, had to acknowledge round after round of applause.

Richard L. Stokes thus described the occasion in the Evening World:

"For the first time this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday evening to Carnegie Hall, and was welcomed by a throng of rejoicing admirers which packed the Auditorium. Mr. Koussevitzky who had previously revisited the glimpses of this clime in the role of a solo contrabassist, was saluted with prolonged acclamations when he appeared on the platform.

"After the first few measures, it was obvious that the Boston organization is still the premier orchestra of last season — robust and polished munificent and refined."

Frank A. Sedgwick is anticipating a fine program for the Hartford concert at the Capitol Theater on February 3, and if offering tickets for this concert at this time, in order that patrons may secure desired locations, and tickets may be reserved now, and will be held until January 15, or will be mailed now, if accompanied with check. The ticket sale is at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum St.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit of the season here this past week. Of course, it is pretty well known by this time that the Boston organizataion has again come completely into its own under the conductorship of the able Koussevitzky. Time was, not so long ago, when it seemed that the famous orchestra was going the down grade but, immediately, the guiding hand of Koussevitzky began its effect and today this orchestra stands as it did under such eminent conductors as Gericke, Nikish and Karl Muck. Probably, after all, the box office is a fairly good barometer as to the artistic standing of even so highly rated an organization as a symphony orchestra.

When the Boston orchestra was "in the depths," so to speak, several years ago, the audiences attending its concerts here dwindled from absolute capacity to far from that; a subscription to the concerts at that time were very easy to be obtained. Today, this series of concerts is sold out far in advance and lucky is the person holding a subscription.

The visit of the Boston orchestra here this week brought forward a work by one of the Russian modernists—Serge Prokofieff. This composer's "Classical" symphony, heard in this program, was first introduced here as long ago as 1918 by the Russian Symphony Orchestra; however, it has been so rarely heard since that its inclusion in the Boston orchestra's program came as a novelty. There was also that superb piece of orchestral writing, perhaps the most inspired of all that Debussy ever composed, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Brahm's Second Symphony. Of the performances of the Boston orchestra nothing new can be said or need be said. It is one of the world's greatest symphonic organizations existing today.

* * *

556

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
DEC 1 - 1928

Koussevitzky Names Brahms' Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will open its Providence season next Tuesday evening, Dec. 4, in the Albee Theatre. Koussevitzky has chosen, for the symphony of the programme, the second of Brahms in D major. This is perhaps the most popular of Brahms' four symphonies. The reason is not hard to find, for it is easily the most melodious of the four. Never was Brahms, the poet and romantic lyricist, more inspired than in this score.

Serge Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," which is also on the programme, is, in a sense, a delightful musical joke. The modern Russian composer, who can do terrifying things in music when he wishes, for once has put modernity behind him, and composed a little 12-minute symphony in the form and style of the 18th century "as Mozart might have done it, were he living today." Beethoven's glorious "Leonore" overture No. 3 will open the programme. This master score is famous for the trumpet calls played off stage, proclaiming the deliverance of the imprisoned hero in Goethe's drama. Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" will complete what might be called a "programme of masterpieces."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
DEC 1 -

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS HERE TUESDAY

Next Tuesday evening in the Albee theatre, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen, for the symphony of the programme, the Second of Brahms in D major. This is perhaps the most popular of Brahms' four symphonies. The reason is not hard to find, for it is easily the most melodious of the four. Never was Brahms the poet and romantic lyricist more inspired than in this score.

Serge Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," which is also on the programme, is in a sense, a delightful musical joke. The modern Russian composer, who can do terrifying things in music when he wishes, for once has put modernity behind him, and composed a little 12 minute symphony in the form and style of the 18th century "as Mozart might have done it, were he living today." Beethoven's glorious "Leonore" Overture No. 3 will open the programme. This master score is famous for the trumpet calls played off stage, proclaiming the deliverance of the imprisoned hero in Goethe's drama. Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," will complete what might be called a "programme of masterpieces."

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME
DEC 3 1 1928

For Koussevitzky

In Boston, Mrs. Alvan Tufts Fuller, wife of Governor Fuller, presented Serge Koussevitzky with the first Boston Symphony Orchestra records made under his leadership for the Victor Talking Machine Co. The records were of Stravinsky's Petrovshka and an excerpt from the new Apollon Musagete, both, according to Conductor Koussevitzky, peculiarly adapted for successful recording.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, O.
NEWS
DEC 2 - 1928

The Boston Symphony orchestra made its first visit of the season here this past week. Of course, it is pretty well known by this time that the Boston organization has again come completely into its own under the conductorship of the able Koussevitzky. Time was, not so long ago, when it seemed that the famous orchestra was going the down grade but, immediately, the guiding hand of Koussevitzky began its effect and today this orchestra stands as it did under such eminent conductors as Gericke, Nikish and Karl Muck.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York American
DEC 2 - 1928

Art-Song Effect Heightened By Moderate Histrionic Aid; Sparks from Musical Anvil

By LEONARD LIEBLING

THERE came to Town Hall here recently in recital, an English baritone, Herbert Heyner. Whilst singing, he used gestures, bits of pantomime, winks and nods, and reflected also in his facial expressions the moods and action of the numbers on his programme.

Leonard Liebling

Heyner's unusual methods chased fearsome tremors down the spines of the conservatives. Some of them even asserted that if such extraneous aids to interpretation became general in recital, there would follow the certain desecration and degeneration of the art of concert-singing.

Is that really so? Let us examine the question with reverence and without heated partisanship.

Heyner, aside from pantomimic illustration and facial expression, puts into his publishments also high qualities of musicianship, taste, intelligence, text-enunciation and uncommon adeptness in the interpretative and colorful use of tone. Those qualities in themselves stamp him as a ranking artist in singing and delivery. The compositions he presents comprise examples of the best styles in ancient and modern songs, and offer further evidence of his aesthetic insight and serious purpose.

* * *

Yielding to no one in our desire to see the vocal recital uphold its time-honored and sacrosanct dignity, nevertheless, we say sincerely that the Heyner performances are singularly and impressively artistic and convincing and that our enjoyment of them was heightened strongly by the physical illustrations which he employs to drive home the nature of the texts and the moods of the music.

In Vocalists' Faces

No great concert vocalists ever assume a sad expression when singing a joyous song, or bear laughing features while voicing measures that are mournful. Some indulge in a stamp of the foot, lowering of the head, raising of a hand, or taking a step forward or backward, to lend realistic emphasis to the meaning of the words.

Coloraturas nearly always try to smile happily when they toss off their lightsome trills and roulades. Religious music invariably results in uplifted eyes and eyebrows and a raptly sanctimonious expression of face on the part of the singer. Roystering ditties (particularly about sailors or pirates) bring about an assertive chest, swaying shoulders and an altogether braggadoccio manner. Such physical first aids to interpretation could be cited without end in connection with even the most respected artist of the concert-platform.

* * *

After all, the object of the words and music in a song is to tell a story or establish and project a mood. We contend that Herbert Heyner's methods add to the meaning and eloquence of his purely vocal and verbal presentations, and therefore are legitimate and justified. They might well be imitated by certain wooden and otherwise immobile and uninspiring representatives of concert-singing.

Providing, of course, that they apply them with the same intelligent restraint and unerring refinement as that intellectual English baritone. He never really acts; he only indicates and emphasizes.

Wise Geraldine

Another artist of striking mental attainments is Geraldine Farrar. She realizes that her vocal resources, through long-continued, strenuous demands of opera activity, no longer lend themselves to the requirements of the lyric stage. Therefore she has focussed her undeniable interpretive talents upon such concert-songs as fall within the present range of her equipment in tone.

Mme. Farrar's tactful retirement from the operatic boards shames those singers who try to make that career outlast their powers to pursue it with results artistically dignified and aurally agreeable to the listeners.

The former Manon, Zaza, Butterfly, Juliet and Mimi, now is practising an art infinitely more exalted (and difficult) than the singing of opera. It is fortunate, however, that she possesses the penetrative thought and fine musical instinct to succeed in her new endeavor. Most of her late colleagues at the Metropolitan would fail lamentably if they tried to come before the public with a programme of Schubert, Schumann, Mozart, Scarlatti, Strauss, Grieg and Rubinstein, as Geraldine Farrar did most successfully in this town not very long ago.

* * *

Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagette," done here recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra knocked the props from under our local modernistic fraternity. It is a piece melodious, conventional in harmony, classical in spirit, and contrapuntally imitative of Bach, Gluck and Handel.

The conservatives regard Stravinsky's feat as a brilliant step in advance; the radicals look upon it as a tragic bounce backward.

Stravinsky has an impish sense of humor and must be enjoying the confusion and consternation he has created in the camps of the modernistic cohorts who so long have acknowledged him as their dauntless chief.

What are they to do now? Has Stravinsky deserted them for good? Are they to renounce him or to follow his, to them, precipitate and somewhat disgraceful retreat? And if the latter, where is their leader likely to leap next?

From Musical Anvil

Suppose they start furiously to writing fugues, minuets, sarabandes, and rondos! Pan Stravinsky might then suddenly hop off in an entirely new direction, soar for hitherto unexplored heights, and write a radio fantasy, a television oratorio, or an ether-wave symphony.

Meanwhile, pity the plight of the lesser modernistic crew, sitting with pen poised, blinking and wondering, dazed and doleful, waiting like the betrayed Wotan, for fiery destruction or triumphant deliverance.

Apropos the Vienna [illegible] cut off Wotan's immemorial, umbrageous whiskers. It remains now but for the Danube impresario to bob Isolde's hair and to put knee skirts on Bruennhilde.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
DEC 2 - 1928

Enlivening of Concert Stage Seen in Singer's Gestures

Herbert Heyner of England Pleases and Displeases—Praise for Geraldine Farrar's Work —Stravinsky Shows Moderns How to Do It

By LEONARD LIEBLING
Universal Service Music Critic

NEW YORK, Dec. 1.—There came to Town hall here recently in recital, an English baritone, Herbert Heyner. Whilst singing, he used gestures, bits of pantomime, winks, and nods, and reflected also in his facial expressions, the moods and action of the numbers on his program.

Heyner's unusual methods chased fearsome tremors down the spines of the conservatives. Some of them even asserted that if such extraneous aids to interpretation became general in recital, there would follow the certain desecration and degeneration of the art of concert-singing.

Heyner, aside from pantomime illustration and facial expression puts into his publishments also high qualities of musicianship, taste, intelligence, text-enunciation; and uncommon adeptness in the interpretive and colorful use of tone. Those qualities in themselves stamp him as a ranking artist in singing and delivery. The compositions he presents comprise examples of the best styles in ancient and modern song, and offer further evidence of his aesthetic insight and serious purpose.

Yielding to none in our desire to see the vocal recital uphold its time-honored and sacrosanct dignity, nevertheless we say sincerely that the Heyner performances are singularly and impressively artistic and convincing; and that our enjoyment of them was heightened strongly by the physical illustrations which he employs to drive home the nature of the texts and the moods of the music.

After all, the object of the words and music in a song, is to tell a story or establish and project a mood. We content that Herbert Heyner's methods add to the meaning and eloquence of his purely vocal and verbal presentations, and therefore are legitimate and justified. They might well be imitated by certain wooden and otherwise immobile and uninspiring representatives of concert-singing.

Providing, of course, that they apply them with the same intelligent restraint and unerring refinement as that intellectual English baritone. He never really acts; he only indicates and emphisizes.

Another artist of striking mental attainments is Geraldine Farrar. She realizes that her vocal rescources, through long-continued, strenuous demands of Opera activity, no longer lend themselves to the requirements of the lyric stage. Therefore she has focussed her undeniable interpretive talents upon such concert-songs as fall within the present range of her equipment in tone.

Mme. Farrar's tactful retirement from the operatic boards shames those singers who try to make that career outlast their powers to pursue it with results artistically dignified, and aurally agreeable to the listenters.

The former Manon, Zaza, Butterfly, Juliet and Mimi, now is practising an art more exalted (and difficult) than the singing of Opera. It is fortunate, however, that she possesses the penetrative thought and fine musical instinct to succeed in her new endeavor. Most of her late colleagues at the Metropolitan would fail lamentably if they tried to come before the public with a program of Schubert, Schumann, Mozart, Scarlatti, Strauss, Grieg and Rubinstein as Geraldine Farrar did most successfully in this town not very long ago.

Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagette," done here recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra knocked the props from under our local modernistic fraternity. It is a piece melodious, conventional in harmony, classical in spirit, and contrapuntally imitative of Bach, Gluck and Handel.

The conservatives regard Stravinsky's feat as a brilliant step in advance; the radicals look upon it as a tragic bounce backward. Stavinsky has an impish sense of humor and must be enjoying the confusion and consternation he has created in the camps of the modernistic cohorts who so long have acknowledged him as their dauntless chief.

What are they to do now? Has Stravinsky deserted them for good? Are they to renounce him or to follow his, to them, precipitate and somewhat disgraceful retreat? And if the latter, where is their leader likely to leap next?"

Suppose they start furiously to writing fugues, minuets, sarabandes and rondos? Pan Stravinsky might then suddenly hop off in an entirely new direction, soar for hitherto unexplored heights and write a radio fantasy, a television oratorio, or an ether-wave symphony.

Meanwhile, pity the plight of the lesser modernistic crew, sitting with pen poised, blinking and wondering, dazed and doleful, waiting like the betrayed Wotan, for fiery destruction or triumphant deliverance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 2 - 19

Boston Symphony Group Opens in New York

A principal event in New York's musical season was the opening Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall on November 23, last. Mr. Koussevitzky then presented Stravinsky's new music, "Apollo, leader of the Muses," for the first time there. After this, as also after Schuman's B-flat Symphony, and Scriabin's "Posm of Ecstasy," which completed the program, the conductor with a standing orchestra behind him, had to acknowledge round after round of applause.

Richard L. Stokes thus described the occasion in the Evening World:

"For the first time this season the Boston Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday evening to Carnegie Hall, and was welcomed by a throng of rejoicing admirer which packed the Auditorium. Mr. Koussevitzky who had previously revisited the glimpses of this clime in the role of a solo contrabassist, was saluted with prolonged acclamations when he appeared on the platform.

"After the first few measures, it was obvious that the Boston organization is still the premier orchestra of last season — robust and polished munificent and refined."

Frank A. Sedgwick is anticipating a fine program for the Hartford concert at the Capitol Theater on February 3, and if offering tickets for this concert at this time, in order that patrons may secure desired locations, and tickets may be reserved now, and will be held until January 15, or will be mailed now, if accompanied with check. The ticket sale is at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum St.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
DEC 2 -

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first visit of the season here this past week. Of course, it is pretty well known by this time that the Boston organizataion has again come completely into its own under the conductorship of the able Koussevitzky. Time was, not so long ago, when it seemed that the famous orchestra was going the down grade but, immediately, the guiding hand of Koussevitzky began its effect and today this orchestra stands as it did under such eminent conductors as Gericke, Nikish and Karl Muck. Probably, after all, the box office is a fairly good barometer as to the artistic standing of even so highly rated an organization as a symphony orchestra.

When the Boston orchestra was "in the depths," so to speak, several years ago, the audiences attending its concerts here dwindled from absolute capacity to far from that; a subscription to the concerts at that time were very easy to be obtained. Today, this series of concerts is sold out far in advance and lucky is the person holding a subscription.

The visit of the Boston orchestra here this week brought forward a work by one of the Russian modernists—Serge Prokofieff. This composer's "Classical" symphony, heard in this program, was first introduced here as long ago as 1918 by the Russian Symphony Orchestra; however, it has been so rarely heard since that its inclusion in the Boston orchestra's program came as a novelty. There was also that superb piece of orchestral writing, perhaps the most inspired of all that Debussy ever composed, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Brahm's Second Symphony. Of the performances of the Boston orchestra nothing new can be said or need be said. It is one of the world's greatest symphonic organizations existing today.

* * *

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 2 - 1928

57

Music Notes

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky, Opens Providence Season Tuesday Night. University Glee Club and Symphony Society Announcements

Within these seven days the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Providence Symphony Society and the University Glee Club open their Providence seasons, events which even in a busier musical year than this has been would make the week seem fairly crowded. The Boston players come Tuesday night to the E. F. Albee Theatre; Providence's own symphony group plays next Sunday afternoon in Elks Auditorium, and the University singers are to be heard next Friday night in Memorial Hall. And with these, a festival of grand opera opens, the details of which are noted in another department.

◈ ◈ ◈

Walter Williams's program for this morning at St. Stephen's Church at 10:40 o'clock is as follows: Kyrie Eleison ("Cathedral Windows," opus 106, No. 1), Sigfrid Karg-Elert; chorale-prelude, "Adorn Thyself, Dear Soul," opus 122, No. 5, Johannes Brahms; chorale-prelude, "Through Adam's Fall, Debased" (Little Organ Book, No. 37), J. S. Bach; Intermezzo (Sonata in A-minor), Josef Rheinberger. In the morning service the choir will sing a Kyrie from the Mass in A-major, by Josef Rheinberger (arranged by Walter Williams), numbers from the Mass in D, by Dr. Edward C. Bairstow, choirmaster of York Minster, England, and an unaccompanied "Ave Maria," by Nicolas Gombert, a Canon of Cambrai Cathedral about 1440. In the afternoon at 5 o'clock a Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis with fauxbourdons by Fr. Vicente Ripolles will be sung for the first time in this country together with the "Cherubim Song" of Rachmaninoff. Fr. Ripolles is Canon of the Cathedral at Valencia in Spain and Professor of Gregorian Music at the Royal College of Corpus Christi in the same city.

◈ ◈ ◈

Three selections for piano and organ will comprise the musical program at the Beneficent Congregational Church this morning at 10:45 o'clock with Herbert Chandler Thrasher at the organ and Mrs. Flora R. Arnold at the piano. Their selections are the "Intermezzo" from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," Massenet's "Meditation," from "Thais," and Handel's "Largo."

◈ ◈ ◈

At the vesper service in the Central Congregational Church this afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, excerpts from Handel's "The Messiah" will be rendered by the quartet and chorus. The quartet consists of Marguerite W. Shaftoe, Julia S. Gould, George Tinker and Harry A. Hughes. Miss Frances Burnham is organist.

◈ ◈ ◈

This afternoon the Chopin Club gives the second of its musical teas at Churchill House at 4 o'clock at which the program will be offered by Maria Iacovino, soprano and the Verdandi Chorus, directed by Oscar Ekeberg.

The Chaminade Club Junior holds its next meeting tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock in The Music Mansion, 88 Meeting street. In the evening, at 8 o'clock, in the same place, the Chaminade Young Artist Club will meet. Owing to the larger space at their disposal afforded by The Music Mansion, both these organizations are able to receive more members and so invite young musicians to join their ranks. The Young Artist Club membership is composed of advanced students while the Chaminade Club Junior consists of younger ones. Both clubs meet every two weeks.

◈ ◈ ◈

For the first of his series of three recitals at the Beneficent Congregational Church Monday nights at 8 o'clock, opening tomorrow night, Herbert Chandler Thrasher announces the following program: Organ, "Concert Overture," Faulkes; "Reverie," Bonnet; Toccata ("Dorian"), J. S. Bach. Tenor, "Noel," Gounod, Bertil O. Larson. Organ, "Where Dusk Gathers Deep," Stebbins; Gavotte, from "Mignon," Thomas; Prelude to "La Traviata," Verdi-Biggs; introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," Wagner. Soprano, "O Divine Redeemer," Gounod, Edith Woodhead Marshall. Organ and piano, Nocturne, Ernest R. Kroeger; "Grand Aria," Demarest, Marion L. Arnold at the piano.

◈ ◈ ◈

With very few seats unsubscribed at this writing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is practically assured of a full house when it begins its season here next Tuesday night at the E. F. Albee Theatre. In other cities besides Providence where the orchestra has played so far, there has been a similar evidence of the Symphony's great popularity and that of its famous conductor. In Boston its series was sold out far in advance of the beginning of the season.

The program through which Serge Koussevitzky will lead his men was announced in this department last week. It contains numbers familiar to concertgoers and is of a spacious order. The first part will be devoted to Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony. Brahms's Second Symphony in D-major will take up the second half.

◈ ◈ ◈

The regular meeting of the MacDowell Club will be held at the home of the President, Mrs. Edward L. Singsen, 100 Greenwood avenue, Rumford, tomorrow night at 8 o'clock.

◈ ◈ ◈

Evangeline Larry announces a series of studio recitals by her violin pupils beginning Wednesday night, Dec. 12, at 8 o'clock in 17 Conrad building. At the first recital Mary Rita Handy will play, assisted by Grace Regester, pianist. On Dec. 14 at 8 o'clock, Isabelle Naylor, violinist, assisted by Marcella Keevers, soprano, will offer the program. Ida Charette and Grace Regester will be the accompanists. On Saturday afternoon, Dec. 22, at 3:30 o'clock the annual Christmas carol program for junior pupils will be held.

◈ ◈ ◈

The musicale to be presented by Nillo Trolli in Bell Street Chapel next Sunday night is the first of a series of concerts planned for Sunday evenings. Those to appear will be Eric Anderson, baritone soloist of the First Congregational Church of Worcester, and Martha Jordan, mezzo soprano, both preparing for opera under Mr. Trolli. Mildred Simmonds will give 'cello numbers, and Emma Morris, pianist, will be accompanist.

Janet R. Armour
Coloratura Soprano Sings With Providence Symphony Society Next Sunday Afternoon in Elks Auditorium.

Kathryne Ross
Soprano is Soloist at University Glee Club Concert Friday Night in Memorial Hall.

OLD-TIME SONGS BY ENGLISH SINGERS

From the musical lore of the British forefathers, mellow and charming madrigals, folksongs and carols, the English Singers will offer a unique program in Alumnae Hall a week from tomorrow night. The informality and spontaneity of the songs will be given in an appropriate manner for the six vocalists sit around a table, a custom of Elizabethan days at musical evenings in the home. The intimate atmosphere conjured in their recitals is said to be not the least of the enjoyments provided.

This is the program they will give: Motets and carol, "Praise Our Lord," William Byrd (1543-1623); "The Virgin's Cradle Hymn," Edmund Rubbra; "Hodie Christus Natus Est." Jan Pieterzoon Sweelinch (1562-1621); Madrigals and ballet, "Sing We and Chant It," Thomas Morley (1558-1603); "O Softly Singing Lute," Francis Pilkington (1562-1638); "Tho' Aramyllis Dance in Green," William Byrd. Folk songs, arranged by R. Vaughan Williams (1872), "The Dary-eved Sailor," "The Turtle Dove," "Wassail Song." Italian street cries, "Chimney Sweeps," Jacques du Pont (c. 1600); "Rag and Bone," Adriano Banchieri (c. 1565-1634); "Hot Chestnuts," Jacques du Pont. Duets and trio, "I Spy Celia," Henry Purcell (1658-1695); "John, Come Kiss Me Not" (16th century), arranged by E. W. Naylor (1867) "The Three Fairies," Henry Purcell. Carols, "Corpus Christi," arranged by Peter Warlock (1894); "The Holly and the Ivy," arranged by Rutland Boughton (1878); "In Dulci Jubilo," arranged by R. L. Pearsall (1795-1856).

The singers are six in number. Flora Mann, Nellie Carson, Lillian Berger, Norman Stone, Norman Notley and Ccuthbert Kelly. This is their fourth American tour and it is said they have given some 300 concerts in this country and Canada. Critics have noted the perfection of their ensemble, the captivating character of their numbers and indescribable nature of the performance which is "magic" to some and to others, "good fun."

◈ ◈ ◈

The Providence College of Music, Wassili Leps, director, announces a concert to be given by last year's graduating class of the normal course at the Providence Plantations Club next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Since their graduation, these students have continued their studies under the guidance of Mr. Leps. They will be assisted by June Russillo and George Beaudet, pianists; Miss Germaine Barre, contralto, and Edward Caffier, violinist, in the following program:

March, from "In a Nutshell Suite," Grainger. Lorette Gagnon, Annette Aubin; "Papillon," Schumann, George Beaudet; "Samson et Dalila," "Amour, Viens Aider," Saint-Saens, Germaine Barre, contralto; "Romance," Schumann, "Sparks," Moszkowski, Lillian Migliori; "Arabesque," Debussy, "La Fileuse," Raff, Berthe Forcier; "Rondo Capriccioso," Mendelssohn, June Russillo; sonata, piano and violin, Edward Caffier, violinist; Maurice Murphy, accompanist; Nocture in F-sharp major, Chopin, Claudia Croisetiere; "Reflet dans l'Eau," Debussy, Carmen Staehly; Sonata, opus 31, No. 3, Beethoven, Lorette Gagnon; "Hindoo Song," Bemberg, "Love is a Bubble," Allitsen, Germaine Barre, contralto; "Faust" waltz, Liszt, Annette Aubin; Fantasy C-minor, Mozart, June Russillo; "Jardins sous la Pluie," Debussy, "Feux d'Artifice," Debussy, George Beadet; Toccata and Fugue, Bach-Tausig, Lillian Migliori; "Blue Danube" Waltz, Strauss, transcribed for two pianos by Chasins, Lorette Gagnon, Annette Aubin.

◈ ◈ ◈

The Clavier Ensemble gives its second concert of the season next Wednesday night at the home of Mrs. George St. John Sheffield, 132 Taber avenue, at 8 o'clock, this being the fourth season of the ensemble and its 20th concert. Miss Julia Gould, contralto, will be the soloist on the following program:

"Moyen-Age Suite," Glazounoff, Prelude, Scherzo, Serenade du Troubadour, two pianofortes, four hands, May Atwood Anderton, Lydia Bell. Christmas Songs, Peter Cornelius, "The Christmas Tree," "The Shepherds," "The Kings," "Simeon," "Christ the Friend of Children," "The Christ Child," Julia Gould. "Toy Symphony," Reinecke, Overture, Turkish March, Intermezzo, Finale, violins, Helen Keenan, Hazel Foster Hadfield, Elizabeth Allsop, Ruth Moulton; celli, Louise Waterman, Helen Grant; pianofortes, Doris Whale, Margaret Ginard, Louise Chagnon; cuckoo, Dorothy Brown; trumpets, May Atwood Anderson, Ingeborg Harklow; rattle, Marjorie Morgan; nightingales, Marian Adams, Dorothy Holmes Sperry; triangle, Elizabeth Higgins; drums, Helen Ostby, Dorothy Joslin Pearce; conductor, Lester Earle Moore.

UNIVERSITY GLEE CLUB'S PROGRAM

With Miss Kathryne Ross, soprano, the University Glee Club, under the direction of Berrick Schloss, will make its bow for the season next Friday night in Memorial Hall. This is the 18th season of the singers and their 41st concert. Earl P. Perkins is accompanist for the club while Mrs. Beatrice Warden Roberts will be at the piano for Miss Ross. A selection of interest in view of the Schubert centenary will be the singing of "The Omnipotence" by Miss Ross, accompanied by the club. The program follows:

"How Beautiful Are the Feet," Handel," arranged by Archibald T. Davidson; "The Devon Maid," Franz C. Bornschein; "After Many a Dusty Mile," Edward Elgar; "The British Grenadiers," traditional air, arranged by Percy E. Fletcher, the club; "Ah! Twine No Blossoms," Gliere; "Only a Yearning Heart," Tschaikowski; "Three Cavaliers," traditional, Miss Ross. "Ain't It a Shame," negro song, arranged by Harvey B. Gaul; "Swingin' Vine," Ralph L. Grosvenor; "Plantation," M. Raul Steiner, arranged by William Stickles, the club. Aria, "Vol lo Sapete," from "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni, Miss Ross.

"Song of the Canys," H. J. Stewart, incidental solo by J. C. Peel, the club. "The Omnipotence," Schubert, arranged by Liszt, Miss Ross, assisted by the club. "Prelude-Cycle of Life," Ronald; "In the Time of Roses," Reichart; "Little Shepherd's Song," Edwards; "Awakening," Golde, Miss Ross. "A Persevering Vocalist," H. Alexander Matthews, incidental solo by Byron Hudson; "In Autumn Sea," W. Gericke; "Roman Rye," Robert M. Crawford; incidental solo by Walter R. Morris, the club.

PROVIDENCE SYMPHONY OPENS CONCERT SERIES

The Providence Symphony Society, Roswell H. Fairman, conductor, starts its present series of educational concerts next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in Elks Auditorium. Mr. Fairman has chosen a substantial and attractive program which will be preceded by a brief analytical talk by James F. Prendergast, Jr., aimed to be helpful in appreciating the music and the purpose of the composer.

The soloist will be Janet D. Armour, a young coloratura soprano said to be of great promise. She is a student in the Lister Studios in Boston. With the orchestra she will sing an aria from "Traviata." The symphony is Mendelssohn's "Scotch," considered by many his finest symphony. The program will be as follows: "Scotch" Symphony in A-minor, Mendelssohn, Andante con motor, Allegro un poco agitato, Vivare non troppo, Adagio, Allegro vivacissimo, Scene and Aria, "Oh, fors' e lui," from "La Traviata," Verdi; Suite, "Woodland Sketches," MacDowell, "To a Water Lily," "A Deserted Farm," "By a Meadow Brook," "Told at Sunset;" overture, "Don Juan," Mozart.

SYMPHONIC MUSIC AT PUBLIC LIBRARY

Of the works to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Providence concert Tuesday night, the Providence Public Library has the following: "Overture to Lenore, No. 3," Beethoven, arranged for piano, four hands, in collections of Beethoven Overtures for Orchestra, published by Breitkopf and Hartel; in collections of Beethoven Overtures, arranged for four-hand playing, published by Peters; in a collection of Beethoven Overtures, arranged for two pianos, eight hands, by Gustav Rosler; in a series of overtures entitled "The Pianist's Library," arranged for two pianos, eight hands, published by Breitkopf and Hartel; in "The Miniature" series of orchestral scores.

There are two arrangements of Debussys "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune," one in the form of a piano solo, transcribed by Leonard Borwick, and the other in the form of a piano duet, transcribed by Maurice Ravel.

Two Symphonies on Program of Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Opens Providence Series of Concerts Tuesday Night in E. F. Albee Theatre.

BY WALTER STOREY SMITH

That two symphonies stand on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, might seem to indicate that the concert will be more than usually formidable. In this instance, however, appearances are deceptive. Of these symphonies only that in the latter half of the program, Brahm's Symphony in D-major, No. 2, is likely to tax the attention of any listener in Tuesday evening's audience. The other, the so-called "Classical" Symphony, by Serge Prokofieff, is indeed a symphony in so far as its formal outlines are concerned, but its musical content is so far from weighty that at times only the composer's cleverly concealed scholarship saves his work from the reproach of obviousness.

Those who know Prokofieff through the music that is genuinely characteristic of his own tendencies and tonal faiths would never suspect him as the author of these measures—measures in which, as Felix Borowski has suggested, his intention was to "catch the spirit of Mozart and put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." An ingenious fancy, if one does not inquire too closely into its accuracy. But it seems altogether probable that if Mozart was, in 1790, a child of his time, he would have been equally a child of his time in 1917 and would thus have written in an idiom at least superficially related to Prokofieff's own.

Be that as it may, it was an amusing caprice that prompted the composer of the Scythian Suite to forget his dissonances and his glaring orchestral colors and to write for the moment simply, artlessly, tunefully, seeking suavity of melody, limpidity of part-writing, harmonic blandness and orchestral euphonies. And thanks to his exuberant imagination and his easy command of all the resources of composition he could carry off successfully an undertaking which, if assumed by a lesser man, might easily have yielded only academic inanities.

The usual four movements suffice for Prokofieff in his adventure into classicism, but unconventionally he substitutes for the Minuet or Scherzo a Gavotte, a procedure for which there is no symphonic precedent. Otherwise his music will be found by those sentient in such matters to be orthodox in pattern, and by all and sundry it will be found music engagingly melodious, enticingly rhythmed and deftly scored for orchestra.

After many performances of this symphony at home and afield the Boston Orchestra now makes of it an exhilarating exercise in virtuosity, especially in the last movement where Mr. Koussevitsky is wont to push speed to the very limits of clarity.

Not before has Providence heard this music, which has been performed in Boston three times within two seasons. The remainder of the program, on the other hand, is familiar enough. For those interested in such details it may be recalled that Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3 was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence under Mr. Monteux in November, 1920; that Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" was heard from this organization in Infantry Hall in November, 1925; and that Brahms's Second Symphony was conducted in Providence by Mr. Koussevitsky no longer ago than season-before-last, in February, 1927. Yet inasmuch as every piece is new to some member of every audience, a few words concerning these other works, each a masterpiece of its kind, will not be amiss.

In all, Beethoven wrote four overtures to his one and only opera, first called "Leonore" and finally known as "Fidelio." Of these the one numbered three was actually the second in order of composition, and it was discarded by its composer in favor of a simpler, more straightforward, less difficult introduction for operatic performances. But Number Three is the one that is heard as a concert-piece.

Sir George Grove called it the greatest single piece in the domain of instrumental music, and it was made the subject of a rhapsodical essay by Wagner who saw in it a vindication of his own theory that the overture to an opera should be a sort of musical synthesis of the drama to come.

In his Prelude to Mallarme's poem of the faun whose muddled brain cannot distinguish between dream and experience Debussy turned one of the pages in the book of art. With the first performance of this Prelude, at Paris, on Dec. 23, 1894, there was born, to change the metaphor, what has been called musical impressionism, an influence from which no modern composer has completely escaped, however strongly the present tendencies in composition may run counter to those of Debussy and his school.

Finally the Symphony of Brahms, although not in any sense an epoch-making work, is among the choicest flowerings of the tonal art. Less epic than the First Symphony of its composer, less moving than the Third, less profound than the Fourth, it has a peculiar charm, an especial appeal of its own. Only in the brooding, introspective, deeply-felt Adagio does this Symphony sound a sombre or a solemn note. The rest is serenity, lyric

There are arrangements of Brahms's "Symphony No. 2 in D-major," as follows: In the excellent "Analytic" series, arranged for piano solo, edited by Percy Goetschius, technically well within the grasp of the average music student; arranged for piano solo, by Robert Keller; arranged for piano duet, in an edition of his "Symphonies," published by Schirmer, arranged for two pianos, eight hands, by Robert Keller.

Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, opus 25, has been ordered. This work was recently played by the orchestra in Boston, and an account of it is contained in the orchestra's Program Book for Oct. 26 and 27, 1928, on file in the music department.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the principal number announced for the opening concert of the Providence Symphony Society, is included also in the "Analytic" series, edited by Percy Goetschius. This number has recently been added to the music collection. In addition to the arrangement for piano solo, the music collection includes all of Mendelssohn's symphonies in four-hand, and in eight-hand arrangements. The four-hand transcriptions are in a collection published by Peters, also in a collection published by Litolff, arranged by Chatwal. The eight-hand arrangements are in a collection published by Peters. A miniature orchestral score completes the list.

Among the books dealing with the symphony orchestra, recommended by Dr. W. Louis Chapman in his talk on the symphony orchestra during the past week (one of the series of "book talks," now being given at the library on Monday afternoons), were the following: "Symphonies and Their Meaning," Goepp; "Standard Symphonies," Upton; "The Orchestra and Orchestral Music," Henderson; "The Orchestral Instruments and What They Do," Mason; "Outlines of Music History," Hamilton; "How Music Developed," Henderson; "Beethoven's Nine Symphonies," Grove; "The Symphony Since Beethoven," Weingartner.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 2 - 1928

57

Music Notes

Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky, Opens Providence Season Tuesday Night. University Glee Club and Symphony Society Announcements

Within these seven days the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Providence Symphony Society and the University Glee Club open their Providence seasons, events which even in a busier musical year than this has been would make the week seem fairly crowded. The Boston players come Tuesday night to the E. F. Albee Theatre; Providence's own symphony group plays next Sunday afternoon in Elks Auditorium, and the University singers are to be heard next Friday night in Memorial Hall. And with these, a festival of grand opera opens, the details of which are noted in another department.

◈ ◈ ◈

Walter Williams's program for this morning at St. Stephen's Church at 10:40 o'clock is as follows: Kyrie Eleison ("Cathedral Windows," opus 106, No. 1), Sigfrid Karg-Elert; chorale-prelude, "Adorn Thyself, Dear Soul," opus 122, No. 5, Johannes Brahms; chorale-prelude, "Through Adam's Fall, Debased" (Little Organ Book, No. 37), J. S. Bach; Intermezzo (Sonata in A-minor), Josef Rheinberger. In the morning service the choir will sing a Kyrie from the Mass in A-major, by Josef Rheinberger (arranged by Walter Williams), numbers from the Mass in D, by Dr. Edward C. Bairstow, choirmaster of York Minster, England, and an unaccompanied "Ave Maria," by Nicolas Gombert, a Canon of Cambrai Cathedral about 1440. In the afternoon at 5 o'clock a Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis with fauxbourdons by Fr. Vicente Ripolles will be sung for the first time in this country together with the "Cherubim Song" of Rachmaninoff. Fr. Ripolles is Canon of the Cathedral at Valencia in Spain and Professor of Gregorian Music at the Royal College of Corpus Christi in the same city.

◈ ◈ ◈

Three selections for piano and organ will comprise the musical program at the Beneficent Congregational Church this morning at 10:45 o'clock with Herbert Chandler Thrasher at the organ and Mrs. Flora R. Arnold at the piano. Their selections are the "Intermezzo" from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," Massenet's "Meditation," from "Thais," and Handel's "Largo."

◈ ◈ ◈

At the vesper service in the Central Congregational Church this afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, excerpts from Handel's "The Messiah" will be rendered by the quartet and chorus. The quartet consists of Marguerite W. Shaftoe, Julia S. Gould, George Tinker and Harry A. Hughes. Miss Frances Burnham is organist.

◈ ◈ ◈

This afternoon the Chopin Club gives the second of its musical teas at Churchill House at 4 o'clock at which the program will be offered by Maria Iacovino, soprano and the Verdandi Chorus, directed by Oscar Ekeberg.

The Chaminade Club Junior holds its next meeting tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock in The Music Mansion, 88 Meeting street. In the evening, at 8 o'clock, in the same place, the Chaminade Young Artist Club will meet. Owing to the larger space at their disposal afforded by The Music Mansion, both these organizations are able to receive more members and so invite young musicians to join their ranks. The Young Artist Club membership is composed of advanced students while the Chaminade Club Junior consists of younger ones. Both clubs meet every two weeks.

◈ ◈ ◈

For the first of his series of three recitals at the Beneficent Congregational Church Monday nights at 8 o'clock, opening tomorrow night, Herbert Chandler Thrasher announces the following program: Organ, "Concert Overture," Faulkes; "Reverie," Bonnet; Toccata ("Dorian"), J. S. Bach. Tenor, "Noel," Gounod, Bertil O. Larson, Organ. "Where Dusk Gathers Deep," Stebbins; Gavotte, from "Mignon," Thomas; Prelude to "La Traviata," Verdi-Biggs; introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin," Wagner. Soprano, "O Divine Redeemer," Gounod, Edith Woodhead Marshall. Organ and piano, Nocturne, Ernest R. Kroeger; "Grand Aria," Demarest, Marion L. Arnold at the piano.

Janet R. Armour
Coloratura Soprano Sings With Providence Symphony Society Next Sunday Afternoon in Elks Auditorium.

◈ ◈ ◈

With very few seats unsubscribed at this writing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is practically assured of a full house when it begins its season here next Tuesday night at the E. F. Albee Theatre. In other cities besides Providence where the orchestra has played so far, there has been a similar evidence of the Symphony's great popularity and that of its famous conductor. In Boston its series was sold out far in advance of the beginning of the season.

The program through which Serge Koussevitzky will lead his men was announced in this department last week. It contains numbers familiar to concertgoers and is of a spacious order. The first part will be devoted to Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony. Brahms's Second Symphony in D-major will take up the second half.

◈ ◈ ◈

The regular meeting of the MacDowell Club will be held at the home of the President, Mrs. Edward L. Singsen, 100 Greenwood avenue, Rumford, tomorrow night at 8 o'clock.

◈ ◈ ◈

Evangeline Larry announces a series of studio recitals by her violin pupils beginning Wednesday night, Dec. 12, at 8 o'clock in 17 Conrad building. At the first recital Mary Rita Handy will play, assisted by Grace Regester, pianist. On Dec. 14 at 8 o'clock, Isabelle Naylor, violinist, assisted by Marcella Keevers, soprano, will offer the program. Ida Charette and Grace Regester will be the accompanists. On Saturday afternoon, Dec. 22, at 3:30 o'clock the annual Christmas carol program for junior pupils will be held.

◈ ◈ ◈

The musicale to be presented by Nillo Trolli in Bell Street Chapel next Sunday night is the first of a series of concerts planned for Sunday evenings. Those to appear will be Eric Anderson, baritone soloist of the First Congregational Church of Worcester, and Martha Jordan, mezzo soprano, both preparing for opera under Mr. Trolli. Mildred Simmonds will give 'cello numbers, and Emma Morris, pianist, will be accompanist.

OLD-TIME SONGS BY ENGLISH SINGERS

From the musical lore of the British forefathers, mellow and charming madrigals, folksongs and carols, the English Singers will offer a unique program in Alumnae Hall a week from tomorrow night. The informality and spontaneity of the songs will be given in an appropriate manner for the six vocalists sit around a table, a custom of Elizabethan days at musical evenings in the home. The intimate atmosphere conjured in their recitals is said to be not the least of the enjoyments provided.

This is the program they will give: Motets and carol, "Praise Our Lord," William Byrd (1543-1623); "The Virgin's Cradle Hymn," Edmund Rubbra; "Hodie Christus Natus Est," Jan Pieterzoon Sweelinch (1562-1621); Madrigals and ballet, "Sing We and Chant It," Thomas Morley (1558-1603); "O Softly Singing Lute," Francis Pilkington (1562-1638); "Tho' Aramyllis Dance in Green," William Byrd. Folk songs, arranged by R. Vaughan Williams (1872), "The Dary-eved Sailor," "The Turtle Dove," "Wassail Song," Italian street cries, "Chimney Sweeps," Jacques du Pont (c. 1600); "Rag and Bone," Adriano Banchieri (c. 1565-1634); "Hot Chestnuts," Jacques du Pont. Duets and trio, "I Spy Celia," Henry Purcell (1658-1695); "John, Come Kiss Me Not" (16th century), arranged by E. W. Naylor (1867) "The Three Fairies," Henry Purcell. Carols, "Corpus Christi," arranged by Peter Warlock (1894); "The Holly and the Ivy," arranged by Rutland Boughton (1878); "In Dulci Jubilo," arranged by R. L. Pearsall (1795-1856).

The singers are six in number. Flora Mann, Nellie Carson, Lillian Berger, Norman Stone, Norman Notley and Cuthbert Kelly. This is their fourth American tour and it is said they have given some 300 concerts in this country and Canada. Critics have noted the perfection of their ensemble, the captivating character of their numbers and indescribable nature of the performance which is "magic" to some and to others, "good fun."

◈ ◈ ◈

The Providence College of Music, Wassili Leps, director, announces a concert to be given by last year's graduating class of the normal course at the Providence Plantations Club next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Since their graduation, these students have continued their studies under the guidance of Mr. Leps. They will be assisted by June Russillo and George Beaudet, pianists; Miss Germaine Barre, contralto, and Edward Caffier, violinist, in the following program:

March, from "In a Nutshell Suite," Grainger, Lorette Gagnon, Annette Aubin; "Papillon," Schumann, George Beaudet; "Samson et Dalila," "Amour, Viens Aider," Saint-Saens, Germaine Barre, contralto; "Romance," Schumann, "Sparks," Moszkowski, Lillian Migliori; "Arabesque," Debussy, "La Fileuse," Raff, Berthe Forcier; "Rondo Capriccioso," Mendelssohn, June Russillo; sonata, piano and violin, Edward Caffier, violinist; Maurice Murphy, accompanist; Nocturne in F-sharp major, Chopin, Claudia Croisetiere; "Reflet dans l'Eau," Debussy, Carmen Staehly; Sonata, opus 31, No. 3, Beethoven, Lorette Cagnon; "Hindoo Song," Bemberg, "Love is a Bubble," Allitsen, Germaine Barre, contralto; "Faust" waltz, Liszt, Annette Aubin; Fantasy C-minor, Mozart, June Russillo; "Jardins sous la Pluie," Debussy, "Feux d'Artifice," Debussy, George Beadet; Toccata and Fugue, Bach-Tausig, Lillian Migliori; "Blue Danube" Waltz, Strauss, transcribed for two pianos by Chasins, Lorette Gagnon, Annette Aubin.

Kathryne Ross
Soprano is Soloist at University Glee Club Concert Friday Night in Memorial Hall.

◈ ◈ ◈

The Clavier Ensemble gives its second concert of the season next Wednesday night at the home of Mrs. George St. John Sheffield, 132 Taber avenue, at 8 o'clock, this being the fourth season of the ensemble and its 20th concert. Miss Julia Gould, contralto, will be the soloist on the following program:

"Moyen-Age Suite," Glazounoff. Prelude, Scherzo, Serenade du Troubadour, two pianofortes, four hands, May Atwood Anderton, Lydia Bell. Christmas Songs, Peter Cornelius, "The Christmas Tree," "The Shepherds," "The Kings," "Simeon," "Christ the Friend of Children," "The Christ Child," Julia Gould. "Toy Symphony," Reinecke. Overture, Turkish March. Intermezzo. Finale, violins, Helen Keenan, Hazel Foster Hadfield, Elizabeth Allsop, Ruth Moulton; celli, Louise Waterman, Helen Grant; pianofortes, Doris Whale, Margaret Ginard, Louise Chagnon; cuckoo, Dorothy Brown; trumpets, May Atwood Anderson, Ingeborg Harklow; rattle, Marjorie Morgan; nightingales, Marian Adams, Dorothy Holmes Sperry; triangle, Elizabeth Higgins; drums, Helen Ostby, Dorothy Joslin Pearce; conductor, Lester Earle Moore.

UNIVERSITY GLEE CLUB'S PROGRAM

With Miss Kathryne Ross, soprano, the University Glee Club, under the direction of Berrick Schloss, will make its bow for the season next Friday night in Memorial Hall. This is the 18th season of the singers and their 41st concert. Earl P. Perkins is accompanist for the club while Mrs. Beatrice Warden Roberts will be at the piano for Miss Ross. A selection of interest in view of the Schubert centenary will be the singing of "The Omnipotence" by Miss Ross, accompanied by the club. The program follows:

"How Beautiful Are the Feet," Handel," arranged by Archibald T. Davidson; "The Devon Maid," Franz C. Bornschein; "After Many a Dusty Mile," Edward Elgar; "The British Grenadiers," traditional air, arranged by Percy E. Fletcher, the club; "Ah! Twine No Blossoms," Gliere; "Only a Yearning Heart," Tschaikowski; "Three Cavaliers," traditional, Miss Ross. "Ain't It a Shame," negro song, arranged by Harvey B. Gaul; "Swingin' Vine," Ralph L. Grosvenor; "Plantation," M. Raul Steiner, arranged by William Stickles, the club. Aria, "Vol lo Sapete," from "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni, Miss Ross.

"Song of the Canys," H. J. Stewart, incidental solo by J. C. Peel, the club. "The Omnipotence," Schubert, arranged by Liszt, Miss Ross, assisted by the club. "Prelude-Cycle of Life," Ronald; "In the Time of Roses," Reichart; "Little Shepherd's Song," Edwards; "Awakening," Golde, Miss Ross. "A Persevering Vocalist," H. Alexander Matthews, incidental solo by Byron Hudson; "The Autumn Sea," W. Gericke; "Roman Rye," Robert M. Crawford; incidental solo by Walter R. Morris, the club.

PROVIDENCE SYMPHONY OPENS CONCERT SERIES

The Providence Symphony Society, Roswell H. Fairman, conductor, starts its present series of educational concerts next Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in Elks Auditorium. Mr. Fairman has chosen a substantial and attractive program which will be preceded by a brief analytical talk by James F. Prendergast, Jr., aimed to be helpful in appreciating the music and the purpose of the composer.

The soloist will be Janet D. Armour, a young coloratura soprano said to be of great promise. She is a student in the Lister Studios in Boston. With the orchestra she will sing an aria from "Traviata." The symphony is Mendelssohn's "Scotch," considered by many his finest symphony. The program will be as follows: "Scotch" Symphony in A-minor, Mendelssohn, Andante con motor, Allegro un poco agitato, Vivare non troppo, Adagio, Allegro vivacissimo. Scene and Aria, "Oh, fors' e lui," from "La Traviata," Verdi; Suite, "Woodland Sketches," MacDowell. "To a Water Lily," "A Deserted Farm," "By a Meadow Brook," "Told at Sunset;" overture, "Don Juan," Mozart.

SYMPHONIC MUSIC AT PUBLIC LIBRARY

Of the works to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Providence concert Tuesday night, the Providence Public Library has the following: "Overture to Lenore, No. 3," Beethoven, arranged for piano, four hands, in collections of Beethoven Overtures for Orchestra, published by Breitkopf and Hartel; in collections of Beethoven Overtures, arranged for four-hand playing, published by Peters; in a collection of Beethoven Overtures, arranged for two pianos, eight hands, by Gustav Rosler; in a series of overtures entitled "The Pianist's Library," arranged for two pianos, eight hands, published by Breitkopf and Hartel; in "The Miniature" series of orchestral scores.

There are two arrangements of Debussys "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune," one in the form of a piano solo, transcribed by Leonard Borwick, and the other in the form of a piano duet, transcribed by Maurice Ravel.

Two Symphonies on Program of Boston Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Which Opens Providence Series of Concerts Tuesday Night in E. F. Albee Theatre.

BY WALTER STOREY SMITH

That two symphonies stand on the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, at the Albee Theatre next Tuesday evening, might seem to indicate that the concert will be more than usually formidable. In this instance, however, appearances are deceptive. Of these symphonies only that in the latter half of the program, Brahm's Symphony in D-major, No. 2, is likely to tax the attention of any listener in Tuesday evening's audience. The other, the so-called "Classical" Symphony, by Serge Prokofieff, is indeed a symphony in so far as its formal outlines are concerned, but its musical content is so far from weighty that at times only the composer's cleverly concealed scholarship saves his work from the reproach of obviousness.

Those who know Prokofieff through the music that is genuinely characteristic of his own tendencies and tonal faiths would never suspect him as the author of these measures—measures in which, as Felix Borowski has suggested, his intention was to "catch the spirit of Mozart and put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." An ingenious fancy, if one does not inquire too closely into its accuracy. But it seems altogether probable that if Mozart was, in 1790, a child of his time, he would have been equally a child of his time in 1917 and would thus have written in an idiom at least superficially related to Prokofieff's own.

Be that as it may, it was an amusing caprice that prompted the composer of the Scythian Suite to forget his dissonances and his glaring orchestral colors and to write for the moment simply, artlessly, tunefully, seeking suavity of melody, limpidity of part-writing, harmonic blandness and orchestral euphonies. And thanks to his exuberant imagination and his easy command of all the resources of composition he could carry off successfully an undertaking which, if assumed by a lesser man, might easily have yielded only academic inanities.

The usual four movements suffice for Prokofieff in his adventure into classicism, but unconventionally he substitutes for the Minuet or Scherzo a Gavotte, a procedure for which there is no symphonic precedent. Otherwise his music will be found by those sentient in such matters to be orthodox in pattern, and by all and sundry it will be found music engagingly melodious, enticingly rhythmed and deftly scored for orchestra.

After many performances of this symphony at home and afield the Boston Orchestra now makes of it an exhilarating exercise in virtuosity, especially in the last movement where Mr. Koussevitsky is wont to push speed to the very limits of clarity.

Not before has Providence heard this music, which has been performed in Boston three times within two seasons. The remainder of the program, on the other hand, is familiar enough. For those interested in such details it may be recalled that Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3 was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence under Mr. Monteux in November, 1920; that Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" was heard from this organization in Infantry Hall in November, 1925; and that Brahms's Second Symphony was conducted in Providence by Mr. Koussevitsky no longer ago than season-before-last, in February, 1927. Yet inasmuch as every piece is new to some member of every audience, a few words concerning these other works, each a masterpiece of its kind, will not be amiss.

In all, Beethoven wrote four overtures to his one and only opera, first called "Leonore" and finally known as "Fidelio." Of these the one numbered three was actually the second in order of composition, and it was discarded by its composer in favor of a simpler, more straightforward, less difficult introduction for operatic performances. But Number Three is the one that is heard as a concert-piece.

Sir George Grove called it the greatest single piece in the domain of instrumental music, and it was made the subject of a rhapsodical essay by Wagner who saw in it a vindication of his own theory that the overture to an opera should be a sort of musical synthesis of the drama to come.

In his Prelude to Mallarme's poem of the faun whose muddled brain cannot distinguish between dream and experience Debussy turned one of the pages in the book of art. With the first performance of this Prelude, at Paris, on Dec. 23, 1894, there was born, to change the metaphor, what has been called musical impressionism, an influence from which no modern composer has completely escaped, however strongly the present tendencies in composition may run counter to those of Debussy and his school.

Finally the Symphony of Brahms, although not in any sense an epoch-making work, is among the choicest flowerings of the tonal art. Less epic than the First Symphony of its composer, less moving than the Third, less profound than the Fourth, it has a peculiar charm, an especial appeal of its own. Only in the brooding, introspective, deeply-felt Adagio does this Symphony sound a sombre or a solemn note. The rest is serenity, lyric

There are arrangements of Brahms's "Symphony No. 2 in D-major," as follows: In the excellent "Analytic" series, arranged for piano solo, edited by Percy Goetschius, technically well within the grasp of the average music student; arranged for piano solo, by Robert Keller; arranged for piano duet, in an edition of his "Symphonies," published by Schirmer, arranged for two pianos, eight hands, by Robert Keller.

Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, opus 25, has been ordered. This work was recently played by the orchestra in Boston, and an account of it is contained in the orchestra's Program Book for Oct. 26 and 27, 1928, on file in the music department.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, the principal number announced for the opening concert of the Providence Symphony Society, is included also in the "Analytic" series, edited by Percy Goetschius. This number has recently been added to the music collection. In addition to the arrangement for piano solo, the music collection includes all of Mendelssohn's symphonies in four-hand, and in eight-hand arrangements. The four-hand transcriptions are in a collection published by Peters, also in a collection published by Litolff, arranged by Chatwal. The eight-hand arrangements are in a collection published by Peters. A miniature orchestral score completes the list.

Among the books dealing with the symphony orchestra, recommended by Dr. W. Louis Chapman in his talk on the symphony orchestra during the past week (one of the series of "book talks," now being given at the library on Monday afternoons), were the following: "Symphonies and Their Meaning," Goepp; "Standard Symphonies," Upton; "The Orchestra and Orchestral Music," Henderson; "The Orchestral Instruments and What They Do," Mason; "Outlines of Music History," Hamilton; "How Music Developed," Henderson; "Beethoven's Nine Symphonies," Grove; "The Symphony Since Beethoven," Weingartner.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
DEC 3 - 19

MUSIC LEAGUE TO GIVE THREE CONCERTS HERE

Three concerts by world-renowned musicians will be given in this city during the spring of 1929, in Infantry hall, the Music League of Providence announces. They are made possible by oversubscriptions to the fund to underwrite the Boston Symphony concert series which [illegible] here at the E. F. Albee Theatre tomorrow evening.

The Music League had hoped to have the three concerts on Tuesday evenings, but this was found impossible, due to late bookings. It was not known that Infantry hall, which has been completly renovated, was available for the series. Announcements will be mailed to subscribers late next month. Public sale of tickets for the series will begin about Feb. 15. The charge made will cover only the expenses.

The Music League announces that Jascha Heifetz, the violinist, will appear here on March 11; the soprano, Dusolina Giannini, and the Russian pianist, Alexander Brailovsky, will share a concert evening in April 9; and on May 2 the Cleviland Symphony Orchestra, with the baritone, Richard Bonelli, will appar here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
DEC 6

Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Albee Theatre Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, in one of his most felicitous citations, presented Dr. Serge Koussevitzk to musical Providence as one of Brown University's most distinguished sons. And if ever a son met an opportunity fair and square, that son was Koussevitzky. And the ovation he received he well merited; for seldom does a conductor anywhere favor an audience with so perfect a reading of such dissimilar scores, as that of last night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Program

PART ONE

Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72.
Debussy—"Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune."
Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Prokofieff—"Classical," Symphony, Op. 25.
I. Allegro.
II. Larghetto.
III. Gavotte.
IV. Finale.

PART TWO

Brahms—Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro con troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto, grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

If Koussevitsky is not master of the orchestra, then the orchestra has no master. He treats it like a great ethereal instrument that thrills with eagerness to sing whatever song the human brain can devise. Alike conspicuous was his force, his delicacy, his uncanny sense of musical complexities, his skill in evoking the flashing riposte of voice against voice, and—greater than all—his felicity in synthetizing the multiplicity of tones into one perfect mood, whether it be that of the blaze of noontide, the glitter of starlight, or the soft ivory of the waning moon.

By good fortune most of the program was familiar to the audience. Not always does one have the opportunity that bids him sit and enjoy the music without thought of sequence or consequence, making no attempt nor feeling the necessity to project the hearing ahead of the sound wave in an endeavor to catch in imagination the sound that is to follow. But such an opportunity came last night; for Koussevitzky brought our three old friends, Beethoven, Brahms and Debussy, and included our young acquaintance, Prokofieff.

A Superlative "Leonore"

It is more than pleasant to hear the "Leonore" overture for the nth time and to know that the last performance was by far the best one has ever heard. It filled the mind with strange fancies, it made one wonder what there was in the name potent enough to enchant men as unlike as Beethoven and Poe, to force each to give it a setting of phantasy and romance.

The extreme delicacy of the beginning, the tender Basses such as Beethoven loved, the flutes that have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra famous, a sudden change of key in the very heart of a diminuendo that would be the despair of any other orchestra—these are some of the things that the listener might have noted; or he might have caught luminous chords that he had never noticed before, or shivered at the far-away trumpet blowing like the horns in elfland. And in the end he should have concluded that among all orchestras the Boston Symphony is the only Stradivari.

And then that poor Faun—how well the magic flute of Laurent told of his perplexities. Never until last night has a flute suggested stronger emotion than the strings; but somehow last night it beat them all in open competition. As Laurent played that little theme of one crying in the wilderness the other instruments tried to comfort and console him, until the 'cello mocked him, only to be shamed into silence by the oboe. But the poor distraught Faun seemed more befuddled than ever, until with his quaint psychology he fell asleep wondering, like other pholosophers, whether to live is to die, to breathe is to banquet, or to slumber, a sheepskin.

In Mozart's Manner

It is difficult to determine whether Prokofieff wrote as a rival of Mozart to show tnat he was equally competent to produce a work in classic form and phrase, or whether he made a delicate but pungent parody of Mozart's style, calling attention by a wink in the Gavotte to the fact that nowadays we do things otherwise and in a better manner.

His work is full of reminiscences of various sorts, humorous and otherwise. In the first movement there is a strong flavor of a Hayden rondo, while the second is redolent of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The playing of this movement was the very virtuosity of restraint, just as the last was that of velocity.

If the Symphony seemed a little muddy at the very outset, the flute and the 'cello soon clarified it, and the stream then flowed on with perhaps more force than one usually observes.

Koussevitzky roused Brahms from his too pensive mood, although he allowed him to play with his Lullaby theme and contemplate it with quiet satisfaction; and he also permitted him to sound several strange echoes of Schubert. But he made him speak out in his own person more definitely than we usually hear him speak.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
DEC 5 - 19

KOUSSEVITSKY IS BACK AGAIN

Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in First of Four Concerts at the Albee

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, M. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, came to Providence at the Albee Theatre last night for the first of four concerts of the 48th season. As usual, every seat in the theatre was occupied and M. Koussevitsky and the ensemble were warmly greeted. Thoughtful and appreciative friends had sent M. Koussentsky large pieces of chrysanthemums which graced each side of the conductor's stand.

For the opening program presented M. Koussevitsky presented familiar numbers with one exception—that the classical symphony by his friend, M. Prokofieff, who, it will be remembered, was a soloist at a concert in Infantry Hall several years ago with the Boston Symphony, the first year, if we recall rightly, of M. Koussevitsky's directorship. The other numbers were the overture to Leonore by Beethoven; the Prelude to I'Apres-Midi d'un Faune (the afternoon of a Faun) by Debussy, and Brahms's Second Symphony in D-major.

The Leonora Overture never fails to charm and enthrall. One of the more popular of Beethoven's works, it is played and enjoyed in the German beer gardens as one of the latest of the American flash jazz numbers in a New York night club. One never tires of its beautiful melody. Constant playing can-

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
DEC 5 - 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Given Great Reception

Serge Koussevitzky Directs Program in Albee Theatre at Providence.

The first concert of the season and the 204th concert in Providence of the Boston Symphony orchestra given in the Albee Theatre last evening thrilled an audience that filled every seat in the house.

It was a remarkable reception to Serge Koussevitzky and the 108musician of this mammoth orchestra. Greeting the visitors, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce showered an abundance of praise upon them and elicited spontaneous applause. He congratulated Mr. Koussevitzky and asserted that Rhode Island was hungry for the symphony orchestra.

Music lovers found much in last evening's varied programme to appease their appetites. With commanding vigor Mr. Koussevitzky adroitly wafted his baton while standing on the platform which was banked with flowers—tokens of the high esteem and appreciation of Rhode Island followers.

Opens With Beethoven Overture.

The programme opened with Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," which won instant favor. "Leonore" begins with softened basses and reaches periods of furious outbursts from the entire orchestra which arouses a multitude of emotions. From the time of the twice-repeated trumpet call off stage until the end, the theme is as enchanting as it is pathetic. It was first played on March 29, 1806, as the overture for the opera "Fidelio, oder die eheliche Liebe."

It was in 1902 that the first performance of Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune (Eglogue de S. Mallarme) was given in this country. Under the splendidly skilled direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, this selection transported hearers into a world of phantasy. Impressions of the magical faun, melancholy and passionate, are ever present.

The "Classical Symphony" by Serge S. Prokofieff has the express purpose of showing the composer's idea of how Mozart would write music if he were living now. Prokofieff actually composed a stirring and extremely Russion symphony which at times reached the depth of power and melancholy that is touching.

Plays Brahms Symphony.

If Brahms symphonies are boring one could not judge by applause which was given his "Symphony No. 2 in D-Major" last evening. It was rendered with tenderness and brilliance. The scherzo was particularly bright and graceful and the thematic development very effective.

To name the selection which made the most profound impression and which was enjoyed the most would be very difficult. Suffice to say that music lovers have already started to look forward to Jan. 15, when Mr. Koussevitzky and his gifted players return for their second concert.

musicians had the laugh on all reformers. The language of music is unintelligble to them. If they knew what it meant, confided Mr. Taylor, the battalions of reform would swing into action. But they never will, and neither will a great many who enjoyed Debussy's silver lushness last night.

A program note quoting a commentary by Felix Borowski said of the Prokofieff Symphony: "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his score." That is a magnificent attempt to scale the walls of the musican heavens when it is recalled that of Mozart it was said he wrote music that he had remembered from divine voices. Whether or not M. Prokofieff succeeded we leave to more competent judges. The Brahms Symphony lost none of its loveliness from the treatment of the Boston Symphony.

Several were heard last night sighing for Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. It may be that M. Koussevitsky, who is just as engaging as ever, will satisfy us in this respect before the season is over. As for the orchestra, what can one say that it loses none of its skill with the passing years and that under the baton of M. Koussevitsky it is rapidly assuming a place at the very top of the best of the great ensembles of the world?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
DEC 5 - 1

-:- MUSIC -:-

A BRILLIANT CONCERT

It is a perilous undertaking to try to find a single phrase which would express the outstanding characteristic of the brilliant concert with which Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra opened the season last night, yet the temptation is irresistible to describe it as a concert of subtle luminosity. Subtle and luminous it was from beginning to end, a series of interpretations that carried us into the very last refinements of intellectualized spirit and emotion.

No words could over praise such an evening. Words, indeed, are a poor way of trying to interpret musicianship that could only be interpreted by music itself. But at least words may be used to recognize the excellent taste with which the programme was built; here were a balance and harmony which would have delighted Plato himself.

* * *

Three of the four numbers on the programme were familiar to us, Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3, which age cannot wither nor custom stale; Debussy's prelude to "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune," in which the composer did with tones for Mallarme what Mallarme had not been able to do for himself with words, and Brahms's Second Symphony of which so great an authority as Felix Weingartner said; "The stream of invention has never flowed so fresh and spontaneous in other works by Brahms, and nowhere else has he colored his orchestration so beautifully."

The novelty for Providence was Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," that work in which the young Russian essayed to show that he could, if he would, become the Mozart de nos jours. When we saw that this work was on the programme we cudgelled our brains for a distant memory, and only when we found out that the first performance of it in this country was in December, 1918, by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in New York did we find what we wanted. Then we recalled that occasion when we heard the work directed by Modest Altschuler and as venturesome a band of musicians as ever faced the public. There are persons in New York nowadays who say to each other—"Do you remember the Russian Symphony"—and when they find that memory is shared, smile at each other like old friends. It was a small orchestra, comparatively speaking, financed by Altschuler himself. When the older organizations were still doubtful of the modernists, Altschuler used to step in and defy the angels. If, on rehearing a work his aggregation of musicians performed, it seems new, we cannot help it. We still take off our hats to that daring band which knew what was good and did its best to give it to us.

* * *

Koussevitzky's reading of this symphony was amazingly brilliant. We thought more of Haydn than of Mozart while it was being played, but then, perhaps, Prokofieff also did so notwithstanding his boast. We do not care a jot whether or not this is what Mozart would have done in our day, as Prokofieff said it was; we are well content that this is a composition which, though thin at times, is full of lovely phrasing and loses nothing for its occasional sly dig at those who worship the surface more than the substance of Mozart's music.

All the eerie beauty of the world of the half-gods, the twilight of the ages, was in the playing of the Debussy piece. Not an iota of its poetic beauty was lost and much beauty that had remained hitherto unrevealed to us was brought forth with a wistful and half-fantastic poignancy that made an irresistible appeal.

The charge has often been made against the Brahms symphony that its orchestration is "muddy and grey." How anyone could sustain it in the face of such an interpretation, full of tonal beauty and clarity, as Mr. Koussevitzky gives is beyond us to account for. Not during a single phrase did he waver last night, but climbed from the beginning to the end, up a magical stairway, carrying us with him, his slaves and his admirers.

Dr. Faunce made one of those very graceful speeches of his before the concert began; how well pleased he must have been to find his distinguished words so well justified!

—R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CHRONICLE
DEC 9 - 192

"Apollo Musagete" ("Apollo, Leader of the Muses"), Stravinsky's most recent composition, has been played in Boston and New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Sergei Koussevitzky conducting.

58

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

DEC [illegible]

MUSIC LEAGUE TO GIVE THREE CONCERTS HERE

Three concerts by world-renowned musicians will be given in this city during the spring of 1929, in Infrantry hall, the Music League of Providence announces. They are made possible by oversubscriptions to the fund to underwrite the Boston Symphony concert series which opens here at the E. F. Albee Theatre tomorrow evening.

The Music League had hoped to have the three concerts on Tuesday evenings, but this was found impossible, due to late bookings. It was not known that Infantry hall, which has been completly renovated, was available for the series. Announcements will be mailed to subscribers late next month. Public sale of tickets for the series will begin about Feb. 15. The charge made will cover only the expenses.

The Music League announces that Jascha Heifetz, the violinist, will appear here on March 11; the soprano, Dusolina Giannini, and the Russian pianist, Alexander Brailowsky, will share a concert evening on April 9; and on May 2 the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, with its baritone, Richard Bonelli, will appar here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Albee Theatre Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, in one of his most felicitous citations, presented Dr. Serge Koussevitzk to musical Providence as one of Brown University's most distinguished sons. And if ever a son met an opportunity fair and square, that son was Koussevitzky. And the ovation he received he well merited; for seldom does a conductor anywhere favor an audience with so perfect a reading of such dissimilar scores, as that of last night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Program

PART ONE

Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72.
Debussy—"Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune."
Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Prokofieff—"Classical," Symphony, Op. 25.
I. Allegro.
II. Larghetto.
III. Gavotte.
IV. Finale.

PART TWO

Brahms—Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro con troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

If Koussevitsky is not master of the orchestra, then the orchestra has no master. He treats it like a great ethereal instrument that thrills with eagerness to sing whatever song the human brain can devise. Alike conspicuous was his force, his delicacy, his uncanny sense of musical complexities, his skill in evoking the flashing riposte of voice against voice, and—greater than all—his felicity in synthetizing the multiplicity of tones into one perfect mood, whether it be that of the blaze of noontide, the glitter of starlight, or the soft ivory of the waning moon.

By good fortune most of the program was familiar to the audience. Not always does one have the opportunity that bids him sit and enjoy the music without thought of sequence or consequence, making no attempt nor feeling the necessity to project the hearing ahead of the sound wave in an endeavor to catch in imagination the sound that is to follow. But such an opportunity came last night; for Koussevitzky brought our three old friends, Beethoven, Brahms and Debussy, and included our young acquaintance, Prokofieff.

A Superlative "Leonore"

It is more than pleasant to hear the "Leonore" overture for the nth time and to know that the last performance was by far the best one has ever heard. It filled the mind with strange fancies, it made one wonder what there was in the name potent enough to enchant men as unlike as Beethoven and Poe, to force each to give it a setting of phantasy and romance.

The extreme delicacy of the beginning, the tender Basses such as Beethoven loved, the flutes that have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra famous, a sudden change of key in the very heart of a diminuendo that would be the despair of any other orchestra—these are some of the things that the listener might have noted; or he might have caught luminous chords that he had never noticed before, or shivered at the far-away trumpet blowing like the horns in elfland. And in the end he should have concluded that among all orchestras the Boston Symphony is the only Stradivari.

And then that poor Faun—how well the magic flute of Laurent told of his perplexities. Never until last night has a flute suggested stronger emotion than the strings; but somehow last night it beat them all in open competition. As Laurent played that little theme of one crying in the wilderness the other instruments tried to comfort and console him, until the 'cello mocked him, only to be shamed into silence by the oboe. But the poor distraught Faun seemed more befuddled than ever, until with his quaint psychology he fell asleep wondering, like other pholosophers, whether to live is to die, to breathe is to banquet, or to slumber, a sheepskin.

In Mozart's Manner

It is difficult to determine whether Prokofieff wrote as a rival of Mozart to show that he was equally competent to produce a work in classic form and phrase, or whether he made a delicate but pungent parody of Mozart's style, calling attention by a wink in the Gavotte to the fact that nowadays we do things otherwise and in a better manner.

His work is full of reminiscences of various sorts, humorous and otherwise. In the first movement there is a strong flavor of a Hayden rondo, while the second is redolent of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The playing of this movement was the very virtuosity of restraint, just as the last was that of velocity.

If the Symphony seemed a little muddy at the very outset, the flute and the 'cello soon clarified it, and the stream then flowed on with perhaps more force than one usually observes.

Koussevitzky roused Brahms from his too pensive mood, although he allowed him to play with his Lullaby theme and contemplate it with quiet satisfaction; and he also permitted him to sound several strange echoes of Schubert. But he made him speak out in his own person more definitely than we usually hear him speak.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

DEC 5 - 1928

KOUSSEVITSKY IS BACK AGAIN

Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in First of Four Concerts at the Albee

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, M. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, came to Providence at the Albee Theatre last night for the first of four concerts of the 48th season. As usual, every seat in the theatre was occupied and M. Koussevitsky and the ensemble were warmly greeted. Thoughtful and appreciative friends had sent M. Koussentsky large pieces of chrysanthemums which graced each side of the conductor's stand.

For the opening program presented M. Koussevitsky presented familiar numbers with one exception—that the classical symphony by his friend, M. Prokofieff, who, it will be remembered, was a soloist at a concert in Infantry Hall several years ago with the Boston Symphony, the first year, if we recall rightly, of M. Koussevitsky's directorship. The other numbers were the overture to Leonore by Beethoven; the Prelude to l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune (the afternoon of a Faun) by Debussy, and Brahms's Second Symphony in D-major.

The Leonora Overture never fails to charm and enthrall. One of the more popular of Beethoven's works, it is played and enjoyed in the German beer gardens as one of the latest of the American flash jazz numbers in a New York night club. One never tires of its beautiful melody. Constant playing can-

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 5 - 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Given Great Reception

Serge Koussevitzky Directs Program in Albee Theatre at Providence.

The first concert of the season and the 204th concert in Providence of the Boston Symphony orchestra given in the Albee Theatre last evening thrilled an audience that filled every seat in the house.

It was a remarkable reception to Serge Koussevitzky and the 108musician of this mammoth orchestra. Greeting the visitors, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce showered an abundance of praise upon them and elicited spontaneous applause. He congratulated Mr. Koussevitzky and asserted that Rhode Island was hungry for the symphony orchestra.

Music lovers found much in last evening's varied programme to appease their appetites. With commanding vigor Mr. Koussevitzky adroitly wafted his baton while standing on the platform which was banked with flowers—tokens of the high esteem and appreciation of Rhode Island followers.

Opens With Beethoven Overture.

The programme opened with Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," which won instant favor. "Leonore" begins with softened basses and reaches periods of furious outbursts from the entire orchestra which arouses a multitude of emotions. From the time of the twice-repeated trumpet call off stage until the end, the theme is as enchanting as it is pathetic. It was first played on March 29, 1806, as the overture for the opera "Fidelio, oder die eheliche Liebe."

It was in 1902 that the first performance of Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune (Eglogue de S. Mallarme) was given in this country. Under the splendidly skilled direction of Mr. Koussevitzky, this selection transported hearers into a world of phantasy. Impressions of the magical faun, melancholy and passionate, are ever present.

The "Classical Symphony" by Serge S. Prokofieff has the express purpose of showing the composer's idea of how Mozart would write music if he were living now. Prokofieff actually composed a stirring and extremely Russion symphony which at times reached the depth of power and melancholy that is touching.

Plays Brahms Symphony.

If Brahms symphonies are boring one could not judge by applause which was given his "Symphony No. 2 in D-Major" last evening. It was rendered with tenderness and brilliance. The scherzo was particularly bright and graceful and the thematic development very effective.

To name the selection which made the most profound impression and which most would be very difficult. Suffice to say that music lovers have already started to look forward to Jan. 15, when Mr. Koussevitzky and his gifted players return for their second concert.

not to wor was tion tho
T larn com pier sens writ the all prob Tayl

musicians had the laugh on all reformers. The language of music is unintelligble to them. If they knew what it meant, confided Mr. Taylor, the battalions of reform would swing into action. But they never will, and neither will a great many who enjoyed Debussy's silver lushness last night.

A program note quoting a commentary by Felix Borowski said of the Prokofieff Symphony: "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his score." That is a magnificent attempt to scale the walls of the musican heavens when it is recalled that of Mozart it was said he wrote music that he had remembered from divine voices. Whether or not M. Prokofieff succeeded we leave to more competent judges. The Brahms Symphony lost none of its loveliness from the treatment of the Boston Symphony.

Several were heard last night sighing for Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. It may be that M. Koussevitsky, who is just as engaging as ever, will satisfy us in this respect before the season is over. As for the orchestra, what can one say that it loses none of its skill with the passing years and that under the baton of M. Koussevitsky it is rapidly assuming a place at the very top of the best of the great ensembles of the world?

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

DEC 5

-:- MUSIC -:-

A BRILLIANT CONCERT

It is a perilous undertaking to try to find a single phrase which would express the outstanding characteristic of the brilliant concert with which Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra opened the season last night, yet the temptation is irresistible to describe it as a concert of subtle luminosity. Subtle and luminous it was from beginning to end, a series of interpretations that carried us into the very last refinements of intellectualized spirit and emotion.

No words could over praise such an evening. Words, indeed, are a poor way of trying to interpret musicianship that could only be interpreted by music itself. But at least words may be used to recognize the excellent taste with which the programme was built; here were a balance and harmony which would have delighted Plato himself.

* * *

Three of the four numbers on the programme were familiar to us, Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3, which age cannot wither nor custom stale; Debussy's prelude to "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune," in which the composer did with tones for Mallarme what Mallarme had not been able to do for himself with words, and Brahms's Second Symphony of which so great an authority as Felix Weingartner said; "The stream of invention has never flowed so fresh and spontaneous in other works by Brahms, and nowhere else has he colored his orchestration so beautifully."

The novelty for Providence was Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," that work in which the young Russian essayed to show that he could, if he would, become the Mozart de nos jours. When we saw that this work was on the programme we cudgelled our brains for a distant memory, and only when we found out that the first performance of it in this country was in December, 1918, by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in New York did we find what we wanted. Then we recalled that occasion when we heard the work directed by Modest Altschuler and as venturesome a band of musicians as ever faced the public. There are persons in New York nowadays who say to each other—"Do you remember the Russian Symphony"—and when they find that memory is shared, smile at each other like old friends. It was a small orchestra, comparatively speaking, financed by Altschuler himself. When the older organizations were still doubtful of the modernists, Altschuler used to step in and defy the angels. If, on rehearing a work his aggregation of musicians performed, it seems new, we cannot help it. We still take off our hats to that daring band which knew what was good and did its best to give it to us.

* * *

Koussevitzky's reading of this symphony was amazingly brilliant. We thought more of Haydn than of Mozart while it was being played, but then, perhaps, Prokofieff also did so notwithstanding his boast. We do not care a jot whether or not this is what Mozart would have done in our day, as Prokofieff said it was; we are well content that this is a composition which, though thin at times, is full of lovely phrasing and loses nothing for its occasional sly dig at those who worship the surface more than the substance of Mozart's music.

All the eerie beauty of the world of the half-gods, the twilight of the ages, was in the playing of the Debussy piece. Not an iota of its poetic beauty was lost and much beauty that had remained hitherto unrevealed to us was brought forth with a wistful and half-fantastic poignancy that made an irresistible appeal.

The charge has often been made against the Brahms symphony that its orchestration is "muddy and grey." How anyone could sustain it in the face of such an interpretation, full of tonal beauty and clarity, as Mr. Koussevitzky gives is beyond us to account for. Not during a single phrase did he waver last night, but climbed from the beginning to the end, up a magical stairway, carrying us with him, his slaves and his admirers.

Dr. Faunce made one of those very graceful speeches of his before the concert began; how well pleased he must have been to find his distinguished words so well justified!

—R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CHRONICLE

DEC 9 - 1928

"Apollo Musagete" ("Apollo, Leader of the Muses"), Stravinsky's most recent composition, has been played in Boston and New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Sergei Koussevitzky conducting.

58

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
DEC 3 - 192

MUSIC LEAGUE TO GIVE THREE CONCERTS HERE

Three concerts by world-renowned musicians will be given in this city during the spring of 1929, in Infrantry hall, the Music League of Providence announces. They are made possible by oversubscriptions to the fund to underwrite the Boston Symphony concert series which opens here at the E. F. Albee Theatre tomorrow evening.

The Music League had hoped to have the three concerts on Tuesday evenings, but this was found impossible, due to late bookings. It was not known that Infantry hall, which has been completly renovated, was available for the series. Announcements will be mailed to subscribers late next month. Public sale of tickets for the series will begin about Feb. 15. The charge made will cover only the expenses.

The Music League announces that Jascha Heifetz, the violinist, will appear here on March 11; the soprano, Dusolina Giannini, and the Russian pianist, Alexander Brailowsky, will share a concert evening on April 9; and on May 2 the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, with the baritone, Richard Bonelli, will appar here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
DEC 5

Boston Symphony

Last evening at the Albee Theatre Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, in one of his most felicitous citations, presented Dr. Serge Koussevitzk to musical Providence as one of Brown University's most distinguished sons. And if ever a son met an opportunity fair and square, that son was Koussevitzky. And the ovation he received he well merited; for seldom does a conductor anywhere favor an audience with so perfect a reading of such dissimilar scores, as that of last night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Program

PART ONE

Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72.
Debussy—"Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune."
Eclogue by S. Mallarme.
Prokofieff—"Classical," Symphony, Op. 25.
I. Allegro.
II. Larghetto.
III. Gavotte.
IV. Finale.

PART TWO

Brahms—Symphony No. 2 in D-major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro con troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

If Koussevitsky is not master of the orchestra, then the orchestra has no master. He treats it like a great ethereal instrument that thrills with eagerness to sing whatever song the human brain can devise. Alike conspicuous was his force, his delicacy, his uncanny sense of musical complexities, his skill in evoking the flashing riposte of voice against voice, and—greater than all—his felicity in synthetizing the multiplicity of tones into one perfect mood, whether it be that of the blaze of noontide, the glitter of starlight, or the soft ivory of the waning moon.

By good fortune most of the program was familiar to the audience. Not always does one have the opportunity that bids him sit and enjoy the music without thought of sequence or consequence, making no attempt nor feeling the necessity to project the hearing ahead of the sound wave in an endeavor to catch in imagination the sound that is to follow. But such an opportunity came last night; for Koussevitzky brought our three old friends, Beethoven, Brahms and Debussy, and included our young acquaintance, Prokofieff.

A Superlative "Leonore"

It is more than pleasant to hear the "Leonore" overture for the nth time and to know that the last performance was by far the best one has ever heard. It filled the mind with strange fancies, it made one wonder what there was in the name potent enough to enchant men as unlike as Beethoven and Poe, to force each to give it a setting of phantasy and romance.

The extreme delicacy of the beginning, the tender Basses such as Beethoven loved, the flutes that have made the Boston Symphony Orchestra famous, a sudden change of key in the very heart of a diminuendo that would be the despair of any other orchestra—these are some of the things that the listener might have noted; or he might have caught luminous chords that he had never noticed before; or shivered at the far-away trumpet blowing like the horns in elfland. And in the end he should have concluded that among all orchestras the Boston Symphony is the only Stradivari.

And then that poor Faun—how well the magic flute of Laurent told of his perplexities. Never until last night has a flute suggested stronger emotion than the strings; but somehow last night it beat them all in open competition. As Laurent played that little theme of one crying in the wilderness the other instruments tried to comfort and console him, until the 'cello mocked him, only to be shamed into silence by the oboe. But the poor distraught Faun seemed more befuddled than ever, until with his quaint psychology he fell asleep wondering, like other pholosophers, whether to live is to die, to breathe is to banquet, or to slumber, a sheepskin.

In Mozart's Manner

It is difficult to determine whether Prokofieff wrote as a rival of Mozart to show that he was equally competent to produce a work in classic form and phrase, or whether he made a delicate but pungent parody of Mozart's style, calling attention by a wink in the Gavotte to the fact that nowadays we do things otherwise and in a better manner.

His work is full of reminiscences of various sorts, humorous and otherwise. In the first movement there is a strong flavor of a Hayden rondo, while the second is redolent of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The playing of this movement was the very virtuosity of restraint, just as the last was that of velocity.

If the Symphony seemed a little muddy at the very outset, the flute and the 'cello soon clarified it, and the stream then flowed on with perhaps more force than one usually observes.

Koussevitzky roused Brahms from his too pensive mood, although he allowed him to play with his Lullaby theme and contemplate it with quiet satisfaction; and he also permitted him to sound several strange echoes of Schubert. But he made him speak out in his own person more definitely than we usually hear him speak.

M. C. W.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
DEC 5 - 192

KOUSSEVITSKY IS BACK AGAIN

Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra in First of Four Concerts at the Albee

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, M. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, came to Providence at the Albee Theatre last night for the first of four concerts of the 48th season. As usual, every seat in the theatre was occupied and M. Koussevitsky and the ensemble were warmly greeted. Thoughtful and appreciative friends had sent M. Koussentsky large pieces of chrysanthemums which graced each side of the conductor's stand.

For the opening program presented M. Koussevitsky presented familiar numbers with one exception—that the classical symphony by his friend, M. Prokofieff, who, it will be remembered, was a soloist at a concert in Infantry Hall several years ago with the Boston Symphony, the first year, if we recall rightly, of M. Koussevitsky's directorship. The other numbers were the overture to Leonore by Beethoven; the Prelude to l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune (the afternoon of a Faun) by Debussy, and Brahms's Second Symphony in D-major.

The Leonora Overture never fails to charm and enthrall. One of the more popular of Beethoven's works, it is played and enjoyed in the German beer gardens as one of the latest of the American flash jazz numbers in a New York night club. One never tires of its beautiful melody. Constant playing cannot cheapen it nor will it ever be dragged to a commonplace level. The great mind, working behind ears that could not hear, was incapable of any musical composition that did not carry his powerful thought and his inner beauty.

The Debussy Prelude, based upon Wallarme's poem that is as yet understood completly only by the few that have pierced its meaning of its words, is as sensuous as anything that has ever been written. It is the consummate appeal to the sensuous nature of man stripped of all safeguards and conventions. It is probably this Debussy piece that Deems Taylor had in mind when he wrote that musicians had the laugh on all reformers. The language of music is unintelligble to them. If they knew what it meant, confided Mr. Taylor, the battalions of reform would swing into action. But they never will, and neither will a great many who enjoyed Debussy's silver lushness last night.

A program note quoting a commentary by Felix Borowski said of the Prokofieff Symphony: "The composer's idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his score." That is a magnificent attempt to scale the walls of the musican heavens when it is recalled that of Mozart it was said he wrote music that he had remembered from divine voices. Whether or not M. Prokofieff succeeded we leave to more competent judges. The Brahms Symphony lost none of its loveliness from the treatment of the Boston Symphony.

Several were heard last night sighing for Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. It may be that M. Koussevitsky, who is just as engaging as ever, will satisfy us in this respect before the season is over. As for the orchestra, what can one say that it loses none of its skill with the passing years and that under the baton of M. Koussevitsky it is rapidly assuming a place at the very top of the best of the great ensembles of the world?

THIS CLIPPING FROM PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
DEC 5 - 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Given Great Reception

Serge Koussevitzky Directs Program in Albee Theatre at Providence.

The first concert of the season and the 204th concert in Providence of the Boston Symphony orchestra given in the Albee Theatre last evening thrilled an audience that filled every seat in the house.

It was a remarkable reception to Serge Koussevitzky and the 108musician of this mammoth orchestra. Greeting the visitors, Dr. W. H. P. Faunce showered an abundance of praise upon them and elicited spontaneous applause. He congratulated Mr. Koussevitzky and asserted that Rhode Island was hungry for the symphony orchestra.

Music lovers found much in last evening's varied programme to appease their appetites. With commanding vigor Mr. Koussevitzky adroitly wafted his baton while standing on the platform which was banked with flowers—tokens of the high esteem and appreciation of Rhode Island followers.

Opens With Beethoven Overture.

The programme opened with Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," which won instant favor. "Leonore" begins with softened basses and reaches periods of furious outbursts from the entire orchestra which arouses a multitude of emotions. From the time of the twice-repeated trumpet call off stage until the end, the theme is as enchanting as it is pathetic. It was first played on March 29, 1806, as the overture for the opera "Fidelio, oder die eheliche Liebe."

It was in 1902 that the first performance of Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune (Eglogue de S. Mallarme) was given in this country. Under the splendidly skilled [illegible] found a bag reported stolen from a elsbach of 128 Trenton street has

The police say that Regina Grammstreet yesterday.

Emile Gagnon of 41 Riley street, reported to the police that someone stole his $5 bicycle from Stearns Police Notes.

A 15-year-old boy was found wandering around the down-town at 4:15 o'clock this morning by Patrolman Bernard Hughes. His parents, residents of Johnston, called at the police headquarters for the youngster.

new many educators it has risen up for the initiation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
DEC 5 - 192

-:- MUSIC -:-

A BRILLIANT CONCERT

It is a perilous undertaking to try to find a single phrase which would express the outstanding characteristic of the brilliant concert with which Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony orchestra opened the season last night, yet the temptation is irresistible to describe it as a concert of subtle luminosity. Subtle and luminous it was from beginning to end, a series of interpretations that carried us into the very last refinements of intellectualized spirit and emotion.

No words could over praise such an evening. Words, indeed, are a poor way of trying to interpret musicianship that could only be interpreted by music itself. But at least words may be used to recognize the excellent taste with which the programme was built; here were a balance and harmony which would have delighted Plato himself.

* * *

Three of the four numbers on the programme were familiar to us, Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3, which age cannot wither nor custom stale; Debussy's prelude to "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune," in which the composer did with tones for Mallarme what Mallarme had not been able to do for himself with words, and Brahms's Second Symphony of which so great an authority as Felix Weingartner said; "The stream of invention has never flowed so fresh and spontaneous in other works by Brahms, and nowhere else has he colored his orchestration so beautifully."

The novelty for Providence was Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," that work in which the young Russian essayed to show that he could, if he would, become the Mozart de nos jours. When we saw that this work was on the programme we cudgelled our brains for a distant memory, and only when we found out that the first performance of it in this country was in December, 1918, by the Russian Symphony Orchestra in New York did we find what we wanted. Then we recalled that occasion when we heard the work directed by Modest Altschuler and as venturesome a band of musicians as ever faced the public. There are persons in New York nowadays who say to each other—"Do you remember the Russian Symphony"—and when they find that memory is shared, smile at each other like old friends. It was a small orchestra, comparatively speaking, financed by Altschuler himself. When the older organizations were still doubtful of the modernists, Altschuler used to step in and defy the angels. If, on rehearing a work his aggregation of musicians performed, it seems new, we cannot help it. We still take off our hats to that daring band which knew what was good and did its best to give it to us.

* * *

Koussevitzky's reading of this symphony was amazingly brilliant. We thought more of Haydn than of Mozart while it was being played, but then, perhaps, Prokofieff also did so notwithstanding his boast. We do not care a jot whether or not this is what Mozart would have done in our day, as Prokofieff said it was; we are well content that this is a composition which, though thin at times, is full of lovely phrasing and loses nothing for its occasional sly dig at those who worship the surface more than the substance of Mozart's music.

All the eerie beauty of the world of the half-gods, the twilight of the ages, was in the playing of the Debussy piece. Not an iota of its poetic beauty was lost and much beauty that had remained hitherto unrevealed to us was brought forth with a wistful and half-fantastic poignancy that made an irresistible appeal.

The charge has often been made against the Brahms symphony that its orchestration is "muddy and grey." How anyone could sustain it in the face of such an interpretation, full of tonal beauty and clarity, as Mr. Koussevitzky gives is beyond us to account for. Not during a single phrase did he waver last night, but climbed from the beginning to the end, up a magical stairway, carrying us with him, his slaves and his admirers.

Dr. Faunce made one of those very graceful speeches of his before the concert began; how well pleased he must have been to find his distinguished words so well justified!

—R. de A. J.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN FRANCISCO
CHRONICLE
DEC 9 - 192

"Apollo Musagete" ("Apollo, Leader of the Muses"), Stravinsky's most recent composition, has been played in Boston and New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Sergei Koussevitzky conducting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

DEC 9 - 1928

PRIZE SYMPHONY BY ERNEST BLOCH ASTOUNDS CRITICS

Brilliant "America" Composition Produced by Man 12 Years Ago an Alien

Rated by Judges Outstanding Among All Scores Submitted in Contest

LAWRENCE GILMAN, writing editorially in the New York Herald-Tribune upon Bloch as the composer of "America," says:

"Mr. Ernest Bloch should consider himself a fortunate man. In the prime of life (he is 48), he finds himself internationally famous, admired and warmly praised by those whose praise is best worth having, securely established as one of the foremost living composers and (one understands) materially well conditioned. As if this were not enough, Mr. Bloch, a Swiss born in Geneva, resident in the United States for only a dozen years and now a naturalized citizen, has won the prize of $3,000 offered by "Musical America" for the best American symphonic work submitted in its recently decided contest; and on the 20th and 21st of this month, the prize-winning score is to be performed simultaneously by six of our leading symphony orchestras: by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society in New York, under Mr. Damrosch; by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Gabrilowitsch; by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky; by the Chicago Orchestra under Mr. Stock; by the San Francisco Orchestra under Mr. Hertz; by the Cincinnati Orchestra under Mr. Reiner. Other orchestras will perform the work shortly after.

"Mr. Bloch, who 12 years ago was a visiting foreigner in the United States, and about as "American" in culture, tradition, and ideals as the king of Siam, has walked off, under the very noses of our native composers, with a prize symphony (bearing, ironically enough, the title "America") chosen from among 92 submitted scores by a jury consisting of Messrs. Leopold Stokowski, Frederick Stock, Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky and Alfred Hertz. The judges were enthusiastic. Mr. Stokowski proclaimed the work "a noble and masterly score," and congratulated "Musical America" upon "bringing to light a composition that is superbly conceived and developed." Mr. Stock said that he voted for "America" because it seemed to him "the outstandingly great work of the entire contest." Mr. Hertz praised it as "a masterpiece that may well become a classic of American symphonic literature." Mr. Damrosch has not been quoted, but is said to be equally enthusiastic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY
TRIBUNE

DEC 28

PROPS KNOCKED FROM MODERNISTIC MUSICAL CROWD

NEW YORK, Dec. 8 (Universal).—Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagette," done here recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra, knocked the props from under our local modernistic fraternity. It is a piece melodious, conventional in harmony, classical in spirit and contrapuntally imitative of Bach, Gluck and Handel.

The conservatives regard Stravinsky's feat as a brilliant step in advance; the radicals look upon it as a tragic bounce backward.

Stravinsky has an impish sense of humor and must be enjoying the confusion and consternation he has created in the camps of the modernistic cohorts, who so long have acknowledged him as their dauntless chief.

What are they to do now? Has Stravinsky deserted them for good? Are they to renounce him or to follow his, to them, precipitate and somewhat disgraceful retreat? And if the latter, where is their leader likely to leap next?"

Suppose they start furiously to writing fugues, minuets, sarabandes and rondos? Pan Stravinsky might then suddenly hop off in an entirely new direction, soar for hitherto unexpected heights and write a radio fantasy, a television oratorio, or an ether-wave symphony.

Meanwhile, pity the plight of the lesser modernistic crew, sitting with pen poised blinking and wondering, dazed and doleful, waiting like the betrayed Wotan, for fiery destruction or triumphant deliverance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

DEC 9 - 1928

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, decided to take a vacation in Maine. So he packed his bags, and—came to New York, and attended every rehearsal of Arturo Toscanini. Peeping Thomas says that he has watched Koussevitzky and observes him as an eternally curious student, watching those who are good, and those who are bad among the conductors.

Thomas remarks that a recent article in The Sunday Times has had a strange effect on the career of Koussevitzky. It was intended, undoubtedly, to help the Boston conductor, but it did just the very reverse. Mr. Downes rushed to the support of Mr. Koussevitzky in the article, acting as apologist, in an attempt to prove that the conductor knows his business, no matter what might be said against him. Well, as a matter of fact, the rank and file of the public never had thought that Mr. Koussevitzky didn't know how to conduct, or that he could not read a score. A few intimates had talked about the fact that he had the score played to him several times that he could thus hear it in his inner mind. But what of it?

Thomas says that the public is getting so it wants to know what clothing and bath-soap a conductor uses—his methods of preparing a score are his own. In the matter of the article, now people are beginning to question Koussevitzky's ability. . . . A noted pianist said that he understood that Leopold Stokowski, of Philadelphia, did not know when his men were playing out of tune, that he had no ear for pitch.

Such rumors are ridiculous. They are almost as foolish as those which circulated about the unfortunate Georges Zaslawsky, conductor of the late Beethoven Symphony Orchestra. People said he couldn't read music, that he would continue beating time after the finale had been reached, etc. Zaslawsky knows music, and he has a keen ear. Stokowski is one of the most sensitive musicians of our time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

DEC 12 1928

Albee theatre pulled out its regular show Tuesday night to make way for the Boston Symphony orchestra, 108 musicians. Serge Koussevitzky directed before a capacity house.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 13 1928

Boston Symphony

A fine suggestion for Christmas gifts is the mailing of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert to your musical friends. They will appreciate hearing the great orchestra, under Koussevitzski's direction, as one of their most prized remembrances.

The Boston Symphony is playing better this season than ever before and Sergei Koussevitzky, hailed as one of the world's finest interpretors of the old classic symphonies, has no peer in the rendering of the modern compositions and the new Russian music. The orchestra numbers 112 players this season, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert following a concert in New York City. Mr. Koussevitzky brought back from Europe this fall, several new artists, one being probably the most distinguished French horn player in Europe.

A tremendous ovation was accorded the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky on their first concert in New York, this season.

Richard Aldrich—the music critic of the New York Times, writes off the second concert on November 29.

"The performance of the symphony put all this orchestral skill and amazing virtuosity to their highest uses. It was a noble and beautiful performance, full of poetry and eloquence and overflowing with tonal beauty. Such a performance shows how far Brahm's orchestration is from the "muddiness" and "grayness" that were once attributed to it. Mr. Koussevitzky set forth its deep, glowing richness of orchestral color in a miraculous way; and he made this color a means to disclosing the true eloquence of the music. The performance was as splendid and sonorous in larger proportions as it was finished and ornate in detail; exquisitely adjusted in phrasing, free in its carefully considered nuances of tempo and dynamics—all achieved with a consummate art that concealed art and that made the whole seem a natural and an inevitable expression of Brahm's thought.

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, 89 Asylum Street. Tickets will be held until January 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

DEC 15 1928

Koussevitzky Desires Only the Good Music

WITH Messrs Bodanzky, Gabrilowitsch, Deems Taylor already reported on The Morning Telegraph's symposium, now we record the findings of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and himself the most lavish exponent of new music among all the conductors now in America.

Mr. Koussevitzky speaks practically in the same way as does Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Irrespective of time or nation, each wants good music.

May we ask Messrs Koussevitzky and Gabrilowitsch how anybody can say in advance that any composition is good? Wagner, whose music none today can question, was called bad by his contemporaries; so was the work of Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, and practically all of the standard makers of music. This is Mr. Koussevitzky's word:

"You ask me what will be my vote on the ...c? and ...e, if a ...r if it ...one es- ...music." ...wingly ...s vary, ...e still

THIS CLIPPING FROM PATERSON, N. J.
~~CALL~~ Post

DEC 21 1928

WHO'S WHO IN MUSIC

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Before Serge Koussevitsky began his career as conductor, he was famous as the foremost living master of that ponderous instrument of the orchestra, the double-bass. The recent double-bass recital in Symphony Hall—his second in America—bears testimony to his mastery of this instrument. Koussevitsky took up the bass as a boy of fourteen, when in the Moscow Conservatory he was required to master some instrument. The first ten years of his career he toured Europe, giving recitals and playing his own double-bass concerto with orchestras. His bass is a superb product of Gironimo Amati, the great Italian instrument maker of the 17th century.

The celebrated Russian conductor is famous as conductor as well as leader in his own orchestra in Moscow, which he conducted almost without interruption during the war.

Koussevitsky is called "icy" to an extraordinary degree. It is said that the more an artist is on fire, the cooler must be the head and hand that direct the fire. This is true of Koussevitsky. Nervousness is his servant; excitement is always under perfect control.

Koussevitsky is known for his presentation of unusual programs, as well as for his thoroughly original interpretation of the classics. He plays the works of the old masters, not fancifully, but as if they were written yesterday. He is continually searching, not merely for novelty, but for new explanations and new truths; this spirit together with his artistic interpretation has made Serge Koussevitsky the figure he is today in the musical world.

Born in Tver in 1874, the son of a member of a symphony orchestra, when only six, the boy was already studying music, and at nine took part in the orchestra of the Tver City Theatre. At twelve he conducted a provincial city orchestra, and began to compose. In 1890 he entered the Moscow Conservatory as a student of composition and orchestral conducting, and because he was qualifying for a scholarship, he began the study of the doube-bass. For several years after the termination of his studies, he played the double-bass at the Moscow Imperial Opera, but he never lost sight of his real aim.

Returning to Russia, he established his own symphony orchestra, began to give concerts, and to tour the Russian provinces, chartering one of the largest Volga steamers, and transporting his orchestra of 85 musicians and his full-size concert grand piano. He stopped at the principal cities on the banks of the river, and charged nominal fees for his concerts thus giving these teeming multitudes a glimpse of real music, as well as discovering and encouraging many persons of talent.

Koussevitsky came to Western Europe in 1920, and organized concerts in Paris, each year giving a spring and autumn series of four concerts. These have become a leading feature of musical life there, owing to the novelty of the program and the spirit which inspires them. He has made known to his audiences works of Russian composers unknown to Europe before, as well as unfamiliar classical and ancient works and those of the modern composers. During the same years he conducted concerts in London, Liverpool, Edinburgh, Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, Berlin, Warsaw and other cities.

In the autumn of 1924 Koussevitsky was nominated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to replace Pierre Monteux. His success was so great here that he was re-engaged for another five years long before his first contract expired.

His graying hair, his well-knit figure, his firm, decisive jaw, mark him, not as a radical, but as a conservative. He is both of these, and perhaps here lies the secret of his success. His is a dynamic personality which he reveals on the stand.

Koussevitsky was undoubtedly much influenced by Arthur Nikisch, whose favorite pupil he was. He resembles him a great deal in the manner of his conducting, being like him, both lyric and romantic. Critics have said: "It used to be said that Nikisch mesmerized his players. In Koussevitsky's case one might rather put that he electrifies them—and with them the audiences too!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

DEC 30 1928

An announcement for which have been waiting pertains to near-advent of some new recordings by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This great ... in its heyday under Karl Muck, recorded the final movement of the Tchaikovsky fourth symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature" and the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin." These are among our most valued treasures of old process recordings. Why such orchestras as the Minneapolis, the San Francisco, the Detroit, the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic, and the Cleveland, were recruited, and not the Boston, was a great mystery only now being dispelled.

59

LES F. FRENCH

...L
...ADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YE
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YE
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEA

THURSDAY

DEC 28 1928

CHICAGO.

...ED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST

...of Mahler's ...le'' in Boston

...zky Gives Admirable ...ng and Symphony

...his city prides itself on the Universe. Its pet "musical town." As a ...on Symphony Orchestra but the indifference of to some of the most ...can be understood only ...t. An artist may receive ...y rehearsal, but let him ...e empty chairs will far ...ed. Composers suffer in when a conductor pos- Koussevitzky does this ...mmunicate itself to an ...f-complacence that has Mahler's "Das Lied von ...c. 7, in the year of our ...mphony for contralto, ...d as Mahler's farewell ...t is tenderly beautiful of resignment and the of the "first families" ...eir wonted places, even ...ebrated composers have ...loubt with "you really ...l Symphonies are huge ...hler at the twilight of ...estral score to a con- of ostentation and use ...y economy, even when ...ricate.

...anslated and arranged by Hans Bethge), which Mahler chose for this work, are pervaded by a gentle nostalgia and held together by a certain continuity of thought. They contrast the inevitable bitterness of death with the eternity that the Greeks believed to be the life of the Olympians. Thus we find the contralto interpreting the songs replete with pathos and almost rebuking the tenor (the Epicurean). The former sings of Autumn Solitude, of Beauty, and the Meeting and Farewell to a Friend, the latter extols Youth, a Drinking Song to Earthly Woe and a Drunkard in Springtime.

"The Song of the Earth" is generally considered Mahler's noblest effort, free as it is from much of the hesitant ambiguity of his other works. Here, as in the other symphonies, there is constant use of folk material, of the woodwinds, and there are unexpected contracts in sonority. The lighter of the poems are set to humorsome, gay accompaniments, while those cast in a more serious mood are richly supported in a manner often Wagnerian. There are many passages of enduring beauty, notably in the concluding poem, of which Adolph Weissman once said, "To hear Mme. Cahier sing those final words, 'Ewig. Ewig,' is an unforgettable experience."

Through these Chinese poems, tinged as they are with Oriental irony, runs the message that Mahler wished to convey. Music of this type was bound to stir Mr. Koussevitzky. Time and again, in excess of zeal, he overweighted the highly sensitized interpretation of Mr. Meader and the restraint of Mme. Cahier, but his dominating vitality and insight places every Mahlerite in his lasting debt.

RICHARDSON BROWN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

DEC 9 -

PRIZE SYMPHONY BY ERNEST BLOCH ASTOUNDS CRITICS

Brilliant "America" Composition Produced by Man 12 Years Ago an Alien

Rated by Judges Outstanding Among All Scores Submitted in Contest

LAWRENCE GILMAN, writing editorially in the New York Herald-Tribune upon Bloch as the composer of "America," says:

"Mr. Ernest Bloch should consider himself a fortunate man. In the prime of life (he is 48), he finds himself internationally famous, admired and warmly praised by those whose praise is best worth having, securely established as one of the foremost living composers and (one understands) materially well conditioned. As if this were not enough, Mr. Bloch, a Swiss born in Geneva, resident in the United States for only a dozen years and now a naturalized citizen, has won the prize of $3,000 offered by "Musical America" for the best American symphonic work submitted in its recently decided contest; and on the 20th and 21st of this month, the prize-winning score is to be performed simultaneously by six of our leading symphony orchestras: by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society in New York, under Mr. Damrosch; by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Gabrilowitsch; by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky; by the Chicago Orchestra under Mr. Stock; by the San Francisco Orchestra under Mr. Hertz; by the Cincinnati Orchestra under Mr. Reiner. Other orchestras will perform the work shortly after.

"Mr. Bloch, who 12 years ago was a visiting foreigner in the United States, and about as "American" in culture, tradition, and ideals as the king of Siam, has walked off, under the very noses of our native composers, with a prize symphony (bearing, ironically enough, the title "America") chosen from among 92 submitted scores by a jury consisting of Messrs. Leopold Stokowski, Frederick Stock, Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky and Alfred Hertz. The judges were enthusiastic. Mr. Stokowski proclaimed the work "a noble and masterly score," and congratulated "Musical America" upon "bringing to light a composition that is superbly conceived and developed." Mr. Stock said that he voted for "America" because it seemed to him "the outstandingly great work of the entire contest." Mr. Hertz praised it as "a masterpiece that may well become a classic of American symphonic literature." Mr. Damrosch has not been quoted, but is said to be equally enthusiastic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY
TRIBUNE

PROPS KNOCKED FROM MODERNISTIC MUSICAL CROWD

NEW YORK, Dec. 8 (Universal).—Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagette," done here recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra, knocked the props from under our local modernistic fraternity. It is a piece melodious, conventional in harmony, classical in spirit and contrapuntally imitative of Bach, Gluck and Handel.

The conservatives regard Stravinsky's feat as a brilliant step in advance; the radicals look upon it as a tragic bounce backward.

Stravinsky has an impish sense of humor and must be enjoying the confusion and consternation he has created in the camps of the modernistic cohorts, who so long have acknowledged him as their dauntless chief.

What are they to do now? Has Stravinsky deserted them for good? Are they to renounce him or to follow his, to them, precipitate and somewhat disgraceful retreat? And if the latter, where is their leader likely to leap next?"

Suppose they start furiously to writing fugues, minuets, sarabandes and rondos? Pan Stravinsky might then suddenly hop off in an entirely new direction, soar for hitherto unexpected heights and write a radio fantasy, a television oratorio, or an ether-wave symphony.

Meanwhile, pity the plight of the lesser modernistic crew, sitting with pen poised blinking and wondering, dazed and doleful, waiting like the betrayed Wotan, for fiery destruction or triumphant deliverance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
DEC 9 - 1928

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, decided to take a vacation in Maine. So he packed his bags, and—came to New York, and attended every rehearsal of Arturo Toscanini. Peeping Thomas says that he has watched Koussevitzky and observes him as an eternally curious student, watching those who are good, and those who are bad among the conductors.

Thomas remarks that a recent article in The Sunday Times has had a strange effect on the career of Koussevitzky. It was intended, undoubtedly, to help the Boston conductor, but it did just the very reverse. Mr. Downes rushed to the support of Mr. Koussevitzky in the article, acting as apologist, in an attempt to prove that the conductor knows his business, no matter what might be said against him. Well, as a matter of fact, the rank and file of the public never had thought that Mr. Koussevitzky didn't know how to conduct, or that he could not read a score. A few intimates had talked about the fact that he had the score played to him several times that he could thus hear it in his inner mind. But what of it?

Thomas says that the public is getting so it wants to know what clothing and bath-soap a conductor uses—his methods of preparing a score are his own. In the matter of the article, now people are beginning to question Koussevitzky's ability. . . . A noted pianist said that he understood that Leopold Stokowski, of Philadelphia, did not know when his men were playing out of tune, that he had no ear for pitch.

Such rumors are ridiculous. They are almost as foolish as those which circulated about the unfortunate Georges Zaslawsky, conductor of the late Beethoven Symphony Orchestra. People said he couldn't read music, that he would continue beating time after the finale had been reached, etc. Zaslawsky knows music, and he has a keen ear. Stokowski is one of the most sensitive musicians of our time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

DEC 12 1928

Albee theatre pulled out its regular show Tuesday night to make way for the Boston Symphony orchestra, 108 musicians. Serge Koussevitzky directed before a capacity house.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 1[illegible]

Boston Symphony

A fine suggestion for Christmas gifts is the mailing of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert to your musical friends. They will appreciate hearing the great orchestra, under Koussevitzki's direction, as one of their most prized remembrances.

The Boston Symphony is playing better this season than ever before and Sergei Koussevitzky, hailed as one of the world's finest interpretors of the old classic symphonies, has no peer in the rendering of the modern compositions and the new Russian music. The orchestra numbers 112 players this season, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert following a concert in New York City. Mr. Koussevitzky brought back from Europe this fall, several new artists, one being probably the most distinguished French horn player in Europe.

A tremendous ovation was accorded the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky on their first concert in New York, this season.

Richard Aldrich—the music critic of the New York Times, writes off the second concert on November 29.

"The performance of the symphony put all this orchestral skill and amazing virtuosity to their highest uses. It was a noble and beautiful performance, full of poetry and eloquence and overflowing with tonal beauty. Such a performance shows how far Brahm's orchestration is from the "muddiness" and "grayness" that were once attributed to it. Mr. Koussevitzky set forth its deep, glowing richness of orchestral color in a miraculous way; and he made this color a means to disclosing the true eloquence of the music. The performance was as splendid and sonorous in larger proportions as it was finished and ornate in detail; exquisitely adjusted in phrasing, free in its carefully considered nuances of tempo and dynamics—all achieved with a consummate art that concealed art and that made the whole seem a natural and an inevitable expression of Brahm's thought.

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, 89 Asylum Street. Tickets will be held until January 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
DEC 15 1928

Koussevitzky Desires Only the Good Music

WITH Messrs Bodanzky, Gabrilowitsch, Deems Taylor already reported on The Morning Telegraph's symposium, now we record the findings of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and himself the most lavish exponent of new music among all the conductors now in America.

Mr. Koussevitzky speaks practically in the same way as does Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Irrespective of time or nation, each wants good music.

May we ask Messrs Koussevitzky and Gabrilowitsch how anybody can say in advance that any composition is good? Wagner, whose music none today can question, was called bad by his contemporaries; so was the work of Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, and practically all of the standard makers of music. This is Mr. Koussevitzky's word:

"You ask me what will be my vote on the [illegible]ic? and [illegible]e, if a [illegible]r if it [illegible]ne es- [illegible]music." [illegible]wingly [illegible]s vary, [illegible]e still

THIS CLIPPING FROM PATERSON, N. J.
CALL
Part 1
DEC 21 1928

WHO'S WHO IN MUSIC

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Before Serge Koussevitsky began his career as conductor, he was famous as the foremost living master of that ponderous instrument of the orchestra, the double-bass. The recent double-bass recital in Symphony Hall—his second in America—bears testimony to his mastery of this instrument. Koussevitsky took up the bass as a boy of fourteen, when in the Moscow Conservatory he was required to master some instrument. The first ten years of his career he toured Europe, giving recitals and playing his own double-bass concerto with orchestras. His bass is a superb product of Gironimo Amati, the great Italian instrument maker of the 17th century.

The celebrated Russian conductor is famous as conductor as well as leader in his own orchestra in Moscow, which he conducted almost without interruption during the war.

Koussevitsky is called "icy" to an extraordinary degree. It is said that the more an artist is on fire, the cooler must be the head and hand that direct the fire. This is true of Koussevitsky. Nervousness is his servant; excitement is always under perfect control.

Koussevitsky is known for his presentation of unusual programs, as well as for his thoroughly original interpretation of the classics. He plays the works of the old masters, not fancifully, but as if they were written yesterday. He is continually searching, not merely for novelty, but for new explanations and new truths; this spirit together with his artistic interpretation has made Serge Koussevitsky the figure he is today in the musical world.

Born in Tver in 1874, the son of a member of a symphony orchestra, when only six, the boy was already studying music, and at nine took part in the orchestra of the Tver City Theatre. At twelve he conducted a provincial city orchestra, and began to compose. In 1890 he entered the Moscow Conservatory as a student of composition and orchestral conducting, and because he was qualifying for a scholarship, he began the study of the doube-bass. For several years after the termination of his studies, he played the double-bass at the Moscow Imperial Opera, but he never lost sight of his real aim.

Returning to Russia, he established his own symphony orchestra, began to give concerts, and to tour the Russian provinces, chartering one of the largest Volga steamers, and transporting his orchestra of 85 musicians and his full-size concert grand piano. He stopped at the principal cities on the banks of the river, and charged nominal fees for his concerts thus giving these teeming multitudes a glimpse of real music, as well as discovering and encouraging many persons of talent.

Koussevitsky came to Western Europe in 1920, and organized concerts in Paris, each year giving a spring and autumn series of four concerts. These have become a leading feature of musical life there, owing to the novelty of the program and the spirit which inspires them. He has made known to his audiences works of Russian composers unknown to Europe before, as well as unfamiliar classical and ancient works and those of the modern composers. During the same years he conducted concerts in London, Liverpool, Edinburgh, Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, Berlin, Warsaw and other cities.

In the autumn of 1924 Koussevitsky was nominated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to replace Pierre Monteux. His success was so great here that he was re-engaged for another five years long before his first contract expired.

His graying hair, his well-knit figure, his firm, decisive jaw, mark him, not as a radical, but as a conservative. He is both of these, and perhaps here lies the secret of his success. His is a dynamic personality which he reveals on the stand.

Koussevitsky was undoubtedly much influenced by Arthur Nikisch, whose favorite pupil he was. He resembles him a great deal in the manner of his conducting, being like him, both lyric and romantic. Critics have said: "It used to be said that Nikisch mesmerized his players. In Koussevitsky's case one might rather put that he electrifies them—and with them the audiences too!"

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

DEC 30 1928

An announcement for which have been waiting pertains to near-advent of some new recordings by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This great [illegible], in its heyday under Karl Muck, recorded the final movement of the Tchaikovsky fourth symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature" and the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin." These are among our most valued treasures of old process recordings. Why such orchestras as the Minneapolis, the San Francisco, the Detroit, the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic, and the Cleveland, were recruited, and not the Boston, was a great mystery only now being dispelled.

LES F. FRENCH

[illegible]AL
[illegible]ADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YE
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YE
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEA

THURSDAY

DEC 28 1928

CHICAGO.

501 McCORMICK BUILDIN
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE

[illegible]ED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST

[illegible] of Mahler's [illegible]le'' in Boston

[illegible]zky Gives Admirable [illegible]ng and Symphony

[illegible]his city prides itself on the Universe. Its pet "musical town." As a [illegible]on Symphony Orchestra but the indifference of to some of the most [illegible]can be understood only [illegible]t. An artist may receive [illegible]y rehearsal, but let him [illegible]e empty chairs will far [illegible]ed. Composers suffer in when a conductor pos- Koussevitzky does this [illegible]mmunicate itself to an

[illegible]f-complacence that has Mahler's "Das Lied von [illegible]c. 7, in the year of our [illegible]mphony for contralto, [illegible]d as Mahler's farewell [illegible]t is tenderly beautiful of resignment and the of the "first families" [illegible]eir wonted places, even [illegible]ebrated composers have [illegible]loubt with "you really anslated and arranged by Hans Bethge), which Mahler chose for this work, are pervaded by a gentle nostalgia and held together by a certain continuity of thought. They contrast the inevitable bitterness of death with the eternity that the Greeks believed to be the life of the Olympians. Thus we find the contralto interpreting the songs replete with pathos and almost rebuking the tenor (the Epicurean). The former sings of Autumn Solitude, of Beauty, and the Meeting and Farewell to a Friend, the latter extols Youth, a Drinking Song to Earthly Woe and a Drunkard in Springtime.

[illegible] Symphonies are huge [illegible]hler at the twilight of [illegible]estral score to a con- of ostentation and use [illegible]y economy, even when [illegible]ricate.

"The Song of the Earth" is generally considered Mahler's noblest effort, free as it is from much of the hesitant ambiguity of his other works. Here, as in the other symphonies, there is constant use of folk material, of the woodwinds, and there are unexpected contracts in sonority. The lighter of the poems are set to humorsome, gay accompaniments, while those cast in a more serious mood are richly supported in a manner often Wagnerian. There are many passages of enduring beauty, notably in the concluding poem, of which Adolph Weissman once said, "To hear Mme. Cahier sing those final words, 'Ewig. Ewig,' is an unforgettable experience."

Through these Chinese poems, tinged as they are with Oriental irony, runs the message that Mahler wished to convey. Music of this type was bound to stir Mr. Koussevitzky. Time and again, in excess of zeal, he overweighted the highly sensitized interpretation of Mr. Meader and the restraint of Mme. Cahier, but his dominating vitality and insight places every Mahlerite in his lasting debt.

RICHARDSON BROWN.

59

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
DEC 9 - 1928

PRIZE SYMPHONY BY ERNEST BLOCH ASTOUNDS CRITICS

Brilliant "America" Composition Produced by Man 12 Years Ago an Alien

Rated by Judges Outstanding Among All Scores Submitted in Contest

LAWRENCE GILMAN, writing editorially in the New York Herald-Tribune upon Bloch as the composer of "America," says:

"Mr. Ernest Bloch should consider himself a fortunate man. In the prime of life (he is 48), he finds himself internationally famous, admired and warmly praised by those whose praise is best worth having, securely established as one of the foremost living composers and (one understands) materially well conditioned. As if this were not enough, Mr. Bloch, a Swiss born in Geneva, resident in the United States for only a dozen years and now a naturalized citizen, has won the prize of $3,000 offered by "Musical America" for the best American symphonic work submitted in its recently decided contest; and on the 20th and 21st of this month, the prize-winning score is to be performed simultaneously by six of our leading symphony orchestras: by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society in New York, under Mr. Damrosch; by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Gabrilowitsch; by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. [illegible]sky; by the Chicago Orchestra under Mr. Stock; by the San Francisco Orchestra under Mr. Hertz; by the Cincinnati Orchestra under Mr. Reiner. Other orchestras will perform the work shortly after.

"Mr. Bloch, who 12 years ago was a visiting foreigner in the United States, and about as "American" in culture, tradition, and ideals as the king of Siam, has walked off, under the very noses of our native composers, with a prize symphony (bearing, ironically enough, the title "America") chosen from among 92 submitted scores by a jury consisting of Messrs. Leopold Stokowski, Frederick Stock, Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky and Alfred [illegible] were enthusiastic. Mr. Stokowski proclaimed the work "a noble and masterly score," and congratulated "Musical America" upon "bringing to light a composition that is superbly conceived and developed." Mr. Stock said that he voted for "America" because it seemed to him "the outstandingly great work of the entire contest." Mr. Hertz praised it as "a masterpiece that may well become a classic of American symphonic literature." Mr. Damrosch has not been quoted, but is said to be equally enthusiastic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY
TRIBUNE
DEC 9 1928

PROPS KNOCKED FROM MODERNISTIC MUSICAL CROWD

NEW YORK, Dec. 8 (Universal).—Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagette," done here recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra, knocked the props from under our local modernistic fraternity. It is a piece melodious, conventional in harmony, classical in spirit and contrapuntally imitative of Bach, Gluck and Handel.

The conservatives regard Stravinsky's feat as a brilliant step in advance; the radicals look upon it as a tragic bounce backward.

Stravinsky has an impish sense of humor and must be enjoying the confusion and consternation he has created in the camps of the modernistic cohorts, who so long have acknowledged him as their dauntless chief.

What are they to do now? Has Stravinsky deserted them for good? Are they to renounce him or to follow his, to them, precipitate and somewhat disgraceful retreat? And if the latter, where is their leader likely to leap next?"

Suppose they start furiously to writing fugues, minuets, sarabandes and rondos? Pan Stravinsky might then suddenly hop off in an entirely new direction, soar for hitherto unexpected heights and write a radio fantasy, a television oratorio, or an ether-wave symphony.

Meanwhile, pity the plight of the lesser modernistic crew, sitting with pen poised blinking and wondering, dazed and doleful, waiting like the bewildered Wotan, for fiery destruction or triumphant deliverance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
DEC 9 - 1928

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, decided to [illegible] vacation in Maine. So he packed his bags, and—came to New York, and attended every rehearsal of Arturo Toscanini. Peeping Thomas says that he has watched Koussevitzky and observes him as an eternally curious student, watching those who are good, and those who are bad among the conductors.

Thomas remarks that a recent article in The Sunday Times has had a strange effect on the career of Koussevitzky. It was intended, undoubtedly, to help the Boston conductor, but it did just the very reverse. Mr. Downes rushed to the support of Mr. Koussevitzky in the article, acting as apologist, in an attempt to prove that the conductor knows his business, no matter what might be said against him. Well, as a matter of fact, the rank and file of the public never had thought that Mr. Koussevitzky didn't know how to conduct, or that he could not read a score. A few intimates had talked about the fact that he had the score played to him several times that he could thus hear it in his inner mind. But what of it?

Thomas says that the public is getting so it wants to know what clothing and bath-soap a conductor uses—his methods of preparing a score are his own. In the matter of the article, now people are beginning to question Koussevitzky's ability. . . . A noted pianist said that he understood that Leopold Stokowski, of Philadelphia, did not know when his men were playing out of tune, that he had no ear for pitch.

Such rumors are ridiculous. They are almost as foolish as those which circulated about the unfortunate Georges Zaslawsky, conductor of the late Beethoven Symphony Orchestra. People said he couldn't read music, that he would continue beating time after the finale had been reached, etc. Zaslawsky knows music, and he has a keen ear. Stokowski is one of the most sensitive musicians of our time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY
DEC 1 [illegible]1928

Albee theatre pulled out its regular show Tuesday night to make way for the Boston Symphony orchestra, 108 musicians. Serge Kou[illegible] directed before a capacity house.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 13 1928

Boston Symphony

A fine suggestion for Christmas gifts is the mailing of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert to your musical friends. They will appreciate hearing the great orchestra, under Koussevitzski's direction, as one of their most prized remembrances.

The Boston Symphony is playing better this season than ever before and Sergei Koussevitzky, hailed as one of the world's finest interpretors of the old classic symphonies, has no peer in the rendering of the modern compositions and the new Russian music. The orchestra numbers 112 players this season, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert following a concert in New York City. Mr. Koussevitzky brought back from Europe this fall, several new artists, one being probably the most distinguished French horn player in Europe.

A tremendous ovation was accorded the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky on their first concert in New York, this season.

Richard Aldrich—the music critic of the New York Times, writes off the second concert on November 29.

"The performance of the symphony put all this orchestral skill and amazing virtuosity to their highest uses. It was a noble and beautiful performance, full of poetry and eloquence and overflowing with tonal beauty. Such a performance shows how far Brahm's orchestration is from the "muddiness" and "grayness" that were once attributed to it. Mr. Koussevitzky set forth its deep, glowing richness of orchestral color in a miraculous way; and he made this color a means to disclosing the true eloquence of the music. The performance was as splendid and sonorous in larger proportions as it was finished and ornate in detail, exquisitely adjusted in phrasing, free in its carefully considered nuances of tempo and dynamics—all achieved with a consummate art that concealed art and that made the whole seem a natural and an inevitable expression of Brahm's thought.

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, 89 Asylum Street. Tickets will be held until January 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
DEC 15 1928

Koussevitzky Desires Only the Good Music

WITH Messrs Bodanzky, Gabrilowitsch, Deems Taylor already reported on The Morning Telegraph's symposium, now we record the findings of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and himself the most lavish exponent of new music among all the conductors now in America.

Mr. Koussevitzky speaks practically in the same way as does Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Irrespective of time or nation, each wants good music.

May we ask Messrs Koussevitzky and Gabrilowitsch how anybody can say in advance that any composition is good? Wagner, whose music none today can question, was called bad by his contemporaries; so was the work of Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, and practically all of the standard makers of music. This is Mr. Koussevitzky's word:

"You ask me what will be my vote on the question, Do you want to hear new music? and I wish to answer you that I do not care, if a work belongs to the standard repertory, or if it is an unhackneyed piece—there is only one essential question for me—that it be good music."

Naturally no conductor would knowingly schedule music that is bad, but if opinions vary, and they always will on new music, shall we still use it—and how shall we judge?

"Dee" Dresne

Lend A Hand

Gentle readers, can you sp[illegible] a moment or two perhaps, lend your poor harassed so[illegible] editor a sympathetic ear?

* * * *

Sh . . . I've a lurid confess[illegible] to make. I am about to de[illegible] you all. Yes, at last I have fo[illegible] sufficient courage to leave [illegible] dear old column (in trustwor[illegible] hands, of course) while I s[illegible] forth in quest of?

* * *

Well, a change of scene, a f[illegible] days of rest and quiet, resp[illegible] from worry and care—and—well you know what I mean.

* * *

But I can't call time out, p[illegible] the old Eversharp in some d[illegible] corner, grab nine or ten vali[illegible] and flee, without your assistan[illegible]

* * *

For here is the rub—in or[illegible] to fill the column and not r[illegible] the wrath of the dear ole boss must have your news at once, not sooner.

* * *

So—c'mon help erase the wr[illegible] kles from mine worried br[illegible] Keep my line busy beginning n[illegible] —for all work and no play c[illegible] make even Dee a dull girl.

MRS. B. SHAPIRO MAKE[illegible] "TAIGLACH" FOR SCOU[illegible]

Friends of Girl Scout Troop [illegible] will be pleased to know that substantial sum of money has be[illegible] collected at last week's Girl Sc[illegible] Bazaar through the sale of

Born in Tver in 1874, the son of a member of a symphony orchestra, when only six, the boy was already studying music, and at nine took part in the orchestra of the Tver City Theatre. At twelve he conducted a provincial city orchestra, and began to compose. In 1890 he entered the Moscow Conservatory as a student of composition and orchestral conducting, and because he was qualifying for a scholarship, he began the study of the doube-bass. For several years after the termination of his studies, he played the double-bass at the Moscow Imperial Opera, but he never lost sight of his real aim.

Returning to Russia, he established his own symphony orchestra, began to give concerts, and to tour the Russian provinces, chartering one of the largest Volga steamers, and transporting his orchestra of 85 musicians and his full-size concert grand piano. He stopped at the principal cities on the banks of the river, and charged nominal fees for his concerts

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN
DEC 30 1928

An announcement for which we have been waiting pertains to the near-advent of some new recordings by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This great [illegible] in its heyday under Karl Muck, recorded the final movement of the Tchaikovsky fourth symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature" and the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin." These are among our most valued treasures of old process recordings. Why such orchestras as the Minneapolis, the San Francisco, the Detroit, the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic, and the Cleveland, were recruited, and not the Boston, was a great mystery only now being dispelled.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YE
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YE
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEA

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

507 McCORMICK BUILDIN
332 SO MICHIGAN AVE

CHICAGO.

DEC 28 1928

TION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

First Performance of Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" in Boston

The Redoubtable Koussevitzky Gives Admirable Interpretation of the Song and Symphony Cycle

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 21.—This city prides itself on being the theoretical Hub of the Universe. Its pet pleasure is being known as a "musical town." As a matter of fact, it isn't! The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been fashionable for years, but the indifference of this same "fashionable" public to some of the most remarkable talents of the day can be understood only by someone who has witnessed it. An artist may receive all manner of acclaim at a Friday rehearsal, but let him (or her) appear in recital and the empty chairs will far outnumber those that are occupied. Composers suffer in much the same way, and only when a conductor possesses the eclecticism of Serge Koussevitzky does this feeling of indifference fail to communicate itself to an audience.

It is perhaps this supine self-complacence that has caused the first performance of Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" to be relegated to Dec. 7, in the year of our Lord, 1928. This work—a Symphony for contralto, tenor and orchestra—was intended as Mahler's farewell to his artistic life. As such, it is tenderly beautiful music, filled with the melancholy of resignment and the futility of life. Even so, many of the "first families" cast about for substitutes to fill their wonted places, even though minor works of more celebrated composers have been given the benefit of the doubt with "you really should hear it more than once."

Whereas the Fifth and Second Symphonies are huge machines, the simplicities of Mahler at the twilight of his career reduced the extra-orchestral score to a contralto and tenor voice. This lack of ostentation and use of polyphony presage present day economy, even when the orchestral texture itself is intricate.

The seven Chinese poems (translated and arranged by Hans Bethge), which Mahler chose for this work, are pervaded by a gentle nostalgia and held together by a certain continuity of thought. They contrast the inevitable bitterness of death with the eternity that the Greeks believed to be the life of the Olympians. Thus we find the contralto interpreting the songs replete with pathos and almost rebuking the tenor (the Epicurean). The former sings of Autumn Solitude, of Beauty, and the Meeting and Farewell to a Friend, the latter extols Youth, a Drinking Song to Earthly Woe and a Drunkard in Springtime.

"The Song of the Earth" is generally considered Mahler's noblest effort, free as it is from much of the hesitant ambiguity of his other works. Here, as in the other symphonies, there is constant use of folk material, of the woodwinds, and there are unexpected contracts in sonority. The lighter of the poems are set to humorsome, gay accompaniments, while those cast in a more serious mood are richly supported in a manner often Wagnerian. There are many passages of enduring beauty, notably in the concluding poem, of which Adolph Weissman once said, "To hear Mme. Cahier sing those final words, 'Ewig. Ewig,' is an unforgettable experience."

Through these Chinese poems, tinged as they are with Oriental irony, runs the message that Mahler wished to convey. Music of this type was bound to stir Mr. Koussevitzky. Time and again, in excess of zeal, he overweighted the highly sensitized interpretation of Mr. Meader and the restraint of Mme. Cahier, but his dominating vitality and insight places every Mahlerite in his lasting debt.

RICHARDSON BROWN.

59

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL

DEC 9 -

PRIZE SYMPHONY BY ERNEST BLOCH ASTOUNDS CRITICS

Brilliant "America" Composition Produced by Man 12 Years Ago an Alien

Rated by Judges Outstanding Among All Scores Submitted in Contest

LAWRENCE GILMAN, writing editorially in the New York Herald-Tribune upon Bloch as the composer of "America," says:

"Mr. Ernest Bloch should consider himself a fortunate man. In the prime of life (he is 48), he finds himself internationally famous, admired and warmly praised by those whose praise is best worth having, securely established as one of the foremost living composers and (one understands) materially well conditioned. As if this were not enough, Mr. Bloch, a Swiss born in Geneva, resident in the United States for only a dozen years and now a naturalized citizen, has won the prize of $3,000 offered by "Musical America" for the best American symphonic work submitted in its recently decided contest; and on the 20th and 21st of this month, the prize-winning score is to be performed simultaneously by six of our leading symphony orchestras: by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society in New York, under Mr. Damrosch; by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Gabrilowitsch; by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky; by the Chicago Orchestra under Mr. Stock; by the San Francisco Orchestra under Mr. Hertz; by the Cincinnati Orchestra under Mr. Reiner. Other orchestras will perform the work shortly after.

"Mr. Bloch, who 12 years ago was a visiting foreigner in the United States, and about as "American" in culture, tradition, and ideals as the king of Siam, has walked off, under the very noses of our native composers, with a prize symphony (bearing, ironically enough, the title "America") chosen from among 92 submitted scores by a jury consisting of Messrs. Leopold Stokowski, Frederick Stock, Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky and Alfred Hertz. The judges were enthusiastic. Mr. Stokowski proclaimed the work "a noble and masterly score," and congratulated "Musical America" upon "bringing to light a composition that is superbly conceived and developed." Mr. Stock said that he voted for "America" because it seemed to him "the outstandingly great work of the entire contest." Mr. Hertz praised it as "a masterpiece that may well become a classic of American symphonic literature." Mr. Damrosch has not been quoted, but is said to be equally enthusiastic.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SALT LAKE CITY
TRIBUNE

PROPS KNOCKED FROM MODERNISTIC MUSICAL CROWD

NEW YORK, Dec. 8 (Universal).—Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagette," done here recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra, knocked the props from under our local modernistic fraternity. It is a piece melodious, conventional in harmony, classical in spirit and contrapuntally imitative of Bach, Gluck and Handel.

The conservatives regard Stravinsky's feat as a brilliant step in advance; the radicals look upon it as a tragic bounce backward.

Stravinsky has an impish sense of humor and must be enjoying the confusion and consternation he has created in the camps of the modernistic cohorts, who so long have acknowledged him as their dauntless chief.

What are they to do now? Has Stravinsky deserted them for good? Are they to renounce him or to follow his, to them, precipitate and somewhat disgraceful retreat? And if the latter, where is their leader likely to leap next?"

Suppose they start furiously to writing fugues, minuets, sarabandes and rondos? Pan Stravinsky might then suddenly hop off in an entirely new direction, soar for hitherto unexpected heights and write a radio fantasy, a television oratorio, or an ether-wave symphony.

Meanwhile, pity the plight of the lesser modernistic crew, sitting with pen poised blinking and wondering, dazed and doleful, waiting like the betrayed Wotan, for fiery destruction or triumphant deliverance.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

DEC 9 - 1928

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, decided to take a vacation in Maine. So he packed his bags, and—came to New York, and attended every rehearsal of Arturo Toscanini. Peeping Thomas says that he has watched Koussevitzky and observes him as an eternally curious student, watching those who are good, and those who are bad among the conductors.

Thomas remarks that a recent article in The Sunday Times has had a strange effect on the career of Koussevitzky. It was intended, undoubtedly, to help the Boston conductor, but it did just the very reverse. Mr. Downes rushed to the support of Mr. Koussevitzky in the article, acting as apologist, in an attempt to prove that the conductor knows his business, no matter what might be said against him. Well, as a matter of fact, the rank and file of the public never had thought that Mr. Koussevitzky didn't know how to conduct, or that he could not read a score. A few intimates had talked about the fact that he had the score played to him several times that he could thus hear it in his inner mind. But what of it?

Thomas says that the public is getting so it wants to know what clothing and bath-soap a conductor uses—his methods of preparing a score are his own. In the matter of the article, now people are beginning to question Koussevitzky's ability. . . . A noted pianist said that he understood that Leopold Stokowski, of Philadelphia, did not know when his men were playing out of tune, that he had no ear for pitch.

Such rumors are ridiculous. They are almost as foolish as those which circulated about the unfortunate Georges Zaslawsky, conductor of the late Beethoven Symphony Orchestra. People said he couldn't read music, that he would continue beating time after the finale had been reached, etc. Zaslawsky knows music, and he has a keen ear. Stokowski is one of the most sensitive musicians of our time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM VARIETY

DEC 12 1928

Albee theatre pulled out its regular show Tuesday night to make way for the Boston Symphony orchestra, 108 musicians. Serge Koussevitzky directed before a capacity house.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 12 1928

Boston Symphony

A fine suggestion for Christmas gifts is the mailing of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert to your musical friends. They will appreciate hearing the great orchestra, under Koussevitzky's direction, as one of their most prized remembrances.

The Boston Symphony is playing better this season than ever before and Sergei Koussevitzky, hailed as one of the world's finest interpretors of the old classic symphonies, has no peer in the rendering of the modern compositions and the new Russian music. The orchestra numbers 112 players this season, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert following a concert in New York City. Mr. Koussevitzky brought back from Europe this fall, several new artists, one being probably the most distinguished French horn player in Europe.

A tremendous ovation was accorded the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky on their first concert in New York, this season.

Richard Aldrich—the music critic of the New York Times, writes off the second concert on November 29.

"The performance of the symphony put all this orchestral skill and amazing virtuosity to their highest uses. It was a noble and beautiful performance, full of poetry and eloquence and overflowing with tonal beauty. Such a performance shows how far Brahm's orchestration is from the "muddiness" and "grayness" that were once attributed to it. Mr. Koussevitzky set forth its deep, glowing richness of orchestral color in a miraculous way; and he made this color a means to disclosing the true eloquence of the music. The performance was as splendid and sonorous in larger proportions as it was finished and ornate in detail; exquisitely adjusted in phrasing, free in its carefully considered nuances of tempo and dynamics—all achieved with a consummate art that concealed art and that made the whole seem a natural and an inevitable expression of Brahm's thought.

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, 89 Asylum Street. Tickets will be held until January 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

DEC 15 1928

Koussevitzky Desires Only the Good Music

WITH Messrs Bodanzky, Gabrilowitsch, Deems Taylor already reported on The Morning Telegraph's symposium, now we record the findings of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and himself the most lavish exponent of new music among all the conductors now in America.

Mr. Koussevitzky speaks practically in the same way as does Mr. Gabrilowitsch. Irrespective of time or nation, each wants good music.

May we ask Messrs Koussevitzky and Gabrilowitsch how anybody can say in advance that any composition is good? Wagner, whose music none today can question, was called bad by his contemporaries; so was the work of Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, and practically all of the standard makers of music. This is Mr. Koussevitzky's word:

"You ask me what will be my vote on the question, Do you want to hear new music? and I wish to answer you that I do not care, if a work belongs to the standard repertory, or if it is an unhackneyed piece—there is only one essential question for me—that it be good music."

Naturally no conductor would knowingly schedule music that is bad, but if opinions vary, and they always will on new music, shall we still use it—and how shall we judge?

"Dee" Dresner

Lend A Hand

Gentle readers, can you sp a moment or two perhaps, lend your poor harassed so editor a sympathetic ear?

* * *

Sh . . . I've a lurid confess to make. I am about to de you all. Yes, at last I have fo sufficient courage to leave dear old column (in trustwor hands, of course) while I s forth in quest of?

* * *

Well, a change of scene, a days of rest and quiet, resp from worry and care—and—well you know what I mean.

* * *

But I can't call time out, p the old Eversharp in some d corner, grab nine or ten vali and flee, without your assistan

* * *

For here is the rub—in or to fill the column and not r the wrath of the dear ole boss must have your news at once, not sooner.

* * *

So—c'mon help erase the wr kles from mine worried br
Keep my line busy beginning n —for all work and no play c make even Dee a dull girl.

MRS. B. SHAPIRO MAKE "TAIGLACH" FOR SCOU

Friends of Girl Scout Troop will be pleased to know that substantial sum of money has be collected at last week's Girl Sc
Bazaar through the sale of

Born in Tver in 1874, the son of a member of a symphony orchestra, when only six, the boy was already studying music, and at nine took part in the orchestra of the Tver City Theatre. At twelve he conducted a provincial city orchestra, and began to compose. In 1890 he entered the Moscow Conservatory as a student of composition and orchestral conducting, and because he was qualifying for a scholarship, he began the study of the doube-bass. For several years after the termination of his studies, he played the double-bass at the Moscow Imperial Opera, but he never lost sight of his real aim.

Returning to Russia, he established his own symphony orchestra, began to give concerts, and to tour the Russian provinces, chartering one of the largest Volga steamers, and transporting his orchestra of 85 musicians and his full-size concert grand piano. He stopped at the principal cities on the banks of the river, and charged nominal fees for his concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

DEC 30 1928

An announcement for which we have been waiting pertains to the near-advent of some new recordings by the Boston Symphony orchestra. This great organization, in its heyday under Karl Muck, recorded the final movement of the Tchaikovsky fourth symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Marche Miniature" and the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin." These are among our most valued treasures of old process recordings. Why such orchestras as the Minneapolis, the San Francisco, the Detroit, the New York Symphony and the Philharmonic, and the Cleveland, were recruited, and not the Boston, was a great mystery only now being dispelled.

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

MUSICAL LEADER

E. F. SMITH
J. DEMERATH
F. M. WARD

SUBSCRIPTION: $3.00 FOR YE
CANADIAN $4.00 FOR YE
FOREIGN $4.50 FOR YEA

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

DEC 28 1928

507 McCORMICK BUILDIN
332 SO. MICHIGAN AVE

CHICAGO.

TION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH APPEARED IN LAST OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

First Performance of Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" in Boston

The Redoubtable Koussevitzky Gives Admirable Interpretation of the Song and Symphony Cycle

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 21.—This city prides itself on being the theoretical Hub of the Universe. Its pet pleasure is being known as a "musical town." As a matter of fact, it isn't! The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been fashionable for years, but the indifference of this same "fashionable" public to some of the most remarkable talents of the day can be understood only by someone who has witnessed it. An artist may receive all manner of acclaim at a Friday rehearsal, but let him (or her) appear in recital and the empty chairs will far outnumber those that are occupied. Composers suffer in much the same way, and only when a conductor possesses the eclecticism of Serge Koussevitzky does this feeling of indifference fail to communicate itself to an audience.

It is perhaps this supine self-complacence that has caused the first performance of Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" to be relegated to Dec. 7, in the year of our Lord, 1928. This work—a Symphony for contralto, tenor and orchestra—was intended as Mahler's farewell to his artistic life. As such, it is tenderly beautiful music, filled with the melancholy of resignment and the futility of life. Even so, many of the "first families" cast about for substitutes to fill their wonted places, even though minor works of more celebrated composers have been given the benefit of the doubt with "you really should hear it more than once."

Whereas the Fifth and Second Symphonies are huge machines, the simplicities of Mahler at the twilight of his career reduced the extra-orchestral score to a contralto and tenor voice. This lack of ostentation and use of polyphony presage present day economy, even when the orchestral texture itself is intricate.

The seven Chinese poems (translated and arranged by Hans Bethge), which Mahler chose for this work, are pervaded by a gentle nostalgia and held together by a certain continuity of thought. They contrast the inevitable bitterness of death with the eternity that the Greeks believed to be the life of the Olympians. Thus we find the contralto interpreting the songs replete with pathos and almost rebuking the tenor (the Epicurean). The former sings of Autumn Solitude, of Beauty, and the Meeting and Farewell to a Friend, the latter extols Youth, a Drinking Song to Earthly Woe and a Drunkard in Springtime.

"The Song of the Earth" is generally considered Mahler's noblest effort, free as it is from much of the hesitant ambiguity of his other works. Here, as in the other symphonies, there is constant use of folk material, of the woodwinds, and there are unexpected contracts in sonority. The lighter of the poems are set to humorsome, gay accompaniments, while those cast in a more serious mood are richly supported in a manner often Wagnerian. There are many passages of enduring beauty, notably in the concluding poem, of which Adolph Weissman once said, "To hear Mme. Cahier sing those final words, 'Ewig. Ewig,' is an unforgettable experience."

Through these Chinese poems, tinged as they are with Oriental irony, runs the message that Mahler wished to convey. Music of this type was bound to stir Mr. Koussevitzky. Time and again, in excess of zeal, he overweighted the highly sensitized interpretation of Mr. Meader and the restraint of Mme. Cahier, but his dominating vitality and insight places every Mahlerite in his lasting debt.

RICHARDSON BROWN.

Toch in New York

TRANS. JAN. 6 —

High-Water Mark

TOCH'S Concerto, Mr. Sanroma pianist, Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor, fared well in New York last week when the piece was heard at both the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. For the reviewers, after the first performance on Thursday evening, Mr. Henderson wrote in The Sun: "If you dislike modernist music per se, no matter whether it is well or badly made, shows mastership or clumsy incompetence, you will not like Toch's Concerto. But if you can discern ability in a piece of music the idiom of which is uncongenial to you, this one should please you. Toch has not created an immortal masterpiece as some of the propaganda writers have exclaimed, but one can perceive the cause of their ecstasies. Here is actually the first clearly shaped and comprehensively purposeful work that has lately been put forth by any modernist writer. It stands out like a sculpture among masses of mere clay.

"It has well defined themes, which are related to each other and impose a homogeneous character upon the work. The rhythms are invigorating and without the lamentable monotony which spoils so much modernist composition. The Concerto reveals a mastery of form which is rare among the unchained spirits of the time. It adheres in some measure to the principles of the classic sonata, but without enslaving the fancy of the musician. The composition as a whole develops logically and is free from the jumble of futile strivings and helpless wanderings which have so discouraged those trying honestly to discover some mastery of their materials among the acclaimed progressives. Toch is perhaps not a Stravinsky, but he seems to know where he is going.

"His harmonic style is distinctly atonal, and perhaps he has over-worked the chromatic scale and its chord-derivatives in his eagerness to avoid all approach to the ancient cadences, but with his chromatics he has achieved some uncommon beauty and at times a wistful song-speech which seems to be quite his own. His slow movement is of course his weakest. The modernists have not yet found their cantilena. The long melodic line of the classics, which they discarded, has not been replaced by them with anything possessing its suave and sustained enchantment.

"But the finale, which one of the enthusiasts has described as rhythmic violence, is nothing of the sort. It is rude in spots and it rejoices in some of those abrupt pauses and jarring resumptions which are items in the modernist stock in trade. But it has vitality. It is male music, and this is true of the whole work. The scoring is marvellously clever and the piano-part is constructed so that it is an integral portion of the score and not a thing aloof.

"And the whole composition sounds. It is not always sweet upon the ear; rather it is often pungent, but it intrigues at every moment. One listens to it with interest and recognizes the presence of a musician who knows what he is doing and how to do it. The Concerto was superbly performed. Without the most flawless instrumental balance the thing would be cacophanous without doubt. Played as it was last evening by the Boston men under the magic wand of Koussevitzky, it had opulence of texture and color. Mr. Sanromá treated the piano-part in a style which proclaimed him a virtuoso of the first rank in modernist music."

After the second performance, on Saturday afternoon, The Times added: "The Concerto fully justified the enthusiastic reception of thirty-six hours before, and new discoveries were made by certain observers, as, for instance, the beauty of the second theme of the first movement, and the importance of this beautiful idea in the elaborate and electrifying developments. Again the performance was a triumph for composer, conductor and soloist. If anything, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanromá outshone their previous achievements with the same score."

Doubts and Disdains

The only dissenter of moment was Mr. Thompson in The Evening Post, saying: "The Concerto is very much twentieth-century in its din, its brass, its impudence, its pile-driving vitality. It hits the listener between the eyes as perhaps no other work of its character has done. for those to whom it is that long-sought desideratum, an expression of the age, it may even be something of a knockout. For others who may be inclined to believe that to cultivate the hard-boiled and the mechanistic is to close the door at the start on any very promising musical inspiration, the question remains as to whether this is music at all.

"There are many stunning effects—stunning in the literal meaning of the word—in the more violent parts. Whether they will have any continuing musical value when they have ceased to be novel is not to be too confidently asserted on the basis of the excitement, on the one hand—or the aversion, on the other—they plainly created in performance. This reviewer was surfeited with a formulistic artificiality, a self-conscious strutting, an attitude of 'watch my smoke' in most of the first and last movements. The slow movement, if scarcely to be described as beautiful, had an utterance orderly and purposeful, with neat and often attractive turns of phrase.

"If the Stravinsky of today is right, this Concerto may be regarded as an abortive illustration of a skill worthy of a better fate; but if atonality, polytonality, mechanical din and rhythmic violence are, indeed, the signposts of the new day, then Toch has contributed a work that outclasses most of its com-

Back to Beethoven

On Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky began the concert with Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." About the performance The Times printed on Sunday the following note: "It befell that Mr. Koussevitzky captured the secret and mood of this music with the rarest felicity. He did not attempt to read a kind of emotion or color into the score that was not there. He chose his tempi with the greatest good fortune. The 'Brook' movement may completely miss its effect by being a fraction too fast or too slow. The opening movement can communicate and maintain the sensation of humming life and endless happy sing-song of nature if the interpreter is capable of such simplicity and of maintaining the unobstructed lyrical flow of Beethoven's music. Not many interpreters in this day and age can re-create such beauty and rhythm for the listener. It is also necessary to give this symphony the utmost clarity and beauty of sound. Such sound came yesterday from the instruments which gave the melodic phrases a swelling ardor and suavity of form that made the whole symphony lyrical and again bespoke the excellence of the orchestra."

ADVERTISER. BOSTON

Thursday, January 10, 1929

Honegger Will Lead Symphony

Arthur Honegger, composer of "Pacific 231," "King David" and "Judith," will be the guest conductor at the Symphony concerts this week.

Arthur Honegger.

Honegger took up the study of music when still a small boy. At the Paris Conservatory Widor, Codalge and d'Indy were his masters. In 1916, when Honegger was 24, he met a young pianist, Andree Vaurabourg, whom he married. He dedicated his "Concertino" to her. Honegger first became known in this country as a member of the radical group "des six."

Honegger's new work for orchestra, "Rugby," will be heard for the first time in America this week.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

GLOBE JAN 6

Honegger's Football Music

The noted modernist composer Arthur Honegger, whose tone poem about a locomotive engine, "Pacific 231," has attracted a great deal of attention, has now written another tone poem, about a football game. He will conduct the first performance of it in America at this week's Boston Symphony concerts. He is to make his American debut as guest conductor of these concerts in a program entirely devoted to his own compositions.

His wife will play the solo part in his piano concerto.

"Rugby," the football piece, was played last Fall in Paris. It was suggested, as the title shows, by English and not the American game. No doubt if M Honegger had only visited Boston a little earlier in the season he might have sought at the Harvard Stadium inspiration for a companion piece.

Honegger has more than once said that in "Pacific 231" he was not trying to make the orchestra sound like a locomotive, but to give an imaginative impression of a powerful engine in motion. There is no crude imitation of actual sounds, merely an attempt to convey a mood.

So in the new football piece to be heard this week one must not listen for the actual sounds made by players and crowd, but merely try to feel as though one were at the Harvard-Yale game. One wonders whether the Friday Sympthony audience, in which ladies with beautiful white hair are many and men of any age very few, is quite the ideal crowd for "Rugby."

Further Inspiration

Honegger might, by the way, find inspiration for yet another tone poem by visiting the Park-st Subway at about 5:15 p m, or by cultivating the muse in a downtown office building with a new one going up next door.

His music has not all of it been suggested by modern life. Of the pieces to be heard this week one is suggested by the episode in Roman history which schoolboys still learn from Macaulay's "Lays" of Horatius at the Bridge, and another is from an opera "Judith," on the story of Judith and Holofernes.

Mary Garden has taken the role of Judith here with the Chicago Civic Opera, and will repeat it Jan 29. Another of Honegger's apera's is based on the "Antigone" of Sophocles. He has written and oratorio on psalms of David, entitled "King David." This was sung here last season at the Boston Symphony's pension fund concert.

These and other works have already given Honegger a world-wide reputation and made it seem probable that his name will go down in musical history. He is now at work on an opera "Cyrano de Bergerac," after Rostand's play; a suite for two pianos; and a one-act piece rather surprisingly entitled "Aconcagua."

Arthur Honegger was born on March 10th, 1892, at Havre. His family was Swiss and Protestant, and came from Zurich.

When Honegger was only a child, his mother used to play Beethoven and Mozart to him, and he took up the study of music when still a small boy. At the Paris Conservatory, Widor, Gedalge and d'Indy were his masters.

In 1916, at the Conservatoire, Honegger first met a young pianist, Andree Vaurabourg, whom he later married. He dedicated his "Concertino" to her. Honegger first became known in this country as a member of the radical group des six, to whom he has never admitted alliance, nor indeed did these six ever avow a single purpose

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL today at 3:30—Reginald Werrenrath, baritone. "Alma;" recitative: "Tutto Elispe;" aria: "Aprite un po," Mozart; "Still," "Im Treibhaus," "Schmerz," "Traume," Wagner; "Credo" from "Otello," Verdi. Old time concert favorites: "The Sands o' Dee," "Gypsy John," Frederick Clay; "Punching," J. C. Molloy; "The Lost Chord," Arthur Sullivan; "Give a Man a Horse He Can Ride," Michael Head; "Charleigh Fair," J. C. Holliday; "Star-Eyes," Oley Speaks; "Fuzzy Wuzzy," Arthur Whiting.

Wednesday at 8:15 P M—Dorothy

Music Notes and Comment

Honegger's actual American debut will be made at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday night, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in the program to be played at the Boston concerts Friday and Saturday and commented upon elsewhere in this department today. Next week E. Fernandez Arbos, who was for a single season concert master of the Boston Symphony under Gericke a quarter-century ago, will appear as guest conductor. He has now a world-wide reputation as conductor and as specialist in Spanish music, to which the program will be devoted.

THE LIBRETTO

Official Publication of the Massachusetts Federation of Music Clubs

Volume IV JANUARY, 1929 Number 4

President's Message

A very Happy New Year to you! To each member, individually, do I wish this Happy New Year, and to our Massachusetts Federation as a body, because we hope that the coming year will be the happiest and most prosperous that our state has ever experienced musically.

We are looking forward to the inspiration and enthusiasm for new endeavor which we are certain to derive from the Biennial meetings to be held here in June, and that is one way of making our New Year a happy one. But, the very best way for us to be happy in our organization is to make someone else happy in their musical life. And so, we wish to call attention to the notice in another column of our Bureau of Club Talent, and once more to urge our clubs, in making up their programs for the coming year, to engage at least one of our young artists, and thus help to encourage these young aspirants for musical honors.

We sponsor no one who is not worthy of a hearing, and, if we do not help in engaging these young people, how can we expect others outside of our organization to do so? Will you not, if possible, give one engagement in the coming year, to one member of our Bureau, and will you not also try to talk to your friends in the Federation of Womens' Clubs, and urge them to send engagements our way? In this way, we may make our own year happy by feeling that we have smoothed some of the stones from the sometimes rough pathway to musical fame and achievement.

And so, once more, a very happy and prosperous New Year to you all!

Very cordially yours,

MARY G. REED.

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the most sought, as well as one of the greatest musical organizations in the world. Every series which Boston's Orchestra gives, whether the Friday afternoon, the Saturday evening, or the Monday evening series in Boston, the series in Cambridge, in Providence, and a double series in New York — all are subscribed to the last seat by the season, and there are waiting lists of prospective subscribers in each city. There remains, however, one series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts, recently instituted, for which still seats are to be had. These concerts will begin in Symphony Hall on February 5, and the others will take place on February 26, March 12, April 2, and April 23. These concerts begin at three o'clock, and are particularly patronized by out of town subscribers on account of the convenience of this hour for commutation.

The Tuesday afternoon series present the famous Boston Symphonv Orchestra of 110 musicians, under its great conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. They offer for many an advantage over the longer series in that the programmes will consist entirely of the orchestral masterpieces. The conductcor has labeled them five programmes of the "classics," intending the word in its broader sense to signify both the works which have held their place in the general estimation for a considerable time, and the newer works which today are accepted as models of their kind.

Accordingly, the series will comprise a splendid representation of typical masterpieces from each important era of music. They will be arranged in no particular division of time or school, but in the interest of balanced programmes.

Published monthly (except July and August). Entered as second class mail matter, April 13, 1927, in the postoffice at Boston, Mass., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Five cents a copy, 20 cents a year in advance; Canadian subscriptions 32 cents, foreign 44 cents.

Copyright, 1929, by General Magazines Corporation. All rights reserved.

GENERAL MAGAZINES CORPORATION, Publishers, 470 STUART STREET, BOSTON

John L. Wright, President; Joseph A. Di Pesa, Vice-President; Edmund R. Brown, Treasurer; Nelson L. Martin, Jr., Secretary; Helen Conefey, Assistant Secretary; Frederick D. Potter, Auditor.

REAL ESTATE NEWS GRANITE THE PYTHIAN NEWS THE CHILDREN'S HOUR
THE LIBRETTO THE PARENT-TEACHER THE MERRY-GO-ROUND

60

Toch in New York

TRANS. JAN. 6 –

High-Water Mark

TOCH'S Concerto, Mr. Sanromá pianist, Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor, fared well in New York last week when the piece was heard at both the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. For the reviewers, after the first performance on Thursday evening, Mr. Henderson wrote in The Sun: "If you dislike modernist music per se, no matter whether it is well or badly made, shows mastership or clumsy incompetence, you will not like Toch's Concerto. But if you can discern ability in a piece of music the idiom of which is uncongenial to you, this one should please you. Toch has not created an immortal masterpiece as some of the propaganda writers have exclaimed, but one can perceive the cause of their ecstasies. Here is actually the first clearly shaped and comprehensively purposeful work that has lately been put forth by any modernist writer. It stands out like a sculpture among masses of mere clay.

"It has well defined themes, which are related to each other and impose a homogeneous character upon the work. The rhythms are invigorating and without the lamentable monotony which spoils so much modernist composition. The Concerto reveals a mastery of form which is rare among the unchained spirits of the time. It adheres in some measure to the principles of the classic sonata, but without enslaving the fancy of the musician. The composition as a whole develops logically and is free from the jumble of futile strivings and helpless wanderings which have so discouraged those trying honestly to discover some mastery of their materials among the acclaimed progressives. Toch is perhaps not a Stravinsky, but he seems to know where he is going.

"His harmonic style is distinctly atonal, and perhaps he has over-worked the chromatic scale and its chord-derivatives in his eagerness to avoid all approach to the ancient cadences, but with his chromatics he has achieved some uncommon beauty and at times a wistful song-speech which seems to be quite his own. His slow movement is of course his weakest. The modernists have not yet found their cantilena. The long melodic line of the classics, which they discarded, has not been replaced by them with anything possessing its suave and sustained enchantment.

"But the finale, which one of the enthusiasts has described as rhythmic violence, is nothing of the sort. It is rude in spots and it rejoices in some of those abrupt pauses and jarring resumptions which are items in the modernist stock in trade. But it has vitality. It is male music, and this is true of the whole work. The scoring is marvellously clever and the piano-part is constructed so that it is an integral portion of the score and not a thing aloof.

"And the whole composition sounds. It is not always sweet upon the ear; rather it is often pungent, but it intrigues at every moment. One listens to it with interest and recognizes the presence of a musician who knows what he is doing and how to do it. The Concerto was superbly performed. Without the most flawless instrumental balance the thing would be cacophanous without doubt. Played as it was last evening by the Boston men under the magic wand of Koussevitzky, it had opulence of texture and color. Mr. Sanromá treated the piano-part in a style which proclaimed him a virtuoso of the first rank in modernist music."

After the second performance, on Saturday afternoon, The Times added: "The Concerto fully justified the enthusiastic reception of thirty-six hours before, and new discoveries were made by certain observers, as, for instance, the beauty of the second theme of the first movement, and the importance of this beautiful idea in the elaborate and electrifying developments. Again the performance was a triumph for composer, conductor and soloist. If anything, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Sanromá outshone their previous achievements with the same score."

Doubts and Disdains

The only dissenter of moment was Mr. Thompson in The Evening Post, saying: "The Concerto is very much twentieth-century in its din, its brass, its impudence, its pile-driving vitality. It hits the listener between the eyes as perhaps no other work of its character has done, for those to whom it is that long-sought desideratum, an expression of the age, it may even be something of a knockout. For others who may be inclined to believe that to cultivate the hard-boiled and the mechanistic is to close the door at the start on any very promising musical inspiration, the question remains as to whether this is music at all.

"There are many stunning effects—stunning in the literal meaning of the word—in the more violent parts. Whether they will have any continuing musical value when they have ceased to be novel is not to be too confidently asserted on the basis of the excitement, on the one hand—or the aversion, on the other—they plainly created in performance. This reviewer was surfeited with a formulistic artificiality, a self-conscious strutting, an attitude of 'watch my smoke' in most of the first and last movements. The slow movement, if scarcely to be described as beautiful, had an utterance orderly and purposeful, with neat and often attractive turns of phrase.

"If the Stravinsky of today is right, this Concerto may be regarded as an abortive illustration of a skill worthy of a better fate; but if atonality, polytonality, mechanical din and rhythmic violence are, indeed, the signposts of the new day, then Toch has contributed a work that outclasses most of its competitors."

Back to Beethoven

On Saturday Mr. Koussevitzky began the concert with Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." About the performance The Times printed on Sunday the following note: "It befell that Mr. Koussevitzky captured the secret and mood of this music with the rarest felicity. He did not attempt to read a kind of emotion or color into the score that was not there. He chose his tempi with the greatest good fortune. The 'Brook' movement may completely miss its effect by being a fraction too fast or too slow. The opening movement can communicate and maintain the sensation of humming life and endless happy sing-song of nature if the interpreter is capable of such simplicity and of maintaining the unobstructed lyrical flow of Beethoven's music. Not many interpreters in this day and age can re-create such beauty and rhythm for the listener. It is also necessary to give this symphony the utmost clarity and beauty of sound. Such sound came yesterday from the instruments which gave the melodic phrases a swelling ardor and suavity of form that made the whole symphony lyrical and again bespoke the excellence of the orchestra."

ADVERTISER.
BOSTON
Thursday, January 10, 1929

Honegger Will Lead Symphony

Arthur Honegger, composer of "Pacific 231," "King David" and "Judith," will be the guest conductor at the Symphony concerts this week.

Arthur Honegger.

Honegger took up the study of music when still a small boy. At the Paris Conservatory Widor, Codalge and d'Indy were his masters. In 1916, when Honegger was 24, he met a young pianist, Andree Vaurabourg, whom he married. He dedicated his "Concertino" to her. Honegger first became known in this country as a member of the radical group "des six."

Honegger's new work for orchestra, "Rugby," will be heard for the first time in America this week.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

GLOBE JAN 6

Honegger's Football Music

The noted modernist composer Arthur Honegger, whose tone poem about a locomotive engine, "Pacific 231," has attracted a great deal of attention, has now written another tone poem, about a football game. He will conduct the first performance of it in America at this week's Boston Symphony concerts. He is to make his American debut as guest conductor of these concerts in a program entirely devoted to his own compositions.

His wife will play the solo part in his piano concerto.

"Rugby," the football piece, was played last Fall in Paris. It was suggested, as the title shows, by English and not the American game. No doubt if M Honegger had only visited Boston a little earlier in the season he might have sought at the Harvard Stadium inspiration for a companion piece.

Honegger has more than once said that in "Pacific 231" he was not trying to make the orchestra sound like a locomotive, but to give an imaginative impression of a powerful engine in motion. There is no crude imitation of actual sounds, merely an attempt to convey a mood.

So in the new football piece to be heard this week one must not listen for the actual sounds made by players and crowd, but merely try to feel as though one were at the Harvard-Yale game. One wonders whether the Friday Sympthony audience, in which ladies with beautiful white hair are many and men of any age very few, is quite the ideal crowd for "Rugby."

Further Inspiration

Honegger might, by the way, find inspiration for yet another tone poem by visiting the Park-st Subway at about 5:15 p m, or by cultivating the muse in a downtown office building with a new one going up next door.

His music has not all of it been suggested by modern life. Of the pieces to be heard this week one is suggested by the episode in Roman history which schoolboys still learn from Macaulay's "Lays" of Horatius at the Bridge, and another is from an opera "Judith," on the story of Judith and Holofernes.

Mary Garden has taken the role of Judith here with the Chicago Civic Opera, and will repeat it Jan 29. Another of Honegger's apera's is based on the "Antigone" of Sophocles. He has written and oratorio on psalms of David, entitled "King David." This was sung here last season at the Boston Symphony's pension fund concert.

These and other works have already given Honegger a world-wide reputation and made it seem probable that his name will go down in musical history. He is now at work on an opera "Cyrano de Bergerac," after Rostand's play; a suite for two pianos; and a one-act piece rather surprisingly entitled "Aconcagua."

Arthur Honegger was born on March 10th, 1892, at Havre. His family was Swiss and Protestant, and came from Zurich.

When Honegger was only a child, his mother used to play Beethoven and Mozart to him, and he took up the study of music when still a small boy. At the Paris Conservatory, Widor, Gedalge and d'Indy were his masters.

In 1916, at the Conservatoire, Honegger first met a young pianist, Andree Vaurabourg, whom he later married. He dedicated his "Concertino" to her. Honegger first became known in this country as a member of the radical group des six, to whom he has never admited alliance, nor indeed did these six ever avow a single purpose.

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL today at 3:30—Reginald Werrenrath, baritone. "Alma;" recitative: "Tutto Eispos;" aria: "Aprite un po," Mozart; "S[h]e Still," "Im Treibhaus," "Schmerz," "Traume," Wagner; "Credo" [fr]om "Otello," Verdi. Old time concert favorites: "The Sands o' Dee," "Gipsy John," Frederick Clay; "Punchinello," J. C. Molloy; "The Lost Chord," Arthur Sullivan; "Give a Man a Horse He Can Ride," Michael Head; "Christmas leigh Fair," J. C. Holliday; "Star-Eyes," Oley Speaks; "Fuzzy Wuzzy," Arthur Whiting.

Wednesday at 8:15 P M—Dorothy

Music Notes and Comment

Honegger's actual American debut will be made at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday night, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in the program to be played at the Boston concerts Friday and Saturday and commented upon elsewhere in this department today. Next week E. Fernandez Arbos, who was for a single season concert master of the Boston Symphony under Gericke a quarter-century ago, will appear as guest conductor. He has now a world-wide reputation as conductor and as specialist in Spanish music, to which the program will be devoted.

THE LIBRETTO

Official Publication of the Massachusetts Federation of Music Clubs

Volume IV JANUARY, 1929 Number 4

President's Message

A very Happy New Year to you! To each member, individually, do I wish this Happy New Year, and to our Massachusetts Federation as a body, because we hope that the coming year will be the happiest and most prosperous that our state has ever experienced musically.

We are looking forward to the inspiration and enthusiasm for new endeavor which we are certain to derive from the Biennial meetings to be held here in June, and that is one way of making our New Year a happy one. But, the very best way for us to be happy in our organization is to make someone else happy in their musical life. And so, we wish to call attention to the notice in another column of our Bureau of Club Talent, and once more to urge our clubs, in making up their programs for the coming year, to engage at least one of our young artists, and thus help to encourage these young aspirants for musical honors.

We sponsor no one who is not worthy of a hearing, and, if we do not help in engaging these young people, how can we expect others outside of our organization to do so? Will you not, if possible, give one engagement in the coming year, to one member of our Bureau, and will you not also try to talk to your friends in the Federation of Womens' Clubs, and urge them to send engagements our way? In this way, we may make our own year happy by feeling that we have smoothed some of the stones from the sometimes rough pathway to musical fame and achievement.

And so, once more, a very happy and prosperous New Year to you all!

Very cordially yours,

MARY G. REED.

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the most sought, as well as one of the greatest musical organizations in the world. Every series which Boston's Orchestra gives, whether the Friday afternoon, the Saturday evening, or the Monday evening series in Boston, the series in Cambridge, in Providence, and a double series in New York — all are subscribed to the last seat by the season, and there are waiting lists of prospective subscribers in each city. There remains, however, one series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts, recently instituted, for which still seats are to be had. These concerts will begin in Symphony Hall on February 5, and the others will take place on February 26, March 12, April 2, and April 23. These concerts begin at three o'clock, and are particularly patronized by out of town subscribers on account of the convenience of this hour for commutation.

The Tuesday afternoon series present the famous Boston Symphonv Orchestra of 110 musicians, under its great conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. They offer for many an advantage over the longer series in that the programmes will consist entirely of the orchestral masterpieces. The condutcor has labeled them five programmes of the "classics," intending the word in its broader sense to signify both the works which have held their place in the general estimation for a considerable time, and the newer works which today are accepted as models of their kind.

Accordingly, the series will comprise a splendid representation of typical masterpieces from each important era of music. They will be arranged in no particular division of time or school, but in the interest of balanced programmes.

Published monthly (except July and August). Entered as second class mail matter, April 13, 1927, in the postoffice at Boston, Mass., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Five cents a copy, 20 cents a year in advance; Canadian subscriptions 32 cents, foreign 44 cents.

Copyright, 1929, by General Magazines Corporation. All rights reserved.

GENERAL MAGAZINES CORPORATION, Publishers, 470 STUART STREET, BOSTON

John L. Wright, President; Joseph A. Di Pesa, Vice-President; Edmund R. Brown, Treasurer; Nelson L. Martin, Jr., Secretary; Helen Conefey, Assistant Secretary; Frederick D. Potter, Auditor.

REAL ESTATE NEWS GRANITE THE PYTHIAN NEWS THE CHILDREN'S HOUR
THE LIBRETTO THE PARENT-TEACHER THE MERRY-GO-ROUND

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

In Arthur Honegger the Symphony Concerts Receive a Notable Guest

For His Bostonian Audiences a Program That Is a Musical Autobiography from "Nigamon" of 1917 to "Rugby" of 1928

IT HAS come to be the custom that during the twelfth and thirteenth week of the symphonic year—exactly at mid-season—Mr. Koussevitzky tired from much rehearsing and much concert giving, receives a fortnight's holiday. In his absence notable composers and conductors come as guests. For the concerts of this week, the distinguished Parisian, Monsieur Arthur Honegger takes such place. Biographical and appreciative notes appear in the various columns of this page. But Honegger is writing his musical biography for us in the program which he has arranged: "Chant de Nigamon," of 1917, is one of his first orchestral works. "Pastorale d'Eté" and "Horace Victorieux" were first heard in 1921. "Pacific 2-3-1"—the locomotive-piece so-called—was written in 1928. The Concertino for Piano and Orchestra (pianist, Madame Honegger); the opera, "Judith" from which Madame Cobina Wright will sing The Prayer near the beginning of Act One; the three songs from "La Petite Sirène," all date from 1924 and 1925; while "Rugby" was written last summer and last autumn. Opera and oratorio aside, this program spans the full course of Honegger's creative years.

On a fly-leaf at the beginning of the score of "The Song of Nigamon" stands this legend: ". . . Tareah, the Huron, had reserved Nigamon and the other Iroquois chiefs, to burn them alive. Fire was placed at the bottom of the pyres. When the flames began to rise, Tareah leaped across them and scalped Nigamon and his companions and boxed their ears with the hair of their own heads. During all this the Iroquois sang their song of death, but when that of Nigamon began, the others remained silent—to listen." For Americans an American subject, Honegger must have reasoned when he shaped the program. And he uses at least two actual Indian themes, taken from Julien Tiersot's "Notes d'Ethnographie Musicale." The piece begins with figures rhythmic and realistic, with much percussion. Solo-voices in the strings sing a theme. There is development and more actively rhythmed measures. Then we hear a War Song of the Hurons, played in full seventh chords, in full lower strings. Later, horns bring in a Song of Iroquois Warriors. This early work, though not so complex as its successors, shows daring harmonic procedures and a fine sense of orchestral values.

The Prayer of Judith occurs near the beginning of the opera. In it Judith prays for the deliverance of her people and for success in her own attempt to assist in that deliverance. It is a music of gentle melodies in the woodwinds, of brass in plangent but quiet chords, of a vocal line gentle, reverent, pleading, with at times a suggestion of anguish.

Both the "Summer Pastoral" and the Concertino received first performances here in Boston from Mr. Arthur Fiedler's "Sinfonietta," the Pastoral two years ago, the Concertino last February. The "Summer Pastoral" is simple both in construction and orchestration. In the first and last sections, "Calme," gentle melodies are heard in the winds to the accompaniment of simple pastoral figures. The mood is drowsy. In the middle, or contrasting, section, "Vif et Gai," both winds and strings toy around bright tunes; while the whole stirs to a sprightly agitation, as the climax of the piece before the resumption of the quieter measures.

"Horace Victorieux" was composed at Paris in the winter of 1920-21. It is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky. After two performances in Switzerland under the excellent Mr. Ansermet, Mr. Koussevitzky gave the piece a first Parisian hearing on Nov. 11, 1921. Mr. Monteux played it in Symphony Hall a year later when it proved a hard nut for Bostonians to crack. Not few, as they now hear it, seven years later, may smile at the difficulties and resentments that then beset them. The story of this "Mimed Symphony" is that of the three Horatii who were to do battle for the Romans against the three Curiatii defending the Albans, to decide a quarrel between the two peoples. (How much more convenient than to impose a world-war for such a purpose. One to a side would have been still better.) After furious fighting all three Curiatii are wounded and two Horatii have been killed. Horatius, the survivor, quick-witted, outthinks his three adversaries. He resorts to the trick of flight, with the Curiatii in hot pursuit. When the fleetest of the three is sufficiently separated from the other two, Horatius turns and dispatches him. The second he lures to a similar fate, after which the third is an easy victim.

But when Horatius returns to Rome he finds his sister Camilla, in love with Curiatius, moaning for her dead lover instead of rejoicing with her conquering brother. Enraged, and with a curse, he runs her through. For this murder he is condemned to death, but his father defends him, saying that he did right, that Camilla had deserved her fate. The sentence is remitted and Horatius is merely compelled to pass under yoke after the manner of such soldiers as are to be sold into slavery. Honegger, however, ends with the death of Camilla. And the murder is not so long drawn out as many anoother that has been set to music. A mere thirteen measures suffice for it. For which, blessed be modernism!

After a grumbling and gnashing introduction of no more than five measures, "Horatius Triumphant" falls into eight divisions:

I. Camilla and Curiatius. "Très lent." Delicate string sonorities furnish background for a flute-solo. Later it is joined by other solo instruments. This division is largely lyric as becomes the intimate subject in hand, though its climax is ardent. It yields a "curiatius theme" which is used later.

II. Entrance of The Horatii. "Rhythmique." To an angular rhythm begun in basses and tuba the Horatii enter in fugal fashion. Honegger's habit of writing frequent fugues is cause for comment by more than one writer.) A melodic contrast soon follows and the two intermingle in all manner of harmonies, tonalities and sonorities.

III. Entrance of The Crowd preceding The Heralds. "Assez animé." We now learn that the grumbling first measures of the introduction really represent this crowd, which is of course the background for much of the piece. There are suggestions of the Horatii theme. Martial music evidently signifies the heralds. It dominates the "crowd" music.

IV. Announcement and Preperations for The Combat. "Un peu plus lent." A highly martial music in the trombones (the heralds) introduces this section. Through an "allargando" the music leads to "Lourd." Evidently the Horatii make preparation first, for this is their music, deep among heavy bass instruments. Once more we hear the "crowd" figure, once more the martial music of the heralds' proclamation. Then the Curiatii make ready in expressive solos in contrabass, bassoon, viola. It is already obvious that the Horatii will be the victors; for the lyricism of the Curiatii could not possibly prevail against their hard grimness.

V. The Combat. "Très animé." The Curiatii give good account of themselves, for they not only get in the first blows, but their lyric theme becomes almost as fierce and forbidding as that of the Horatii. The battle continues in deadly earnest with a fugue as hard as cut steel nails.

VI. Triumph of Horatius. "Un peu plus large." A very broad music, treated with exultant sonorities. A long sustained climax.

VII. Lamentations and Imprecations of Camilla. "Très lent, expressif et douloureux." Fragments of the theme of Curiatius make pitiable entrances in the strings. The brass (Horatius) angrily interferes. Woodwinds sing their own weeping tune. But the rage of the brass increases, sweeps all before it, and we are at VIII. Murder of Camilla. "Plus vif, en pressant beaucoup." It was written above that the murder occupied thirteen measures. Five would probably be more truthful. For the last eight measures, "Très large," are more peroration than murder. In them Honegger brings his "symphony" to close.

For "Pacific 2-3-1," established these five years as repertory piece at Symphony Hall, it is only necessary to recall Honegger's own program-note:

> I have always had a passionate love for locomotives. To me they—and I love them passionately as others are pasionate in their love for horses or women—are like living creatures.
>
> What I wanted to express in "Pacific" is not the noise of an engine, but the visual impression and the physical sensation of it. These I strove to express by means of a musical composition. Its point of departure is an objective contemplation: quiet respiration of an engine in a state of immobility; effort for moving; progressive increase of speed, in order to pass from the "lyric" to the "pathetic" state of an engine of three hundred tons driven in the night at a speed of one hundred and twenty per hour. As a subject I have taken an engine of the "Pacific" type, known as 2-3-1, an engine for heavy trains of high speed.

On a sort of rhythmic pedal, sustained by the violins, is built the impressive image of an intelligent monster, a joyous giant.

The Concertino (written at Paris, September to November, 1924) is dedicated to the composer's wife, when she was still Andrée Vaurabourg. As one would expect from a Concertino, the music is not weighty. Though the whole is compressed into a single movement, it is really a fusion of three movements. There is continuous and lively dialogue between piano and orchestra. The piano has a gratefully "pianistic" part. After a single syncopated measure from the orchestra, the piano, also in a single measure announces the motif which dominates the first division. The second section, "Larghetto," is ushered in by a cantabile melody in the piano. This in turn gives way by a very active "Allegro," in which the bass maintains a persistent march rhythm.

The songs from "La Petite Sirène are settings of words by Renè Morax, derived originally from Andersen's fairy tale, "The Mermaid." They are three in number, "Song of the Sirens," "Lullaby," "Song of the Pear." The accompaniment was originally for string quartet and flute; to be played at the concerts of this week by flute together with a contingent from the string choir, without double basses. These songs are well placed on this program immediately preceding "Rugby," for like "Rugby," they are less complex than much of Honegger's earlier work. Revery is th out.

"Rugby," Honegger's was written for the firs new Orchestre Sympho that capital's endowed or men. It was written e occasion. Probably mar noisy music, but "Rugl percussion instruments. that gives the impres youthful, vigor. It is "Pacific 2-3-1" but aims Reviewers stress its ess Henri Prunières goes s "'Rugby' opens a new many abortive experime definitely entered the (Has Monsieur Prunière egger's own "Skating Or was that one of the ments"? Or is skating wonders.) The "Menes quoted in this country turn to sobriety, to cla tonal unity. This piece, ditional sonata-form, ma any picturesque element by any percussion. It poem reduced to the e music. Anti-romanticism order of the day." And tells of a "Schumanes ism," seemingly the seq sonata form.

Let no one expect, h a second theme. For closely its mood to t motiv. Though this a alyzed as sonata-form, will hear it as an expr than a single mood. a by an energetic, seethi ing, swirling mass—of case, for the subject s vigorous play. But it anything else, as long were in active and motion. It is less dis ace," indeed; but in it no means returned to ties. Being of this age tion. Being of Honeg motion humanized.

Honegger's Creed

Communicated in 1920 to Paul Landormy

I ATTACH great importance to musical architecture. I would never see it sacrificed to literary or pictorial considerations. . . . My model, above the rest, is Bach Unlike sundry "anti-impressionists," I seek no return to harmonic symplicity. I hold that we are bound to utilize the harmonic material of the school that preceded us, but to different purpose—as basis for lines and rhythms . . . I do not share the [current] inclination for music of the side-show or the vaudeville theater. On the contrary, I prefer chamber music, and symphonic music, when they are gravest and most austere.

(From the Portrait by Fernan Ochsé)

"Between Two Races, French and German, Honegger Chose to be Honegger" Andre Coeuroy

e mood through-foot-ball piece, t concert of the nique de Paris, chestra of young xpressly for the y will expect a by" contains no It is a piece sion of sturdy, a companion to less at realism. ential simplicity. far as to say, period. After nts, sport has realm of music. s forgotten Hon- Rink" of 1922? abortive experi- ot a sport? One trel" so far not finds it a "re- ssical form, to conceived in tra- kes no appeal by and particularly is a symphonic ements of pure is decidedly the her commentator ue bit of lyric- nd theme of this owever, too lyric this theme joins at of the main usic can be an- many a listener ssion of no more that suggested , running, leap- humanity, in this ggests a team at might have been as this anything ariously directed onant than "Hor- Honegger has by classical simplici- it is music of mo- er, it is music of

A. H. M.

The Composer and The Man in Brief Survey, with "Pacific" for His Image—The World Into Which He Entered and Prevailed

De la musique avant toute chose.

STIRRED by a gust of wind, an Æolian harp sounds a tone—a syllable of musical language. The air is full of music; and now and then happily winged Ariels unchain it for us on their magic trumpets. Then the tempest roars in chromatics; then earth and fire, water and air, shape themselves into four-part harmony. Music and nature run in parallels, never to cross, ever to counterpart. Respighi's caged nightingale is less winged than Beethoven's pastoral birds; Strauss's alpine wind-machine less ohilling than Rossini's breezy scales. Portraiture in music defeats its purpose by exposing the inaptitude of an art to measure up to life, greater as the former may be than the latter, if kept within its own uncurved course.

Few musicians are as true to these chaste ideals as Arthur Honneger, not long ago a formidable modernist, now an unopposed messenger of the new musical truth which is as inevitable to come upon us as the year 1930. At the Dantesque age, on the summit of his powers, he already gathers the rewards of his mettle. Last year Russia greeted him, and he found orchestras there that had his music well in their routine. Now America welcomes him with an uncompromising salute. Soyez le bienvenu! Curiosity whips the sentiment, and the figure of the French-Swiss composer wearing a healthy smile under a basque cap becomes the picture of the hour. He is as much excited over things American, as the curious are excited over him, and, true to his first infatuation, he never fails to inspect the locomotives that drive him hither and thither. His type is Pacific 2-3-1, according to the number of the wheels, in front, on the side, and behind. Indiscriminate newspapermen, using indiscriminate cuts to illustrate his most famous musical score, err frequently and annoyingly in these details.

Arthur Honegger took the Pacific for his inspiration as Schubert had taken the postillion. Nor is he the first to marvel in tones at the puffing monster. In his modest way, Glinka wrote a song of the railroad train; and Berlioz was tempted by the early engine. In Honegger's Symphonic Movement there are actual musical sounds in the rails vibrating under the speeding wheels, there is an obvious acceleration of beats and puffs. There is even the familiar effect of the Doppler principle—the change of pitch of the whistle of a locomotive travelling at a high rate of speed. But Honegger does not set a pair of rails, or blow the steam whistle, as a musical photographer would. All this serves him as material as the minor third of the cuckoo served our musical ancestors. The harmonics used by Honegger in the introductory bars of "Pacific" are uncannily near the actual scratchings and scrapings when an engine is first set in motion. A gramophone record made under the wheels of a 2-3-1 would have been more correct, but its application to a musical piece would have killed it outright; for all that follows is designed on a musical scale, demanding musical setting.

"Pacific" evolves in a quasi-sonata form, which, in ideal purity, is motion progressing from a slow and short introduction to a rapid rhythmic movement, either ending in a crash or symment, metrically receding into the original stillness. "Pacific" comes to a stop—and the double and triple rhythms serving as speed-regulators produce an irresistible impression on the senses. Here is almost an illusion. No wonder Jaques-Dalcroze considers "Pacific" an embodiment of a true rhythm, a masterpiece of music as sound in motion.

The melody flows abundant in "Pacific" as soon as the brakes are released; its course is smooth; scarce drum-beats mark the junctions. In "Rugby"—Honegger's glorification of football—he goes a step further, eliminating percussion altogether. A game without a crash! Plenty of commotion, but commotion by a breathless melody marked, and by riding rhythms sharpened. Music flowing full tide, full of sudden alarms and trepidations, music that excites without stunning. To some, such elimination of the most logical accessory to any music of motion and vigor, would seem an unnecessary stunt But Frank Martin, Honegger's less illustrious countryman, wrote a fox-trot for chamber orchestra without drums and lost not a whit of pulsating power. The classically inclined Hindemith does not luxuriate in percussion.

Even taken as a stunt, this general trend toward economy of means has not a little significance. Stunt and mastery are next-door neighbors. Palestrina and Bach were great stunt-performers.. There is not a vestige of human sense in writing a perfect canon, at the expense of tremendous effort and possibly crippled inspiration. We possess no multiple power of sensation to follow several independent lines of complicated counterpoint. Yet Bach's achievement in Fugue changed the face of musical history and paved the way for the great symphonists of the following centuries. A successful stunt presupposes a superior technic. Physical culture teaches us to stand on our heads that we may stand firmly on our feet. Musical culture must pursue a similar course. Modern youth achieve things that would baffle ancient wise men. There is no need to worry about scarcity of geniuses; the musical world is still in the making, and out of the present turmoil remarkable men are arising more numerous than ever.

Arthur Honegger appeared on the musical horizon during the war. Music was in a crisis, as was the entire world. Musicians, great or small, were languishing under the strain of mortifying decadence. Mallarmé was ever worrying that his sonnets were not "sufficiently obscure." They were; and to his texts sensitive musicians were setting an equally obscure, languorous, though strangely attractive music. They reveled in visions of ancient Greece, vanished gods and voluptuous nymphs. Satie had a cult of his own, perfecting the art of miniature. Exquisite raptures in nebulous tones, half-suggestions of an impossible felicity, the entire wealth of the impresisonistic palette, seemed to reign over the souls and minds of both musicians and poets. Away from this coarse life with its internecine wars and annihilating machinery! More flowers, perfumes and pretty things!

Into this world of wan decadence came Arthur Honegger. The difference between Zurich, whence he came, and Paris, where he established himself, was great. Of different make and spirit, he was not tempted by the impressionistic vapors. He was all for healthy, boisterous rhythms. His first Sonata for Violin and Piano, written between 1916 and 1918, does not betray the signs of French sensualism. He writes a "Homage to Ravel," but thereafter pays but little musical homage to the acknowledged master of French music.

In Paris during the war, he meets Mademoiselle Andrée Vaurabourg, now Madame Honegger. She plays his early Tocca'a at a meeting of the improvised Cercle Musical et dramatique Indépendant. Ever since, her style of playing, full of feminine charm, finds reflection in Honegger's piano-writing, up to the subtle and brilliant Concertino.

For sentimental reasons, Honegger may recall in this January of 1929 that exactly nine years ago, at a gathering at Darius Milhaud's, a music-reviewer, eager to help along a group of struggling young musicians, listened favorably to their efforts. On Jan. 23, 1920, an article appeared in Comœdia, that caused confusion for a number of years: "Les Six Francais; Darius Milhaud, Louis Durey, Georges Auric, Arthur Honegger, Francis Poulenc et Germaine Tailleferre." The Six had just as little in common in their musical make-up, as any six Frenchmen picked on the street would have in their physical appearance. But it was a "boost"; "The Six" were friendly; they did not consider the arbitrary grouping as being in any way harmful. The story of "The Six" proved, however, more vital than any one imagined. Some explanations on the part of Honegger and Milhaud were quickly forgotten, and the easier way of following the erroneous conception was universally adopted. At least, one of the group was thus saved from oblivion.

Honegger's first popular success came with "Pacific" in 1923. In the same year he reorchestrated "King David," the oratorio that had originally been written for a rustic theater at Mezières, scored for a wood-wind ensemble plus a solitary double-bass. Rimsky-Korsakov once said that all orchestral music could be divided into three categories: music that sounds well oven with an inexperienced orchestra; music that only a good conductor and an expert body of players can bring out to advantage; music that no conductor and no orchestra can salvage. Honegger's music sounds always well and yields itself admirably to instruments. His instrumentation is as simple as it is logical. He has a strange aversion to "fancy" instruments. True, he has written a Hymn for ten string instruments, all different ranging from ultra-violin to infra-bass at the instigation of Monsieur Léo Sir the inventor. But never once has he used such a common nuisance as the E-flat clarinet. Stravinsky sends it cackling in the most inappropriate passage of "Œdipus!"

Honegger is also universal in his tastes and abilities. Oratorio has never been held in favor among young composers, and Florent Schmitt suffered much loss of popularity on account of his addiction to large and solemn forms. Honegger, the modern, tackles huge choral masses with the sure hand of a

Continued on Following Page

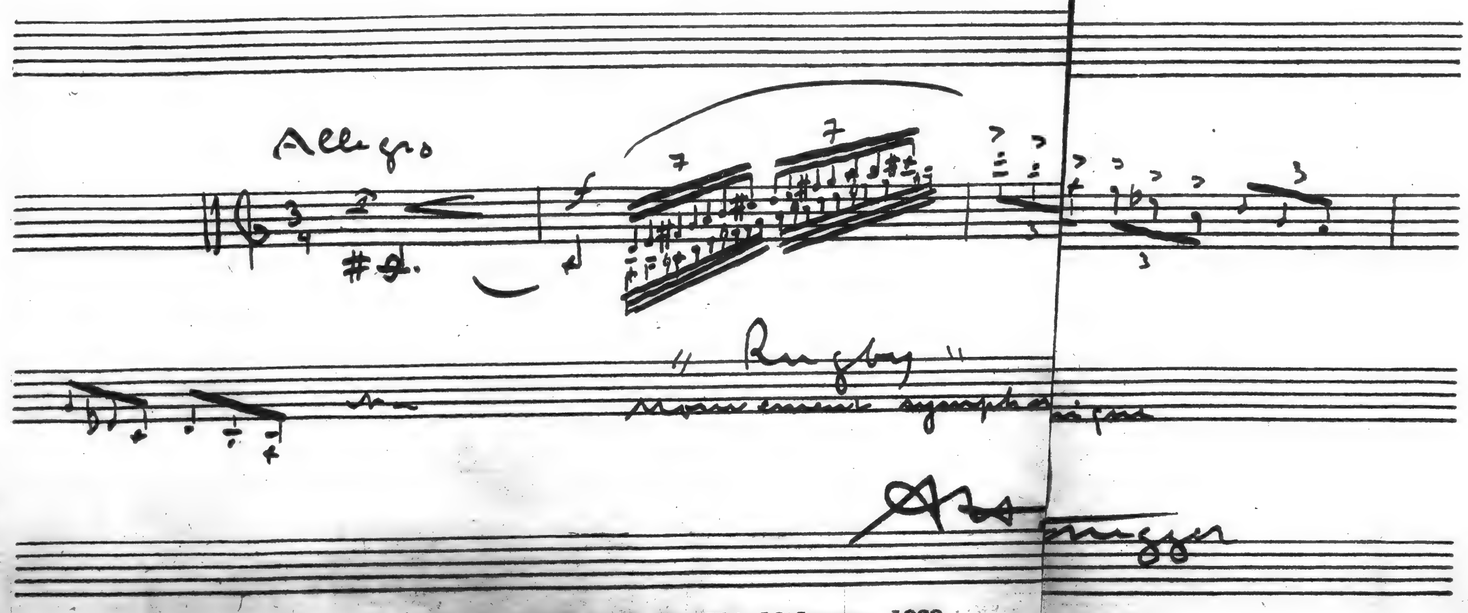
The Background

Honegger as Swiss, Lad and Youth

THOUGH Honegger belongs to French music, by nature—affirms Andre Cœuroy—he is profoundly Swiss. Born, as it happened, in France—at Le Havre in 1892—he came of a long line of German-Swiss ancestors, Protestants to boot. To Zurich, the capital of German Switzerland, he returned in the susceptible late 'teens and there made his first serious musical studies. He dwelt with his uncle, a judge in the law-courts with a taste for music, to whose memory he dedicated one of his earliest pieces. An aunt encouraged his musical bent. Soon—it was now 1911—he resolved to be composer by profession. Legend has it that in his ninth year, he was stirred by the sight and sound of Gounod's "Faust" and went home to wrtie operas of his own. Sonatas ensued though he knew next to nothing of sonata-form.

Now, however, in these summers at Zurich came the serious call. To Bach, Handel, Wagner, Strauss, Honegger, on the verge of his twenties, would add a French musical culture. He found it at the Conservatory under Gedalge, Widor and d'Indy. His Swiss citizenship, though it called him to militia-duty, kept him clear of the wastage of the German war. He could still pursue his studies in Paris, make his beginnings as composer—and these others upon this page take up the tale.

Three Measures, A Title and A Signature



Done in Boston, This 10 January, 1929

The Promise

The Ripened Honegger to Opera Now Turning

THE TIME is passed in which it could be fairly said that Honegger, as composer, was playing a four-cornered game, with Bach, Handel, the Romantics and Stravinsky each in a corner. He is now, as the line under the portrait suggests, altogether himself. His young years of musical adventure are passed. The atonality that grinds out of "Horace" and rumbles, well-lubricated by rhythm, through "Pacific 2-3-1" is no longer an end in itself; has lapsed into a potent means. Polytonality lingers as a distant memory. Honnegger's harmony tends to sobriety. His melody and his formal structures have taken a classical turn.

In opera, to which Honegger more and more devotes himself. "Judith" has proved a work of remarkable richness; while in "Antigone," he puts by both the French and the German procedure to find a course of his own. In it all things move swiftly, tersely; the atmosphere is epic; the music distills and liberates, rather than follows, the text. Honegger, wrote Monsieur Roland-Manuel, "does not magnetize us like Wagner; charm us like Debussy; shake us, like Stravinsky. He strives with us loyally"—and wins us to submission and admiration. An opera to a text by Paul Valery; an operetta drawn from Louys's gamesome "Roi Pausole," now engage him.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

TRANS. JAN 11 - 1909

Plays and P

The Composer, The Conductor, The Personage

Hearing Him in Eight Pieces His Cambridge Audience Rises to Honegger

At four minutes past eight o'clock last evening, in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, there might have been seen—as old romances used to say at the outset of Chapter One—a rather short and stocky gentleman emerging in evening clothes from the ante-room. He looked neither to right nor to left; took two at a time the steps leading to the stage, arrived upon it almost before the Symphony Orchestra could rise to salute him; then turned to face an equally applausive audience. The name of this gentleman is Arthur Honegger. He is near the end of his thirty-seventh year. By profession he is a composer of music; by the proved quality of his work, from "King David" and "Horatius Triumphant" through "Antigone" and "Rugby," a risen, significant, acknowledged figure of the new generation At the invitation of the society, "Pro-Musica," and with his wife—Mme. Andrée Vaurabourg, the pianist—at his side, he is now making a first visit to the United States. At the invitation of the Boston Orchestra, he was also making, last evening, his first appearance upon an American platform as composer-conductor. He makes a second this afternoon at Symphony Hall; a third in the same room on Saturday evening. New York, at the Philharmonic Concerts, will next scrutinize him. Thence he departs into the Middle West, journeying ultimately to California.

Like most modernist composers, or indeed musicians, Honegger—for his distinction warrants the name tout court—declines to look the part. There is not, fortunately, a professional trademark upon him. High from a broad forehead, he brushes back thick dark hair. His face is pale, full, smooth-shaven. The nose is sharp in a slightly aquiline profile; the mouth both sensitive and firm; the eyes quick and bright. His stature, which is not tall; his figure, which is not slender, suggest his German-Swiss blood. A robust geniality confirms the suggestion—as when last evening, he waved the orchestra to its feet with friendly gesture twice and thrice repeated, while far and wide beamed his countenance.

Not an affectation mars Honegger's bearing. As a lad he was good at games and, though he has now put on weight, he takes the course from ante-room to conductor's stand in unbroken, springy stride. The salute of the orchestra acknowledged—for who does not turn first to his partners in the job?—Honegger faces the audience; gives it a quick bow from the waist, European-fashion; bends his head to the continuing plaudits; is evidently eager to begin. When, however, as at the end of "Horatius Triumphant," the clapping rang long and loud, his shining face makes no secret of his pleasure. When, besides, the whole house recalled Madame Andrée again and again, he insisted that she, the pianist, and not he, the composer, of the Concertino, was the target. Once she persuaded him to the stage, but twice, thrice and four times he refused to budge from the ante-room.

Plainly Honegger is no unpractised conductor. (D'Indy schooled him and he has exercised the calling chiefly upon his own pieces). No Ravelian timidities beset him; nor, like il Signore Respighi, did he seem a trifle unfamiliar with the markings of his own scores. As plainly he had won the good will of the orchestra; whatever he bade, forthwith it accomplished. His stick is long and slender; his beat crisp and clean. At the outset of nearly every number he was a tranquil conductor. The stick gave the sign; with his left hand he rarely emphasized or shaded it. Soon, however, he was warming to and with the music. His beat waxed energetic. From his left hand emerged a characteristic gesture—the curving-in of fingers and thumb as though he were about to clench a fist. He bent forward to the orchestra, one foot from the stand upraised; settled back; rose yet again—until "Horatius Triumphant," or "Rugby," had ended in a final rush of sound. The impression was of a conductor who seeks sustained line and cumulative design rather than subtle shadings or polished minutiæ. Yet upon the "Summer Pastoral" his hand was as light, the tone as transparent, as the music itself. Lightly, also, he took the Concertino crisp, bright, pointed, to the end.

In that piece came the heyday of Mad ame Andrée—Mme. Andrée Vaurabourg Honegger the program solemnly style her. As pianists go, she is an ingratiatin figure—young, comely, friend to simpl cities of manner and dress, bearing her self with the taste and the distinctio of a high-bred French woman who i quiet fashion knows also the world. Fro the piano she draws a tone light, bright crisp and supple. Toward the music be fore her she is susceptible and self-subor dinating. Her sensibility to the modern ist idiom stands clear; yet about it she weaves from herself a charm to conquer the resentful. Her version of the Concertino—with Monsieur Arthur at every turn unobtrusively considering her—was persuasion and pleasure. Spelled was th audience until the moment came for ap plause to snap the magic. Not for minute did it stay its hands.

For the music itself, a program of ten numbers—to count each "Siren Song" as a separate item—seemed threateningly long. In outcome it was shorter than those of most Symphony Concerts. For a modernist had set it and brevity is their habit. (Call Toch of the recent Concerto the exception that proves the rule.) The new "Rugby," for example, is barely twelve minutes long; the familiar "Pacific 2-3-1," shorter; the "Summer Pastoral" and the "Concertino" concise; while only the mimed symphony of "Horace Victorieux" exceeds the quarter hour. Nor did the music of a single composer pall, couched though it was, for the most part, in variations of a single idiom. By report, only one anti-modernist à l'outrance, driven to exasperation by "Horatius Triumphant," overtly quitted the concert-room.

As a matter of fact, the early "Chant de Nigamon" is as harmless, to the most conservative ear, as any minor symphonic poem on the late-nineteenth-century model. The "Summer Pastoral" is pleasing lyric verse in tones, far removed from any dreadsome idiom; while the Concertino, whatever the speech, teems with élan, wit and what a new word calls "musicality." Even the fragment from the operatic "Judith" and the three songs out of "La Petite Sirène" prevailed orchestrally over the dullness of the singing. By this time every one who has not "passed out" (as the young gentleman of the University rudely put it) has agreed to "Pacific 2-3-1"; while "Rugby," freer from quasi-realistic detail, excels even that piece as high, imaginative achievement with the rhythmic energy and the dynamic variety of sound in motion. As for "Horace Victorieux," it remains to this day one of the masterpieces of musical modernity. Since its atonal speech is now familiar and therefore endurable, none needs hear it with gnashing of teeth and murmurs of impotent rage. But of these matters there will be occasion to write after the Symphony Concert today. H. T. P.

Herald Jan 11

MU

NOTES ON CONCERTS

By PHILIP HALE

It is hardly necessary to remind the concertgoers of Boston that Arthur Honegger will, as an honored guest, conduct the Symphony orchestra this afternoon and tomorrow night. The hall should be completely filled if only through curiosity to see the man to whom a locomotive engine and a football game suggested musical impressions. The program, consisting wholly of his compositions, includes one of his earliest and one of his latest. "Chant de Nigamon" was written as an exercise for the orchestral class at the Paris Conservatory and it was first performed there under his direction. The argument is taken from a story by Gustave Aimard about the Hurons and Iroquois; how one tribe burned their prisoners alive, scalped them; nevertheless, the unfortunates suspended their death chant to hear the solo of their chief, Nigamon. The "Pastorale d'Ete" has been performed here by the Boston Sinfonietta. These players have also performed the Concertino for piano and orchestra (Pauline Danforth, pianist). The pianist this week will be Mme. Andree Vaurabourg Honegger. "Horatius Victorious" and "Pacific 231"—which has been added to the program since the first announcement—have been performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mme. Cobina Wright, a soprano, which has sung in Boston, will now sing Judith's "Prayer" from the opera in which Mary Garden portrayed at the Boston Opera House the patriotically bloodthirsty heroine. Mme. Wright will also sing three songs with the accompaniment of flute, violins, violas and 'cellos.

Mr. Fernandez-Arbos, who will conduct the Symphony concerts next week, has arranged this program: Wagner, Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Halfter, Sinfonietta, Ravel, Alborado del Grazioso"; Albeniz-Arbos, "Evocation," "La Feta-Dieu a Seville," and "Triana" (orchestration of piano pieces in the suite "Iberia"); Turina, "La Procession del Rocio"; De Falla, Three Dances from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky intends sooner or later to bring Bach's Mass in B minor to performance at Symphony Hall; but not, as rather foolish rumors run, during the present season. The chorus—probably from Cambridge—must be trained long and arduously. It is years since the Mass has been heard in Boston.

As the schedule runs for the concerts on Sunday afternoons at Symphony Hall, [illegible] Metropolitan Opera

TRANS JAN 11 -09

MONITOR JAN. 12

Honegger in America

By L. A. SLOPER

ARTHUR HONEGGER, who is perhaps the most interesting of the group of clever young Parisians who once advertised themselves so well as "The Six," has embarked upon a tour of the United States. His first American appearances were made this week as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Cambridge and Boston; Mr. Koussevitzky having retired for his annual mid-winter vacation.

The French composer, offering a program of his own works, permitted us to trace his development from his student days, when he wrote "Chant de Nigamon," to the recent "Rugby." Intermediate stages were represented by the "Pastorale d'été," "Horace Victorieux," the Concertino, "Pacific 2-3-1," three songs from "La Petite Sirène" and the Prayer of Judith, about to depart for the tent of Holofernes, from the opera "Judith." With all this, there was hardly room for "King David," which many persons consider his masterpiece.

"Chant de Nigamon," although a student effort, is not a composition that might have been written by any student in an orchestral class. In his treatment of the American Indian themes, the composer showed a remarkable knowledge of the orchestra. In the "Summer Pastoral" he chose to reveal his capacity for simple charm and ingratiating melody; but the charm does not escape a certain monotony. Possibly Honegger at the time was preparing, in a rural retreat, the attack on the Curiatii.

Certainly "Horace" came as a stupendous contrast. This musical battle picture we had heard some years ago from Mr. Monteux. The passage of time naturally has deprived it of the power to bewilder us. We are able now to view it calmly and to understand it without difficulty. This gives us a better opportunity to appreciate its rhythmic vigor and its orchestral mastery. It leaves us, however, somewhat doubtful of the value of its substance.

The Concertino

M. Honegger really was able to provide a surprisingly contrasted program from his own works. Thus the Concertino showed another of his many sides, introducing a touch of jazz in its final section. This is a pleasant, lively piece, which we should not care to find any longer. The piano part was played by Mme. Andrée Vaurabourg Honegger, whose personal charm and dexterity at the keyboard completely won the audience.

The opera, "Judith," was most successful in its choral parts. The Prayer of Judith, however, we remember as impressive in its restraint, on the stage. In Symphony Hall, yesterday, it failed to make a similar effect. This probably was due in part to the fact that Mme. Cobina Wright, the singer, though she has an agreeable voice, appeared to have little notion of the meaning of the words she was singing. This may also have been the reason why the other songs left so faint an impression.

It has been said that "Rugby" marks an advance over "Pacific 2-3-1," because it contains less descriptive realism. Would it not be more accurate to say that the composer has merely omitted the detailed verbal description of the progress of events which he supplied in the case of the earlier work?

If this concert did not convince us that Honegger is one of the first line composers, it did serve to draw attention to a peculiarity of his compositions which seems to constitute an identifying idiom. This is the persistent use of a brief and rugged figure in the doublebasses, tuba and trombones, which serves variously to portray an Indian dance, the entrance of Roman gladiators, the exertions of a laboring locomotive and the movements of football players.

As a conductor M. Honegger showed himself lucid and authoritative, even if not so vivid an expositor of his own compositions as such an artist of the baton as Mr. Koussevitzky. The opportunity of seeing him and of hearing his own interpretations of his works was warmly appreciated by the audience of yesterday.

HONEGGER IS GUEST AT SYMPHONY

Bos AMER JAN 12

By MOSES SMITH

Arthur Honegger, guest conductor at this week's pair of Symphony concerts, is a rare bird—a composer who can conduct. Together with a concert in Sanders Theater on Thursday evening, these concerts constitute the American debut of the distinguished Swiss-French composer.

To grace the occasion there is an all-Honegger program, a group of pieces which give an excellent summary, presumably, of his development as an artist. Only music from his superb "King David" is missing; perhaps a chorus could not be assembled.

At any rate, here we were listening for the first time to "Chant de Nigamon," an orchestral trifle about American Indians, composed in 1917 and containing scarcely a suggestion of the Honegger who was to startle the world with his ultra-modernism. Then there was a Prayer from the recent opera, "Judith," music of suggestion; and three songs from "La Petite Sirene," music of cleverness, lightly orchestrated. These vocal numbers were sung by Cobina Wright, who clung tenaciously to the printed page before her, and who was obviously inadequate for the role she was filling.

"Pastorale d'Ete," music of tenderness "Horace Victorieux," first performed here in M. Monteux' day—music which cannot be described in a single phrase. It is a vivid program—symphony, with the classical Horatius for subject-matter. By all odds it was the most rugged, the most substantial music of the day. Scarcely less meaty is "Rugby," having the well-known game for subject.

Then the high point—at least for the audience—of the concert, the Concertino for piano and orchestra, with the charming Mme. Honegger as soloist. Her playing was delightful, deserving the remarkable demonstration that followed it. The music is clever, intellectual; I don't think it comes from the heart.

To conduct a whole program of one's own music is to subject oneself to trial by ordeal, the audience being the ordeal. Honegger came out of it with overwhelming success.

TRAV. JAN. 12,

ARBOS SYMPHONY GUEST

E. Fernandez Arbos, the famous Spanish conductor, is coming to America to appear as guest over the Boston Symphony orchestra for the next regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The Spanish musician visited this country last season and conducted in New York with great success some new Spanish music. Arbos will be remembered by some as the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for the season of 1903-4.

His coming programme will include Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersingers;" Ernesto Halfter's Sinfonietta in D major; Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso;" Albeniz's Piano Suite, "Iberia," arranged for orchestra by Arbos; Turina's "La Procession du Rocio;" and three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat."

EXTRA SYMPHONIES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of its Monday evening series on January 21st, at 8:15, in Symphony hall. This will mark the return of Serge Koussevitzky after his mid-season rest.

The series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the orchestra will begin in Symphony hall on the 5th of February. Serge Koussevitzky announces the five programs consisting of masterpieces from the orchestral repertory, both old and new, thus continuing the plan which he followed last season in this series.

Culbertson, pianist, and

GLOBE JAN 12

HONEGGER CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Noted Composer Leads Program of His Works

"Rugby," New Football Piece Heard for First Time In America, Pleases

Arthur Honegger, noted Swiss composer, appeared as guest conductor at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. His interpretations of a program filled with his own works were of unusual interest. "Rugby," the new tone poem suggested by a football game, was played for the first time in Boston on this program. Honegger's American debut as conductor was made Thursday evening at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, in the same numbers the Boston subscribers are hearing, including the first performance in America of "Rugby."

Andree Vaurabourg (Mme Arthur Honegger) was very warmly applauded for her admirable playing of the piano solo in her husband's Concertino. Cobina Wright, an American soprano now living in New York, sang an air from the opera "Judith," and three songs from "La Petite Sirene."

Honegger, now 36, is world famous as the composer of the oratorio "King David," heard here last year; the operas "Judith," given here two years ago and to be repeated by the Chicago Opera Jan 29; "Antigone," the tone poem about a locomotive "Pacific 231," familiar to Boston audiences from many performances, and other works. His visit to Boston is an event to be remembered with the coming in former seasons of d'Indy, Richard Strauss, Stravinsky, and Ravel. This young modernist seems certain of a prominent place in the history of music in the 20th century.

Stocky and strongly built, of medium height, Honegger looks as much like an athlete or a young business man as like a musician. Only his face, surmounted by a high forehead and a mass of thick black curly hair betrays at a second glance the musician's sensitiveness lightening its heavy features.

He conducts with rather clumsy sweeping gestures, obviously intent on conveying his ideas about interpretation to the players, and completely oblivious of the presence of the audience. He is, in fact, not by profession a conductor, but a musician able to make his talent and his thorough understanding of the orchestra felt by players and audience.

The program, revised at the last moment by the welcome addition of "Pacific 231," ranged from the "Chant de Nigamon," written in 1917 as a student exercise in composition at the Paris Conservatoire to "Rugby," completed last Summer. It represented the development of Honegger's great gift as fully as was possible in the concert hall. It proved that his individual and powerful style has been logically developed.

Logic, indeed, is in Honegger's music a quality that verges almost on a defect. In "Horace Victorieux," for example, the rigor with which he carries through a long work a single train of musical thought results in a monotony of effect certainly not intentional.

Polyphony is as natural a musical idiom to Honegger as it was to Bach. His counterpoint is, of course, very "free" in the technical sense of the term. Yet his treatment of rhythm lacks the flexibility that lends the illusion of freedom to Bach's student fugues.

In the main Honegger's style escapes the selfconscious and imitative eclecticism that impairs the work of too many modern composers. He writes for orchestra with the modern technique that makes the old distinction between the four choirs of the orchestra almost insignificant.

The great thing about his music is that he has something to say, and notable skill in saying it in his own style. One felt yesterday that his music is never pictorial, never really descriptive of actual life, and wondered at his persistent following of the 19th century fashion of giving program titles to his work. Perhaps it is merely a business man's instinct for publicity. Pieces purporting to describe steam engines and football players are sure to be talked about by persons who would ignore them as pure music.

"Rugby," the only important work new to Boston on yesterday's program, does not sound at all like a football game. There is no imitation of actual noises, merely a solidly put together piece of music with a form and a substance that command respect from the intellect and stir the emotions of the listener.

The "Pastorale" and the concertino prove that Honegger has in him a lyric contemplative romatic strain that derives from the German music, with which his spiritual affinities so plainly lie. His musical, as well as his actual genealogy, stems from German and Protestant rather than from French and sceptical sources. His parents were from Zurich, where he studied and lived as an adolescent. It is a meaningless accident that he was born in France and now lives in Paris.

The orchestra did its best for Honegger, and must have satisfied him. His wife, a fine pianist, was a thoroughly satisfactory interpreter of the difficult solo part in the concertino. But he was unfortunate in the singer chosen for his vocal works. P. R.

TRANS. JAN 11 - 1929

Plays and P

The Composer, The Conductor, The Personage

Hearing Him in Eight Pieces His Cambridge Audience Rises to Honegger

At four minutes past eight o'clock last evening, in Sanders Theater at Cambridge, there might have been seen—as old romances used to say at the outset of Chapter One—a rather short and stocky gentleman emerging in evening clothes from the ante-room. He looked neither to right nor to left; took two at a time the steps leading to the stage, arrived upon it almost before the Symphony Orchestra could rise to salute him: then turned to face an equally applausive audience. The name of this gentleman is Arthur Honegger. He is near the end of his thirty-seventh year. By profession he is a composer of music: by the proved quality of his work, from "King David" and "Horatius Triumphant" through "Antigone" and "Rugby," a risen, significant, acknowledged figure of the new generation. At the invitation of the society, "Pro-Musica," and with his wife—Mme. Andrée Vaurabourg, the pianist—at his side, he is now making a first visit to the United States. At the invitation of the Boston Orchestra, he was also making, last evening, his first appearance upon an American platform as composer-conductor. He makes a second this afternoon at Symphony Hall; a third in the same room on Saturday evening. New York, at the Philharmonic Concerts, will next scrutinize him. Thence he departs into the Middle West, journeying ultimately to California.

Like most modernist composers, or indeed musicians, Honegger—for his distinction warrants the name—tout court—declines to look the part. There is not, fortunately, a professional trademark upon him. High from a broad forehead, he brushes back thick dark hair. His face is pale, full, smooth-shaven. The nose is sharp in a slightly aquiline profile; the mouth both sensitive and firm; the eyes quick and bright. His stature, which is not tall; his figure, which is not slender, suggest his German-Swiss blood. A robust geniality confirms the suggestion—as when last evening, he waved the orchestra to its feet with friendly gesture twice and thrice repeated, while far and wide beamed his countenance.

Not an affectation mars Honegger's bearing. As a lad he was good at games and, though he has now put on weight, he takes the course from ante-room to conductor's stand in unbroken, springy stride. The salute of the orchestra acknowledged—for who does not turn first to his partners in the job?—Honegger faces the audience; gives it a quick bow from the waist, European-fashion; bends his head to the continuing plaudits; is evidently eager to begin. When, however, as at the end of "Horatius Triumphant," the clapping rang long and loud, his shining face makes no secret of his pleasure. When, besides, the whole house recalled Madame Andrée again and again, he insisted that she, the pianist, and not he, the composer, of the Concertino, was the target. Once she persuaded him to the stage, but twice, thrice and four times he refused to budge from the ante-room.

Plainly Honegger is no unpractised conductor. (D'Indy schooled him and he has exercised the calling chiefly upon his own pieces). No Ravelian timidities beset him; nor, like il Signore Respighi, did he seem a trifle unfamiliar with the markings of his own scores. As plainly he had won the good will of the orchestra; whatever he bade, forthwith it accomplished. His stick is long and slender; his beat crisp and clean. At the outset of nearly every number he was a tranquil conductor. The stick gave the sign; with his left hand he rarely emphasized or shaded it. Soon, however, he was warming to and with the music. His beat waxed energetic. From his left hand emerged a characteristic gesture—the curving-in of fingers and thumb as though he were about to clench a fist. He bent forward to the orchestra, one foot from the stand upraised; settled back; rose yet again—until "Horatius Triumphant," or "Rugby," had ended in a final rush of sound. The impression was of a conductor who seeks sustained line and cumulative design rather than subtle shadings or polished minutiæ. Yet upon the "Summer Pastoral" his hand was as light, the tone as transparent, as the music itself. Lightly, also, he took the Concertino crisp, bright, pointed, to the end.

In that piece came the heyday of Madame Andrée—Mme. Andrée Vaurabourg Honegger the program solemnly style her. As pianists go, she is an ingratiatin figure—young, comely, friend to simpl cities of manner and dress, bearing her self with the taste and the distinctio of a high-bred French woman who i quiet fashion knows also the world. Fro the piano she draws a tone light, bright crisp and supple. Toward the music be fore her she is susceptible and self-subor dinating. Her sensibility to the modern ist idiom stands clear; yet about it she weaves from herself a charm to conquer the resentful. Her version of the Concertino—with Monsieur Arthur at every turn unobtrusively considering her—was persuasion and pleasure. Spelled was the audience until the moment came for applause to snap the magic. Not for minute did it stay its hands.

For the music itself, a program of ten numbers—to count each "Siren Song" as a separate item—seemed threateningly long. In outcome it was shorter than those of most Symphony Concerts. For a modernist had set it and brevity is their habit. (Call Toch of the recent Concerto the exception that proves the rule.) The new "Rugby," for example, is barely twelve minutes long; the familiar "Pacific 2-3-1," shorter; the "Summer Pastoral" and the "Concertino" concise; while only the mimed symphony of "Horace Victorieux" exceeds the quarter hour. Nor did the music of a single composer pall, couched though it was, for the most part, in variations of a single idiom. By report, only one anti-modernist à l'outrance, driven to exasperation by "Horatius Triumphant," overtly quitted the concert-room.

As a matter of fact, the early "Chant de Nigamon" is as harmless, to the most conservative ear, as any minor symphonic poem on the late-nineteenth-century model. The "Summer Pastoral" is pleasing lyric verse in tones, far removed from any dreadsome idiom: while the Concertino, whatever the speech, teems with élan, wit and what a new word calls "musicality." Even the fragment from the operatic "Judith" and the three songs out of "La Petite Sirène" prevailed orchestrally over the dullness of the singing. By this time every one who has not "passed out" (as the young gentleman of the University rudely put it) has agreed to "Pacific 2-3-1"; while "Rugby," freer from quasi-realistic detail, excels even that piece as high, imaginative achievement with the rhythmic energy and the dynamic variety of sound in motion. As for "Horace Victorieux," it remains to this day one of the masterpieces of musical modernity. Since its atonal speech is now familiar and therefore endurable, none needs hear it with gnashing of teeth and murmurs of impotent rage. But of these matters there will be occasion to write after the Symphony Concert today. H. T. P.

MU

NOTES ON CONCERTS

By PHILIP HALE

It is hardly necessary to remind the concertgoers of Boston that Arthur Honegger will, as an honored guest, conduct the Symphony orchestra this afternoon and tomorrow night. The hall should be completely filled if only through curiosity to see the man to whom a locomotive engine and a football game suggested musical impressions. The program, consisting wholly of his compositions, includes one of his earliest and one of his latest. "Chant de Nigamon" was written as an exercise for the orchestral class at the Paris Conservatory and it was first performed there under his direction. The argument is taken from a story by Gustave Aimard about the Hurons and Iroquois; how one tribe burned their prisoners alive, scalped them; nevertheless, the unfortunates suspended their death chant to hear the solo of their chief, Nigamon. The "Pastorale d'Ete" has been performed here by the Boston Sinfonietta. These players have also performed the Concertino for piano and orchestra (Pauline Danforth, pianist). The pianist this week will be Mme. Andree Vaurabourg Honegger. "Horatius Victorious" and "Pacific 231"—which has been added to the program since the first announcement—have been performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mme. Cobina Wright, a soprano, which has sung in Boston, will now sing Judith's "Prayer" from the opera in which Mary Garden portrayed at the Boston Opera House the patriotically bloodthirsty heroine. Mme. Wright will also sing three songs with the accompaniment of flute, violins, violas and 'cellos.

Mr. Fernandez-Arbos, who will conduct the Symphony concerts next week, has arranged this program: Wagner, Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Halfter, Sinfonietta, Ravel, Alborado del Grazioso"; Albeniz-Arbos, "Evocation," "La Feta-Dieu a Seville," and "Triana" (orchestration of piano pieces in the suite "Iberia"); Turina, "La Procession del Rocio"; De Falla, Three Dances from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky intends sooner or later to bring Bach's Mass in B minor to performance at Symphony Hall; but not, as rather foolish rumors run, during the present season. The chorus—probably from Cambridge—must be trained long and arduously. It is years since the Mass has been heard in Boston.

As the schedule runs for the concerts on Sunday afternoons at Symphony Hall, [illegible] Metropolitan Opera

TRANS JAN 11-29

MONITOR JAN. 12

Honegger in America

By L. A. SLOPER

ARTHUR HONEGGER, who is perhaps the most interesting of the group of clever young Parisians who once advertised themselves so well as "The Six," has embarked upon a tour of the United States. His first American appearances were made this week as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Cambridge and Boston; Mr. Koussevitzky having retired for his annual mid-winter vacation.

The French composer, offering a program of his own works, permitted us to trace his development from his student days, when he wrote "Chant de Nigamon," to the recent "Rugby." Intermediate stages were represented by the "Pastorale d'été," "Horace Victorieux," the Concertino, "Pacific 2-3-1," three songs from "La Petite Sirène" and the Prayer of Judith, about to depart for the tent of Holofernes, from the opera "Judith." With all this, there was hardly room for "King David," which many persons consider his masterpiece.

"Chant de Nigamon," although a student effort, is not a composition that might have been written by any student in an orchestral class. In his treatment of the American Indian themes, the composer showed a remarkable knowledge of the orchestra. In the "Summer Pastoral" he chose to reveal his capacity for simple charm and ingratiating melody; but the charm does not escape a certain monotony. Possibly Honegger at the time was preparing, in a rural retreat, the attack on the Curiatii.

Certainly "Horace" came as a stupendous contrast. This musical battle picture we had heard some years ago from Mr. Monteux. The passage of time, naturally has deprived it of the power to bewilder us. We are able now to view it calmly and to understand it without difficulty. This gives us a better opportunity to appreciate its rhythmic vigor and its orchestral mastery. It leaves us, however, somewhat doubtful of the value of its substance.

The Concertino

M. Honegger really was able to provide a surprisingly contrasted program from his own works. Thus the Concertino showed another of his many sides, introducing a touch of jazz in its final section. This is a pleasant, lively piece, which we should not care to find any longer. The piano part was played by Mme. Andrée Vaurabourg Honegger, whose personal charm and dexterity at the keyboard completely won the audience.

The opera, "Judith," was most successful in its choral parts. The Prayer of Judith, however, we remember as impressive in its restraint, on the stage. In Symphony Hall, yesterday, it failed to make a similar effect. This probably was due in part to the fact that Mme. Cobina Wright, the singer, though she has an agreeable voice, appeared to have little notion of the meaning of the words she was singing. This may also have been the reason why the other songs left so faint an impression.

It has been said that "Rugby" marks an advance over "Pacific 2-3-1," because it contains less descriptive realism. Would it not be more accurate to say that the composer has merely omitted the detailed verbal description of the progress of events which he supplied in the case of the earlier work?

If this concert did not convince us that Honegger is one of the first line composers, it did serve to draw attention to a peculiarity of his compositions which seems to constitute an identifying idiom. This is the persistent use of a brief and rugged figure in the doublebasses, tuba and trombones, which serves variously to portray an Indian dance, the entrance of Roman gladiators, the exertions of a laboring locomotive and the movements of football players.

As a conductor M. Honegger showed himself lucid and authoritative, even if not so vivid an expositor of his own compositions as such an artist of the baton as Mr. Koussevitzky. The opportunity of seeing him and of hearing his own interpretations of his works was warmly appreciated by the audience of yesterday.

HONEGGER IS GUEST AT SYMPHONY

Bos AMER JAN 12

By MOSES SMITH

Arthur Honegger, guest conductor at this week's pair of Symphony concerts, is a rare bird—a composer who can conduct. Together with a concert in Sanders Theater on Thursday evening, these concerts constitute the American debut of the distinguished Swiss-French composer.

To grace the occasion there is an all-Honegger program, a group of pieces which give an excellent summary, presumably, of his development as an artist. Only music from his superb "King David" is missing; perhaps a chorus could not be assembled.

At any rate, here we were listening for the first time to "Chant de Nigamon," an orchestral trifle about American Indians, composed in 1917 and containing scarcely a suggestion of the Honegger who was to startle the world with his ultra-modernism. Then there was a Prayer from the recent opera, "Judith," music of suggestion; and three songs from "La Petite Sirene," music of cleverness, lightly orchestrated. These vocal numbers were sung by Cobina Wright, who clung tenaciously to the printed page before her, and who was obviously inadequate for the role she was filling.

"Pastorale d'Ete," music of tenderness "Horace Victorieux," first performed here in M. Monteux' day—music which cannot be described in a single phrase. It is a vivid program—symphony, with the classical Horatius for subject-matter. By all odds it was the most rugged, the most substantial music of the day. Scarcely less meaty is "Rugby," having the well-known game for subject.

Then the high point—at least for the audience—of the concert, the Concertino for piano and orchestra, with the charming Mme. Honegger as soloist. Her playing was delightful, deserving the remarkable demonstration that followed it. The music is clever, intellectual; I don't think it comes from the heart.

To conduct a whole program of one's own music is to subject oneself to trial by ordeal, the audience being the ordeal. Honegger came out of it with overwhelming success.

TRAV. JAN. 12.

ARBOS SYMPHONY GUEST

E. Fernandez Arbos, the famous Spanish conductor, is coming to America to appear as guest over the Boston Symphony orchestra for the next regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The Spanish musician visited this country last season and conducted in New York with great success some new Spanish music. Arbos will be remembered by some as the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony orchestra, for the season of 1903-4.

His coming programme will include Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersingers;" Ernesto Halfter's Sinfonietta in D major; Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso;" Albeniz's Piano Suite, "Iberia," arranged for orchestra by Arbos; Turina's "La Procession du Rocio;" and three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat."

EXTRA SYMPHONIES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert of its Monday evening series on January 21st, at 8:15, in Symphony hall. This will mark the return of Serge Koussevitzky after his mid-season rest.

The series of five Tuesday afternoon concerts by the orchestra will begin in Symphony hall on the 5th of February. Serge Koussevitzky announces the five programs consisting of masterpieces from the orchestral repertory, both old and new, thus continuing the plan which he followed last season in this series.

[illegible] Culbertson, pianist, and

GLOBE JAN 12

HONEGGER CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Noted Composer Leads Program of His Works

"Rugby," New Football Piece Heard for First Time in America, Pleases

Arthur Honegger, noted Swiss composer, appeared as guest conductor at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. His interpretations of a program filled with his own works were of unusual interest. "Rugby," the new tone poem suggested by a football game, was played for the first time in Boston on this program. Honegger's American debut as conductor was made Thursday evening at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, in the same numbers the Boston subscribers are hearing including the first performance in America of "Rugby."

Andree Vaurabourg (Mme Arthur Honegger) was very warmly applauded for her admirable playing of the piano solo in her husband's Concertino. Cobina Wright, an American soprano now living in New York, sang an air from the opera "Judith," and three songs from "La Petite Sirene."

Honegger, now 36, is world famous as the composer of the oratorio "King David," heard here last year; the operas "Judith," given here two years ago and to be repeated by the Chicago Opera Jan 29; "Antigone," the tone poem about a locomotive "Pacific 231," familiar to Boston audiences from many performances, and other works. His visit to Boston is an event to be remembered with the coming in former seasons of d'Indy, Richard Strauss, Stravinsky, and Ravel. This young modernist seems certain of a prominent place in the history of music in the 20th century.

Stocky and strongly built, of medium height, Honegger looks as much like an athlete or a young business man as like a musician. Only his face, surmounted by a high forehead and a mass of thick black curly hair betrays at a second glance the musician's sensitiveness lightening its heavy features.

He conducts with rather clumsy sweeping gestures, obviously intent on conveying his ideas about interpretation to the players, and completely oblivious of the presence of the audience. He is, in fact, not by profession a conductor, but a musician able to make his talent and his thorough understanding of the orchestra felt by players and audience.

The program, revised at the last moment by the welcome addition of "Pacific 231," ranged from the "Chant de Nigamon," written in 1917 as a student exercise in composition at the Paris Conservatoire to "Rugby," completed last Summer. It represented the development of Honegger's great gift as fully as was possible in the concert hall. It proved that his individual and powerful style has been logically developed.

Logic, indeed, is in Honegger's music a quality that verges almost on a defect. In "Horace Victorieux," for example, the rigor with which he carries through a long work a single train of musical thought results in a monotony of effect certainly not intentional.

Polyphony is as natural a musical idiom to Honegger as it was to Bach. His counterpoint is, of course, very "free" in the technical sense of the term. Yet his treatment of rhythm lacks the flexibility that lends the illusion of freedom to Bach's student fugues.

In the main Honegger's style escapes the selfconscious and imitative eclecticism that impairs the work of too many modern composers. He writes for orchestra with the modern technique that makes the old distinction between the four choirs of the orchestra almost insignificant.

The great thing about [illegible] is that he has something to say, and notable skill in saying it in his own style. One felt yesterday that his music is never pictorial, never really descriptive of actual life. And wondered at his persistent following of the 19th century fashion of giving program titles to his work. Perhaps it is merely a business man's instinct for publicity. Pieces purporting to describe steam engines and football players are sure to be talked about by persons who would ignore them as pure music.

"Rugby," the only important work new to Boston on yesterday's program, does not sound at all like a football game. There is no imitation of actual noises, merely a solidly put together piece of music with a form and a substance that command respect from the intellect and stir the emotions of the listener.

The "Pastorale" and the concertino prove that Honegger has in him a lyric contemplative romatic strain that derives from the German music, with which his spiritual affinities so plainly lie. His musical, as well as his actual genealogy, stems from German and Protestant rather than from French and sceptical sources. His parents were from Zurich, where he studied and lived as an adolescent. It is a meaningless accident that he was born in France and now lives in Paris.

The orchestra did its best for Honegger, and must have satisfied him. His wife, a fine pianist, was a thoroughly satisfactory interpreter of the difficult solo part in the concertino. But he was unfortunate in the singer chosen for his vocal works. P. R.

TRANS. JAN. 12 –

The Afternoon Of Honegger Full-Rounded

The Symphony Concert Arrays Eight of His Pieces, Variously Voiced

IN CAMBRIDGE the audience at the Symphony Concerts applauds as though it had come together for an occasion and was heartily enjoying it. In Boston, at the matinée, the assembled company claps considering, cautiously, self-consciously, as though it were not quite sure of its pleasure and were wondering whether "correct" motives prompted it. Consequently, Monsieur Honegger seemed less warmly received in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon than he had been on Thursday evening in Sanders Theater. Even so, plaudits were plentiful at every opportunity—the entrances of the composer-conductor, the end of the better-liked pieces, the moment when he waved the orchestra to its feet, shook its collective hand upon the wrist of Mr. Burgin; stood framed in the crescent, alert, grateful, happy.

Whatever the difference between the two audiences, on both banks of the Charles clapping was longest and loudest at the close of the Concertno. In it Madame Honegger renewed every agreeable impression of the evening; laid again upon hearers what her compatriots call a "very personal" spell; while Monsieur Arthur was once more model of discretion as composer, conductor—and husband. The matinée audience does not escort charm and gayety into Symphony Hall. Madame Andrée led them both to a stage where, since the day of Mademoiselle Germaine Tailleferre, there has been no such apparition. "She's young" seemed to come in an overt whisper from every quarter of the hall. . . . For his part, Monsieur Honegger put by the morning coat of conductorial convention for the short jacket and striped trousers of current European mode; at second appearance was more urgent, and more confident, with the orchestra; drew from it more polished or more puissant performance.

As at Cambridge, eight numbers—to count collectively the songs from "La Petite Sirène"—filled the program. Two—Nigamon's orchestral song and "Summer Pastoral"—may be counted early Honegger. Into a middle period fall "Horatius Triumphant" and "Pacific 2-3-1";! while to a later and a present day belong the Concertino and "Rugby." For the purposes of the concert, somewhere in a limbo of their own hovered the fragment from the opera, "Judith"—her Prayer to Jehovah in Act One—and the three songs out of "La Petite Sirène" suggested by Andersen's tale of the little mermaid. "Judith" is drama in music; exists, therefore, in true and living self nowhere but in the theater. Only to students and connoisseurs of opera (there are such futile persons) was the Prayer of much interest—as illustration of Honegger's swift, salient operatic speech as though the shape, speed and substance of the word were on the instant fused into the shape, speed and substance of the music; as example, again, of the illusion or the emotion single instruments, stripped or hushed, may evoke.

In turn, the three "Siren Songs," sung to flute and a few strings, hinted at the increasing fineness of hand and choiceness of means in Honegger, that in quick sensibility he may seize, project, dissolve, a mood. Call them adroit, sensitive trifles — a caress, a motion and a laugh. . . . All four of these vocal numbers suffered from the inability of the singer to convey the musical substance or assimilate the musical style—much less to enhance and individualize either. Must high-placed French composers, paying notable visits to the United States, have some singing millstone, hung by an American management, about their necks? For Ravel, last year, it was Mme Lisa Roma; for Honegger of yesterday it was Mme. Cobina Wright.

Nor, as the stock-phrase of old-fashioned reviewing went, need "Nigamon's Song" or "Summer Pastoral" detain us long. Which of us, having done more or less decent work in maturity, does not turn back with secret affection to the exercises of student-years? A certain reviewer, not without present place and quality, still lays hand upon heart and declares that he wrote his best article as a junior at Cambridge for the long-defunct Harvard Monthly. Even so with "Nigamon's Song." On Friday, as on Thursday, this music of the tortured Iroquois in the midst of the torturing Hurons, finally awed to silence, seemed but symphonic poem on the German model for advanced practice in composition. Possibly Honegger had been reading in Chateaubriand or Cooper about "the noble red man." Certainly he had absorbed the theory and practice of the symphonic poem, German-fashion—even to its frequent obscurity. For though Nigamon's death-song stayed savage hands and softened savage hearts, it is not easy to follow across Honegger's staves. Yet, for prophecy, in the piece go both readiness and vigor.

Honegger still passes the holiday months in German Switzerland whence he came. In landscape and atmosphere, in homely sights and sounds familiar and cherished, he found the moods, out of them made the music, for "Summer Pastoral"—the murmurous, musing, beginning; through the middle measures gentle gayety drifting out of the distance to thread the revery; the revery itself melting, as drowsy day-dreams do, into the summer glow. Yet note the lightening hand of Honegger. "Nigamon" was written stub-fingered. "Summer Pastoral" runs in fine lines to fine shadings; the musical matter gives out aromas; fancy chooses it; grace and delicacy conduct it.

By so much "Summer Pastoral" may lead the way to the Concertino—the present flower, as Madame Andrée plays it, of the lighter Honegger. It is brief—yet not for lack of diverse matter or variety of mood. It is written as one writes in joy of the work growing under mind and hand. Every measure is transparent, every note falls into just place. The musical movement is supple and alert Here runs Honegger's melody; there his animated counterpoint; a few pages onward, his zest for fugue—he can even turn it playful; everywhere his harmonic readiness, his sensibility to timbres. Honegger, however, lives in his own time, and 1924 is the date upon the Concertino. Hence the piano as instrument of percussion as well as means to pseudo-song; hints of atonality and polytonality seductive, almost cooing: in the finale a syncopated dance; while over the way from the bassoons and the violas something very like jazz. (The austere programist will have it "a street song.") And all done with an infectious verve and charm as musical as the matter. A good leave-taking for the fanciful, the adept, the smiling Honeggers—since to do justice to Madame Andrée they must indeed be plural.

Through "Horatius Triumphant," "Pacific 2-3-1," the new "Rugby," the other and, as the books will surely say, the greater Honegger. The "mimed symphony" of the triple Roman combat, of the passionful and murdered Camilla received yesterday its meed of applause. Seemingly, the atonality and the polytonality of a music that lays on and spares not, irritated few ears, exasperated few mouths. Yet no longer ago than 1922, when Mr. Monteux, greatly daring, produced the self-same piece in that self-same room, feminine voices screamed with scornful resentment and senile lips quavered out gutter-epithets. Now intent listening and fervent applause. Are we at last agreed that the music of this immediate time is fundamentally and pervasively music of dissonance; that to it our perceptions are becoming accustomed, understanding, responsive, as they gradually attuned themselves first to Wagner, then to Debussy; that at the imagination, the will, the hands, of a Stravinsky or a Honegger, this dissonance becomes a means to power and beauty, the more such for their strangeness? Have we gained at last the victory over prejudices by which we see that atonality, polytonality and the kindred modernisms are but new instruments to old ends, to be used or disused, enforced or softened, as they may serve the purpose of the composer? Through yesterday's concert—blessed be the Divine Justice!—the signs were favorable.

Unmistakably, and after six years, this mimed symphony of Roman legend is modernist music of poignant beauty and impinging power. It is not easy to sit unmoved before the measures that sing the fated loves of Camilla of the Horatii and her Curatius; or that sharpen her agony and revolt when by her brother's hand her lover falls. She screams out imprecation—for "Horace Victorieux" is intrinsically tonal drama—and the page pierces with power. The brother runs her through—and the page seethes with the swift savagery of the deed; then swells into the silence that upon these Romans fell. Along the way to this climax other deeds of tonal power and musico-dramatic imagination. Vividly the two motivs contrast the combatants, foretell the victory; there the heralds proclaim—for once tersely; before and behind the crowd grinds; and ever, as it seems, the undernote of the fated Camilla.

Honegger writes a stark, sinewy music; grave, austere, the composer's eye and ear fixed on the object, not a measure of rambunctious rhetoric or romantic palaver; the high Roman fashion; the heroics of Corneille's tragedy hard-bitten into a stripped realism. Nor is "Horatius Triumphant" merely a music of delineation and of mimed drama. Beyond both, it has its own integrity and vitality, into them has fused all else. Two-fold, from Honegger conducting and composing now came "Horace Victorieux." Thereby, no doubt, it was glamoured. Yet from it sounded high imagination and large mastery into music transfusing drama. The way was clear for "Judith," "Antigone," and Honegger fertilizing a sterile stage.

Then to the other mastery—over the music of motion. To us in America "Pacific 2-3-1"—the locomotive piece—first disclosed it. Being human, and therefore decently light-minded, the delineative details primarily amused us. We heard "the joyous monster," as a Parisian commentator named it, chugging into motion, straining to grip the rails. From it sounded the whistle, even according to the rules; at the end it was braked—there is no other word for the sound—to a stop. (Honegger, by the way, speeds up the Pacific beyond the usual; but brings it to less graphic standstill.) As descriptive music, the piece would have been forgotten in a year. Upon listening imagination and preserving recollection it laid hold by far more remarkable traits.

Here at last was a music primarily of motion. Seventy-five miles to the hour the Pacific raced the rails and spanned the night. Honegger rhythmed the pace; sang the song of the motion, filled the staves with the zest and glow of such riding of earth, air and darkness. Even the counterpoint felt the thrill. The imagining was bold and sure; the accomplishing masterly. Our day, our living, by no means inglorious, had entered into symphonic music, Honegger for its voice. Here were its steel and speed, here its rasp and clatter rhythmed and made music. By such titles, not as mere locomotive piece, "Pacific 2-3-1" endured. To this day we that love our own time shamelessly, may not hear it without emotion.

In succession, but to far fine achievement, now stands "Rugby," already labelled the football piece. (Honegger finds locomotives amusing, even haunting. Therefore legend about "Pacific." Honegger once played football; still follows the game. Therefore legend—already accumulating—about "Rugby," no more than four months old. Under any other name it would have sounded as potent. Here again is a music of motion, variously and intensively rhythmed — abrupt, broken, hastened, checked, beaten down, struggling upward. It upsprings from motivs developed and conducted in contrast, rivalry, struggle, combat. They are wrought into a mêlée of counterpoint—a Parisian found the phrase—that in both graphic and musical impression transcends "Pacific."

In this polyphony the game—if game there is—is played changefully, excitedly, dynamically. The zest of it, the joy of it—this is European, not collegiate football, football seen and heard through the imagination—burst here and there into songful measures, full-throated, elate. The end flings up a sturdy victory. And all by musical means used in musical imagery to musical illusion. For his purpose Honegger needs neither atonality nor polytonality; tosses away with as free a gesture the percussion group. Here again is music of our time, our living, our sport—and not merely are they machines; music built upon the foundations of the fathers, yet speaking our language in our voice to our answering emotions. "The ancients were the ancients"—composers included —"but we"—listening to music—"are people of today."

H. T. P.

The Prague Singers For Second Hearing

The Prague Teachers' Chorus, under its intensely musical and equally resourceful conductor, Method Dolezil, last evening gave its second performance hereabouts, when it appeared at Sanders Theater under the auspices of the division of music and the division of fine arts of Harvard University. The concert was provided by Mrs. Coolidge, generous patron of the arts Needless to say, not all who sought admission

Above The Keyboard

Andree Vaurabourg-Honegger
Pianist and Wife to the Eminent Composer

64

Jan 12 Herald

MUSIC

ARTHUR HONEGGER

By PHILIP HALE

Arthur Honegger conducted, as a guest, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon. (He conducted the orchestra at the Cambridge concert last Thursday night.) The program of yesterday, made up wholly of his works, was as follows: Chant de Nigamon, Prayer of Judith from the opera "Judith." Three songs: Song of the Sirens, Cradle song of the Siren, Song of the Pear. Pastorale d'ete. Horatius Victorious. Rugby. Concertino for piano and orchestra. Pacific 2, 3, 1.

Mme. Andree Vaurabourg Honegger was the pianist; Mme. Cobina Wright, the soprano singer. "Pacific 2, 3, 1," was added to the program that had been announced. The orchestra rose to their feet when Mr. Honegger came on the platform; the audience welcomed him warmly.

The Chant de Nigamon, composed as an exercise for the orchestral class of the Paris Conseratory, is one of Honegger's earliest orchestral works. The subject is an episode in a story by Gustave Aimard of Hurons torturing Iroquois prisoners, who stopped their death chant to hear their chief Nigamon sing his last word. Three themes were taken from melodies of the North American Indians collected by Julian Tiersot. The composition might be described as pictorially romantic, planned according to then contemporaneous form: music expressive of tribal conflicts, exultant triumph, tortures and the final chant of tragic resignation; music that is appropriately savage, cruel, and then dignified, stoical in its lamentation. American composers who have summered and wintered with our Indians, and, as the saying goes, been through them with a dark lantern have not expressed savagery so forcibly as Honegger whose acquaintance with them was wholly derived from the ingenious Aimard. In comparison with Honegger's music for the torture, that of Puccini's in the second act of "Tosca" is agreeable and suave. This symphonic poem shows Honegger's technical skill, his grasp of effective orchestration, his ability to express himself pictorially, even emotionally. It does not reveal individuality, nor was individuality perhaps to be expected of a young man in a conservatory. No one hearing this music in 1918 could have foreseen the Honegger of "Horatius Victorious" composed in 1920-1 and of the still later works.

Mr. Monteux brought out "Horatius" for the first time in this country and by so doing disturbed the equanimity of orthodox Bostonians; woke them from their constitutional composure. Since that shock was administered by Mr. Monteux, these good people have learned resignation, they are prepared in a measure for what they consider the worst to come. Today "Horatius" probably no longer seems to them amorphous, horridly cacophonous and chaotic; some pages may appear deliberately brutal, but the subject is not one for mellifluous strains. Here one finds the true Honegger, standing on his feet, apart from the others, raising his own voice, virile, at times raucous, conscious of his own strength, a man to be reckoned with.

In marked contrast with "Horatius," which was originally for a mimed performance on the stage, is the "Summer Pastorale" with its pleasing poetical remembrances of country life and surroundings; amiable music, deftly made, with the to be expected employment of professionally pastoral instruments; music that a composer of less individuality might have signed after a restful vacation; music that charms the ears while it is playing; is vaguely remembered.

In "Pacific 231" and "Rugby" the true Honegger steps boldly forth, the man of the commanding position among composers of today. "Rugby" has been aptly described as a "melee of bodies", two football teams, two themes, "lyric dynamism". And in this symphonic movement Honegger shows that he can command at will a long, sweeping melody. As for "Pacific, 231" it might well bear for its motto Walt Whitman's lines to a locomotive:

". . . Through gale or calm, now swift, now slack,
Yet steadily careering;
Type of the modern—emblem of motion and power . . .

Fierce-throated beauty!
Roll through my chant with all thy lawless music . . .
(No sweetness debonair of tearful harp or glib piano thine)
To the free skies . . . unpent and glad and strong"

The "Concertino" seems a new departure; it is a fascinating, haunting composition. Here the frequent repetition of a theme—pattern, if you will—in dialogue for piano and orchestra—excites; it does not, as is often the case with repetitions, annoy. How charming the ornamentation by orchestral instruments of the melody for the piano in the middle section; how inspiriting the gay measures in the finale. No padding, no spinning out of a musical idea beyond endurance. Truly an admirable work, delightfully performed by the pianist and the orchestra. No wonder that Madame Honegger and her husband were recalled again and again.

Mme. Wright was not the woman to sing the music from "Judith." She has not the voice for it; there was no emotion, no spiritual exaltation in her performance. She was a little more fortunate in the short light and tripping "Song of the Peer."

Mr. Honegger, modest, honest in speech and in behavior, does not pretend to be a virtuoso conductor. Leading his own compositions, he knows what he should express. The orchestra yesterday was gladly responsive to his wishes.

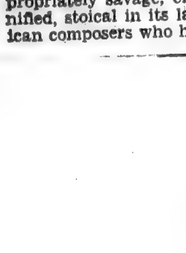
The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Enrique Fernandez-Arbos will be the "guest" conductor of the orchestra. His program will be as follows: Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Halfter, Sinfonietta. Ravel, Alborada del Grazioso. Albeniz-Arbos, La Procession del Rocio. De Falla, Three Dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Bos. Daily Adv
Saturday, January 12, 1929

More New

Arthur Honegger Guest Conductor at the Symphony

To the conductor's stand at Symphony Hall this week comes no less a celebrity than Arthur Honegger, noted French modernist, to wield the baton over an entire program of his own works. No less as conductor than as composer is Honegger an artist. In his "Rugby" and "Horace Victorieux" in particular, he spurred on the orchestra, caught its members up into his own enthusiasm, and produced a reading of each work that would be hard to match.



Arthur Honegger

These two pieces, and the celebrated "Pacific 231" proved the backbone of the program. For the rest, there were songs with Cobina Wright for soloist, a Concertino for piano and orchestra with Mme Honegger as assisting artist.

Like Moussorgsky, Honegger looks about him at the life of the day as well as delving into the past. Like the great Russian, he finds pictorial patterns ready to his hand and sets them to musical cadence. "Pacific 231" is probably the best modern musical interpretation of a machine; in this case the lordly locomotive.

By the same token, the new "Rugby" is a sporting theme set in contrapuntal rhythm. It is more objective and less realistic than the locomotive piece. Its swirl of attack and counter attack on a football field is suggested rather than openly displayed by the musical idiom. Unlike most modernistic music, it has life, force and vividness and should occupy no mean place among Honegger's works.

For the rest, the program was of infinite variety; the soft languor of the lovely "Pastorale d'Ete"; the frankly French conception of the American Indian in "Chant de Nigamon"; the clever concertino, the agreeable cycle of little songs. Honegger's style is varied, his genius has many facets. Well may his music fill an entire afternoon.

HONEGGER DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Entire List of Pieces by and Led by Composer

Post — Jan 12.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The world of music is revolving rapidly these days. Not so long ago the name of Arthur Honegger was one with which to frighten the musically timid. Yesterday afternoon Monsieur Honegger led the Symphony Orchestra through an entire programme of his compositions, and the audience, far from protesting, applauded most of them with genuine fervor and, in a far larger proportion than is customary at the Friday matiness, sat the concert through.

KNOWS WHAT HE WANTS

Many pictured likenesses have made Honegger's face familiar to the readers of musical periodicals, the scanners of music-pages in the daily press. It is a strong face, rather massive in contour and surmounted by a shock of unruly black hair. Seen in the flesh the composer gives as a man the impression of energy and vitality that is created by his music. Thick-set, of medium stature, he has few of the graces of the prima-donna conductor, but he leads an orchestra as one familiar with the essentials of the craft and, what is more to the point, as one who knows what he wants and obtains it with no excess of gesture.

Next March Honegger will pass his 37th birthday. Already he has established himself as the leading figure among the newer composers of France. This is not a day of musical masterpieces, but he has made at least one in his "King David," produced here last spring by the Symphony Orchestra and the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe. And to judge by a single hearing, he has made another in the tone-poem "Rugby" (he styles it an orchestral movement), played yesterday for the first time in Boston.

"Rugby" Good Music

Those who expected in this latest Honegger score a repetition of the somewhat crass realism of the locomotive piece, "Pacific 2-3-1" were doomed to disappointment. Save in the general suggestion of conflict and motion there is little in "Rugby" of either the externals or internals of a football match. There is, in fact, a recurring lyric theme of a marked, if fleeting, beauty that is difficult to place in such surroundings. Perhaps it has reference to the fair devotees of the sport. But regarded solely as a composition, "Rugby" seems to have in it the elements that make for life. Beyond doubt it will become a part of the standard orchestral repertory. "Pacific 2-3-1" which, by the way, concluded the concert of yesterday, seems to have come to stay; and "Rugby" is far the finer piece of the two.

To begin the concert Monsieur Honegger offered an early composition on an American Indian subject, "The Song of Nigamon," that is little more than a worthy student-exercise. The Prayer from the opera "Judith," sung by Cobina Wright, strengthened the impression made by the opera itself, that the solo passages are relatively ineffective. Three songs with orchestra from "La Petite Sirene" proved of slight interest—though they might have been more convincingly sung—and another early work, "A Summer Pastoral," played here once by Mr. Fiedler's Sinfonietta, has no more than a passing charm.

"Horace Victorieux"

With the ensuing number, the mimed symphony "Horace Victorieux," introduced here by Mr. Monteux in 1922 to a generally perplexed and even resentful audience, the real, the characteristic Honegger emerged. This music that vividly describes the victory of the Roman Horatius over the three Alban Curiatii and his subsequent murder of his own sister, because she lamented the death of one of the vanquished, has a power that is inescapable. Six years of modernist music have tempered somewhat the sting of its dissonances. But it is not for those who delight only in agreeable sounds. Yet yesterday's audience received the piece with undisguised enthusiasm. Verily we are making progress.

Between "Rugby" and "Pacific 2-3-1" came yesterday the Concertino for piano and orchestra, the solo part played by the composer's wife, Mme. Andree Vaurabourg Honegger. This Concertino, which was performed here last season by Pauline Danforth at a chamber concert of modern music, is a piece that should disconcert no one. The final movement, a sort of polite and modified jazz, pleased particularly yesterday, and there was much applause for Mme. Honegger, who played with a crystal-clear tone and delightful sense of rhythm.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE JAN 13-

E. Fernandez Arbos, the illustrious Spanish musician, will be the guest conductor at the next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan 18 and 19. Senor Arbos is known to Boston as concert master of this orchestra for the single season of 1903-04, when he succeeeded Franz Kneizel. Indeed, Arbos as a young man was a famous violin virtuoso.

Born in Madrid, he studied the violin there as a boy, and perfected his technique under Vieuxtemps of Brussels, and Joachim of Berlin. Touring Europe in the 90s, he became a foremost virtuoso of that period. It was in 1904 that he devoted his career more particularly to conducting. He has long been at the head of the Symphony Orchestra of Madrid, likewise conducting in London for many seasons, and conducting concerts more recently in Paris, Rome, and Petrograd.

Last season he visited America and conducted concerts in New York, when he brought out some Spanish music with much success.

Spanish scores, including his own transcriptions of Albeniz will constitute the larger part of his program here.

Programs to Hand TRANS

From Mr. Fernandez-Arbos of Madrid for his concerts, as guest-conductor, with the Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Jan. 18, and Saturday evening, Jan. 19—for the most part music of Spanish composers:

Prelude to the Opera, "Die Meistersinger," ..... Wagner
Sinfonietta in D major ..... Halffter
Alborada del Grazioso ..... Ravel
(Orchestral Version)
Suite, "Iberia," ..... Albeniz
(Scored for Orchestra by Arbos)
The Procession of Rocio ..... Turina
Three Dances from the Ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat" ..... de Falla

Boston Post Jan 14

COMPOSER RIDES IN CAB OF ENGINE

Arthur Honegger, French composer, who incorporated the wheezes and whistles of a railroad engine into a musical composition entitled "Pacific 2-3-1," yesterday enjoyed a ride in an engine cab from the South Station to Providence.

The young composer, who since boyhood has made locomotives his hobby, is visiting this country for what he declares is to be the last time. He stepped out of the cab at Providence thrilled over the experience and then boarded the 5 o'clock express for New York City, where he is to appear as guest conductor.

Rattle 2400 Years Old

A child's rattle shaped like a hedgehog was unearthed in the ruined city of Kish and is said to date back to about 500 B. C.

THE BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, JANUARY 14, 1929

COMPOSER HELPS DRIVE BIG LOCOMOTIVE

Arthur Honegger took his first ride in an engine cab yesterday on the run from Boston to Providence. The group, just before the start, includes (left to right), Ralph Bradley, Engineer F. J. Waldon, Mme. Honegger, the composer, and Boaz Piller, member of Boston Symphony orchestra.

64

Jan 12 Herald

MUSIC

ARTHUR HONEGGER

By PHILIP HALE

Arthur Honegger conducted, as a guest, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon. (He conducted the orchestra at the Cambridge concert last Thursday night.) The program of yesterday, made up wholly of his works, was as follows: Chant de Nigamon, Prayer of Judith from the opera "Judith." Three songs: Song of the Sirens, Cradle song of the Siren, Song of the Pear. Pastorale d'ete. Horatius Victorious. Rugby. Concertino for piano and orchestra. Pacific 2, 3, 1.

Mme. Andree Vaurabourg Honegger was the pianist; Mme. Cobina Wright, the soprano singer. "Pacific 2, 3, 1," was added to the program that had been announced. The orchestra rose to their feet when Mr. Honegger came on the platform; the audience welcomed him warmly.

The Chant de Nigamon, composed as an exercise for the orchestral class of the Paris Conseratory, is one of Honegger's earliest orchestral works. The subject is an episode in a story by Gustave Aimard of Hurons torturing Iroquois prisoners, who stopped their death chant to hear their chief Nigamon sing his last word. Three themes were taken from melodies of the North American Indians collected by Julian Tiersot. The composition might be described as pictorially romantic, planned according to then contemporaneous form: music expressive of tribal conflicts, exultant triumph, tortures and the final chant of tragic resignation; music that is appropriately savage, cruel, and then dignified, stoical in its lamentation. American composers who have summered and wintered with our Indians, and, as the saying goes, been through them with a dark lantern have not expressed savagery so forcibly as Honegger whose acquaintance with them was wholly derived from the ingenious Aimard. In comparison with Honegger's music for the torture, that of Puccini's in the second act of "Tosca" is agreeable and suave. This symphonic poem shows Honegger's technical skill, his grasp of effective orchestration, his ability to express himself pictorially, even emotionally. It does not reveal individuality, nor was individuality perhaps to be expected of a young man in a conservatory. No one hearing this music in 1918 could have foreseen the Honegger of "Horatius Victorious" composed in 1920-1 and of the still later works.

Mr. Monteux brought out "Horatius" for the first time in this country and by so doing disturbed the equanimity of orthodox Bostonians; woke them from their constitutional composure. Since that shock was administered by Mr. Monteux, these good people have learned resignation, they are prepared in a measure for what they consider the worst to come. Today "Horatius" probably no longer seems to them amorphous, horridly cacophonous and chaotic; some pages may appear deliberately brutal, but the subject is not one for mellifluous strains. Here one finds the true Honegger, standing on his feet, apart from the others, raising his own voice, virile, at times raucous, conscious of his own strength, a man to be reckoned with.

In marked contrast with "Horatius," which was originally for a mimed performance on the stage, is the "Summer Pastorale" with its pleasing poetical remembrances of country life and surroundings; amiable music, deftly made, with the to be expected employment of professionally pastoral instruments; music that a composer of less individuality might have signed after a restful vacation; music that charms the ears while it is playing; is vaguely remembered.

In "Pacific 231" and "Rugby" the true Honegger steps boldly forth, the man of the commanding position among composers of today. "Rugby" has been aptly described as a "melee of bodies", two football teams, two themes, "lyric dynamism". And in this symphonic movement Honegger shows that he can command at will a long, sweeping melody. As for "Pacific, 231" it might well bear for its motto Walt Whitman's lines to a locomotive:

". . . Through gale or calm, now swift, now slack,
Yet steadily careering;
Type of the modern—emblem of motion and power . . .

Fierce-throated beauty!
Roll through my chant with all thy lawless music . . .
(No sweetness debonair of tearful harp or glib piano thine)
To the free skies . . . unpent and glad and strong"

The "Concertino" seems a new departure; it is a fascinating, haunting composition. Here the frequent repetition of a theme—pattern, if you will—in dialogue for piano and orchestra—excites; it does not, as is often the case with repetitions, annoy. How charming the ornamentation by orchestral instruments of the melody for the piano in the middle section; how inspiriting the gay measures in the finale. No padding, no spinning out of a musical idea beyond endurance. Truly an admirable work, delightfully performed by the pianist and the orchestra. No wonder that Madame Honegger and her husband were recalled again and again.

Mme. Wright was not the woman to sing the music from "Judith." She has not the voice for it; there was no emotion, no spiritual exaltation in her performance. She was a little more fortunate in the short light and tripping "Song of the Peer."

Mr. Honegger, modest, honest in speech and in behavior, does not pretend to be a virtuoso conductor. Leading his own compositions, he knows what he should express. The orchestra yesterday was gladly responsive to his wishes.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Enrique Fernandez-Arbos will be the "guest" conductor of the orchestra. His program will be as follows: Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." Halfter, Sinfonietta. Ravel, Alborada del Grazioso. Albeniz-Arbos, La Procession del Rocio. De Falla, Three Dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Bos. Daily Adv
Saturday, January 12, 1929

More New

Arthur Honegger Guest Conductor at the Symphony

To the conductor's stand at Symphony Hall this week comes no less a celebrity than Arthur Honegger, noted French modernist, to wield the baton over an entire program of his own works. No less as conductor than as composer is Honegger an artist. In his "Rugby" and "Horace Victorieux" in particular, he spurred on the orchestra, caught its members up into his own enthusiasm, and produced a reading of each work that would be hard to match.

Arthur Honegger

These two pieces, and the celebrated "Pacific 231" proved the backbone of the program. For the rest, there were songs with Cobina Wright for soloist, a Concertino for piano and orchestra with Mme Honegger as assisting artist.

Like Moussorgsky, Honegger looks about him at the life of the day as well as delving into the past. Like the great Russian, he finds pictorial patterns ready to his hand and sets them to musical cadence. "Pacific 231" is probably the best modern musical interpretation of a machine; in this case the lordly locomotive.

By the same token, the new "Rugby" is a sporting theme set in contrapuntal rhythm. It is more objective and less realistic than the locomotive piece. Its swirl of attack and counter attack on a football field is suggested rather than openly displayed by the musical idiom. Unlike most modernistic music, it has life, force and vividness and should occupy no mean place among Honegger's works.

For the rest, the program was of infinite variety; the soft languor of the lovely "Pastorale d'Ete"; the frankly French conception of the American Indian in "Chant de Nigamon"; the clever concertino, the agreeable cycle of little songs. Honegger's style is varied, his genius has many facets. Well may his music fill an entire afternoon.

HONEGGER DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Entire List of Pieces by and Led by Composer

Post — Jan 12.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The world of music is revolving rapidly these days. Not so long ago the name of Arthur Honegger was one with which to frighten the musically timid. Yesterday afternoon Monsieur Honegger led the Symphony Orchestra through an entire programme of his compositions, and the audience, far from protesting, applauded most of them with genuine fervor and, in a far larger proportion than is customary at the Friday matiness, sat the concert through.

KNOWS WHAT HE WANTS

Many pictured likenesses have made Honegger's face familiar to the readers of musical periodicals, the scanners of music-pages in the daily press. It is a strong face, rather massive in contour and surmounted by a shock of unruly black hair. Seen in the flesh the composer gives as a man the impression of energy and vitality that is created by his music. Thick-set, of medium stature, he has few of the graces of the prima-donna conductor, but he leads an orchestra as one familiar with the essentials of the craft and, what is more to the point, as one who knows what he wants and obtains it with no excess of gesture.

Next March Honegger will pass his 37th birthday. Already he has established himself as the leading figure among the newer composers of France. This is not a day of musical masterpieces, but he has made at least one in his "King David," produced here last spring by the Symphony Orchestra and the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe. And to judge by a single hearing, he has made another in the tone-poem "Rugby" (he styles it an orchestral movement), played yesterday for the first time in Boston.

"Rugby" Good Music

Those who expected in this latest Honegger score a repetition of the somewhat crass realism of the locomotive piece, "Pacific 2-3-1" were doomed to disappointment. Save in the general suggestion of conflict and motion there is little in "Rugby" of either the externals or internals of a football match. There is, in fact, a recurring lyric theme of a marked, if fleeting, beauty that is difficult to place in such surroundings. Perhaps it has reference to the fair devotees of the sport. But regarded solely as a composition, "Rugby" seems to have in it the elements that make for life. Beyond doubt it will become a part of the standard orchestral repertory. "Pacific 2-3-1" which, by the way, concluded the concert of yesterday, seems to have come to stay; and "Rugby" is far the finer piece of the two.

To begin the concert Monsieur Honegger offered an early composition on an American Indian subject, "The Song of Nigamon," that is little more than a worthy student-exercise. The Prayer from the opera "Judith," sung by Cobina Wright, strengthened the impression made by the opera itself, that the solo passages are relatively ineffective. Three songs with orchestra from "La Petite Sirene" proved of slight interest—though they might have been more convincingly sung—and another early work, "A Summer Pastoral," played here once by Mr. Fiedler's Sinfonietta, has no more than a passing charm.

"Horace Victorieux"

With the ensuing number, the mimed symphony "Horace Victorieux," introduced here by Mr. Monteux in 1922 to a generally perplexed and even resentful audience, the real, the characteristic Honegger emerged. This music that vividly describes the victory of the Roman Horatius over the three Alban Curiatii and his subsequent murder of his own sister, because she lamented the death of one of the vanquished, has a power that is inescapable. Six years of modernist music have tempered somewhat the sting of its dissonances. But it is not for those who delight only in agreeable sounds. Yet yesterday's audience received the piece with undisguised enthusiasm. Verily we are making progress.

Between "Rugby" and "Pacific 2-3-1" came yesterday the Concertino for piano and orchestra, the solo part played by the composer's wife, Mme. Andree Vaurabourg Honegger. This Concertino, which was performed here last season by Pauline Danforth at a chamber concert of modern music, is a piece that should disconcert no one. The final movement, a sort of polite and modified jazz, pleased particularly yesterday, and there was much applause for Mme. Honegger, who played with a crystal-clear tone and delightful sense of rhythm.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE JAN 13-

E. Fernandez Arbos, the illustrious Spanish musician, will be the guest conductor at the next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan 18 and 19. Senor Arbos is known to Boston as concert master of this orchestra for the single season of 1903-04, when he succeeeded Franz Kneizel. Indeed, Arbos as a young man was a famous violin virtuoso.

Born in Madrid, he studied the violin there as a boy, and perfected his technique under Vieuxtemps of Brussels, and Joachim of Berlin. Touring Europe in the 90s, he became a foremost virtuoso of that period. It was in 1904 that he devoted his career more particularly to conducting. He has long been at the head of the Symphony Orchestra of Madrid, likewise conducting in London for many seasons, and conducting concerts more recently in Paris, Rome, and Petrograd.

Last season he visited America and conducted concerts in New York, when he brought out some Spanish music with much success.

Spanish scores, including his own transcriptions of Albeniz will constitute the larger part of his program here.

Programs to Hand TRANS

From Mr. Fernandez-Arbos of Madrid for his concerts, as guest-conductor, with the Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Jan. 18, and Saturday evening, Jan. 19—for the most part music of Spanish composers:

Prelude to the Opera, "Die Meistersinger," ..... Wagner
Sinfonietta in D major ..... Halffter
Alborada del Grazioso ..... Ravel
(Orchestral Version)
Suite, "Iberia," ..... Albeniz
(Scored for Orchestra by Arbos)
The Procession of Rocio ..... Turina
Three Dances from the Ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat" ..... de Falla

Boston Post Jan 14

COMPOSER RIDES IN CAB OF ENGINE

Arthur Honegger, French composer, who incorporated the wheezes and whistles of a railroad engine into a musical composition entitled "Pacific 2-3-1," yesterday enjoyed a ride in an engine cab from the South Station to Providence.

The young composer, who since boyhood has made locomotives his hobby, is visiting this country for what he declares is to be the last time. He stepped out of the cab at Providence [illegible] over the experience and then boarded the 5 o'clock express for New York City, where he is to appear as guest conductor.

Rattle 2400 Years Old

A child's rattle shaped like a [illegible] hog was unearthed in the ruins of Kish and is said to date back to about 500 B. C.

THE BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, JANUARY 14, 1929

COMPOSER HELPS DRIVE BIG LOCOMOTIVE

Arthur Honegger took his first ride in an engine cab yesterday on the run from Boston to Providence. The group, just before the start, includes (left to right), Ralph Bradley, Engineer F. J. Waldon, Mme. Honegger, the composer, and Boaz Piller, member of Boston Symphony orchestra.

JANUARY 17, 1929

Players --- The So

Again The New Generation

Ernesto Halffter (Alban)

Entering the Symphony Concerts from The Music of Spain

Out of Spain The Conductor And The Music

To the Symphony Concerts Senor Arbos Returns As Chief Guest

THE elderly and gentle lady who rather pathetically asked the management of Symphony Hall last Saturday whether it would not be possible soon to have some music of "pleasant sounds," will get her wish earlier than she expected. For a pleasant gentleman with kindly eyes and a fatherly beard has come out of that land of romance—as the old books have it—which is called Spain, to bring to her and to many another this week a program which begins with the solid old Prelude to Wagner's opera "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and ends with the dances from de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," with nothing more biting between than Ravel's or Albeniz's or Turina's working of Spanish dances, along with a Sinfonietta that some writers describe as similar to Bach or Handel in their lighter styles, but which others say is like nothing so much as Papa Haydn. The gentleman to provide the program is Senor Enrique Fernandez-Arbos, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of Madrid. The program other than the two numbers mentioned includes Halffter's Sinfonietta in D major; Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso"; three out of Albeniz's set of twelve piano-pieces under the common title "Iberia"; Turina's so-called Tableau Symphonique, "La Procession del Rocio."

Mr. Arbos is not unknown to an elder generation of Bostonians. It will remember him as an excellent violinist who was concert-master of the orchestra in 1903-1904, the year after the resignation of Franz Kneisel. It may remember also, if its memory is good, that Mr. Arbos was then forty years of age; that he had enjoyed excellent training and plainly profited by it. The violin was his chosen instrument; upon it he studied with Monasterio at Madrid, Vieuxtemps in Brussels, Joachim in Berlin. In Brussels the excellent Gevaert also guided him in composition. Not for a few months merely did he frequent these teachers; for a full three or four years he was with them. Since even ten years of study do not bring a man to the age of forty, be it said that previous to his one year in Boston (he believes it the coldest he ever spent in his whole life. What will he say of his present visit?) he had been professor of violin-playing at the Hamburg conservatory (where he went immediately after his study with Joachim); for a short time concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; finally professor of violin-playing at the conservatory of the city of his birth, Madrid. He had further spent considerable time travelling as virtuoso of the violin, and even better, had interested himself in quartet-playing.

From Boston Mr. Arbos went to London, where the Gulf Stream produces not only fog but also a degree of warmth, again to teach violin-playing, at the Royal College of Music. After a time he began spending his summers in Madrid, and conducting there. In 1916 he settled in that capital as conductor of the Orquesta Sinfonica. His good work spread abroad and he has done much "guest conducting" through the capitals of Europe. But like Mr. Koussevitzky in Russia, he spends much time taking his orchestra into the interior of Spain, playing before audiences that have never heard symphonic music before. Interestingly he relates that with them a Concerto of Bach will "go" at first hearing, while a Symphony of, say, Chaikovsky requires several repetitions to make proper impression.

Like the older Parisian orchestras, Mr. Arbos's orchestra in Madrid is an association of players without guarantee or endowment. At first it worked under handicaps elsewhere unknown: concerts for example were taxed more heavily than any other form of "amusement," bullfights included. Now concerts are taxed less than other entertainments. Mr. Arbos, in spite of hampering conditions, reports high loyalty and good rehearsals as the rule with his men. . . . One more incident to make real the temper of the people to whom he plays. He brings to America the story of a crowd of 15,000, so enraged at a bull-fight that with difficulty they were prevented from wrecking the arena. The same evening at six o'clock, the hour of concerts in Madrid, the same crowd was listening reverently to music from Wagner's "Parsifal. . . . Mr. Arbos renewed his acquaintance with America last year when he conducted concerts for the New York Symphony Society and visited other cities as guest-conductor. He has also composed in the smaller forms, even an opera of the Spanish zarzuela type. His instrumental arrangements and transcriptions show a keen and sensitive understanding of the orchestra. As a conductor he is clear, forceful, highly rhythmical, lucid in the exposition of music, at the same time strongly dynamic.

Ernesto Halffter, whose Sinfonietta in D major stands after Wagner's Prelude upon the impending program, is a young Spaniard of high musical ability, born at Madrid in 1905. He is a pupil of de Falla, and at Seville now conducts a chamber-orchestra founded by his teacher, the Orquesta Bética de Cámera. The present Sinfonietta is designed for an orchestra of that type. The program book at the première in Madrid declared that in character and form it approximated a Sinfonia Concertante of Haydn rather than a Concerto Grosso of Bach or Handel.

The Sinfonietta was written at Madrid between 1923 and 1927 and is dedicated to "mon cher maitre, Manuel de Falla, en hommage." It is scored for one each of the four usual woodwinds—flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon; two horns, one trumpet, one trombone; tympani and two snare-drums, one smaller than the other; solo violin, 'cello, contrabass; and the usual string quintet. The four movements are designated Pastorella; Adagio; Allegretto vivace (Minuetto); Allegro giocoso. In the first division both themes bear out the pastoral label. The first is well accented, is heard principally in woodwinds and horns; while the second is less rhythmical and is carried often by solo instruments, as the flute or the first violin. There is a closing theme that is entirely rhythmical, made of the alternation of two chords (tonic and dominant), played by the strings with the back of the bow, together with woodwinds, while the solo violin sounds in high harmonics. The score contains many unusual orchestral effects—much use of harmonics; glissandi in the double-basses, considerable solo measures for double bass. The whole is sensitively, deftly, "openly" scored. There is no sign of the hand of the beginner. The "working-out section" introduces some new material. Halffter avoids a formal recapitulation, and in conclusion develops portions of the second theme, with much emphasis on the closing theme.

The Adagio is expressive, distributed mainly among solo instruments—violin, 'cello, flute, horn. The chief contrast involves music with much delicate flute-embroidery. The Minuetto is entirely in the old tradition. The theme is full-bodied and aristocratic. Midway is a melodic trio. The form, with its cadences, and double bars and repetitions, follows the classical minuet. The finale is rhapsodic in character and form, now brilliant and exultant, now expressive and delicate, now "burlesqued." Probably the composer reaches the height of his originality (and he is an original young artist) in this movement. Altogether the Sinfonietta is clear proof that originality is possible with the use of not much more than the old devices of classicism and romanticism. Hitherto Halffter has been known to Bostonians only by a Debussyan String Quartet once played by "The Flonzaleys."

Ever since Ravel scored his "Alborada del Grazioso" the Symphony Concerts have been awaiting the orchestral version. Mr. Monteux included it in more than one prospectus. Mr. Koussevitzky has considered it. Mr. Arbos actually brings it. The piece belongs to the set of piano-pieces called "Miroirs" (1905). The orchestration was copyrighted in 1923. The term "alborada" is Spanish for the French "aubade," which in turn is the equivalent of morning serenade. Monsieur Jean-Aubry is responsible for the statement that a Grazioso is "a kind of buffoon, full of finesse—a sort of Figaro." He continues: "For such an incessantly alert being, it would seem as if night were never present; for him it is always the hour of the aubade—the hour of smiles and of delicacy. He is skilled in pleasant mockery and is loath to vociferate. He enjoys the sweetness of living and lingers over no reflections." The music begins with a dance in which 3-4 alternates with 6-8 meter. The middle section opens with a bassoon solo over string accompaniment. The student of orchestral methods will observe that here the strings are divided—first violins into six parts, seconds into six, violas into five, 'cellos into four, double basses into three. The last division adds new brilliances and new dance rhythms.

Mr. Arbos has orchestrated many of Albeniz's pieces out of the set called collectively "Iberia," and described as "twelve scenes from different corners of Spain inspired by the rhythms, harmonies and turns of phrase from Spanish popular music, particularly the songs and dances of Andalusia.' Much description is unnecessary as these pieces are heard frequently in piano recitals. For the present program Mr. Arbos has chosen "Evocation" (Allegretto expressivo), "Corpus Christi at Seville." Triana.' In connection with the second the listener must remember the custom of the cathedral at Seville in preceding high festivals with dancing in the patio and even at the altar—a custom said in one legend to have received the sanction if not the special blessing, of the Pope. The piece begins, then, with dance figures; adds brilliance to brilliance; with these at white heat proceeds to choral measures, ending in quiet, religious mood. Mr. Arbos's orchestrations are masterful, brilliant, pointing both the exotic coloring implied in these pieces and the irresistible punch of the rhythms.

Joaquin Turina is another Spanish composer and scholar, born at Seville in 1882. He is no less know as writer on musical subjects than as composer. Although he is as "Spanish' as either Albeniz or de Falla, his outlook is said to be entirely different. "La Procession del Rocio," his chief symphonic work, has been called "a brilliant orchestral study which never fails to make its effect." It is dedicated to Mr. Arbos. On the first page of the score is this program:

> Every year in the month of June the Procession of Roses, in which the best families of the city take part in their carriages, makes its entry into Triana in honor of the Holy Virgin, whose banner is carried to the strains of music in the midst of a brilliant cavalcade, on a chair of silver drawn by a team of oxen. Triana is in festival array. "Soleares" (the French of this program note does not attempt to translate) are succeeded by seguidillas, a drunkard surprises a "garrotin," but the songs and dances are interrupted by the arrival of the procession, announced by flute and drum. The religious theme, several times played, bursts out triumphantly, mixed with strains of the royal march. Bells ringing a full peal add to the sum of the various sounds. The festal songs and dances are again taken up and continue vaguely until the end of the piece.

It is hardly necessary to add further analysis to so complete a description. Suffice it to say that the score is divided into two sections, "Triana en fete" and "La Procession," the latter, of course, introduced by flute solo. . . . Of the three dances from de Falla's ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat" it is probably no more necessary to speak than of Wagner's prelude: Mr. Monteux, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Cassella have all played them.

A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky will return to his post at the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening, with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Franck's Symphony upon his program. He will divide the ensuing pair of regular Symphony Concerts, on Jan. 25 and 26, between Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, in which he has never been heard in Boston, and Mr. Bloch's Rhapsody, "America," first played a month ago.. In the concluding "Anthem," a chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe will again assist.

Herald Jan. 19

MUSIC

SPANISH MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

Enrique Fernandez-Arbos, a guest, conducted the 13th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, where 25 years ago he sat on the platform as the concertmaster of that orchestra. His program was as follows: Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Halffter, Sinfonietta D major; Ravel, Alborada del Grazioso; Alberiz-Arbos, "La Fete-Dieu a Seville," "Triana"; Turina, "La Procession del Rocio"; De Falla, three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat." The sinfonietta by Halffter and the piano pieces by Alberiz as orchestrated by Mr. Arbos were played for the first time in Boston; the music by Ravel and Turina for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Koussevitsky handed over to Mr. Arbos the superb orchestra which during the years of his engagement he has shaped and fashioned until, according to the testimony of visiting conductors acquainted with bands in Europe and this country, it is now without an equal. Mr. Arbos played upon this instrument as a musician and a virtuoso; a conductor, respecting the composers; ever mindful of them; without disturbing and unwelcome personal display, yet shining by the service he rendered them. To speak in detail of his qualities as a conductor would be superfluous, if not impertinent, for his reputation has long been established in Europe; his ability was fully recognized last season in New York, where the conducted several concerts.

Take for example his interpretation yesterday of Wagner's Prelude. He remembered first of all that "The Mastersingers" is a comedy; that the Prelude is joyous. We have heard performances even in German opera houses, when one would have thought from the manner in which this musice was read that the opera was one

"Presenting Thebes, or, Pelops' line,
Or the tale of Troy divine."

Joyous, but with due consideration of the sections representing the square-toed, pedantic mastersingers; not forgetful of the lyric passages for Walther and Eva; a performance characterized by clarity even when there was extreme contrapuntal complexity; a buoyant spirit maintained throughout; a continuous flow of melody in which various episodes were not separate streams but tributaries to the mighty rush of the musical river, indispensable to the continuity. While there was an ever present regard for details, they too contributed to the general effect and did not appear as if they were all-important.

The spirit, the beauty, and the strength of the performance were at once appreciated by the audience. The conductor and the orchestra were enthusiastically applauded; the former wes thrice called to the platform. And enthusiasm reigned throughout the concert.

Of the Spanish music, familiar and unfamiliar, Halffter's Sinfonietta and the "Triana" of Albeniz, brilliantly orchestrated by Mr. Arbos, made the deepest impression. Ravel's orchestration of his piano piece is ingenious but "Alborada" cannot be ranked among his better works either in the original or in the magnified and enriched form. There are measures that promise something entrancing to come, but there is no arrival. Turina's "Procession" is not so interesting as the description of the festival, printed by way of explanation in the score. The subject of the "Procession" and that of "Le Fete-Dieu" are about the same; the former is a too literal translation into tones panoramic music; music for a film; the latter is gorgeous impressionism, if that word may be allowed.

Halffter is a young man but he has not been swept off his feet by contemporary influences, neither by Stravinsky nor by the preachers of atonality and polytonality. He is not so devoted to folk song that this Sinfonietta cannot make a universal appeal; yet it is evident that he is Spanish in musical feeling and expression. He has a pronounced sense of rhythm; he is not afraid to let drums have an important role (he uses two side drums); there are many hints at dance forms; nor does he require a huge orchestra to say what he has to say. The Pastorale is charmingly simple and melodious. The Adagio is too long. It contains fine passages, the prevailing mood holds the attention for the greater part; the technical treatment inspires respect; but Halffter could not stop after he had, for the audience at least, exhausted his subject. The Finale has more character than the Minuet. With the reservation made, the Sinfonietta is not an ordinary, not a conventional work. The composer has musical ideas, skill in expressing them and making the most of them. He does not shun melody or the semblance of melody, nor does he go far afield in the wish to avoid what some consider "too obvious."

If music can be said to dazzle by its brilliance, "Triana" is an amazing example. The piano piece calls loudly for orchestral color, dash, swing, rhythmic frenzy;; it might be called an admirable study for a master's instrumentation. The piano piece, when the pianist has the requisite technic and fiery imagination, it itself exciting; as Mr. Arbos has scored it, the music is intoxicating.

A concert that gave great pleasure. A proof of this is that only one or two before the final number left the hall, panting for tea, eager for social chatter.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Bloch's epic rhapsody "America."

Players --- The Sc

Again The New Generation

Ernesto Halffter (Alban)

Entering the Symphony Concerts from The Music of Spain

Out of Spain The Conductor And The Music

To the Symphony Concerts Senor Arbos Returns As Chief Guest

THE elderly and gentle lady who rather pathetically asked the management of Symphony Hall last Saturday whether it would not be possible soon to have some music of "pleasant sounds," will get her wish earlier than she expected. For a pleasant gentleman with kindly eyes and a fatherly beard has come out of that land of romance—as the old books have it—which is called Spain, to bring to her and to many another this week a program which begins with the solid old Prelude to Wagner's opera "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and ends with the dances from de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," with nothing more biting between than Ravel's or Albeniz's or Turina's working of Spanish dances, along with a Sinfonietta that some writers describe as similar to Bach or Handel in their lighter styles, but which others say is like nothing so much as Papa Haydn. The gentleman to provide the program is Senor Enrique Fernandez-Arbos, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of Madrid. The program other than the two numbers mentioned includes Halffter's Sinfonietta in D major; Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso"; three out of Albeniz's set of twelve piano-pieces under the common title "Iberia"; Turina's so-called Tableau Symphonique, "La Procession del Rocio."

Mr. Arbos is not unknown to an elder generation of Bostonians. It will remember him as an excellent violinist who was concert-master of the orchestra in 1903-1904, the year after the resignation of Franz Kneisel. It may remember also, if its memory is good, that Mr. Arbos was then forty years of age; that he had enjoyed excellent training and plainly profited by it. The violin was his chosen instrument; upon it he studied with Monasterio at Madrid, Vieuxtemps in Brussels, Joachim in Berlin. In Brussels the excellent Gevaert also guided him in composition. Not for a few months merely did he frequent these teachers; for a full three or four years he was with them. Since even ten years of study do not bring a man to the age of forty, be it said that previous to his one year in Boston (he believes it the coldest he ever spent in his whole life. What will he say of his present visit?) he had been professor of violin-playing at the Hamburg conservatory (where he went immediately after his study with Joachim); for a short time concert-master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; finally professor of violin-playing at the conservatory of the city of his birth, Madrid. He had further spent considerable time travelling as virtuoso of the violin, and even better, had interested himself in quartet-playing.

From Boston Mr. Arbos went to London, where the Gulf Stream produces not only fog but also a degree of warmth, again to teach violin-playing, at the Royal College of Music. After a time he began spending his summers in Madrid, and conducting there. In 1916 he settled in that capital as conductor of the Orquesta Sinfonica. His good work spread abroad and he has done much "guest conducting" through the capitals of Europe. But like Mr. Koussevitzky in Russia, he spends much time taking his orchestra into the interior of Spain, playing before audiences that have never heard symphonic music before. Interestingly he relates that with them a Concerto of Bach will "go" at first hearing, while a Symphony of, say, Chaikovsky requires several repetitions to make proper impression.

Like the older Parisian orchestras, Mr. Arbos's orchestra in Madrid is an association of players without guarantee or endowment. At first it worked under handicaps elsewhere unknown: concerts for example were taxed more heavily than any other form of "amusement," bullfights included. Now concerts are taxed less than other entertainments Mr. Arbos, in spite of hampering conditions, reports high loyalty and good rehearsals as the rule with his men. . . . One more incident to make real the temper of the people to whom he plays. He brings to America the story of a crowd of 15,000, so enraged at a bull-fight that with difficulty they were prevented from wrecking the arena. The same evening at six o'clock, the hour of concerts in Madrid, the same crowd was listening reverently to music from Wagner's "Parsifal. . . . Mr. Arbos renewed his acquaintance with America last year when he conducted concerts for the New York Symphony Society and visited other cities as guest-conductor. He has also composed in the smaller forms, even an opera of the Spanish zarzuela type. His instrumental arrangements and transcriptions show a keen and sensitive understanding of the orchestra. As a conductor he is clear, forceful, highly rhythmical, lucid in the exposition of music, at the same time strongly dynamic.

Ernesto Halffter, whose Sinfonietta in D major stands after Wagner's Prelude upon the impending program, is a young Spaniard of high musical ability, born at Madrid in 1905. He is a pupil of de Falla, and at Seville now conducts a chamber-orchestra founded by his teacher, the Orquesta Bética de Cámera. The present Sinfonietta is designed for an orchestra of that type. The program book at the première in Madrid declared that in character and form it approximated a Sinfonia Concertante of Haydn rather than a Concerto Grosso of Bach or Handel.

The Sinfonietta was written at Madrid between 1923 and 1927 and is dedicated to "mon cher maitre, Manuel de Falla, en hommage." It is scored for one each of the four usual woodwinds—flute, oboe, clarinet and bassoon; two horns, one trumpet, one trombone; tympani and two snare-drums, one smaller than the other; solo violin, 'cello, contrabass; and the usual string quintet. The four movements are designated Pastorella; Adagio; Allegretto vivace (Minuetto); Allegro giocoso. In the first division both themes bear out the pastoral label. The first is well accented, is heard principally in woodwinds and horns; while the second is less rhythmical and is carried often by solo instruments, as the flute or the first violin. There is a closing theme that is entirely rhythmical, made of the alternation of two chords (tonic and dominant), played by the strings with the back of the bow, together with woodwinds, while the solo violin sounds in high harmonics. The score contains many unusual orchestral effects—much use of harmonics; glissandi in the double-basses, considerable solo measures for double bass. The whole is sensitively, deftly, "openly" scored. There is no sign of the hand of the beginner. The "working-out section" introduces some new material. Halffter avoids a formal recapitulation, and in conclusion develops portions of the second theme, with much emphasis on the closing theme.

The Adagio is expressive, distributed mainly among solo instruments—violin, 'cello, flute, horn. The chief contrast involves music with much delicate flute-embroidery. The Minuetto is entirely in the old tradition. The theme is full-bodied and aristocratic. Midway is a melodic trio. The form, with its cadences, and double bars and repetitions, follows the classical minuet. The finale is rhapsodic in character and form, now brilliant and exultant, now expressive and delicate, now "burlesqued." Probably the composer reaches the height of his originality (and he is an original young artist) in this movement. Altogether the Sinfonietta is clear proof that originality is possible with the use of not much more than the old devices of classicism and romanticism. Hitherto Halffter has been known to Bostonians only by a Debussyan String Quartet once played by "The Flonzaleys."

Ever since Ravel scored his "Alborada del Grazioso" the Symphony Concerts have been awaiting the orchestral version. Mr. Monteux included it in more than one prospectus. Mr. Koussevitzky has considered it. Mr. Arbos actually brings it. The piece belongs to the set of piano-pieces called "Miroirs" (1905). The orchestration was copyrighted in 1923. The term "alborada" is Spanish for the French "aubade," which in turn is the equivalent of morning serenade. Monsieur Jean-Aubry is responsible for the statement that a Grazioso is "a kind of buffoon, full of finesse—a sort of Figaro." He continues: "For such an incessantly alert being, it would seem as if night were never present; for him it is always the hour of the aubade—the hour of smiles and of delicacy. He is skilled in pleasant mockery and is loath to vociferate. He enjoys the sweetness of living and lingers over no reflections." The music begins with a dance in which 3-4 alternates with 6-8 meter. The middle section opens with a bassoon solo over string accompaniment. The student of orchestral methods will observe that here the strings are divided—first violins into six parts, seconds into six, violas into five, 'cellos into four, double basses into three. The last division adds new brilliances and new dance rhythms.

Mr. Arbos has orchestrated many of Albeniz's pieces out of the set called collectively "Iberia," and described as "twelve scenes from different corners of Spain inspired by the rhythms, harmonies and turns of phrase from Spanish popular music, particularly the songs and dances of Andalusia.' Much description is unnecessary as these pieces are heard frequently in piano recitals. For the present program Mr. Arbos has chosen "Evocation" (Allegretto expressivo), "Corpus Christi at Seville." Triana.' In connection with the second the listener must remember the custom of the cathedral at Seville in preceding high festivals with dancing in the patio and even at the altar—a custom said in one legend to have received the sanction if not the special blessing, of the Pope. The piece begins, then, with dance figures; adds brilliance to brilliance; with these at white heat proceeds to choral measures, ending in quiet, religious mood. Mr. Arbos's orchestrations are masterful, brilliant, pointing both the exotic coloring implied in these pieces and the irresistible punch of the rhythms.

Joaquin Turina is another Spanish composer and scholar, born at Seville in 1882. He is no less know as writer on musical subjects than as composer. Although he is as "Spanish' as either Albeniz or de Falla, his outlook is said to be entirely different. "La Procession del Rocio," his chief symphonic work, has been called "a brilliant orchestral study which never fails to make its effect." It is dedicated to Mr. Arbos. On the first page of the score is this program:

> Every year in the month of June the Procession of Roses, in which the best families of the city take part in their carriages, makes its entry into Triana in honor of the Holy Virgin, whose banner is carried to the strains of music in the midst of a brilliant cavalcade, on a chair of silver drawn by a team of oxen. Triana is in festival array. "Soleares" (the French of this program note does not attempt to translate) are succeeded by seguidillas, a drunkard surprises a "garrotin," but the songs and dances are interrupted by the arrival of the procession, announced by flute and drum. The religious theme, several times played, bursts out triumphantly, mixed with strains of the royal march. Bells ringing a full peal add to the sum of the various sounds. The festal songs and dances are again taken up and continue vaguely until the end of the piece.

It is hardly necessary to add further analysis to so complete a description. Suffice it to say that the score is divided into two sections, "Triana en fete" and "La Procession," the latter, of course, introduced by flute solo. . . . Of the three dances from de Falla's ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat" it is probably no more necessary to speak than of Wagner's prelude: Mr. Monteux, Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Cassella have all played them.

A. H. M.

Concert-Chronicle

Incidents and Prospects

Mr. Koussevitzky will return to his post at the supplementary concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Monday evening, with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Franck's Symphony upon his program. He will divide the ensuing pair of regular Symphony Concerts, on Jan. 25 and 26, between Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, in which he has never been heard in Boston, and Mr. Bloch's Rhapsody, "America," first played a month ago.. In the concluding "Anthem," a chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe will again assist.

MUSIC

SPANISH MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

Enrique Fernandez-Arbos, a guest, conducted the 13th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, where 25 years ago he sat on the platform as the concertmaster of that orchestra. His program was as follows: Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Halffter, Sinfonietta D major; Ravel, Alborada del Grazioso; Alberiz-Arbos, "La Fete-Dieu a Seville," "Triana"; Turina, "La Procession del Rocio"; De Falla, three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat." The sinfonietta by Halffter and the piano pieces by Alberiz as orchestrated by Mr. Arbos were played for the first time in Boston; the music by Ravel and Turina for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Koussevitsky handed over to Mr. Arbos the superb orchestra which during the years of his engagement he has shaped and fashioned until, according to the testimony of visiting conductors acquainted with bands in Europe and this country, it is now without an equal. Mr. Arbos played upon this instrument as a musician and a virtuoso; a conductor, respecting the composers; ever mindful of them; without disturbing and unwelcome personal display, yet shining by the service he rendered them. To speak in detail of his qualities as a conductor would be superfluous, if not impertinent, for his reputation has long been established in Europe; his ability was fully recognized last season in New York, where the conducted several concerts.

Take for example his interpretation yesterday of Wagner's Prelude. He remembered first of all that "The Mastersingers" is a comedy; that the Prelude is joyous. We have heard performances even in German opera houses, when one would have thought from the manner in which this musice was read that the opera was one

"Presenting Thebes, or, Pelops' line,
Or the tale of Troy divine."

Joyous, but with due consideration of the sections representing the square-toed, pedantic mastersingers; not forgetful of the lyric passages for Walther and Eva; a performance characterized by clarity even when there was extreme contrapuntal complexity; a buoyant spirit maintained throughout; a continuous flow of melody in which various episodes were not separate streams but tributaries to the mighty rush of the musical river, indispensable to the continuity. While there was an ever present regard for details, they too contributed to the general effect and did not appear as if they were all-important.

The spirit, the beauty, and the strength of the performance were at once appreciated by the audience. The conductor and the orchestra were enthusiastically applauded; the former wes thrice called to the platform. And enthusiasm reigned throughout the concert.

Of the Spanish music, familiar and unfamiliar, Halffter's Sinfonietta and the "Triana" of Albeniz, brilliantly orchestrated by Mr. Arbos, made the deepest impression. Ravel's orchestration of his piano piece is ingenious but "Alborada" cannot be ranked among his better works either in the original or in the magnificd and enriched form. There are measures that promise something entrancing to come, but there is no arrival. Turina's "Procession" is not so interesting as the description of the festival; printed by way of explanation in the score. The subject of the "Procession" and that of "Le Fete-Dieu" are about the same; the former is a too literal translation into tones; panoramic music; music for a film; the latter is gorgeous impressionism, if that word may be allowed.

Halffter is a young man but he has not been swept off his feet by contemporary influences, neither by Stravinsky nor by the preachers of atonality and polytonality. He is not so devoted to folk song that this Sinfonietta cannot make a universal appeal; yet it is evident that he is Spanish in musical feeling and expression. He has a pronounced sense of rhythm; he is not afraid to let drums have an important role (he uses two side drums); there are many hints at dance forms; nor does he require a huge orchestra to say what he has to say. The Pastorale is charmingly simple and melodious. The Adagio is too long. It contains fine passages, the prevailing mood holds the attention for the greater part; the technical treatment inspires respect; but Halffter could not stop after he had, for the audience at least, exhausted his subject. The Finale has more character than the Minuet. With the reservation made, the Sinfonietta is not an ordinary, not a conventional work. The composer has musical ideas, skill in expressing them and making the most of them. He does not shun melody or the semblance of melody, nor does he go far afield in the wish to avoid what some consider "too obvious."

If music can be said to dazzle by its brilliance, "Triana" is an amazing example. The piano piece calls loudly for orchestral color, dash, swing, rhythmic frenzy; it might be called an admirable study for a master's instrumentation. The piano piece, when the pianist has the requisite technic and fiery imagination, it itself exciting; as Mr. Arbos has scored it, the music is intoxicating.

A concert that gave great pleasure. A proof of this is that only one or two before the final number left the hall, panting for tea, eager for social chatter.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Bloch's epic rhapsody "America."

66

ARBOS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Spanish Musician Wins Heartfelt Applause

Pieces by Halffter, Ravel, Albeniz, Wagner and De Falla Heard

Globe Ja 19

Enrique Fernandez Arbos, conductor of the Orquesta Sinfonica at Madrid, Spain, was guest conductor at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. Mr Arbos is not a stranger to Boston, though he had not before conducted here. In the season 1903-4, he served as concert master of the Boston Symphony, then conducted by Gericke, and was heard in chamber concerts. To many in yesterday's audience he was an old acquaintance, to be cordially welcomed. The heartfelt and prolonged applause after each number on the program was a tribute to his remarkable skill as conductor, not the usual polite and meaningless hand-clapping.

Mr Arbos chose a program which proved that his native country has produced significant orchestral music. Except for Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude and Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso," every number was by a Spaniard. Halffter, Albeniz, Turina and De Falla were the composers represented.

The performance of Wagner's familiar prelude with which the concert began was the finest heard here in recent seasons. For a parallel one must go back to the days of Dr Muck. Mr Arbos' magnificent sense of rhythm and his rare ability to make the structure of music obvious to the listener while thrilling him with its emotional power are just what this music needs. Mr Arbos, a thorough musician, is a conductor able to get from an orchestra the kind of performance he wants and the music requires. His reading of this number alone proved that he deserves to be numbered with the foremost conductors.

In the modern pieces that filled the rest of the program, the same ability to attain brilliant and stirring performances with no sacrifice of clarity or precision of detail compelled the listener's wholehearted admiration for Mr Arbos' conducting. Seldom does the Friday audience applaud through an afternoon with the warmth it showed yesterday.

Ernesto Halffter, previously known here only by a piece played two years ago by the Flonzaley Quartet, has in the Sinfonietta in D major heard yesterday written one of the most spirited and ingratiating of modern pieces of light music, unless Mr Arbos' genius beguiled the listener. Each of its four movements is thoroughly enjoyable. The style is not violently modern.

Ie recalled Kodaly's "Hari Janos," rather than Honegger or Stravinsky, though Halffter, like the rest of the younger generation, has been influenced by 18th-century music. If Haydn had been born in 1905, as Halffter was, he would probably have written music like this—music which ought to take a permanent place in the orchestral repertory.

Halffter, born in the 20th century, shows none of the desire to use Spanish "local color" which betrays the 19th century romantic influence on Turina, de Falla, Albeniz and Ravel. His music has at least the cosmopolitanism of the 18th century, if not the universality of the masterpieces that are beyond age and time.

Granada and Seville have a picturesque appeal that has caught the fancy of many musicians, most of them foreigners like Bizet and Ravel, and Rimsky Korsakoff. The 19th century rule for writing Spanish music was to borrow the intriguing rhythms of Spanish popular dances and explain in a program note the scenery and incidents supposedly depicted in tones.

When done by a foreigner like Ravel this sort of thing is utterly artificial. Even when the local color is genuine, as is the work of Turina, Albeniz and de Falla, who employ Spanish rhythms and Spanish turns of melody with at least the illusion of spontaneity, this national music seems mannered and not devoid of affectation.

Mr Arbos' orchestration of piano pieces by Albeniz stood the test of comparison with Ravel's marvelous orchestration of his own "Alborada," written for piano. Rhythm, color, vivacity animated yesterday's concert. Mr Arbos should be heard here again as conductor. One would like to hear what he could do to other classics after delighting in his conducting of the "Meistersinger" prelude.

P. R.

Mr. Arbós Conducts Boston Orchestra

Enrique Fernandez Arbós of Madrid, who 25 years ago was concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday occupied the dais at Symphony Hall. He is acting as guest conductor for the second week of the Koussevitzkyan hibernation. He was welcomed with unusual warmth by audience and orchestra, and the concert was punctuated by mutual felicitations of conductor, players and listeners.

If Mr. Arbós had been quite unknown, he would have established himself at once as an authoritative orchestral director by his rousing performance of the "Meistersinger" Prelude. Austere Wagnerites may find his reading "not Wagner," but upon one who had enjoyed of late a little too much of the neo-Bayreuthian devotional atmosphere, this bustle had the effect of a sea turn.

Every guest conductor must bring a novelty. Mr. Arbós had selected the D major Sinfonietta of Ernesto Halffter Escriche. So far as we recall, this is the first composition of Halffter's to be heard in Boston except the "Quartettino per archi," which the Flonzaley Quartet introduced two years ago. The Sinfonietta confirmed the excellent impression of the composer formed on that occasion. There has been some disputation whether the manner is more like that of Bach, of Handel or of Haydn. There are evidences of all these influences, and of that of Mozart as well. But what we like about the piece is its individuality and restraint.

Perhaps we have heard too much Honegger of late as well as too much Wagner. At all events, we are relieved to encounter again this young Spaniard, who can write a score that depends for its effect neither on extra-musical sounds nor on feeble echoes of the masters. Halffter does not find it necessary to issue a manifesto with his work, explaining that it implies a new theory of æsthetics, or, on the other hand, a "return" to this, that or the other classic school. Simply he sets down his own musical thoughts (and pleasing thoughts they are), using the forms that have been bequeathed to him by his predecessors, and employing modern harmonic and rhythmic resources with discretion.

If he does not require a swollen orchestra, reinforced with strange percussion devices, neither does he strive for effect by approximating the negation of sound. His score strikes us as honest, expert, transparent, witty and fanciful. We shall not be so reckless as to declare that the mantle of Bach is about to fall upon the shoulders of Halffter, but we are certain that the works of Halffter we have heard are in the direct classical line, and we have a notion that they are more significant than many opi of better advertised composers.

Ravel's "Alborado del Grazioso," vividly performed, closed the first half of the program. Thereafter we were made to feel that it is possible to hear too much Spanish music at a sitting. This feeling was roused by the sequence of Albeniz's "Fête-Dieu à Séville" and "Triana," orchestrated by Mr. Arbós; Turina's "La Procession del Rocio," and three dances from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat." The audience nevertheless received gladly this rather theatrical fare, and remained to pay further tribute to the conductor.

L. A. S.

MONITOR
JAN. 19 - '29

Post Jay. 19

SYMPHONY RESPONDS TO ARBOS

Spanish Programme Seems to Please Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Returning as guest conductor to an orchestra which 25 years ago he served for a season as concert-master, Enrique Fernandez-Arbos of Madrid directed the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. It is in the interpretation of the music of his own countrymen that Mr. Arbos by common consent excels as conductor and, save for Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude and Ravel's would-be Spanish "Alborada del Grazioso," the programme ran wholly to pieces by Spanish composers.

HAS CHANGED BUT LITTLE

To speak first of the man, Mr. Arbos has changed outwardly but little since last he appeared in Symphony Hall. His hair retains its raven blackness though his beard has grayed, and a slight stoop makes him seem a shade less tall. In conducting he is energetic, clear-cut, generally economical of motion and a trifle angular. By report the orchestra warms to him as a man. Clearly it responded to him as musician and as conductor.

In return he expressed his pleasure in the band by graciously bidding the players to rise at the end of nearly every number on the programme. The audience participated in and heightened this general good-will; from first to last the applause yesterday was more than commonly plentiful and hearty.

His Spanish Pieces

In detail Mr. Arbos' Spanish pieces were a Sinfonietta by the 24-year-old Ernesto Halffter, composed when that precociously gifted pupil of De Falla was but 19; two numbers from Albeniz's piano suite "Iberia" in Mr. Arbos' orchestration; Turina's "La Procession del Rocio"; and three dances from De Falla's ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Of these pieces Halffter's Sinfonietta was new to Boston, as were Mr. Arbos' transcriptions, and Turina's "luminous fresco," to use a phrase bestowed upon it by Debussy, had been played here only by the orchestra of the MacDowell Club and by the People's Symphony.

Halffter's Sinfonietta in its general character suggests the suites of Handel and Bach, but it is Spanish for all that, and an extraordinary work to have come from so young a composer. There is some repetitiousness but no uncertainty of touch.

Albeniz Very Effective

More conventionally Spanish is Turina's Tableau Symphonique, brilliant and colorful. So effective were Albeniz's pieces, the Triana especially, in Mr. Arbos' version, that it would be a pleasure to hear others of the set. Ravel's "Alborado" is diverting; and so are De Falla's dances, although this music is less distinctive than the composer's "El Amor Brujo."

As programme-making per se such preponderance of music of a single type might be questioned, but there was no mistaking the audience's enjoyment of the concert. The performances of this Spanish music amply confirmed Mr. Arbos' reputation in it. Keenly he feels, vividly he imparts its rhythm and color. The "Meistersinger" Prelude, however, was too shrilled-voiced, tonally too high-pitched, over-violent in the brass. Wagner with sauce espagnole, a stimulating dish for those who relish a new point of view and are not disturbed by racial contradictions.

EVENING AMERICAN
JANUARY 19, 1929

ARBOS LEADS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Spanish music interpreted by a Spanish musician, Enrique F. Arbos, was the point of chief interest at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last week Honegger, French composer and conductor, led the concerts. This week Mr. Arbos brought to us gentle music from the land of torrid sunshine, also music of the dance—sometimes passionate, sometimes boisterous, but always gay.

After a virile interpretation of Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," a Sinfoniette by the Spaniard Halffter (first time in Boston), gave us opportunity to judge the merits of both composer and conductor. Precision of beat and respect for artistic proportion marked the excellent interpretation of the conductor, and to him we are devoid of sensationalism, clear in its intent, essentially melodic in character and above all having every indication of being sincerely expressed.

Unquestionably there is yet other new music, not "modern" that we should be permitted to hear.

The composer, only 24 years old, shows marked feeling for orchestral writing and feeling in the use of instruments, though the unity of the composition was disturbed by a last movement almost frivolous, seemingly out of place.

To the next numbers, "Alborada del Grazioso" by Ravel, and an arrangement of Albeniz's "Iberia" by the conductor, Mr. Arbos, there was brought out a beautiful panorama of colors that only the palette of a Spaniard could display. "La Procession del Rocio" by Turina and three dances by De Falla closed the program. Once again has a visiting artist made a distinct contribution to the dignity and superb musicianship of the orchestra, rare as these occasions have been.

GLOBE JAN 20

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky returns to his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony tomorrow night at the third Monday concert, for which he has set a program of repertory pieces. Yehudi Menuhin will not appear at this concert, and his appearance in the Sunday concerts is still not definitely settled.

For the regular series Mr Koussevitzky plans to repeat Bloch's "America," which he is going also to perform in New York next week. The only other number will be Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, a work hitherto neglected by Koussevitzky, who has let it go unheard since he came here, though it is one of the greatest of classic symphonies.

Bos. HERALD-
AY, JANUARY 20, 1929

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 14th regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Koussevitzky will then repeat Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," which had its first performance here several weeks ago. This prize winning composition, which has been played all over the United States, is dedicated to Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, and follows the growth of this country from the day of the Indians and early settlers, through the civil war, to the present jazz age, finally looking towards a more ideal future and culminating in a hymn to America. The hymn will be sung as before by a chorus —the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct as an opening number Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony in C major. It has not yet been heard here under his direction.

66

ARBOS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Spanish Musician Wins Heartfelt Applause

Pieces by Halffter, Ravel, Albeniz, Wagner and De Falla Heard

Globe Jan 19

Enrique Fernandez Arbos, conductor of the Orquesta Sinfonica at Madrid, Spain, was guest conductor at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert. Mr Arbos is not a stranger to Boston, though he had not before conducted here. In the season 1903-4, he served as concert master of the Boston Symphony, then conducted by Gericke, and was heard in chamber concerts. To many in yesterday's audience he was an old acquaintance, to be cordially welcomed. The heartfelt and prolonged applause after each number on the program was a tribute to his remarkable skill as conductor, not the usual polite and meaningless hand-clapping.

Mr Arbos chose a program which proved that his native country has produced significant orchestral music. Except for Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude and Ravel's "Alborada del Grazioso," every number was by a Spaniard. Halffter, Albeniz, Turina and De Falla were the composers represented.

The performance of Wagner's familiar prelude with which the concert began was the finest heard here in recent seasons. For a parallel one must go back to the days of Dr Muck. Mr Arbos' magnificent sense of rhythm and his rare ability to make the structure of music obvious to the listener while thrilling him with its emotional power are just what this music needs. Mr Arbos, a thorough musician, is a conductor able to get from an orchestra the kind of performance he wants and the music requires. His reading of this number alone proved that he deserves to be numbered with the foremost conductors.

In the modern pieces that filled the rest of the program, the same ability to attain brilliant and stirring performances with no sacrifice of clarity or precision of detail compelled the listener's wholehearted admiration for Mr Arbos' conducting. Seldom does the Friday audience applaud through an afternoon with the warmth it showed yesterday.

Ernesto Halffter, previously known here only by a piece played two years ago by the Flonzaley Quartet, has in the Sinfonietta in D major heard yesterday written one of the most spirited and ingratiating of modern pieces of light music, unless Mr Arbos' genius beguiled the listener. Each of its four movements is thoroughly enjoyable. The style is not violently modern.

Is recalled Kodaly's "Hari Janos," rather than Honegger or Stravinsky, though Halffter, like the rest of the younger generation, has been influenced by 18th-century music. If Haydn had been born in 1905, as Halffter was, he would probably have written music like this—music which ought to take a permanent place in the orchestral repertory.

Halffter, born in the 20th century, shows none of the desire to use Spanish "local color" which betrays the 19th century romantic influence on Turina, de Falla, Albeniz and Ravel. His music has at least the cosmopolitanism of the 18th century, if not the universality of the masterpieces that are beyond age and time.

Granada and Seville have a picturesque appeal that has caught the fancy of many musicians, most of them foreigners like Bizet and Ravel, and Rimsky Korsakoff. The 19th century rule for writing Spanish music was to borrow the intriguing rhythms of Spanish popular dances and explain in a program note the scenery and incidents supposedly depicted in tones.

When done by a foreigner like Ravel this sort of thing is utterly artificial. Even when the local color is genuine, as is the work of Turina, Albeniz and de Falla, who employ Spanish rhythms and Spanish turns of melody with at least the illusion of spontaneity, this national music seems mannered and not devoid of affectation.

Mr Arbos' orchestration of piano pieces by Albeniz stood the test of comparison with Ravel's marvelous orchestration of his own "Alborada," written for piano. Rhythm, color, vivacity animated yesterday's concert. Mr Arbos should be heard here again as conductor. One would like to hear what he could do to other classics after delighting in his conducting of the "Meistersinger" prelude.

P. R.

Mr. Arbós Conducts Boston Orchestra

Enrique Fernandez Arbós of Madrid, who 25 years ago was concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday occupied the dais at Symphony Hall. He is acting as guest conductor for the second week of the Koussevitzkyan hibernation. He was welcomed with unusual warmth by audience and orchestra, and the concert was punctuated by mutual felicitations of conductor, players and listeners.

If Mr. Arbós had been quite unknown, he would have established himself at once as an authoritative orchestral director by his rousing performance of the "Meistersinger" Prelude. Austere Wagnerites may find his reading "not Wagner," but upon one who had enjoyed of late a little too much of the neo-Bayreuthian devotional atmosphere, this bustle had the effect of a sea turn.

Every guest conductor must bring a novelty. Mr. Arbós had selected the D major Sinfonietta of Ernesto Halffter Escriche. So far as we recall, this is the first composition of Halffter's to be heard in Boston except the "Quartettino per archi," which the Flonzaley Quartet introduced two years ago. The Sinfonietta confirmed the excellent impression of the composer formed on that occasion. There has been some disputation whether the manner is more like that of Bach, of Handel or of Haydn. There are evidences of all these influences, and of that of Mozart as well. But what we like about the piece is its individuality and restraint.

Perhaps we have heard too much Honegger of late as well as too much Wagner. At all events, we are relieved to encounter again this young Spaniard, who can write a score that depends for its effect neither on extra-musical sounds nor on feeble echoes of the masters. Halffter does not find it necessary to issue a manifesto with his work, explaining that it implies a new theory of æsthetics, or, on the other hand, a "return" to this, that or the other classic school. Simply he sets down his own musical thoughts (and pleasing thoughts they are), using the forms that have been bequeathed to him by his predecessors, and employing modern harmonic and rhythmic resources with discretion.

If he does not require a swollen orchestra, reinforced with strange percussion devices, neither does he strive for effect by approximating the negation of sound. His score strikes us as honest, expert, transparent, witty and fanciful. We shall not be so reckless as to declare that the mantle of Bach is about to fall upon the shoulders of Halffter, but we are certain that the works of Halffter we have heard are in the direct classical line, and we have a notion that they are more significant than many opi of better advertised composers.

Ravel's "Alborado del Grazioso," vividly performed, closed the first half of the program. Thereafter we were made to feel that it is possible to hear too much Spanish music at a sitting. This feeling was roused by the sequence of Albeniz's "Fête-Dieu à Séville" and "Triana," orchestrated by Mr. Arbós; Turina's "La Procession del Rocio," and three dances from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat." The audience nevertheless received gladly this rather theatrical fare, and remained to pay further tribute to the conductor.

MONITOR L. A. S.
JAN. 19 - '29

Post Jan. 19

SYMPHONY RESPONDS TO ARBOS

Spanish Programme Seems to Please Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Returning as guest conductor to an orchestra which 25 years ago he served for a season as concert-master, Enrique Fernandez-Arbos of Madrid directed the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon. It is in the interpretation of the music of his own countrymen that Mr. Arbos by common consent excels as conductor and, save for Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude and Ravel's would-be Spanish "Alborada del Grazioso," the programme ran wholly to pieces by Spanish composers.

HAS CHANGED BUT LITTLE

To speak first of the man, Mr. Arbos has changed outwardly but little since last he appeared in Symphony Hall. His hair retains its raven blackness though his beard has grayed, and a slight stoop makes him seem a shade less tall. In conducting he is energetic, clear-cut, generally economical of motion and a trifle angular. By report the orchestra warms to him as a man. Clearly it responded to him as musician and as conductor.

In return he expressed his pleasure in the band by graciously bidding the players to rise at the end of nearly every number on the programme. The audience participated in and heightened this general good-will; from first to last the applause yesterday was more than commonly plentiful and hearty.

His Spanish Pieces

In detail Mr. Arbos' Spanish pieces were a Sinfonietta by the 24-year-old Ernesto Halffter, composed when that precociously gifted pupil of De Falla was but 19; two numbers from Albeniz's piano suite "Iberia" in Mr. Arbos' orchestration; Turina's "La Procession del Rocio"; and three dances from De Falla's ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Of these pieces Halffter's Sinfonietta was new to Boston, as were Mr. Arbos' transcriptions, and Turina's "luminous fresco," to use a phrase bestowed upon it by Debussy, had been played here only by the orchestra of the MacDowell Club and by the People's Symphony.

Halffter's Sinfonietta in its general character suggests the suites of Handel and Bach, but it is Spanish for all that, and an extraordinary work to have come from so young a composer. There is some repetitiousness but no uncertainty of touch.

Albeniz Very Effective

More conventionally Spanish is Turina's Tableau Symphonique, brilliant and colorful. So effective were Albeniz's pieces, the Triana especially, in Mr. Arbos' version, that it would be a pleasure to hear others of the set. Ravel's "Alborado" is diverting; and so are De Falla's dances, although this music is less distinctive than the composer's "El Amor Brujo."

As programme-making per se such preponderance of music of a single type might be questioned, but there was no mistaking the audience's enjoyment of the concert. The performances of this Spanish music amply confirmed Mr. Arbos' reputation in it. Keenly he feels, vividly he imparts its rhythm and color. The "Meistersinger" Prelude, however, was too shrilled-voiced, tonally too high-pitched, over-violent in the brass. Wagner with sauce espagnole, a stimulating dish for those who relish a new point of view and are not disturbed by racial contradictions.

EVENING AMERICAN

JANUARY 19, 1929

ARBOS LEADS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Spanish music interpreted by a Spanish musician, Enrique F. Arbos, was the point of chief interest at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last week Honegger, French composer and conductor, led the concerts. This week Mr. Arbos brought to us gentle music from the land of torrid sunshine, also music of the dance—sometimes passionate, sometimes boisterous, but always gay.

After a virile interpretation of Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," a Sinfonietta by the Spaniard Halffter (first time in Boston), gave us opportunity to judge the merits of both composer and conductor. Precision of beat and respect for artistic proportion marked the excellent interpretation of the conductor, and to him we are devoid of sensationalism, clear in its intent, essentially melodic in character and above all having every indication of being sincerely expressed.

Unquestionably there is yet other new music, not "modern" that we should be permitted to hear.

The composer, only 24 years old, shows marked feeling for orchestral writing and feeling in the use of instruments, though the unity of the composition was disturbed by a last movement almost frivolous, seemingly out of place.

To the next numbers, "Alborada del Grazioso" by Ravel, and an arrangement of Albeniz's "Iberia" by the conductor, Mr. Arbos, there was brought out a beautiful panorama of colors that only the palette of a Spaniard could display. "La Procession del Rocio" by Turina and three dances by De Falla closed the program. Once again has a visiting artist made a distinct contribution to the dignity and superb musicianship of the orchestra, rare as these occasions have been.

GLOBE JAN 20

Music Notes and Comment

Mr Koussevitzky returns to his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony tomorrow night at the third Monday concert, for which he has set a program of repertory pieces. Yehudi Menuhin will not appear at this concert, and his appearance in the Sunday concerts is still not definitely settled.

For the regular series Mr Koussevitzky plans to repeat Bloch's "America," which he is going also to perform in New York next week. The only other number will be Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, a work hitherto neglected by Koussevitzky, who has let it go unheard since he came here, though it is one of the greatest of classic symphonies.

Bos. HERALD-
AY, JANUARY 20, 1929

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 14th regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Koussevitzky will then repeat Ernest Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America," which had its first performance here several weeks ago. This prize winning composition, which has been played all over the United States, is dedicated to Abraham Lincoln and Walt Whitman, and follows the growth of this country from the day of the Indians and early settlers, through the civil war, to the present jazz age, finally looking towards a more ideal future and culminating in a hymn to America. The hymn will be sung as before by a chorus —the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club.

Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct as an opening number Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony in C major. It has not yet been heard here under his direction.

Again "Classics" And Koussevitzky

ON a page of the program for the third of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared a notice explaining the plan of the Tuesday afternoon series: "Mr. Koussevitsky will again, as last season, make five programs from the "classics." The word is intended in its broader sense to signify both the works which have held their place in the general estimation for a considerable time, and the newer works which today are accepted as models of their kind."

That is an admirable paragraph. It applies equally to the concerts of the Monday series, and the concert last evening was a most fitting example. Of the works that have held their place for a considerable time, few can be more representative than Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Franck's "Symphony in D Minor." And for a newer work—broadly speaking—what could better serve as model of its kind than Ravel's Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz"—the sum, essence, body, heart and, mayhap, soul, of all waltzes of all time? In so planning a concert, moreover, Mr. Koussevitzky exposes the rudiments and essentials of balanced program-making. For beginning, the gentle loveliness of Schubert; for closing, the sonorotie of Father Franck; in between, the glittering surfaces, sardonic harmonies and provocative rhythms of which Ravel is so notable a master. That Mr. Koussevitzky understands the audiences of Monday, or of any day—was the evidence of the applause. Upon "The Unfinished Symphony," and upon the conductor and orchestra which manifested it for them, the devotees of Schubert—and they are as legion as mankind—lavished their favor. Mr. Koussevitzky, called back to the stage, brought the orchestra to their feet. The exulting euphonies of Franck's symphony—ending a concert of unashamed and outspoken "standard pieces"—produced a like result. Nor was Ravel neglected in these tributes. The implication of the burst of clapping following "The Waltz" was as plain as could be: "Bravo! We like that, too; and everything you give us." Again conductor and orchestra stood together.

There are other points of merit in Mr. Koussevitzky's choice of numbers. Every piece came from the easily accessible repertory shelves. Mr. Koussevitzky has extracted each of them on several occasions this season. Consequently, every note is many times familiar to conductor and musicians alike. Upon these numbers they may spend their finest abilities and most expressive ardors. The occasion is not one of an important "first performance," with its attendant anxieties, hopes and promises. There are those who will say that the audiences of Monday evenings are doubly favored not only because they hear the masterpieces of musical literature which please them, but because they are present on those occasions when, through force of circumstances, the orchestra is in a state of super-efficiency.

It was in such a state that the orchestra played last evening. Schubert's Symphony was refined until it became the very essence of musical beauty. The inspiration of the composer and the intuition of the conductor united in a single, gently moving stream. The musicians, their ensemble technique perfected to a point unrivalled before this day of transcendental orchestras, played as though the resistance of instruments were nothing. To what contrasting result was this same technique responsible in Ravel's "The Waltz!" If this composition has failed to "come off" properly in previous performance this season, last evening it wanted nothing in nervous vitality, in mocking accent, in frenzied pace, in seductive glamour, in slithering and dazzling instrumental color. For these sophisticated measures there scarcely could have been better contrast than the virtuous and sonorous symphony of Franck. Mr. Koussevitzky opened their arms to this music. . . . There have been some exceptional terms set down here. The performance was one of exceptional brilliance.

N. M. J.

TRANS. JAN. 22

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Schubert's "Unfinished" and Franck in D Minor

Globe Jan 22

Mr Koussevitzky put two familiar symphonies on the program of last night's Boston Symphony concert, the third of the current Monday series, so that the program :an as follows: "Unfinished Symphony," Schubert; "La Valse," Ravel; Symphony in D minor, Franck. The audience applauded typical Koussevitzky interpretations of these familiar pieces with more warmth than they would have shown for any save the most celebrated of soloists.

Of the music on last night's program there is little that needs be said. Schubert has been discussed from every angle, possible and impossible, during the past months, because an ingenious advertising man beguiled the musical world into celebrating the centenary of his death with a pomp and circumstance which would have amazed him. But the way in which centenaries are advertised, or pass, as others have done, unnoted, is not a musical story.

Franck has long passed, on the word of his pupil, d'Indy, for a sainted mystic writing music fit only to be heard in an imaginary cathedral. There are those who think that Franck was human, perhaps all too human, musically, akin spiritually to Liszt rather than to Palestrina. Among them, if last night's performance may serve as proof, is Mr Koussevitzky. His possibly overdramatized version of the one symphony Franck left behind him was human to the point of hysterics.

Ravel's "La Valse" served, as usual, to display the virtuosity of conductor and orchestra. But, as before, one wished Mr Koussevitzky would note and obey the direction "In the movement of a Viennese waltz" written by Ravel in the score and exemplified by the composer's interpretation of the piece here last season.

Mr Koussevitzky's way with music is not, however, to obey the composer's directions with humility and scholarly devotion. On the contrary, he invariably gives to the audience just what he himself feels in the music. Last night he again seemed to feel that Schubert wrote his "Unfinished Symphony" in the vein later cultivated with great popular success by Tchaikovsky in the celebrated "Pathetic Symphony," and conducted accordingly. When the Schubert symphony was played this season in the regular series Mr Koussevitzky interpreted it more lyrically and less dramatically. Last night's version was the one he first revealed to a somewhat astonished, but for the most part delighted, audience here several seasons ago.

Mr Koussevitzky's way with an orchestra, as last night's concert, the first following his midseason vacation, proved, is to emphasize climaxes, and to polish those outstanding bits of the score that the audience is sure to notice, to whip himself, players and listeners into an emotional frenzy, in which little matters like precision of ensemble, clean-cut attacks, playing exactly the right notes at exactly the right instant, are sometimes neglected.

The conductor's way with music greatly pleases the majority in his audiences. There is, however, a recalcitrant minority, which emits grumbles from time to time.

The next concert in this series will be given Feb 11.

P. R.

Post Jan 22

THIRD OF SYMPHONY MONDAYS

Orchestra Again Under Koussevitzky's Master Hand

Fresh from the fortnight's vacation which he now takes in the midst of each Symphony season, Mr. Koussevitzky last evening led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the third of the supplementary series of Monday evening concerts.

IN FAMILIAR NUMBERS

Although last evening's audience had not been deprived of Mr. Koussevitzky's presence it received him and applauded him quite as cordially as though he had returned to them from a temporary absence. And after an interim of guest-conductors at the Symphony concerts proper it was a pleasure again to hear the orchestra under the direction of the man who has brought it to its present high estate.

The programme of last evening, made of pieces very much in the current repertory of the orchestra, listed Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Ravel's choreographic poem "The Waltz" and the symphony of Cesar Franck.

The performance last evening of Ravel's enticing composition was one of unusual brilliance. However unorthodox Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Schubert's symphony, it is both interesting and effective in its own right. And as for the symphony of Franck, with each repetition of the piece Mr. Koussevitzky seems to come closer to a sympathetic understanding of the composer, and as he does so his interpretation of the Symphony gains in eloquence as well as in fidelity to its author's purposes and intentions.

REPEAT EPIC "AMERICA" AT SYMPHONY

JAN 26 EVE. AMER

By MOSES SMITH

An audience which had not seen Serge Koussevitzky in almost a month greeted him warmly at the first of this week's symphony concerts at Symphony Hall. He signalized his return to the conductor's stand by arranging an unusual program containing only two works, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Ernest Bloch's prize-winning "America," which was first played here five weeks ago.

The performance of the symphony was of almost unspeakable perfection—we say "unspeakable" because it was a nervous strain on the listener to hear the last movement played at such a dazzling rate of speed. You felt that the thing was going to fall to pieces at any moment. Yet it never did, so remarkably has this orchestra been shaped by Mr. Koussevitzky.

The first movement, according to his reading, had a somewhat Beethovenish character in spots, and the opening of the slow movement dragged. These things aside, the symphony was played as it has not been since the legendary days "before the war." You might have felt, on looking at the massed strings, that there were too many of them. But in actual performance they lacked not a whit of suppleness and, on the other hand, gave added body to this masterpiece.

It would be fashionable to say that a second—or, in the case of this writer, third—hearing of the Bloch Rhapsody shows up even more the reputed weaknesses of the score. It has even been called insincere. Never having posed as a model of fashion, I can blithely set down my renewed impression that the work, while not a masterpiece, has some very great music in it; that the first two movements are finely conceived; and that only the last part of the third movement, containing the now notorious anthem, is disappointing.

To say that the piece is a hodgepodge of many tunes is a criticism equally applicable to Chabrier's "Espana" and similar works by Ravel, Rimsky-Korsakoff and others. Yet these things continue to live in the concert hall.

TWO NUMBERS FILL SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bloch's 'America,' Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony

GLOBE JAN 26

Patriotic Close of Bloch's Prize Composition Wins Applause

Two numbers filled the program of yesterday's Symphony concert, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and Bloch's "America," the prize composition first performed at these concerts Dec 21 and 22 last. Mr Koussevitzky, who was one of the judges in the contest arranged by Musical America, has several times publicly proclaimed his belief that Bloch's score is a masterpiece.

Reviewers in Boston, as in the other cities where the work was given simultaneously last month, for the most part expressed disappointment with the music. Yesterday, as at the first performance, the audience, stirred by the patriotic climax on a new national anthem which closes Bloch's "epic rhapsody," applauded loud and long. Next week Mr Koussevitzky will conduct "America" in New York, where some dissatisfaction seems to have been felt with previous performances conducted by Mr Damrosch.

There is no need to say more about Bloch's music than that the second hearing strengthened the unfavorable impression of its musical value explained at length in the Globe of Dec 22. Whether Mr Koussevitzky and the judges, or the reviewers for leading newspapers in most American cities boasting symphony orchestras, are right about the merits and demerits of Bloch's Rhapsody, only time will tell. What really determines the place in musical history of a new composition is whether it can stand the test of repeated performances. The 20th rather than the second hearing of Bloch's "America" will give occasion for prophecy as to its ultimate place in history.

Mozart's C major symphony, usually called, nobody knows quite why "Jupiter," is one of the few symphonies which by common consent rank with the best of Beethoven's. It is even possible that in another 50 years this and the G minor symphony written in the same year, 1788, may put Mozart's fame above that of Beethoven. Certainly there are now many young modernists who worship the Mozart of these symphonies, of the operas "Don Giovanni" and "Le Nozze di Figaro," and scoff at the Beethoven of the "Eroica" and the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony.

When they become austere, baldheaded authorities, they will no doubt worship Mozart still, and dislike Beethoven even more. Then perhaps a new generation of young modernists will rediscover Beethoven, and feel that to exalt him they must disparage Mozart. Less supercilious persons will no doubt continue to do as they now do, and enjoy both Mozart and Beethoven without seeking to compare them.

After the doors of the hall had been closed at the beginning of yesterday's concert and the audience had settled down, the orchestra rose as one man. There was a dramatic pause. Then Mr Koussevitzky, bowing and smiling, made his way amid the plaudits of his men and of the audience, to his place at the conductor's stand. One wondered for a moment why his entrance was so dramatic. Then one remembered that he had been absent at the last two concerts in this series on his midseason vacation. But when he conducted last Monday in the Monday series there was no unusual demonstration.

This little incident was characteristic of the man. Given the slightest pretext for dramatizing a situation or a piece of music, it is his nature to emphasize whatever theatrical quality can be found in it. His success as a conductor is bound up with this histrionic instinct. It has been said of many celebrated actors that whatever spot they occupied became the center of the stage. Mr Koussevitzky is always in the center of the stage at the concerts he conducts, and nobody in the audience can ignore him.

In Mozart's symphony he felt the dramatic intensity of the first movement, the pathos of the slow movement, the grace of the minuet, and the brilliance of the finale, and made his audience feel these qualities. His reading was not in accordance at all points with the score. He found in the music things that no other conductor before Koussevitzky had detected there. He was not especially concerned that every player should play exactly the right note at exactly the right instant, tolerating slipshod details of performance that would have brought down on the careless players the wrath of a Toscanini or a Muck.

But to the vast majority of the audience, who care only for generalized emotional impressions from music, who do not notice small details, who do not particularly heed traditions, who come to the Symphony concerts because of Koussevitzky rather than because of Mozart, yesterday's performance was undoubtedly stirring and delightful.

With Bloch's rhapsody music better suited than Mozart's to Koussevitzky's talents and method, he was even more successful in wringing from the score the last drop of emotion. Here his only error was failure to bring out clearly some of the American tunes quoted, as, for instance, "Old Hundred" and "Dixie," which those listeners who read the analysis in the programs were listening for, and which no native American would fail to recognize.

There are no Symphony concerts in Boston next week.

P. R.

Jan 26 MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Koussevitzky, returning from his vacation of a fortnight, conducted yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall the 14th concert (48th season) of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program comprised Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America."

The symphony, a flawless work of art and beauty was played in flawless manner. The performance was the first under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction at these concerts.

What is more to be said? Yet one may ask if "The marriage of Figaro" was not in Mozart's head when he wrote the second section of the opening Allegro. One can hear Susanna roguishly singing, mocking the court, or arousing Figaro's jealousy Has there not too much been said about the marvelous display of science in the construction of the Finale? The wonder of it is that this display does not impress the hearers unduly. To him it is merely gay and charming music. It ravishes his ear without his taking interest in the technical devices, even if he could recognize and understand them. If the title should be "Symphony in C major with the fugue," the word "fugue" would not fill his soul with dismal foreboding. There has been only one Mozart, as there has been only one Handel.

It is not known who gave the title "Jupiter" to this symphony. There is nothing in the music that reminds one of Jupiter Tonans, Jupiter Fulgurator, Jupiter Pluvius; or of the god, who assuming various disguises, came down to earth, where by his adventures with women, semi-divine or mortals of common clay, he excited the jealous rage of Juno. The music is not of an Olympian mood. It is intensely human in its loveliness and its gaiety.

There are several reasons why Mr. Bloch's rhapsody should gain momentary popularity. First of all it has a story attached to the music; the audience is told what the composer attempted to and what it is to expect. There is attentive listening so that "Old Hundred" shall not go by unrecognized. There is joy when the orchestra plays "Pop Goes the Weasle" for the Virginia reel. This or that hearer hums "Old Folks at Home" when he hears the melody from the orchestra. In the third section there is a forcible reminder of an apartment house in process of construction and one Bostonian noble dame may whisper to another: "Do you think they'll allow them to go up on Arlington street, spoil the skyline and ruin the Public Garden? What a shame!"

Yes, this Rhapsody is panoramic music therefore more to be enjoyed by many than music that is only music. And so there are persons who look on anecdoted paintings, as Frith's "Derby Day" and "The Railway Station," as triumphs of art.

Not that Mr. Bloch's rhapsody is wholly without some fine or impressive pages.

The opening of the second section with its introductory solo for the English horn establishes a mood. The long crescendo leading to the anthem is well contrived and powerful, but what a little mouse to come out of this mountainous preparation! There was a Grecian gentleman who apologized for the stateliness and pomp of the funeral procession when the corpse was only his little 2-year-old girl. Does Mr. Bloch really believe that he has invented the anthem to be sung by all Americans when their hearts are aglow with patriotism? Or was he exhausted by the crescendo of preparation? Did his Muse forsake him, saying: "You have been fortunate with borrowed themes; now let's see you compose one for your grand climax?" O lame and impotent conclusion.

The singers were those at the first performance on the 21st of last December: Members of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Cub.

The concert wil be repeated tonight.

Next week the orchestra will give concerts in Baltimore, Richmond, Washington, New York, Brooklyn and Hartford. The program of Feb. 8, 9 will be as follows: Bach, Brandenburg concerto No. 4 for violin, two flutes and strings. Mozart, piano concerto, A major (Nicolai Orloff, pianist). Strauss, "Also sprach Zarathustra."

Programs to Hand JAN.

From Mr. Koussevitzky, for t[illegible] of the supplementary matinées o[illegible] Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Feb

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Symphony in C major, No. 41, "Jupiter" Mozart
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica" Beethoven

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, Feb. 7:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Symphony in C major, No. 41, "Jupiter" Mozart
"Clouds" and "Fêtes" from The Nocturnes Debussy
Gymnopédics ..... Satie-Debussy
Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz" ..... Ravel

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Feb. 8 and 9:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Concerto in A major for Piano with Orchestra ..... Mozart
Pianist: Nicolai Orlov
Tone-Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" .. Strauss

TRANS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The second of the Monday night concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra was conducted last evening in Symphony hall by Mr. Koussevitzky. The program contained nothing of alarm; on the contrary, the selections were Schubert's "unfinished" Symphony, Ravel's "The Waltz," and Cesar Franck's Symphony. These compositions are familiar and have often been discussed. They were none the less welcomed by the audience, whose enjoyment of the music itself and the performance was evident.

Schubert's symphony, which fortunately was not finished, so that the hearer is left with the thought of the charming lyricism of the slow movement, is well contrasted with Franck's in which the anxiety and doubt expressed in the opening allegro are answered by the jubilation of the finale. There are two ways of understanding Ravel's "Waltz": one of a Viennese waltz, with introduction and coda; one as a symphonic poem with the chief motif in waltz rhythm, but with slackening and accelerating the pace. Mr. Koussevitzky prefers the second manner, and thus gives more importance perhaps to the music than it deserves if it simply is taken in the Viennese manner, or as a parody, as has been suggested by some. The orchestral performance was brilliant throughout.

Again "Classics" And Koussevitzky

ON a page of the program for the third of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared a notice explaining the plan of the Tuesday afternoon series: "Mr. Koussevitsky will again, as last season, make five programs from the "classics." The word is intended in its broader sense to signify both the works which have held their place in the general estimation for a considerable time, and the newer works which today are accepted as models of their kind."

That is an admirable paragraph. It applies equally to the concerts of the Monday series, and the concert last evening was a most fitting example. Of the works that have held their place for a considerable time, few can be more representative than Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Franck's "Symphony in D Minor." And for a newer work—broadly speaking—what could better serve as model of its kind than Ravel's Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz"—the sum, essence, body, heart and, mayhap, soul, of all waltzes of all time? In so planning a concert, moreover, Mr. Koussevitzky exposes the rudiments and essentials of balanced program-making. For beginning, the gentle loveliness of Schubert; for closing, the sonorities of Father Franck; in between, the glittering surfaces, sardonic harmonies and provocative rhythms of which Ravel is so notable a master. That Mr. Koussevitzky understands the audiences of Monday, or of any day—was the evidence of the applause. Upon "The Unfinished Symphony," and upon the conductor and orchestra which manifested it for them, the devotees of Schubert—and they are as legion as mankind—lavished their favor. Mr. Koussevitzky, called back to the stage, brought the orchestra to their feet. The exulting euphonies of Franck's symphony—ending a concert of unashamed and outspoken "standard pieces"—produced a like result. Nor was Ravel neglected in these tributes. The implication of the burst of clapping following "The Waltz" was as plain as could be: "Bravo! We like that, too; and everything you give us." Again conductor and orchestra stood together.

There are other points of merit in Mr. Koussevitzky's choice of numbers. Every piece came from the easily accessible repertory shelves. Mr. Koussevitzky has extracted each of them on several occasions this season. Consequently, every note is many times familiar to conductor and musicians alike. Upon these numbers they may spend their finest abilities and most expressive ardors. The occasion is not one of an important "first performance," with its attendant anxieties, hopes and promises. There are those who will say that the audiences of Monday evenings are doubly favored not only because they hear the masterpieces of musical literature which please them, but because they are present on those occasions when, through force of circumstances, the orchestra is in a state of super-efficiency.

It was in such a state that the orchestra played last evening. Schubert's Symphony was refined until it became the very essence of musical beauty. The inspiration of the composer and the intuition of the conductor united in a single, gently moving stream. The musicians, their ensemble technique perfected to a point unrivalled before this day of transcendental orchestras, played as though the resistance of instruments were nothing. To what contrasting result was this same technique responsible in Ravel's "The Waltz!" If this composition has failed to "come off" properly in previous performance this season, last evening it wanted nothing in nervous vitality, in mocking accent, in frenzied pace, in seductive glamour, in slithering and dazzling instrumental color. For these sophisticated measures there scarcely could have been better contrast than the virtuous and sonorous symphony of Franck. Mr. Koussevitzky opened their arms to this music. . . . There have been some exceptional terms set down here. The performance was one of exceptional brilliance.

N. M. J.

TRANS. JAN. 22

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Schubert's "Unfinished" and Franck in D Minor

Globe Jan 22

Mr Koussevitzky put two familiar symphonies on the program of last night's Boston Symphony concert, the third of the current Monday series, so that the program ran as follows: "Unfinished Symphony," Schubert; "La Valse," Ravel; Symphony in D minor, Franck. The audience applauded typical Koussevitzky interpretations of these familiar pieces with more warmth than they would have shown for any save the most celebrated of soloists.

Of the music on last night's program there is little that needs be said. Schubert has been discussed from every angle, possible and impossible, during the past months, because an ingenious advertising man beguiled the musical world into celebrating the centenary of his death with a pomp and circumstance which would have amazed him. But the way in which centenaries are advertised, or pass, as others have done, unnoted, is not a musical story.

Franck has long passed, on the word of his pupil, d'Indy, for a sainted mystic writing music fit only to be heard in an imaginary cathedral. There are those who think that Franck was human, perhaps all too human, musically, akin spiritually to Liszt rather than to Palestrina. Among them, if last night's performance may serve as proof, is Mr Koussevitzky. His possibly overdramatized version of the one symphony Franck left behind him was human to the point of hysterics.

Ravel's "La Valse" served, as usual, to display the virtuosity of conductor and orchestra. But, as before, one wished Mr Koussevitzky would note and obey the direction "In the movement of a Viennese waltz" written by Ravel in the score and exemplified by the composer's interpretation of the piece here last season.

Mr Koussevitzky's way with music is not, however, to obey the composer's directions with humility and scholarly devotion. On the contrary, he invariably gives to the audience just what he himself feels in the music. Last night he again seemed to feel that Schubert wrote his "Unfinished Symphony" in the vein later cultivated with great popular success by Tchaikovsky in the celebrated "Pathetic Symphony," and conducted accordingly. When the Schubert symphony was played this season in the regular series Mr Koussevitzky interpreted it more lyrically and less dramatically. Last night's version was the one he first revealed to a somewhat astonished, but for the most part delighted, audience here several seasons ago.

Mr Koussevitzky's way with an orchestra, as last night's concert, the first following his midseason vacation, proved, is to emphasize climaxes, and to polish those outstanding bits of the score that the audience is sure to notice, to whip himself, players and listeners into an emotional frenzy, in which little matters like precision of ensemble, clean-cut attacks, playing exactly the right notes at exactly the right instant, are sometimes neglected.

The conductor's way with music greatly pleases the majority in his audiences. There is, however, a recalcitrant minority, which emits grumbles from time to time.

The next concert in this series will be given Feb 11.

P. R.

Programs to Hand JAN.

From Mr. Koussevitzky, for t[illegible] of the supplementary matinées o[illegible] Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Feb[illegible]:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Symphony in C major, No. 41, "Jupiter" Mozart
Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Eroica" Beethoven

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening, Feb. 7:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Symphony in C major, No. 41, "Jupiter" Mozart
"Clouds" and "Fêtes" from The Nocturnes Debussy
Gymnopédies ..... Satie-Debussy
Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz" ..... Ravel

From Mr. Koussevitzky for the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Feb. 8 and 9:

Brandenburg Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra ..... Bach
Concerto in A major for Piano with Orchestra ..... Mozart
Pianist: Nicolai Orlov
Tone-Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" .. Strauss

TRANS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The second of the Monday night concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra was conducted last evening in Symphony hall by Mr. Koussevitzky. The program contained nothing of alarm; on the contrary, the selections were Schubert's "unfinished" Symphony, Ravel's "The Waltz," and Cesar Franck's Symphony. These compositions are familiar and have often been discussed. They were none the less well comed by the audience, whose enjoyment of the music itself and the performance was evident.

Schubert's symphony, which fortunately was not finished, so that the hearer is left with the thought of the charming lyricism of the slow movement, is well contrasted with Franck's, in which the anxiety and doubt expressed in the opening allegro are answered by the jubilation of the finale. There are two ways of understanding Ravel's "Waltz": one of a Viennese waltz, with introduction and coda; one as a symphonic poem with the chief motif in waltz rhythm, but with slackening and accelerating the pace. Mr. Koussevitzky prefers the second manner, and thus gives more importance perhaps to the music than it deserves if it simply is taken in the Viennese manner, or as a parody, as has been suggested by some. The orchestral performance was brilliant throughout.

Post Jan 22

THIRD OF SYMPHONY MONDAYS

Orchestra Again Under Koussevitzky's Master Hand

Fresh from the fortnight's vacation which he now takes in the midst of each Symphony season, Mr. Koussevitzky last evening led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the third of the supplementary series of Monday evening concerts.

IN FAMILIAR NUMBERS

Although last evening's audience had not been deprived of Mr. Koussevitzky's presence it received him and applauded him quite as cordially as though he had returned to them from a temporary absence. And after an interim of guest-conductors at the Symphony concerts proper it was a pleasure again to hear the orchestra under the direction of the man who has brought it to its present high estate.

The programme of last evening, made of pieces very much in the current repertory of the orchestra, listed Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Ravel's choreographic poem "The Waltz" and the symphony of Cesar Franck.

The performance last evening of Ravel's enticing composition was one of unusual brilliance. However unorthodox Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Schubert's symphony, it is both interesting and effective in its own right. And as for the symphony of Franck, with each repetition of the piece Mr. Koussevitzky seems to come closer to a sympathetic understanding of the composer, and as he does so his interpretation of the Symphony gains in eloquence as well as in fidelity to its author's purposes and intentions.

REPEAT EPIC "AMERICA" AT JAN 26 SYMPHONY EVE.

By MOSES SMITH

An audience which had not seen Serge Koussevitzky in almost a month greeted him warmly at the first of this week's symphony concerts at Symphony Hall. He signalized his return to the conductor's stand by arranging an unusual program containing only two works, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Ernest Bloch's prize-winning "America," which was first played here five weeks ago.

The performance of the symphony was of almost unspeakable perfection—we say "unspeakable" because it was a nervous strain on the listener to hear the last movement played at such a dazzling rate of speed. You felt that the thing was going to fall to pieces at any moment. Yet it never did, so remarkably has this orchestra been shaped by Mr. Koussevitzky.

The first movement, according to his reading, had a somewhat Beethovenish character in spots, and the opening of the slow movement dragged. These things aside, the symphony was played as it has not been since the legendary days "before the war." You might have felt, on looking at the massed strings, that there were too many of them. But in actual performance they lacked not a whit of suppleness and, on the other hand, gave added body to this masterpiece.

It would be fashionable to say that a second—or, in the case of this writer, third—hearing of the Bloch Rhapsody shows up even more the reputed weaknesses of the score. It has even been called insincere. Never having posed as a model of fashion, I can blithely set down my renewed impression that the work, while not a masterpiece, has some very great music in it; that the first two movements are finely conceived; and that only the last part of the third movement, containing the now notorious anthem, is disappointing.

To say that the piece is a hodgepodge of many tunes is a criticism equally applicable to Chabrier's "Espana" and similar works by Ravel, Rimsky-Korsakoff and others. Yet these things continue to live in the concert hall.

TWO NUMBERS FILL SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bloch's 'America,' Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony

GLOBE JAN 26

Patriotic Close of Bloch's Prize Composition Wins Applause

Two numbers filled the program of yesterday's Symphony concert, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and Bloch's "America," the prize composition first performed at these concerts Dec 21 and 22 last. Mr Koussevitzky, who was one of the judges in the contest arranged by Musical America, has several times publicly proclaimed his belief that Bloch's score is a masterpiece.

Reviewers in Boston, as in the other cities where the work was given simultaneously last month, for the most part expressed disappointment with the music. Yesterday, as at the first performance, the audience, stirred by the patriotic climax on a new national anthem which closes Bloch's "epic rhapsody," applauded loud and long. Next week Mr Koussevitzky will conduct "America" in New York, where some dissatisfaction seems to have been felt with previous performances conducted by Mr Damrosch.

There is no need to say more about Bloch's music than that the second hearing strengthened the unfavorable impression of its musical value explained at length in the Globe of Dec 22. Whether Mr Koussevitzky and the judges, or the reviewers for leading newspapers in most American cities boasting symphony orchestras, are right about the merits and demerits of Bloch's Rhapsody, only time will tell. What really determines the place in musical history of a new composition is whether it can stand the test of repeated performances. The 20th rather than the second hearing of Bloch's "America" will give occasion for prophecy as to its ultimate place in history.

Mozart's C major symphony, usually called, nobody knows quite why "Jupiter," is one of the few symphonies which by common consent rank with the best of Beethoven's. It is even possible that in another 50 years this and the G minor symphony written in the same year, 1788, may put Mozart's fame above that of Beethoven. Certainly there are now many young modernists who worship the Mozart of these symphonies, of the operas "Don Giovanni" and "Le Nozze di Figaro," and scoff at the Beethoven of the "Eroica" and the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony.

When they become austere, bald-headed authorities, they will no doubt worship Mozart still, and dislike Beethoven even more. Then perhaps a new generation of young modernists will rediscover Beethoven, and feel that to exalt him they must disparage Mozart. Less supercilious persons will no doubt continue to do as they now do, and enjoy both Mozart and Beethoven without seeking to compare them.

After the doors of the hall had been closed at the beginning of yesterday's concert and the audience had settled down, the orchestra rose as one man. There was a dramatic pause. Then Mr Koussevitzky, bowing and smiling, made his way amid the plaudits of his men and of the audience, to his place at the conductor's stand. One wondered for a moment why his entrance was so dramatic. Then one remembered that he had been absent at the last two concerts in this series on his midseason vacation. But when he conducted last Monday in the Monday series there was no unusual demonstration.

This little incident was characteristic of the man. Given the slightest pretext for dramatizing a situation or a piece of music, it is his nature to emphasize whatever theatrical quality can be found in it. His success as a conductor is bound up with this histrionic instinct. It has been said of many celebrated actors that whatever spot they occupied became the center of the stage. Mr Koussevitzky is always in the center of the stage at the concerts he conducts, and nobody in the audience can ignore him.

In Mozart's symphony he felt the dramatic intensity of the first movement, the pathos of the slow movement, the grace of the minuet, and the brilliance of the finale, and made his audience feel these qualities. His reading was not in accordance at all points with the score. He found in the music things that no other conductor before Koussevitzky had detected there. He was not especially concerned that every player should play exactly the right note at exactly the right instant, tolerating slipshod details of performance that would have brought down on the careless players the wrath of a Toscanini or a Muck.

But to the vast majority of the audience, who care only for generalized emotional impressions from music, who do not notice small details, who do not particularly heed traditions, who come to the Symphony concerts because of Koussevitzky rather than because of Mozart, yesterday's performance was undoubtedly stirring and delightful.

With Bloch's rhapsody music better suited than Mozart's to Koussevitzky's talents and method, he was even more successful in wringing from the score the last drop of emotion. Here his only error was failure to bring out clearly some of the American tunes quoted, as, for instance, "Old Hundred" and "Dixie," which those listeners who read the analysis in the programs were listening for, and which no native American would fail to recognize.

There are no Symphony concerts in Boston next week.

P. R.

67 1 Herald

Jan 26 MU

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Koussevitzky, returning from his vacation of a fortnight, conducted yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall the 14th concert (48th season) of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program comprised Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Bloch's epic rhapsody, "America."

The symphony, a flawless work of art and beauty was played in flawless manner. The performance was the first under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction at these concerts.

What is more to be said? Yet one may ask if "The marriage of Figaro" was not in Mozart's head when he wrote the second section of the opening Allegro. One can hear Susanna roguishly singing, mocking the court, or arousing Figaro's jealousy Has there not too much been said about the marvelous display of science in the construction of the Finale? The wonder of it is that this display does not impress the hearers unduly. To him it is merely gay and charming music. It ravishes his ear without his taking interest in the technical devices, even if he could recognize and understand them. If the title should be "Symphony in C major with the fugue," the word "fugue" would not fill his soul with dismal foreboding. There has been only one Mozart, as there has been only one Handel.

It is not known who gave the title "Jupiter" to this symphony. There is nothing in the music that reminds one of Jupiter Tonans, Jupiter Fulgurator, Jupiter Pluvius; or of the god, who assuming various disguises, came down to earth, where by his adventures with women, semi-divine or mortals of common clay, he excited the jealous rage of Juno. The music is not of an Olympian mood. It is intensely human in its loveliness and its gaiety.

There are several reasons why Mr. Bloch's rhapsody should gain momentary popularity. First of all it has a story attached to the music; the audience is told what the composer attempted to and what it is to expect. There is attentive listening so that "Old Hundred" shall not go by unrecognized. There is joy when the orchestra plays "Pop Goes the Weasle" for the Virginia reel. This or that hearer hums "Old Folks at Home" when he hears the melody from the orchestra. In the third section there is a forcible reminder of an apartment house in process of construction and one Bostonian noble dame may whisper to another: "Do you think they'll allow them to go up on Arlington street, spoil the skyline and ruin the Public Garden? What a shame!"

Yes, this Rhapsody is panoramic music therefore more to be enjoyed by many than music that is only music. And so there are persons who look on anecdoted paintings, as Frith's "Derby Day" and "The Railway Station," as triumphs of art.

Not that Mr. Bloch's rhapsody is wholly without some fine or impressive pages.

The opening of the second section with its introductory solo for the English horn establishes a mood. The long crescendo leading to the anthem is well contrived and powerful, but what a little mouse to come out of this mountainous preparation! There was a Grecian gentleman who apologized for the stateliness and pomp of the funeral procession when the corpse was only his little 2-year-old girl. Does Mr. Bloch really believe that he has invented the anthem to be sung by all Americans when their hearts are aglow with patriotism? Or was he exhausted by the crescendo of preparation? Did his Muse forsake him, saying: "You have been fortunate with borrowed themes; now let's see you compose one for your grand climax?" O lame and impotent conclusion.

The singers were those at the first performance on the 21st of last December: Members of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club.

The concert wil be repeated tonight.

Next week the orchestra will give concerts in Baltimore, Richmond, Washington, New York, Brooklyn and Hartford. The program of Feb. 8, 9 will be as follows: Bach, Brandenburg concerto No. 4 for violin, two flutes and strings. Mozart, piano concerto, A major (Nicolai Orloff, pianist). Strauss, "Also sprach Zarathustra."

Again "Classics" And Koussevitzky

ON a page of the program for the third of the Monday evening series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared a notice explaining the plan of the Tuesday afternoon series: "Mr. Koussevitsky will again, as last season, make five programs from the "classics." The word is intended in its broader sense to signify both the works which have held their place in the general estimation for a considerable time, and the newer works which today are accepted as models of their kind."

That is an admirable paragraph. It applies equally to the concerts of the Monday series, and the concert last evening was a most fitting example. Of the works that have held their place for a considerable time, few can be more representative than Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and Franck's "Symphony in D Minor." And for a newer work—broadly speaking—what could better serve as model of its kind than Ravel's Choreographic Poem, "The Waltz"—the sum, essence, body, heart and, mayhap, soul, of all waltzes of all time? In so planning a concert, moreover, Mr. Koussevitzky exposes the rudiments and essentials of balanced program-making. For beginning, the gentle loveliness of Schubert; for closing, the sonoroties of Father Franck; in between, the glittering surfaces, sardonic harmonies and provocative rhythms of which Ravel is so notable a master. That Mr. Koussevitzky understands the audiences of Monday, or of any day—was the evidence of the applause. Upon "The Unfinished Symphony," and upon the conductor and orchestra which manifested it for them, the devotees of Schubert—and they are as legion as mankind—lavished their favor. Mr. Koussevitzky, called back to the stage, brought the orchestra to their feet. The exulting euphonies of Franck's symphony—ending a concert of unashamed and outspoken "standard pieces"—produced a like result. Nor was Ravel neglected in these tributes. The implication of the burst of clapping following "The Waltz" was as plain as could be: "Bravo! We like that, too; and everything you give us." Again conductor and orchestra stood together.

There are other points of merit in Mr. Koussevitzky's choice of numbers. Every piece came from the easily accessible repertory shelves. Mr. Koussevitzky has extracted each of them on several occasions this season. Consequently, every note is many times familiar to conductor and musicians alike. Upon these numbers they may spend their finest abilities and most expressive ardors. The occasion is not one of an important "first performance," with its attendant anxieties, hopes and promises. There are those who will say that the audiences of Monday evenings are doubly favored not only because they hear the masterpieces of musical literature which please them, but because they are present on those occasions when, through force of circumstances, the orchestra is in a state of super-efficiency.

It was in such a state that the orchestra played last evening. Schubert's Symphony was refined until it became the very essence of musical beauty. The inspiration of the composer and the intuition of the conductor united in a single, gently moving stream. The musicians, their ensemble technique perfected to a point unrivalled before this day of transcendental orchestras, played as though the resistance of instruments were nothing. To what contrasting result was this same technique responsible in Ravel's "The Waltz!" If this composition has failed to "come off" properly in previous performance this season, last evening it wanted nothing in nervous vitality, in mocking accent, in frenzied pace, in seductive glamour, in slithering and dazzling instrumental color. For these sophisticated measures there scarcely could have been better contrast than the virtuous and sonorous symphony of Franck. Mr. Koussevitzky opened their arms to this music. . . . There have been some exceptional terms set down here. The performance was one of exceptional brilliance.

N. M. J.

TRANS.
JAN. 22

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Schubert's "Unfinished" and Franck in D Minor

Globe Jan 22

Mr Koussevitzky put two familiar symphonies on the program of last night's Boston Symphony concert, the third of the current Monday series, so that the program ran as follows: "Unfinished Symphony," Schubert; "La Valse," Ravel; Symphony in D minor, Franck. The audience applauded typical Koussevitzky interpretations of these familiar pieces with more warmth than they would have shown for any save the most celebrated of soloists.

Of the music on last night's program there is little that needs be said. Schubert has been discussed from every angle, possible and impossible, during the past months, because an ingenious advertising man beguiled the musical world into celebrating the centenary of his death with a pomp and circumstance which would have amazed him. But the way in which centenaries are advertised, or pass, as others have done, unnoted, is not a musical story.

Franck has long passed, on the word of his pupil, d'Indy, for a sainted mystic writing music fit only to be heard in an imaginary cathedral. There are those who think that Franck was human, perhaps all too human, musically, akin spiritually to Liszt rather than to Palestrina. Among them, if last night's performance may serve as proof, is Mr Koussevitzky. His possibly overdramatized version of the one symphony Franck left behind him was human to the point of hysterics.

Ravel's "La Valse" served, as usual, to display the virtuosity of conductor and orchestra. But, as before, one wished Mr Koussevitzky would note and obey the direction "In the movement of a Viennese waltz" written by Ravel in the score and exemplified by the composer's interpretation of the piece here last season.

Mr Koussevitzky's way with music is not, however, to obey the composer's directions with humility and scholarly devotion. On the contrary, he invariably gives to the audience just what he himself feels in the music. Last night he again seemed to feel that Schubert wrote his "Unfinished Symphony" in the vein later cultivated with great popular success by Tchaikovsky in the celebrated "Pathetic Symphony," and conducted accordingly. When the Schubert symphony was played this season in the regular series Mr Koussevitzky interpreted it more lyrically and less dramatically. Last night's version was the one he first revealed to a somewhat astonished, but for the most part delighted, audience here several seasons ago.

Mr Koussevitzky's way with an orchestra, as last night's concert, the first following his midseason vacation, proved, is to emphasize climaxes, and to polish those outstanding bits of the score that the audience is sure to notice, to whip himself, players and listeners into an emotional frenzy, in which little matters like precision of ensemble, clean-cut attacks, playing exactly the right notes at exactly the right instant, are sometimes neglected.

The conductor's way with music greatly pleases the majority in his audiences. There is, however, a recalcitrant minority, which emits grumbles from time to time.

The next concert in this series will be given Feb 11.

P. R.

THIRD OF SYMPHONY MONDAYS

Orchestra Again Under Koussevitzky's Master Hand

Fresh from the fortnight's vacation which he now takes in the midst of each Symphony season, Mr. Koussevitzky last evening led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the third of the supplementary series of Monday evening concerts.

IN FAMILIAR NUMBERS

Although last evening's audience had not been deprived of Mr. Koussevitzky's presence it received him and applauded him quite as cordially as though he had returned to them from a temporary absence. And after an interim of guest-conductors at the Symphony concerts proper it was a pleasure again to hear the orchestra under the direction of the man who has brought it to its present high estate.

The programme of last evening, made of pieces very much in the current repertory of the orchestra, listed Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Ravel's choreographic poem "The Waltz" and the symphony of Cesar Franck.

The performance last evening of Ravel's enticing composition was one of unusual brilliance. However unorthodox Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Schubert's symphony, it is both interesting and effective in its own right. And as for the symphony of Franck, with each repetition of the piece Mr. Koussevitzky seems to come closer to a sympathetic understanding of the composer, and as he does so his interpretation of the Symphony gains in eloquence as well as in fidelity to its author's purposes and intentions.

REPEAT EPIC "AMERICA" AT SYMPHONY

JAN 26 EVE.

By MOSES SMITH

An audience which had not seen Serge Koussevitzky in almost a month greeted him warmly at the first of this week's symphony concerts at Symphony Hall. He signalized his return to the conductor's stand by arranging an unusual program containing only two works, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Ernest Bloch's prize-winning "America," which was first played here five weeks ago.

The performance of the symphony was of almost unspeakable perfection—we say "unspeakable" because it was a nervous strain [illegible] the listener to hear the last [illegible]ent played at such a dazz[illegible]te of speed. You felt that [illegible]ing was going to fall to [illegible] at any moment. Yet it [illegible] did, so remarkably has this [illegible]stra been shaped by Mr. [illegible]evitzky.

[illegible] first movement, according to [illegible] reading, had a somewhat [illegible]ovenish character in spots, [illegible] the opening of the slow move[illegible] dragged. These things aside, [illegible]symphony was played as it has [illegible]been since the legendary days [illegible]ore the war." You might have [illegible] on looking at the massed [illegible]ngs, that there were too many [illegible]hem. But in actual performance [illegible]y lacked not a whit of supple[illegible]s and, on the other hand, gave [illegible]led body to this masterpiece. [illegible]t would be fashionable to say [illegible]at a second—or, in the case of [illegible]is writer, third—hearing of the [illegible]loch Rhapsody shows up even [illegible]ore the reputed weaknesses of the [illegible]core. It has even been called in[illegible]ncere. Never having posed as a [illegible]model of fashion, I can blithely set [illegible]down my renewed impression that [illegible]the work, while not a masterpiece, [illegible]has some very great music in it; that the first two movements are finely conceived; and that only the last part of the third movement, containing the now notorious anthem, is disappointing.

To say that the piece is a hodge-podge of many tunes is a criticism equally applicable to Chabrier's "Espana" and similar works by Ravel, Rimsky-Korsakoff and others. Yet these things continue to live in the concert hall.

[illegible] Comfort Hour.
[illegible]'s Song Shop.
[illegible] Color."
[illegible]ing Singers.
[illegible] Transit.
[illegible]-Stuart Hour.
[illegible] d'Or Dance Orchestra.
[illegible] and weather bulletins.
[illegible]AG, Worcester—517m.
[illegible]Astoria dinner music.
[illegible] talk.
[illegible] Comfort Hour.
[illegible]hop.
[illegible]per Hour of Music.
[illegible]ng Singers.
[illegible] time.
[illegible]rogram.
[illegible]-Stuart Hour.
[illegible]bulletins.
[illegible]CA, New York—526m.
[illegible]YC, New York—526m.
[illegible], Philadelphia—535m.
[illegible]R, Buffalo—545m.
[illegible]N, Providence—545m.
[illegible]e College Hour.
[illegible]his Gang.
[illegible]hist.
[illegible]shes.
[illegible] and his Musical Wisemen
[illegible]semble.
[illegible] Andy."
[illegible]ng.
[illegible]nd Artists' Hour.

Herald Jan 22

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The second of the Monday night concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra was conducted last evening in Symphony hall by Mr. Koussevitzky. The program contained nothing of alarm; on the contrary, the selections were Schubert's "unfinished" Symphony, Ravel's "The Waltz," and Cesar Franck's Symphony. These compositions are familiar and have often been discussed. They were none the less welcomed by the audience, whose enjoyment of the music itself and the performance was evident.

